ROBERT Earle of Salisbury, | THOMAS Earle of Suffolk,
Lord High Treasurer of | Lord Chamberlaine to His
ENGLAND, &c. | MAJESTIE.

MY most Honoured Lords, Such is the indulgence of many men, especially Paper-wasters, to their owne imperfections; that when they are receiued with Fauour, and sometimes Pitie, they value them to bee iust such things, as the Mercy and Grace of those, to whom they were giuen, hath made them: And so, by the prosperitie of one fault, become confident to commit the second. I am afraid to be found in this List: that hauing about me a conscience oftrespasse in my first Dedication of this TRANSLATION to your Honours, dare yet attempt you with the latter: All that will saue me in the Imputation, is, that I did then dedicate my selfe, with my vtmost abilities: From which, the frailities that accompany Humanitie, Errors, are not easily separated. Yet, if in this second Edition they appeare lesse, either by my own industry, or the Printers, though not all found and weeded; that very study of bettering and hand-foming the VVORKE, will (I hope) commend both it and me, to your LL. fauour: which Fauour (next to diuine Grace)! proclaim, claime, to haue beene the chearing meane, and inspiring power, enabling me to these, and more, that shortly couet the Light vnder your Honours names: At the foot of which two Pillars (may they be renowned as those of Gades) I haue written my Terme or Bound. There I wil stay, and contemplate your Vertue: which if in others breasts it finde Court, and Reuerence, in mine it hath Religion, and a Temple. And Iustice hath well provided, that such, who are not equall in Ceremonie, may yet be better in Devotion: by how much the study of Truth exceeds that of Shew.

Your LL. deuoted in all duty and service,

AN ADVERTISEMENT TO THE READER.

Gentlemen:

Hope you expect no long Apologic, either to recommend this Work, or to excuse my owne weakness. This French History hath beene a long probationer with you, & it seemeth you haue giuen it a good applause: for I heare, the Book sellers shops are unfurnished. As for my defects, I confesse ingenuously that my Labors are unworthy of your reading. But your kind acceptance of my endeauors, haue giuen me courage to continue this presumption, hoping that if I doe not merit thanks for my Labours, yet I shall procure pardon for what you shall find amisse. The Printer desiring to bring this History the third time to the Presse, importuned me to continue it to these later times, wherunto I did the more willingly yeeld, being loath that any one should vndertake my taske whilst God giueth me health and ability. I haue continued it from the death of the last French King Henry the fourth, vnto the last Peace concluded in the yere 1622. I haue not found Iohn de Serres nor Peter Mathew to translate, but haue collected it out of the best Authors I could get, which haue written of this Subiect: there is nothing of mine owne: I haue related euery thing plainly and truly without any passion, for the which my Authors shall be my warrant. I haue contracted some Articles in Treaties and Edicts, in the body of the History, but yet haue left the full sense: And

The successe of the French army in Guienne.The exploits of the Prince of Wales.

Then the Kings armies march into diuers parts, vnder the commands of the Dukes of Aniou and Berry, and the Constable Guesclin, to whose wifedom, (and especially to the Chancellor Doutmaars) they attribute the obedience of the people of Guienne, discretely praftised by them. Limoges and Cahors yeeld at the fight of the Kings armie. Carlar, Bergerac, S. Seuer, and in the end Rochel by siege: and by the successe of these Cities (reduced to the Kings obedience by force) S. Ian d'Angely, Angouleme, Xaintes, Fontenay, Parthenay, and many other townes obey voluntarily. The fortresses of Mortaigne, Lusignan and Sanzay, are added to this conquest, and in the end Tours stretcheth forth her hands to the King, and shakes off the English yoke. Whilest the Kings armie performed these happy exploits in Guienne: the Prince of Wales (a hardy and generous warrior) B to turne aside this deluge, (the which he fees falling vpon the Country of Bourdeaux) resolves to enter by another quarter, which (fearing no enemy) should be found without defence. Having made a flying campe of English and Gascons, well armed, hee slips into Auvergne, from thence into Bourbonnois and a Berry: where hauing refreshed his troopes some dayes, hee passeth into Forest; and gathering together the boates vpon the Riuer of Loire, hee passeth ouer at Marigny of Nunnes, and so crossing Malconnois, hee comes into Bourgogne: where finding all desert without victuals, all being caried into walled Townes, by the care of Philip the Kings brother,) he marcheth into Auxerrois, and from thence into Gafinois: in the end hee flayes before Espernay, with an armie of twenty thousand men, which terrifies the whole country, and takes the Towne easily, being not released.

Charles recalls his army out of Guienne, giuing the Constable Guesclin commission to stop this streame, the which he executes so happily, as all this cloud was presently dispersed: so as the Prince of Wales could hardly retire himselfe to Bourdeaux, not laden with spoiles as in former times, but with shame and losse.

This was the successe of the first passage the English made through France. But what is become of our Nauarros? Wee haue obserued how hee made his peace with King John, when as he returned from prison. He, thence retired himselfe quietly into his Realme of Nauarre, dissembling his iualouie, and watching all opportunities to crosse the affaires of Charles, who spared him with so great respect. The neernes of Bourdeaux was a fit meane D for him to continue his practices with the English vnder hand: although by meanes of the Queene, he entertained a shew of friendship with Charles's brother in law.

Castile ministred matter of employment for our warriors, with a very notable successe: Peter King of Castile, sonne to Alphonfus (making great profession of loue to the French) married Blanche the daughter of Peter Duke of Bourbon, and sister to Joane the wife of our Charles the Wife, and so brother in law to the King. Whiuest the Castilian loued his wife, the alliance and friendship of our King was his greatest honour: but abandoning himselfe to a strumpet named Padille, he forooke all duty to his Wife, left France, and linckt himselfe with the English, against his sworne faith to his allies. To this trechery he addes the murder of his wife, and a cruel tyranny against his subiects. E

These execrable proceedings procured the wrath of God against him, with the hatred both of great and small, which drew him headlong to his ruine: Alphonfus his father making him his heire and successor of his realme of Castile, had bequeathed a legacy by testament to Henry his bastard sonne, a vertuous man, that is to say, as lawfull by his vertue, as Peter was growne degenerate by his vices: and as greatly beloued of the people, as Peter was hated in general by reason of his abominable life. Hee spoiled Henry his brother of this legacie, the which his father had left him: but thinking to take from another, he lost his owne. For Henry thus ill increased, flies to Pope Vrbans, then resident at Auiignon, beseeching him to vse his authority by admonitions to his brother, aduising him to restore that which his father had giuen him. Vrbans inclining to his iust request, cites them both to appear before the Consistory, to draw them to their duties: Peter not onely refuseth to obey the Pope, but doth outrage to his Nuncio. Henry thus repulsed, repaires to Charles, by the meanes of Peter of Bourbon, brother to the Queene of Castile, whom her husband Peter had murdered. The indignitie of this fact procured Henry great succours from King Charles, euen at such a time as he wanted worke for his men of war. The command of this army was giuen to Peter of Bourbon a Prince of the blood, with the counsell and direction of the Constable Guesclin, who also bare the name, as he tooke the greatest pains. The Castilians

Peter, and expect him.The King of England succours Peter, and restores him.

A The army is leauied in Languedoc by the kings command, and the exceeding care of the Duke of Berry Gouverneur of that Country, to the incredible ioy of many voluntaries, who went cheerfully to so iust a warre: the successe was both happy and speedy. Suddenly as the French army appeared for the succour of Henry, all the Castilians reuolt against Peter, who with great difficulty saues himselfe with his concubine and three daughters he had by her, and one onely seruant, carying nothing with him but a little ready money, and the misery of a dispossessed Prince.

This his calamity did first moue the Prince of Wales to compassion, and then his father Edward, commanding his sonne to succour him with all his forces, the which hee perfor- B med speedily with a goodly army, meaning to crosse the designs of our Charles: but (oh the patience of God, which giues a sinner so long a time of repentance, that in the end (without any excuse) he might pay both the principall and interest!) the successe of this English army was such, in fauour of Peter of Castile, as hauing vanquished the French army, by an notable defeat of foure and twenty thousand men; taken Guesclin the Constable, Arnould of Andreghen Marshall of France, and many other great men prisoners; Peter was restored to the possession of his Realme, and Henry dispossessed; who escaped hardly in this great danger, and retires himselfe into Languedoc, to John Duke of Berry the Kings brother, and Gouverneur of that Country. But after this gracious assistance of Gods mercy, his iustice must take place, as it did against Peter by this meane. Henry being courteously receiued by the Pope and the Duke of Berry, and the Constable Guesclin set at liberty with all his companions, hauing payed their ransomes to the Prince of Wales, he recouers a second ayd by the bounty of our wife Charles, and the diligence of the Duke of Berry, to attempt anew the recovery of the Realme of Castile. The Constable Guesclin was appointed to this charge, to withstand the first checke, if it were possible. The euent answered the proiect, and by an admirable meane, the which ruined Peter through his owne folly.

This tyrant (growne proud by the wishfull successe of the English forces) makes no regard to satisfie the Prince of Wales for the charges of this warre (although the successe were to his good) but busying himselfe to take reuenge on such as had risen against him, D he contemned such as had succoured him: yea treading all piety vnder foot, hee called himselfe with the King of Belle-marine a Sarazin, and (marrying his daughter) hee abjured the Christian Religion, holding the neighbourhood of so mighty a King, to be more certaine and profitable, then all the forces of England. But it fell out contrary to his conceit, for Henry assisted by the Constable Guesclin, and the French Forces, hauing wonne five battels against Peter, in the end hee was quite defeated and taken prisoner.

Hauing him in his power, at the Castilians suite (wonderfully incensed against this tyrant) he caused his head to be cut off, reaping the fruits of his impiety, the which made him to forsake the true religion: of his vanity, trusting to a rotten plancke, with the losse of his conscience; and of his exceeding cruelty, hauing murdered his wife, tyrannized ouer his subiects, and spoyled his brother of his Estate against all right. Hee that E writes the History of Spaine, reports that hee was slain by his brother Duke Henry in Guesclins Tent, being come out of Montiel vpon his assurance. An excellent lesson for all men, especially for great Princes, nor to dally with God, who punisheth heynous crimes with heynous punishments euen in this life, attending the euerslasting paine in the life to come.

Charles King of Nauarre was much perplexed, seeing himselfe betwixt two armies, for desiring to be a neuter, and to please both, he knew not how to gouerne himselfe. He seeks to entertaine both Charles and Edward, although hee were more ingaged to the English, and could not well trust his brother in law, hauing greatly offended him. So he lets the English armie to passe through his dominions when it marched into Castile, to succour Peter, and suffered himselfe to be taken prisoner by Oliver of Mauny, a Gentleman of Britaine, who led him into Castile, to make the English think he had beene forced; and the French, that he did willingly employ himselfe for them, being in their troopes.

A miserable hypocrisie, which of a matter makes himselfe a slave, who might haue beene one of the chiefe of the army, without this wretched dissembling. The good and wise King, taught by the example of his father John, that an Ecle is lost by ouer-gripping it, desired onely to pacifie his brother in law, although he were well acquainted with his bad bad disposition, and the practices he continued with England. So he gave him a safe conduct to come vnto him, and restored vnto him Mantes and Meulan, and the free possession of his lands in Normandy: but this Prince fraught with malice, could not bee reclaimed, neither by the Kings prosperity, nor by his clemency: for (not trusting him) hee retires to his Realme of Navarre, where he continues his old practices with the English: he helps the Britton with men out of Normandy, and attempted against the Kings person, seeking to payson him by Jaquet Rue and Peter of Tertre, his domestick servants: who were executed, and the Navarraise places seized on, as guilty of high treason. Thus Charles was forced to fight against his own blood, and to haue the malice of his kinsmen and allies. No small combat for a great Prince.

The death of both Edwards.

We haue discoursed at large of the valour and happy successe both of Edward the third, King of England, and of Edward his sonne Prince of Wales. But as humane things are not durable, to there chanced a great accident vpon his returne from the warre of Castile, which brought them both to the graue. The Prince of Wales finding himselfe threatened with a droopie, passed from Bourdeaux into England, to take the ayre of his native country, but he died soone after his arrival, the 46 year of his age. A Prince of great hope, not only lamented of his friends, but commended of his enemies. Edward the father, seeing his right arme (as it were) cut off, died for griefe: leaving Richard the sonne of his sonne Edward in his place, who was receiued (without any question made by his vncles) as the first by right of succession.

The English
second passage through France.

Richard, not to degenerate from the example of his grandfather and father, being crowned King, vndertakes a warre in France: whither he sends a goodly army vnder the command of the Duke of Clarence his vncle, who (hauing landed at Calais) passeth the River of Somme at Clercy neere vpon Peronne, and bending towards Soissons, hee crosseth the River of Oise and Aine. Then marching towards Chalons, hee passeth Marne, and shewing himselfe before Troyes in Champagne, hee spoiles the Country, and so goeth ouer Seine, betwixt Ville-neufue and Souley, and bending towards Beaulieu and Gastoinois hee crosseth into Britany, thereto reuiue the warre in fauour of John of Montfort, spoyling the Country with a strange desolation. On the other side there lands another army at Bourdeaux, the which hauing entered the Country, fortified such places as held for the English, to nourish the seeds of this new warre. In the Country of Guenaudan (a diocesse in that large Prouince of Languedoc) there was a Castle neere to Mande named Randon, whereas the English maintained a strong garison, a retreat for theeuers, which did infinite harme in the country. The country hauing sued vnto the King, to free them of this incombrance, he granted them Guesclin the Constable, a man of great reputation, but theaemie should be delayed at their charges. Hee comes into Languedoc, besiegeth Randon, and brings them to the last extremity, but as the besieged (not able to hold out) were entered into composition, behold the Constable (sicke to the death) yeelds vp the ghost. At the same instant the place was yeilded vnto the King: so as in signe that the honour of this prize was due to Guesclin, the Captaine carried the keyes of the Castle vpon his herse.

The death of the Constable
Guesclin.

Thus died Guesclin, leaving an honourable testimony of his valour and loyalty: and to Charles an extreame sorrow for his death, who honoured him with a notable Obsequy, causing his body to be interred with the Kings at Saint Denis: and at the foot of his owne Tombe was that of Guesclin, with a burning lampe maintained by foundation, called the Lampe of Guesclin vnto this day. King Charles had giuen all Bourgongne to his brother Philip for his portion, according to the will of his father John, as we haue said, and had married him with Marguerite the rich heire of Flanders. Being in possession of Bourgongne, there hapned another occasion in Flanders, which won him great credit with those people whom he should command after the death of Lewis his father in law, who was yet liuing. The inhabitants of Gand, a mutinous people by nature, who neuer want matter to mutine, had then a great discontent, both against their Earle in generall, (by reason of some new impositions) and against them of Bruges, in particular (iealous to see them in so great fauour with their Prince) by reason of a channell which they had drawne from the river of Lis, for the commodity of the Country: which Riuier crossing the Riuier of Gand, the Gantois supposed it was all theirs in proper: so as none else might vse it without their liking. This ielousie grew so great, that this great City (as big with their wayward and contentious humors, as it was populous and rich) being thus moued, resolues to make

A shew thereof: and in this fury they make a league, and chooe a head, bearing a marke or token of their faction, and from words they goe to blowes. One called Leon (a bold practitioner of popular seditions) was found fit to be the Ring-leader of this tumult: their marke was a white cap for all the troupe. These Gantois gather together, they hinder the work of this channell, and the gathering of the custome, being the cause of this quarrell: they kill Collectors and Receiuers, and in the end the Gouernour of the City called Roger, who being there for the Earle, laboured to teach them their duties. Their fury exceeded so far, as they spoile the Earles Palace, fire it, and in their rage pull it downe to the ground. They runne in great troopes to other townes, to draw them to their kagew. They besiege Ypre, held by the Earles men, crying in all places, Liberty, as hauing a meaning to change their Lord, and then to seize vpon Flanders. This cruell disorder amazed the Earle, when as beheld Philip Duke of Bourgongne, his sonne in law, flies vnto him to quench this fire: and as men admire rather the Sunne rising then setting, and that the name of the House of France, and the greatnesse of his goodly portion gaue him great authority: so it chanced that he pacified this rebellion, to the content both of the Earle and Cities, taking a happy possession of this great inheritance, by a famous and profitable occasion. But Flanders alone was not subiect to these mad mutinies: for those of Montpellier, newly reduced to the obedience of our King, grew into so great a fury, as they flue Jamys Pontet a Knight of the Order, and Chancellor to John Duke of Berry, Gouernour of the Country, Guy of Secry Seneschall of Rouergue, Arnould of Montclair, Gouernour of the said City, and other officers of the Kings and Dukes, to the number of fourescore, and cast their bodies into a well. As the outrage was odious, so the punishment was memorable. The Duke of Berry comes with his forces, assisted by the whole Prouince, detesting so foule an insolency, so as the inhabitants (calling to mind their audacious frenzy) resolute to submit themselves to punishment, and not to stand desperately against force.

Montpellier.

The Consuls of the City hauing halsters about their neckes, and torne clothes, the keyes of the Citie in one hand, and a red cap (the marke of their office) in the other, met with the Duke their Gouernour, being followed by the Clergy (carying a Crosse) all crying for mercy, and weeping with a lamentable noise.

D In this mournfull sort the Duke enters the Citie gates, being without any guard, hee finds the streets full of poore and desolate people, vpon their knees, men and women, old and young, crying for mercy, and redoubling their pitifull cries, as witnesses of their repentance. Then the Duke commands they should presently bring all their armes into one place neere vnto his lodging, placing a guard at the gates, and vpon the walls. The next day he caused a scaffold to be made in the market place, where hauing sharply rebuked the people for their rebellion, he pronounced a sentence in the Kings name, whereby he declares, That all their priuiledges were taken from them, their Consullship, Townehouse, common Arches, Vniuersity, their Bels, Salt-pannes, and all Iurisdiccions of the Citie, either of foueraigne Courts, or of the Commonalty: five hundred inhabitants to be chosen at adventure, condemned to die; that is, two hundred to lose their heads, two hundred to be hanged, and two hundred burnt, their children declared infamous and slaues for euer, and their goods confiscate: The Commonaltie should pay fixscore thousand Frankes of gold, and the charges of the Dukes voyage, and his armies: The Consuls with certaine Councillers that were named, should draw the bodies of such as had bene massacred out of the Well, and bury them: A Chappell should bee built for their obsequies, with the same Bell which did found the Alarm: The gates and Citie wals should be beaten downe, and their armes burnt publicly.

The sentence pronounced against them.

This was their doome: but it was moderated at the intercession of Pope Clement then resident in Auignon, by the meanes of Cardinal de la Lune. The summe was qualified, the priuiledges restored, the gates and wals preferred; but the authors of this sedition were put to death, that the rest of the inhabitants might liue in safety.

is moderated.

A notable preident for subiects to suppress their fury, even when they thinke to haue a iust cause of complaint, feeling themselves surcharged or otherwise greued: considering that errors are sooner committed then repaired: And for Commanders, that it is a dangerous resolution to let loose the reines to a mad multitude, which augments the mischief, supposing to cure it.

Queene Ioane wife to our wife Charles, daughter to Peter of Bourbon, dies about this time, time, to the great griefe of her husband, to whom she left two sonnes, Charles and Lewis, both very young : for Charles was borne the 3 of December 1371, and was caried to the Font by Charles of Montmorency, and baptised by Dourmans Bishop of Beauvais, and Chancellor of France. Lewis was Duke of Orleans. She left him also one daughter, Japhel, married afterwards to Richard King of England. Necessary obseruations for the course of our History.

This good Prince after his wifes death, was nothing healthfull, so as broken with poyson, the which had much weakened him, and with the tedious toyles of his youth, more then with age, he decayed daily, and he himselfe perceived it ; so as feeling the end of his life to approach, remembring what troubles he had past, during the mournfull imprisonment of his father, by the contempt of his young age, lest the like should happen to his sonne Charles, vnder colour of his minority, governed by Tutors, he decreed in a generall assembly of the States, by a Law, and an irrevocable Edict, That after the decease of the King of France, his eldest sonne should succeed him presently, and at the age of foureteene years, should be declared capable to gouerne the Estate alone, and be freed from Tutors. But (oh the weaknesse of mans wisdom!) he did not foresee that his sonne should be ill gouerned by his Tutors in his minority, that the age of foureteene should not free him from Tutors : and that euen his sonne, coming to mans estate, should giue more scope to the ambition of his owne Vnckles (more worthily to bee called murderers then tutors) then his weakest youth had done.

He had a Fistula in one arme, by the which those ill humors were drawne away, which grew by poyson, and gaue him great ease when it did runne. It chanced this Fistula stop, and then his malady encreased much.

Charles (resolving by this sharpe alarm, to goe the common way of all flesh) calls for his three brethren, Lewis, Iohn, and Philip; and hauing recommended his children and subiects vnto them, he giues them particular aduice for the gouernment of the Realme : leauing the custody of his sonne, and the Regency of the Realme vnto them. Hee died the 16 of September 1380, in the Castle of Beauty, seated vpon the Riuer of Marne. He commanded that Oliuer of Clifton should bee Constable, hauing commended his fidelity and sufficiency, and that they should carefully preferre the amity of Germany.

Charles dyes.

Thus died Charles the wife, wonderfully beloued and lamented of his subiects, leauing his Realme in good estate, after so horrible a desolation. And although the confusions passed had wonderfully impoverished the subiects, and wasted the Kings treasure, (neither was his reigne free from war) yet did he leaue the Prouinces of his Realme very wealthie, and an infinite treasure in his coffers: although he had built the Louure, Saint Germain in Lay, Montargis, Creil, the Celestines, and some other Churches. Of such power is good husbandry in this Realme, as in riches it yeelds not to the treasures of Peru, nor in fertility to any Country vnder heauen, to subsist amidst so many stormes, and to be presently restored by good husbandry.

His disposition.

An example for Princes to imitate, and not to despaire in like confusions, but to hope for all that may be wished for in the restoring of an Estate, by patience and dexterity, vertues proper to our wife Charles. A Prince so much the more praise-worthy, hauing preferred this Estate when it seemed lost; religious, wise, modest, patient, stirring, and staied, when need required; able to entertaine euery man according to his humour : hauing by these vertues wonne a great reputation both within and without the Realme, and honourable to his posterity, as to haue saved France from shipwracke.

He loued learning and learned men : Nicholas Oresme was his Schoolemaster, whom he honoured with great preferments. He caused the Bible to be translated into French, imitating Saint Lewis. I haue seene the Originall in the Kings lodging at the Louure, signed by King Charles and his brother the Duke of Berry. A goodly obseruation of the ancient simplicity of those royall characters. I haue likewise seene a Manuscript of the translation made by the commandement of Saint Lewis. He delighted in the reading of the holy Scripture and Philosophy : hauing likewise caused the Ethickes and Politickes of Aristotle, with many bookes of Tully, to be translated into French. The fauour he shewed to learned men, stirred vp many good wits, who beganne to draw the Muses from their graues both in France and Italy.

The

A The History doth particularly note, that he did often visit his Court of Parliament, and his Chamber of accompts : gaue audience vnto suitors, read their petitions, and heard their complaints and reasons, employing some dayes of the weeke, euen in his greatest affaires, to doe those fatherly and royall workes of iustice. Hee tooke great delight to aduance his household seruants, giuing them meanes secretly (and without the priuity of any) to instruct their sonnes, and to marrie their daughters. A testimony of a good conscience, and of a wise man. This bond of loyalty could haue no better foundation, then in transporting it from the father to the sonne, nor almes be better employed then from the master to the seruant.

B Royall vertues, and worthy of eternall memory. But alas ! what shall be the successe of this bounty and wisdom? The reigne of his sonne Charles shall be most miserable. He hath done the part of a good brother, of a good father, a good father, and a good King: but God the Soueraigne of Kings, had limited the euents of his cares : to teach vs, (by a notable example) That vnlesse the Lord build the house the workmen labour but in vaine : if the Lord keepe not the City, the watchman watcheth but in vaine : for an eternall Maxime of gouernment and State, Whosoeuer glories, let him glory in the Lord. But vertues are not hereditary. Iohn not very wise, begat Charles a wife and happy Prince, and hee begets a stanticke man, vnhappy both in youth and age. We may on the other side oppose other considerations very disputable. Profit aduised him to marrie the heyre of Flanders, not

C onely to pacifie that Country, but also to enlarge his owne dominions, adding thereto that great and rich Estate of Flanders, from whence so many mischiefes haue sprung to France, but his delight made him preferre the faire before the rich. Moreover, the rules of State did not permit him so to aduance his brother, making him in a manner equal to himselfe in power, the which must needs be the cause of many inconueniences, as it after hapned. The cause of his brother Philip Duke of Bourgongne, is ordered by the same rule; for who can with reason mislike, that Charles giues a portion to his brother by his fathers wil; and that in the rich mariage of a Prince his vassall, and of a neere Estate (whereby his Realme was daily annoyed) he preferres his brother before his capitall enemy? But God had referred the honour to himselfe. Bourgongne since Robert, the grandchild of Hugh Capet, had beene successfully in the power of Princes, who had alwaies done faithful seruice to the Crowne, and now it shall be a scourge vnto it : yet in the end it shall be vnto the Crowne againe, and taken from such as had abused it. Experience doth teach, that in matters of State, the end is not alwayes answerable to the beginning, nor the successe to the designe, to the end that Princes may depend on him who is greater then themselves, who hath made them, and can marre them : and without whom they cannot doe any thing.

Behold the life, death, race, reigne, and manners of Charles the fifth called the Wise. But before we enter into the troublesome reigne of Charles the sixth, let vs obserue the estate of the Empire and of the Church. We haue said that Charles the sonne of Iohn King of Bohemia had bene chosen Emperour, and called Charles the fourth. He held the Empire two and thirty yeares, beginning in the yeare 1350. So the reignes of Iohn and Charles his sonne, is contained in this Empire : for he died in the yeare 1378. Before his death he provided that Winceslas his sonne should succeed him in the Imperiall dignity. At the first he married Blanche Countesse of Valois, daughter to Charles Earle of Valois, and sister to Philip of Valois the French King, being very young, (for shee was but seuen yeares old when she was betroathed vnto him) hee had bene bred vp in the Court of France, and learned the French humors : he loued our Crowne better then our lawes. A Prince wholly enclined to his owne particular, making shew to loue our Kings, but vnder-hand hee supported their enemies against them.

The estate of the Empire.

F This was the principall reason why his coming into France proued fruitlesse, after so long a voyage and so great expences, ministring a sufficient cause of calouisy to our Charles, who gaue him the best entertainment he could, to make him know, that the soueraignty which he pretended to haue ouer France, was but a drama. Yet he suffered the Country of Dauphin (which they called the Empire, as a member of the ancient Realme of Arles) to be wholly infranchised from that subiection, to cut off all pretensions from his successors, embracing the commoditie to settle his affaires euen by their meanes whom he knew were not his friends.

This

disposition:

This Emperour Charles the fourth, did all he could both in Italy and Germany to apply vnto himselfe the rights of the Empire, being wholly enclined to his owne profit, for the which he vfed the name of iustice and good order, being more learned in law then in doing right, and hauing more knowledge then conscience. It is he which made the Golden Bull, both to rule the Election of the Emperour, and the rights and dignitie of the Empire. The former confusions of the Empire had so dispensed all priuate gouernours of Countries and Cities, as euery one played the Emperour in his gouernment.

Originall of the Cantons in Switzerland.

These tyrannicall disorders were the cause of the Cantons in Switzerland, who since haue established a goodly Common-weale, consisting of thirteene Cantons, who maintaine themselves with great order and force, hauing the amitie and alliance of the neighbour Monarchs, and an honourable place among the Estates of Christendome vnto this day. Their particular history belongs not to our subiect, it sufficeth to haue noted their beginning, and the occasion of their common-weale, newly erected in the disorders of that age. The Church of Rome was in a very poore estate, first by the continuall factions of the Guelphes and Gibelins, and of it selfe by a distraction bred by an open schisme, hauing two Popes, two chaires, two Seas, and a deadly hatred, the which troubled all the Kings and Princes of Christendome, some defending the Pope, others the Antipope as his opposite.

Estate of the Church.

We haue said, that in the reigne of Philip of Valois the Pontificall See was translated from Rome to Auignon, where it continued about 70 years, Clement the sixth hauing bought this Citie for his successors; being a pleasant and fruitful seat. These quarrels (continued with such violent passions) had tired mens minds like as a long processe doth weary the most obstinate pleaders. The Popes being absent from Rome, gouerned the estate of Italy by three Cardinals their Legats, but all went to ruine. Gregory the sixth Limosin, being chosen Pope at Auignon, went to Rome to redresse these confusions, wherein there was small helpe. Being receiued with an incredible ioy of the Romanes, and of all Italy, he returns no more to Auignon, but passeth the rest of his dayes at Rome.
After his death the people with all vehemency require a Romane borne, or an Italian for Pope: but there was some difficulty in the election, for the Colledge consisted for the most part of French Cardinals, who desired to haue one of their owne nation. They were much diuided: but the Cardinals (fearing the peoples fury, armed with an intent to murder them if they did not chooe one of their nation) yeelded to the election of a Neopolitane, named Bartholomew, who was receiued and proclaimed by the name of Urban the sixth.

Diuiden at Rome for the election of a new Pope.

But within few dayes after, the malecontents retired from Rome (vnder colour to flye the plague) to Fyndy, a towne in the Realme of Naples (of the French faction) by means of Queen Isabe, where they did chooe Clement the 7, a Limosin, who retired to Auignon, and was opposite to Urban the sixth, with open defiance one of another: which schisme continued vntill the Council of Constance, each Pope with his faction. Clement had for him the Kings of France, Castile, and Scotland. Urban had the Emperour, the Kings of England and Hungary: Clement held his seat at Auignon, and Urban at Rome. In those dayes liues Barthol, Baldus, Petrarch, Boccace, Planudes a Greeke by nation, Bonaventura, and Iohn Wickliffe. These hurly-burles touched the hearts, and opened the mouthes of many good men, wonderfully grieved to see such diuision in the Church, apparently gowned by the ambition of such as had greatest authority in the same. The writings lye open to their reasonable complaints, which euery one may reade, without any further discourse.

CHARLES THE SIXT,
The 53. French King.

It is necessary to haue some direction to passe through a Labyrinth, so this crooked reigne hath need of some order to guide vs, in the disorder of so many obscure confusions, which we are to represent. I will first obserue the most famous acts and worthiest personages of this reigne, and then will I distinguish the subiect according to the occurrences. This miserable reigne continued 42 years, beginning in the year 1380, and ending in the year 1422.
Charles the sixth succeeded his father Charles the fifth, at the age of 12 years, (being borne in the year 1363) he was crowned in the year 80, married in 84, dismissed his Tutors to reigne alone in 87, fals into a frenzy in 93, and dies in the year 1422.
So being vnder age with his Tutors, and of age in perfect sense, he reigned thirteen years, and liued in his frenzy twenty nine years. Who sees not then the iust calculation of fortie two years in this reigne?

Necessary observations for the vnderstanding of this reigne.

Charles the fifth his father, had three brethren; Lewis Duke of Aniou, Iohn Duke of Berry, & Philip Duke of Bourgogne. Queen Isabe, daughter to Peter Duke of Bourbon, wife to Charles the fifth, and mother to Charles the sixth, had one brother, James Duke of Bourbon. These foure Vncles shall play their parts vpon this stage in diuers occurrences; but let vs adde the rest, euery one shall haue his turne.

We haue said that Charles the Wise left two sonnes, this Charles the 6, whose reigne we now describe, and Lewis Duke of Orleans. And our Charles had three sonnes, Lewis, Iohn, and Charles, and one daughter named Katherine: all by Elizabeth of Bauaria, one of the chiefest fire brands of this Tragedie: an outrageous woman, an vnaturall mother, and altogether vnworthy of this Crowne. These three sonnes were Dauphins one after another in their fathers life: but Charles succeeded him, notwithstanding all crosses and difficulties of a Katherine his sister was married to Henry the fifth, King of England; a mournfull gage of a horrible confusion for this Realme. But alas, how many cruell acts of ambition, vanity, and trecherie of such as held the helme of this Estate, being either royall persons, or seled in the highest dignities? How many changes and reuolutions of these froward humors, daring any thing vnder the liberty of this reigne: the King being either a child, or sicke, and alwayes weake and vnable to gouerne so great a charge? In the first Scene of this Tragedy, we shall see the Vncles of this young King in diuision one against another.
Lewis Duke of Aniou (declared Regent, as first Prince of the blood) is crossed by his brethren, the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, and he abuseth his authority imperiously.
Lewis Duke of Aniou being dead, Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the 6, shall take his place, as the first Prince, and shall fall to quarrell with Philip the Hardy Duke of Bourgogne, his Vncle, who dying, shall leave Iohn his sonne successor of his ieaalousie, against Lewis Duke of Orleans his cousin. Iohn shall exceed all humanitie, and kill him, but the hatred shall not die, being transplanted into Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to Lewis massacred, the which shall breed infinite troubles. The Dauphins shall play their parts, sometimes friends, and sometimes enemies one to another. Iohn who had murdered Lewis of Orleans, shall be slaine by Charles the Dauphin, who shall be King: but from Iohn shall spring another Philip of Bourgogne, who shall kindle a new fire, to be reuenged of his fathers death. The stranger is engaged in these ciuill warres: women augment it by their furies. On the one side Valentine Duchesse of Orleans: on the other Isabel Queene of France. The Constables of Clifton and Armagnac are likewise drawne in: and the subiect growes licentious in these disorders. Passion preuailes with such a fury, as the mother forgets the birth of her owne wombe, and so abuseth her authority, as she dares attempt (against the fundamentall law of State) to giue the Realme to a stranger, who was crowned and proclaimed King in the heart of France, by her boldnesse.

1380

The Minoritie of King CHARLES the sixt :

From the yeare 1380, when as CHARLES received the Crowne by the deace of his Fathr, vnto the yeare 87, that he dismissed his Vncles, to rule alone with absolute authority.

Lewis of Aniou Regent.

THE Generall Estates assemblé at Paris presently after the death of Charles the Wiſe, to provide for the government of the King and Realme; and to avoid all apparent icalouſie betwixt the Kings Vncles, they decreed, That according to the Declaration made by their good King deaceſed, Charles his ſonne ſhould be anointed and crowned King, and ſhould vntill he were of competent age to gouerne ſo great an Eſtate, Lewis Duke of Aniou (as eldeſt of the Houſe of France, and ſo the firſt Prince of the blood) ſhould be Regent, and haue the authority of Councell and royall Command. And likewise by vertue of King Charles his will, Oliver of Clifton (a braue and valiant Knight borne in Britany) was made Conſtable of France. Oliver of Clifton tooke poſſeſſion of his charge, preparing for the Kings Coronation: and the Duke of Aniou receiuing the Kings Treafure, which they ſay was eightene hundred thouſand Crownes. A very great ſumme for thoſe times, and after ſo wretched a ſeaſon. He forced Sanſſy the head Treafurer, to deliuer thoſe ſummes into his hands, and by this exceſſe laid the ground of a great preſumption which followed.

for precedence betwixt the Kings vncles at his coronation.

Charles is anointed at Rheims, and crowned after the cuſtome of France, the 25 of October, in the yeare 1380, in a ſolemne aſſembly of his Princes of the blood, Princes allied, and officers of this Crowne. The Dukes of Aniou, Berry, and Bourgongne the Kings Vncles, Wenelin Duke of Brabant, the Dukes of Lorraine and Barre, the Earles of Suoy, of Marche, and Eu (friends and confederates to our Kings) did aſſiſt. At this ſolemny there was ſome queſtion for place, whether ſhould take it, the Duke of Aniou as Regent of the Realme, or the Duke of Bourgongne as firſt Peere of France and Deane of the Peeres: diſtinguiſhing the degrees according to their qualities, to whom the order was giuen.

The King to crowne his inſtallment by ſome notable act, tooke vpon him to decide this controuerſie, and decreed, That for as much as at the Kings anointing, the Peeres of France ought to hold the firſt ranke, in all ceremonies: the Duke of Bourgongne as the firſt Peer ſhould take place of the Duke of Aniou: and ſo Philip was preferred before his elder brother, continuing the poſſeſſion of the name of Hardy, the which he purchaſed in defending his father Iohn ſo ſtoutly at the battell of Poitiers. But he encreaſed this name of Hardy too much in his carriage, leauing it hereditary to his children, conuerting this ſtoutneſſe into an imperious preſumption, which bred a huge deluge of miſeries to the great preiudice of the whole Realme. The day after the coronation, the States beſeech the Regent to provide for the reliefe of the poore people, whoſe burthen was too heauy for the great charges they were to pay of debts growne in former reignes, and the rather for that there was no warre which impoſed the neceſſity of ſo great a charge.

The Regent did not yeeld thereunto, but continued theſe leauies of money more and more, which was the occaſion of tumults in diuers Provinces of France, as if this popular humor had become like vnto a peſilent ſuer, or an infectious diſeaſe. Flanders likewiſe kindled great fires vpon ſundry occaſions, which were quenched with much trouble, after memorable combuſtions. Flanders ſhall embarke firſt in this ſtorme, and ſhall come laſt to land not without danger by ſtrange accidents; to teach Princes how firſt they ſhould preſſe their ſubiects; and for ſubiects, with what reſpect they ſhould reuerence their ſuperiors, in ſeeking out remedies for their afflictions; for in the end (amidſt all theſe tumults) the victors weepe and lament in the ruine and notable loſſe and ouerthrow of the vanquiſhed.

We haue ſayd that Philip Duke of Bourgongne, made a compoſition for the Gantois, with the Earle of Flanders his father in law. But this accord laſted not long: for the Earle diſdaining the indignities hee had digeſted, during the ſedition, could not forget them: but vnder ſained quarrels, (to the end they ſhould haue no cauſe of complaint, as breaking the accord) he pincheth ſome, and ruines others: and for that the Gantois ſtood vpon their guard, not ſuffering the Earles men to attempt any thing within the limits of their City,

The Earle of Flanders ſeeks revenge of his ſubiects.

A City, he made a ſearch in the Citie of Bruges (where he commanded abſolutely) for ſuch as had been of the faction of White-caps, where he executed aboue 500. This execution kindled a new fire: Gand ſails to armes, and Ypre follows; to whoſe ſuccour the Gantois ſend three thouſand men. The Earle being the ſtronger, cuts them in pieces betwixt Courtray and Pourprigny, as they march: Ypre yeelds vnto him; being entred the towne, he cuts off ſeauen hundred of the chiefſt mens heads: and then without any ſtay, hee marcheth to Gand, and beſiegeth it. But his forces were too ſmall in regard of that great and ſpacious Citie, ſo as hauing employed all his meanes, they had ſtill the liberty of four gates.

B The Gantois loth to be ſhut vp, and to endure the diſcommodities of a ſiege, hauing a wonderfull aduantage by the numbers of their people, reſolue to provide well for the guard of the City, and then to draw forth a good troope to ſpoyle the Country, and to force ſome of the Earles places, thereby to make a diuerſion of the ſiege. They goe to the field with fixe thouſand choiſe men, vnder the command of Iohn de Launoy one of their Tribunes. They take and burne Tenremonde and Gramont, townes belonging to the Earle, committing infinite ſpoiles in the Country. The Earle leaues the ſiege, and marcheth away with an intent to fight with them. He finds them neare to Niuelle, chargeth them, defeats them, and puts them to flight. They recover the gates of Niuelle, and the Earle enters with them pell meel; ſome of them (led by Launoy) recover the Fort of the towne: the Earle beſiegeth them, and cauſeth many fagots and batins to be brought about this Tower, and to be ſet on fire. All theſe poore wretches are burnt, making moſt horrible cries. This Tribune entreatheth, that they might be receiued to ranſome, and ſhewing his purſe, but receiuing no anſwer from them, but ſcornes and mockes, he caſts himſelfe from the top of the Tower vpon their Halberds and Pikes, and ſo he dies very valiantly. This ſight was horrible, and truly vnworthy of a Lord diſpleaſed with his ſubiects, and yet he continued it with a new ſlaughter of this poore people, who being amazed with this great defeat, had neither feet to runne, nor hands to defend themſelues. All are put to the ſword, ſo as of fixe thouſand, there hardly eſcaped three hundred. But the Gantois ſhall ſoone haue their reuenge. At the brute hereof, they were as much amazed, as the Earle was. D put vp with pride to purſue his victory, being in ſo ready a way for the execution and purſuit thereof.

The Gantois
goe to field with an army
and are defeated.

In this diſorder, the Gantois chooſe another head, Philip of Arteuille, ſonne to Iames of Arteuille, (who (as we ſayd) was ſlaine by the people) who aduertieth them to humble themſelues vnto their Earle, and to craue pardon. They are reſolued, hauing neceſſity for their chiefe Councillor, praying and beſeeching their Earle, To haue pittie of the blood of his ſubiects, who ſubmitted their liues and goods to his mercy, to diſpoſe at his pleaſure, either in pardoning them, or ſuffering them to depart, in abandoning their native Country, as a perſeuall baniſhment, that it would pleaſe him onely to graunt them their liues. The Earle was greatly incenſed againſt them, and in ſuch a choler, as they could receiue no other anſwer, E but that all ſorts within the City, men and women aboue the age of ſiftene yeares, ſhould bare-foot and bare-headed ſubmit themſelues to his mercy, and being in this eſtate, hee would aduſe what to doe.

They ſue for mercy.

The Earle makes the Gantois deſperate.

The people of Gant ſeeing him tranſported with wrath, and no meanes to pacifie it, they reſolue (by the aduice of Philip of Arteuille, their leader, in this extreme neceſſity) to hazard all, and not to hope for any ſafety but in deſpaire: being the leaſt of two miſchiefes, to dye courageouſly, for the liberty of their country, and defending themſelues againſt the vniuſt violence of ſo inexorable a man; then hauing ſene their wiues & daughters deſlowred, they ſhould either ſuruiue their infamie, or be ſlaine and maſſacred without any defence, like dogges, at the mercy of ſo cruell an enemy. The euent, or rather God the protector of the afflicted, fauoured this courageous reſolution. For the effecting hereof, they make choiſe of fixe thouſand of their moſt reſolute and beſt armed men, to try their fortunes againſt the Earle, and provide the beſt they can for the guard of the City: with a generall reſolution and conſent, That if theſe fixe thouſand men ſhould be defeated, to the end they ſhould not attend the doubtfull euent of a ſiege, nor fall into the hands of ſome reconcilable an enemy, they would let fire of the City, and euey one ſaue himſelfe as he could.

This being concluded, Philip of Arteuille parts from Gant, with his deſperate troop, and

feated by the

and marcheth directly to Bruges, takes a feat of aduantage, and intrencheth himselfe, attending the opportunity, either to defend themselves with aduantage, or to fall vpon the enemy. The Earle put vp with his first successe, imagining them too few for the Lacquesies belonging to the Gentlemen of his traine, came to charge them within their trenches, and to force them to fight. Arteuille not like a Brewer of beere, as he was, but as a great Capitaine, ordered his troopes with such dexterity, as the Earles army had the Sun in their eyes: vpon this sudden change, hauing a full view of the Earles men, he goes resolutely to the charge, leading forth this desperate troope, which fell vpon them like a great freame of water, breaking forth suddenly, hauing found a passage. The first ranks (troubled with the Sun-beames which dazled their eyes, and not able to withstand so violent a charge) giue way, and turning their backs, they disorder all the rest.

The Gantois vpon this aduantage, reare all in pieces they encounter, as famished wolues doe in a flocke of sheepe. This braue Nobility flies, as astoned, and is put to the sword. The Earle cries, entreats, and runnes, but all in vaine: he that had the swiftest horse, and the best legges to flye, was the most valiant. The retreat from thence to Bruges was neerer: the multitude flies thither, like a current of water. The Earle enters with the rest, nor able to gather his men againe together, and shuts himselfe into his Castle.

The Gantois following, and killing them that fled, enter pel mel, and seized vpon the gates. Arteuille hauing speedily provided for the guard thereof, the Gantois (being victors) dispersed themselves throughout the City, crying against the vanquished, The City is wonne: and liberty proclaimed for the good Citizens, killing all such as they found to fauour the Earle, searching all houses for his seruants, and commanding to spare the good Citizens. The Earle foreseeing by this brute that the enemy would presently pursue him, he suddenly leaves his rich attire, and takes the simplest of one of his Grooms, and so forsakes the Castle, to seeke some corner to hide his head in. Hee was scarce gone out, but his Castle was beset, and easily taken and spoyle, whilest that he saues himselfe in a poore womans house: where in her silly cottage he had onely one roome beneath, and above a garret, to the which they mounted by a ladder. The Earle creeps into this cabin, and the woman hides him in the bed-draw, where her children did lie, and coming downe,ooke away the ladder. The Gantois hauing made search in euery corner for the Earle, they came to the house where the Earle was, and searching it, they went vp to the place where hee lay hidden. He that could haue read the secrets of this poore princes heart, in this amazement, should haue seene a remorse of conscience, for that hee had not intreated his subiects with more mildnesse. Being thus freed, he creeps out of this cottage, and gets forth of the towne, being alone, and on foot: running from bush to bush, and from ditch to ditch, fearing euery one that passed: when as behold (lying hidden in a ditch) he discouers a household seruant of his owne, named Robert Marshall, who takes him vp on horse-backe behind him, and in this order he recouers Life.

This vnexpected successe bred new designs in the franticke braine of this Tribune: and of this furious multitude, who should haue bene satisfied to haue auoided shipwrack, and (returning to their houses) should haue fallen to their vsuall trades, and haue vied this profitable successe to good purpose, and made their peace with their lawfull Lord, being sufficiently chastised. But vanity thrusts them on, and the certinty of Gods threats shewed it selfe in the following punishment: to teach vs, That man hath but the misery which hee seeks by his owne folly. A generall lesseon for great and small, both for men, Families, and States.

Arteuille with his Gantois (hauing glutted themselves with the sacke and blood of such as were any way affected to the Earle, hauing spoiled his Castle, and left it desolate, beaten downe the gates of Bruges, and filled vp the ditches) from thence they goe to conquer the other cities of Flanders, where he conceived a new Empire. Presently all obey him: Ypre, Dam, Bergues, Bourbourg, Furnes, Sluse, Pourprigne, Courtray and the lesser townes, Audenard resists: It is presently besieged. At the bruite of this successe, all Flanders flies thither, so as in few dayes there were about a hundred thousand men assembled before the towne. The Earle amazed with so violent a reuolt of all his subiects, hath recourse to his son in law Philip Duke of Bourgogne, that by his meanes he might be relieved from the King: although he were more affected to the English then French, hauing bene too much respected by our Kings. King Charles succours the Earle of Flanders contrary to the aduice of the Regent and Councell.

A tested in aduersity. The Regent and the Councell refused to venture the King with this man in so dangerous a cause: but two reasons moued the King thereunto, and made him ouerrule both the Duke of Aniou his Vncle, and his whole Councell by the perswasions of the Duke of Bourgogne. The one was Arteuille himselfe, who during the siege of Audenard (not content to haue ruined the Noblemens houses of the country) had made some roades vpon the frontiers of France.

The other was, King Charles dreamed that hee was mounted vpon a flying Hart, which caried him gently through the ayre, and a Heron vnder him, which did beat downe all other birds, came tuen flying to his sit, and the Hart brought him to the place from whence hee caried him, to his great content. As the King conceived a delight to report this dreame, as preface of some good successe, so the Duke of Bourgogne laboured to draw him into Flanders. The King vpon these motiues doth presently leane an armie, and goes to field. Arteuille to auoid this storme, fortifies the passages of Flanders, especially Pont du Lis, neere vnto Comines. The French surprise this passage politlicky, hauing attended all night in the dirtie marsh vp to the ancles, expecting the commoditie of the passage. Their patience was the more commendable, for that it was in the depth of a sharp winter, in December, Comines and Verrain being taken, sacked and burnt, the towne of Ypre kills their Gouernour, who would not suffer them to obey the King, and yeeld themselves, paying fortie thousand franks for a composition. By their example, Cassel, Bergues, Bourbourg, Graue, Lin, Furnes, Dunkeirke, Pourprigne, Tourmont, Vaillant, Messine, and other neighbour townes resolute to seaze vpon their Gouernours, being Gantois: and so fend them bound hands and feet vnto the King, as a testimonie that they had yeelded vpon force.

Charles receiues the townes to mercie, and cuts off the heads of these vnlawfull Gouernours. Arteuille fearing the reuolt of other Cities, and that his forces (which were great) would fall from him, resolute to prevent Charles, and to force him to fight, promising himselfe the like successe as he had against the Earle before Bruges. With this resolution he chargeth the French army betwixt Courtray and Rosbecque, vpon the Mount of gold, which at the first shocke did somewhat amaze them, they recoyling a little, but without any disorder: yet supported by the Battaille and rere-ward, they breathe, and all together charge this multitude with so great a furie, as all are put to flight, and cut in peeces, or taken with a strange disorder. They number about threescore thousand men slaine, and an infinite number of prisoners taken: after the Nobilitie had glutted their choller vpon this seditious rabble, who had made rebellion a vertue, Philip of Arteuille their leader was slaine: hee was found breathing among the dead carcases, whom the King commanded to be hanged, and so he had the reward of his imagined Empire.

This double euent may serue as a lesseon, both for great and small, for great men, in the Earles person; for small, in that of this Tribune. For the first, to command well, for the others to obey well: and for all, not to passe the bounds of their duties. God punishing the great for their tyranny and crueltie, and the lesser for their disobedience: dangerous plagues of mankind, the which cannot stand but by order and authoritie well gouerned, and well applied.

They call this ouerthrow the battaille of Rosbecque, which chanced in the yeare 1382. in December. It was the more remarkable, for that the vanquished had soon their reuenge. Charles thus victorious, could not manage his victorie; for in stead of surprising the Gantois in this amazement, he lingers too long at Courtray, to seeke out the remainder of those miserable mutines, which remained in this defeat: whereas, in pardoning the vanquished, the Victor gets a double victorie.

This place also (being infamous by a great ouerthrow which chanced in the yeare 1312) moued him to choler, for that this ill aduised people, to note the memorie of that day, did celebrate a sollemne feast yeately, and had rescued 500 paire of gilt spurs, which they had taken from the French in that battell. Charles was so transported with the memory of this audacious indignitie, as he caused this poore Towne to be burnt. An vnworthy reuenge of so great a Monarch, who should hold it the greatest reuenge vpon his enemies, to pardon when he may reuenge. The duke of Bourgogne in all this confusion, did not forget to seeke for goodly moucables, wherof there was abundance. He caried away that goodly clocke, and that exquisite tapistrie, which is now at Dijon in the Kings house.

England.

Artreman, one of their Citizens, for their head, and renew the league of white caps, mote A obstinately then before, being resolved to die, rather then to trust their Eaile, to whom they imputed the cause of all their miseries, the which had continued five yeares, and dismoured two hundred thousand men. So fatalle are ciuill diffentions betwixt the Lord and his subjects. Lewis their Earle hauing laboured to settle his affaires both by the French and English, against the Gantois, feeling daily the inconueniences of this rebellious people, as thornes in his sides, fell into such a melscholie, as he died, leauing his whole estate much troubled, to his sonne in law, Philip Duke of Bourgongne, who being farre engaged in his father in lawes quarrell, was nothing pleasing to this his people.

The warre was renewed, both by practices of the English, and by the meanes of Arme B man, the head of that faction, who hauing tasted the sweet of popular command, desired nothing more then to maintaine this diuision: but there fell out a sodaine accident, which pacified all this great trouble, as a little raine doth a great winde. Two citizens of Gant (whose names deserued well to be registred in this history) discoursing one day of their common miseries, and noting the true causes of these calamities within their city, as feel-ling the wound, they sought the meanes to cure it, the which had continued so long, and cost their miserable country too deare. The Kings pleasure, and the Duke of Bourgongnes must be knowne: they were not ignorant of the peoples humour, being very wearie of so many miseries.

Their enterprise was not without exceeding danger, by the absolute authority of three C or foure, who had most credit with the people, being susceptible of any mischief, when they are thrust forward with a shew of good. It was requisite in the managing of so important a businesse: to vse wisdom and secrecy, vntill the foundation were well laied: and for the execution thereof, there needed one which had both credit and authority with both parties. The God of peace presented one vnto them, which gouerned this action discreetly John Delle, a gentleman of Gant, but bred vp in the court of France. He that seeks peace, findes it. This Delle goes to the King, & the Duke of Bourgongne; he laies open his designe, and is well entertained. He returns with a good answer, both by letters of credit, and priuate instructions, to the Gantois. At his returne the matter is so well furthred by those two citizens (who were in great reputation with the people) as without the pri-uaty of Artreman, or the English Negotiators, the banner of Flanders (the signall of their popular power) is solemnly planted in the great Market place. All the people flocke the-ther, where hauing signified vnto the chiefe Magistrates, that they would haue peace, and obey the Duke of Bourgongne their Prince; D'puties are appointed with power to negotiate and conclude a peace with him. This was effected after a long confusion, to the content, both of the Earle and Flemings. Of a light beginning, God performs a great work, when it pleaseth him. Thus the Duke of Bourgongne pacified Flanders in the yeere 1384, when as he feared greatest tumults by meanes of some seditious persons: to whose great griefe a peace was proclaimed throughout all the Estates of Flanders, which gaue an incredible content to all the people after so many miseries.

Now King Charles grew great, and although he were but sixtene yeeres of age, yet was he desirous to marry. The Duke of Anjou his Vncle, according to the aduice which King Charles the wife had given on his death bed, thought good to seeke him out a Mariage in Germany, in the house of Banaria, to counterbalance the credit of the Emperour Wen- ceslaus, no friend to the House of France, what shew foucer he made. Hee therefore mat-eth with Isabel the daughter of Stephen Duke of Banaria, a Princeesse from whom they expected much good: but she brought infinit troubles to France, as wee shall see hereafter.
Thus mans wisdom is deceived, when as he hopes for best: that God might be knowne for the author of all good, both in the family and State. This imperious Proserpina, verified the puerbe, That a woman raiseth, or ruins a house. She had almost ouerthrowne the State. Eu. shortly there shall an Italian woman be toyed to this Germane, to augment the confusions of this reigne, reasonable good in the beginning, but very miserable in the end. This yeere likewise concluded a peace in Britany, after many troubles, John Montfort hauing renewed his homage to the King, and sworne fealty, which shall not long continue, to the great preiudice of the King and his realme.

The truce was continued in shew betwixt France and England, but with no more leue of the two Kings, then betwixt capitall enemies, who sought to annoy one another by new attempts.

Charles sends men and mation into Scotland.

A attempts. Charles hauing pacified Flanders & Britany, resolves to be reuenged of Richard, who had fought all meanes to annoy him in either prouince, besides the ordinary braudoes hee gaue him within the heart of his realme. Hee therefore sends a thousand men armes to David King of Scots, and threecore Ships well appointed with furniture to arme twelve thousand men of his country, vnder the command of John of Vienne, Admi-rall of France. Their entry into Scotland was pleasing, but the Scottisshmen grew soone discontented with our men, either through their fault or ours, they accusing vs of infidelity and loofeness, and wee them of barbarousnesse and cruelty to their friend a stranger, who came to succour them.

B This diuision caused David to make a peace with Richard, and our Admirall of Vien-ne to returne speedily home with his Frenchmen: but not without obseruing the manners, strength and commodities of this Island, diuided into two kingdomes. And left hee should seeme to haue made a fruitlesse voiage, yelding an account vnto the King of what he had done, seen and learned in Scotland, he lets him vnderstand, that the strength of Scotland consisted but in five thousand horse, and thirty thousand foote halfe armed.
And that of England in eight thousand horsemen, and 60000. footmen. This relation (weie it true or false) gaue aduice to assaile the King of England in his owne countrey, where he might be vanquished with more facility then abroad, the which so moued the minde of this yong prince (transported with the great harmes suffered with much indignity by the English) as it was easie for the Duke of Bourgongne whom it much concerned to haue the English molested, being often disquieted by them in his countrey of Flanders, to perswade the King to undertake this warre. Opportunity did likewise seeme to inuite him, for that the Duke of Lancaster (pretending right to the realme of Castile by his Wife) had exhausted England, both of men and money, and the Gantois being pacified, all Flanders would be held in subiection by this check.

The Regent acquainted with the Duke of Bourgongnes humour being his brother, (who for his priuate interest would hazard the whole) and noting the eminent dangers in the Kings person (who would imbarke himselfe in this action) the great want of money, the peoples exclamations, the great danger of tumults by the great exactions which must be made, and in the action it selfe, the inconueniency so apparent to any one that would open his eyes, the impossibility of so great an enterprise, to assaile a great King (so oft a Conquerour) within his owne Realme, not holding any land there; hee was vtterly against it, yet he spake soberly, lest hee should offend the King, who greatly affected it.

Lewis Earle of Touraine the Kings brother (who soone shall be Duke of Orleans) the Constable Cliffon, the Earle of Saint Pol, the Lord of Couilly, and others in whom Charles had most trust, had beene so perswaded by the Duke of Bourgongne, as they had nothing else in their mouths, nothing founded in this yong Princes cares, but the necessity, profit, honour and facility of this voiage. What my Liege (say they) are you lesse then the King of England? shall the French yeeld to the English in valour, courage or force? what an indignity is it to haue this people alwaies at our gates, to nourish them in our bosomes, and to furnish them with armes to beat vs? what a benefit will it be to take their nest from them, and leaue them no place of retreat? The Countries of Guienne, Normandy, Picardy and Flanders, are wholly yours. How much doth that import for the honour of your Ma-iesty, and the good of your Realme, to returne them their owne, who haue so often defeated your armies, taken your ancestors, spoiled your Estate, braued it in your townes, & besieged your chiefe City of Paris: As for the facility of the execution, who sees not but you may effect it if you please? The Saxons conquered England with a handful of men, farre from their owne home, and with small meanes; and William the Conquerour with his sword alone. And you my Liege hauing a realme full of men, victuals and money, euen at your enemies gate, shall not you preuaile? England opens her armes vnto you: your Realme inuites you, which without doubt will employ both heart and purse for so great and generous a designe, the which imports both the honour and quiet of your Maiesty.

Such and like speeches they did continually buzze into Charles his cares, but from his Chamber they were published in the Court, and so throughout the whole realme, as that which pleaseth the King doth commonly please all. The designe was to be withed against a capitall enemy of the State, and the proceeding had a faire shew. At the generall instance of all the French, the King decrees in Councell, to leauy a great army, for the voiage of England: letters are sent out to all parts, subsidies, taxes, loans imposed, greater then during the imprisonment of King John, but all was shadowed with this reason: That they must endeavour once for all, to roote out the English, who undermined this Estate, and sought to ruine it. This decree was put in execution with great applause of all men, as if France had laied new foundations of her greatness, both to warrant it selfe from danger at hand, to haue a reuenge of former losses, and to build a new Estate at the cost of the common enemy of the French nation. The Navy is prepared at Scuse and Blanbergue to the great content of the Flemings. They armed foure hundred eighty seven ships for war, with an infinit quantity of victuals, the which came from all parts like to a flowing stream. The Nobility strues who shalbe best appointed. Strange Princes are inuited. The King of Spaine (then a friend to our King) the Earle of Sauoy, the Dukes of Saxony and Bawaria send men. Our Princes will yeeld one to another in costly shewes: they adde superfluous curiosity to necessity. They paint and gild their Ships, all glitters with goodly Ensignes, Penons, Banners, Standards, and Streamers. The Masts painted with rich grounds shining with leanes of gold, gaue notice to all men, that they went not onely to a certaine victory, but to some ioyfull nuptials. But all this feast was made without any reckoning with God, who laughs from heauen at these ants, that strue to climbe without a ladder and at princes, who made these brauadoes at the poore peoples cost, who remembered not that God hath a foueraine court, and a register to controll their actions, and to oppose against their vanities. The Army was prepared in two places, in Flanders, and in Britany. It consisted of twenty thousand Knights and Squires, as many Genouois archers on foot, and five hundred men at armes Britains, vnder the command of the Constable Cliffon, who was with the Fleet in Britany. They had a care safely to lodge this great Army after their descent in England, expecting with safety the variable euent of warre, against a King and people, whom they came to fight with, on their owne dunghill. To prevent all inconueniences, they build a great frame or engine (some attribute this inuention to the Constable Cliffon, others to John of Vienne, Admirall of France, who had laied the first plot of this enterprise) like to a towne of warre, with towers, bastions, bulwarks, flanks, and other defences, according to the manner of that age. There was a lodging for the King and his court, according to the degrees of princes, officers, and noblemen of marke: lodgings for the chiefe of the army, according to their quarters, and space to set vp their tents and pavillions, halls and common places for the munition and victuals which followed the army, and to conclude, conuenient roomes to imbattell a great number of men of warre.

This inclosure or frame was round, and made of many peeces with admirable art, and so great abundance of stulke, as if they had cut downe a whole Forest: it was finished with wonderfull speed, by the great number of workemen which came from all parts. To the men, ships, victuals, and this engine, the Kings court gaue an extraordinary beauty, being accompanied with the Dukes of Lorraine and Bar, the Earles of Sauoy, Armagnac, Geneue, Saint Pol, Longueuille, Eu, Dauphin of Auvergne, the Lord Couilly, Master William of Namur, with all the great Barons of France, and an infinite number of brave nobility who embarked themselves more willingly then in the voyage to the Holy Land. Thus was the preparation made in France for England, where they remained in great perplexity, to see so great a somme ready to fall vpon them. They provide the best they can, first by deuotion, (hauing recourse vnto God) then they fortifie their Ports and all passages with great diligence, both with men of warre, and all sorts of incombers, to helpe those places which nature had made of hard access in this Island. They say that Richard leaued a hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, which was not answerable to the Admirals relation, the first Architect of this ridiculous attempt. But thus are Princes oftentimes abused, imbarcking themselves in dangerous actions without reason, whose ends are not answerable to their beginnings.

All was ready in the end of September: the King had provided for the government of the realme in his absence leauing his brother Lewis Earle of Tourain, assisted with the duke of Berry his vncke, and the bishop of Beauvais his Chancellor. Thus he parts from Paris, and comes to Scuse with great speed, to recouer the time lost. The Regent should not abandon his person in so long and important a voyage, but he staies behind the King, promising to follow presently, but his meaning was to bring this enterprise to nothing. The King being ariued, the houres of stay are tedious, hee tels the minutes, and complains Preparation for the warre of England.

A of the time lost: hee sollicitres his vncke to come by sundry letters, and sends poste after poste, he stampes, he chafes by reason of his stay. The whole Court is of the same humor. The Duke of Aniou answers the King, that he will part to morrow, but he stayes at Paris to make good chere at leisure, of purpose to draw on winter, to make the voyage impossible, and so to ouer-throw the action, the which was neuer pleasing vnto him, either for that it was pleasing to the Duke of Bourgogne his brother, and so to crosse him; or for that he held it prejudiciall to the King and his Realme.

But seeing himselfe prest by importunity, and impatient letters from the King, he parts from Paris, and the same day the Constable Cliffon weighes anchor at Lantriguer in Britany, with his great Towne of wood, and 72. ships of warre, meaning to ioyne with the whole body of the army at Scuse: but it fell out contrary to his designe, and otherwise then the facility of his supposed victory had represented vnto him.

For hauing run his course towards Flanders, to take port at Scuse, behold a contrary wind casts him vpon the coast of England, where, notwithstanding all the diligence of his Mariners his fleet was dispersed into diuers parts, three ships (wherin this great Engine was) are driuen into England, and runne on ground at the mouth of the Riuer of Thames. Behold our Argonauts as much amazed to see themselves taken in a weire, as the English were glad, who with ioy and admiration see themselves possessed (beyond all hope, & without any paine) of that which had cost their enemies so much to ruine them.

C These newes flie speedily to King Richard, who commands this great booty to bee brought vp the riuer vnto him, whither all the Country flockes to so strange a spectacle, and every one holds it for a preface of good successe, to haue taken their City, which should haue taken them. Another part of the fleet is driuen into Zealand, and the Constable of Cliffon with the rest ariues at Scuse, much amazed at this first disaster.

All their ioy of an assured victory, is conuerted into a generall feare, lest some new losse should follow this vnfortunate beginning. But whilst this amazement troubled most of the French, the Duke of Bourgogne and those of his faction (who desired the performance of this voyage at any rate) made these difficulties light, as common accidents which should not hinder great enterprises, the which cannot bee executed with-

D out some crosse, for the which they must seek a remedy, and not despaire: He had perswaded the King againe, easie to be drawne to what he desired. Hereupon the Regent ariues, who (seeing the King resolved to imbarque) vailes his maske, speaks plainly, and tels the King in his Councell; That he will neuer consent hee should expose his person and estate to the hazard of the sea, of weather, and of warre, and vpon an aduice which seemed apparently false: being most certaine that the King of England had assembled about a hundred thousand fighting men. That these first losses were aduertisements from heauen to bridle those vaine hopes, which are sooner conceiued then brought forth. He had alwayes sufficiently declared, that it was not his aduice, yet for that hee would not seeme to contradict the Kings will, and crosse such as gaue him this council, as honorable to himselfe, and profitable to his Realme, he would not rashly oppose himselfe. But seeing now that God spake, he did open his mouth the more boldly, bearing in his heart a faithfull zeale vnto the Kings seruice, and the good of the State. That shortest errors being best, it were better to retire in time, then to make an absolute shipwracke of the Kings person, and the honor and good of the Realme, too much dismembred by former afflictions. This check from heauen which God hath sent, Winter, and the feare of worse, made the Regents aduice to be allowed, both by the King and his council, who changed opinion for their voyage to England. So this great enterprise was disappointed, being very prejudiciall to the poore people, who endured the warre that their enemy should haue felt, by an vnseasonable and excessive charge.

I haue quoted this action in the yeare 1381. vnder the Regency of the Duke of Aniou. I know some attribute it to the Duke of Berry, but I haue followed the first opinion, vpon the relation of true Authors, and as it shall appeare by the progresse of this report most likely. This action was the cause of seditions at Paris and Rouen, bred without doubt by the discontent of this bad government: for this great shew lo incensed the people (being weary and grieved to haue borne so great a burthen for so vaine an enterprise) as they rise at Paris, Rouen, Amiens, Poitiers, Lions, and many other Cities, by this new occasion, which presently succeeded the first folly.

The

to the Regent.

The Regent was blamed by the people, to have been too slack in his opposition against this preparation for England, and the chiefe in Court hated him for being so hasty, for that he was the only stay thereof. Thus ill thought of by both, hee was malignd of all hands. It chanced the Realme of Naples was offered vnto him by Quene Ioane & Pope Clement the 7. This was his whole desire, but he must conquer it by dint of sword. The title only was offered him, both by her that might giue it as being heire, and by him that might confirme the donation as being Pope. All the Kings councill (being weary of the Regents command) wished to see him gone, but they must fly to the people for money; the which was hard to get, as experience did witness.

Presently as they hear talk at Paris of a new imposition (although they sweetned these bitter pilles with the goodly name of subsidies) all the world begins to cry out, and from Paris the brute flies through the whole Realme. The people runne tumultuously to the Greue, they desire the Prouost of Merchants to bring them to the Regent, the which he delays from day to day by excuses, but in the end he cannot retaine them. A great multitude runs to the Regents lodging, they giue him to vnderstand by their prouost, into what extremity they were brought, and vige the late superfluous expences. To what end then (say they) serueth a new war to conquer a new kingdome in the ayre with the ruine of the widow and the Orphelin? This was not decreed, nor practised by the good & wise King Charles, whereunto he had bound his son, who should not suffer the memory of his fathers ashes to bee taxed with this dishonor. The Chancellor Dourmans speaks at the Regents request, hee laies before their eyes the necessity of this voyage, whereby both the King and Realme might reape profit and honor, promising the King should provide for the reliefe of the people. This was gently put off, to makethem lose this humour in diuiding them, but the people continue more obstinate, they require a plaine and resolute answer to their demand, so as the next day, they come in troopes before the Kings lodgings, where the whole councill was assembled with the Regent.

The King giues audience to the prouost of Merchants in the peoples name, who delivers the same complaints. Then Iohn de Marais an aduocate in Parliament, an eloquent and popular man, prepared carefully for the purpose, makes a goodly & artificiall oration to diuert the people from this bitterness, laying before them their duties, the necessity of the Kings affaires, and the good which should redound by the enterprise of this foraine warre. Hee omitted nothing of the office of a good Orator, but he pretailed not, for the people going from thence, without respect of the King or his councill, runne presently to the Jewes, Lombards, & such other Merchants houses as had been accustomed to gather all publike exactions, they break vp their shops & counting-houses, they take away what was good, and ill intreat all such as they meet of their profession, yet they kill no man in this first tumult. The Regent winking at this insolvency, and fearing lest it should increafe by mouing the people already in choller, thinks it best to referre the matter to another time, vntill the fume of this bitter discontent were blowne ouer, aduertisements coming from all parts of the realme, that the Cities grew into the like humour.

But all this dissuades him not from his enterprise; he imployes all such as he thinks fit to win the people. Iohn de Marais, Peter de la Riviere, James Andelle, & such like Tribunes, who seemed to be in credit with the people, in shewing themselves affected to the common good. And to lose no time, he prepares his army, being resolute to leaue this imposition by force, whatsoeuer it cost. The farmers of this leauy, haue charge to begin it. A Collector at the Halls requiring a denier from a poore woman, for a basket of herbs, she crying out, a great troope flocke about this Collector and teare him in peeces.

But this is not all, in this tumult all runne together on heapes: Porters, Pedlers, Carriers, Butchers, Tanners, and such like, the summe of the baser sort, they goe in troopes to the towne-house, they break open the doores, and take such armes as they finde. By the Constables command they had made bectes or axes to arme their men withall, they take them, and so vse them, as this sedition was afterwards called, by the name of Maitains. Being thus armed, they goeto the Farmers lodgings, beat downe the doores, breake open cofers, cubboards, and counting-houses, they draw forth their bookes and papers, they teare and burne them, they take away money and mouebles, and in the end they kill and massacre all the Farmers they can finde, searching all corners of their houses. They cry that one had saued himselfe in Saint Iames Church at the Butchery, they runne thither,

A thither, and murder him holding the Image of the blessed Virgin in his armes. Some faue themselves in S. Germaines Abbey, where they are presently besieged. But whilest that some labour after this siege, the rest run to the prisons of the Chasteler and Fourl Eueque where they release the prisoners and arme them. They bethinke themselves of a head, there was a very sufficient man in prison named Hugh Aubriot, who in former times had beene Prouost of the Merchants, and had with honour executed great charges, both in the Treasury and State, but for certaine dislikes of the Vniuersities, (which was then in great credit at Paris) hee was condemned to perpetual prison. This multitude drawes him forth, vpon promise to be their leader, but being at liberty he slips away and retires wisely to Dijon: being loth to ingage himselfe in these popular confusions, the which discrete men doe see as plagues in a common-weale. This rabble finding themselves countenanced with a Commander so well experienced, presume farther, yet seeing themselves abandoned by the departure of Aubriot, and recalling themselves from this phrensie, their hearts faint, and euery one bethinkes himselfe how to yeeld an account of that which had chanced, all this zeale of publike good vanishing away with the consideration of priuate danger. Such as had most to lose (finding themselves actors in these insolencies) seeke for councill of Iohn de Marais a popular Aduocate, intreating him to be intercessor for them vnto the King. The Vniuersity is also requested to imploy their credit with the Prouost of Merchants and other notable Citizens, which were not guilty of these phrenesies.

C There is a number chosen to goe to the King, and to sue for pardon. These deputies, in their habits, countenances and words, shew the greatest sorrow that may bee, for an offence committed. Iohn de Marais is their Aduocate, the King hauing heard them, sends them away, vntill his Councill had aduised what answer to make: who decrees, That for punishment of this popular insolvency, the City of Paris should pay a hundred thousand Franks, and the heads of this sedition (with such as had broake the prisons,) should bee at the Kings discretion.

They sue to the King for pardon.

This decree is deliuered to Iohn de Marais to make knowne vnto the Parisians, in whose name he had spoken to the Kings Councill. He acquaints them with the Article for the fine, and conceales the punishing of the Authors of this sedition: whether it were by commandment, or otherwise, the History makes no mention: yet he kept their heads and his owne for the Scaffold, as we shall presently see, to reape the deserued punishment for dealing in these dangerous affaires, and to pay a deare interest of their popular brokage. The Parisians tamed by this reprehension, pay the hundred thousand Franks, as a fine for their folly, and the whole taxation imposed for the warre of Naples, without any question.

These summes are giuen to the Regent for his voyage into Italy, where his brethren, the Constable of Clifton, and the greatest part of the Councill wished him, rather then in France (the Chancellor Dourmans onely excepted, who soone shall reape the fruit of his departure) notwithstanding any shew they made him, to see him in so good a way to settle his greatnesse. He parts from Paris taking an honourable leaue of the King, of his brethren, and of the whole Court, leauing the Regency to the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, vntill his returne. But taking the way of Italy, he takes the way of much paine, and the Rendezvous of death, which soone swallows vp both his life and all his dignities. His army was goodly, some say 30000 horse, and an infinit number of foot: others 30000 men, without specifying horse or foot, but all agree that he went to the conquest of this Realme, not only well accompanied, but also well furnished with silver, the necessary finewes of a long war. They gaue out, that it was the Treasure of Charles the 5, the which he caused Sanoyssy to deliuer in the beginning of his Regency.

Lewis of Aniou crowned King of Naples goes to take possession.

The order of the History commands me now to set downe the titles of the Realme of Naples, for the which our Lewis of Aniou marcheth into Italy with his army, and the successe of this voyage. We haue said that Charles (brother to the King S. Lewis Duke of Aniou and Earle of Prouence by his wife Beatrice, was called to the Realme of Naples by Pope Phrane the 4, and conquered the possession by his sword, hauing defeated Manfroy and Conrad of Sueuia.

That he was dispossessed of Sicilia at the Sicilian Euenfong, by Peter of Arragon, fionne in law to Manfroy, fauoured by Nicholas the 4, taking from Charles what his predecessor Phrane

Frban had giuen him, so as after hee had contended long with Peter of Arragon, the Realme of Naples remained vnto him, leauing it to his children with more trouble then content. This Charles of Aniou brother to S. Lewis, had many children, Charles, Robert, Lewis, and Philip. Lewis surnamed the Lame, married Mary daughter of Stephen King of Hungary. Charles Martel had two sons, Lewis and Andrew, Lewis was Prince of Durazzo or Dirrachium, and Philip Prince of Tarentum. All appeared on this Theater in some sort, but Robert second son to Charles, was King of Naples, and Earle of Prouence: he had one sonne named Charles, who succeeded him in these two Estates, and he had but two daughters, Ioane and Marguerite.

Ioane as the eldest, was Queene of Naples & Countesse of Prouence, and was married to Andrew brother of Lewis King of Hungary, a loose and an audacious Princess, who slew her husband (as we haue said) and married with Lewis son to Philip Prince of Tarentum, her cousin, against all order. Lewis King of Hungary, son to Charles Martel, comes to Naples, to reuenge the murder and adultery of this maistie bitch: who flies with her incestuous husband into Prouence, yielding him the free possession of the City of Naples, and that of the greatest part of the Realm, some places remaining in Apulia, in the guard of certain captaines, confident seruants vnto Ioane, who were the means to put her again speedily in possession of that Estate, soone won and soone lost. It is manifest that the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples belongs to the Sea of Rome. Lewis King of Hungary being victor, hauing performed the duty of a good brother, and done all hee could against this villanous murderesse, retournes home, leauing all his new conquest to the disposition of Pope Clement the 6, a Limosin, then resident in Auignon.

Ioane who was neer vnto him, and to whom Auignon (where the Popes had now long held their Sea) belonged, had no great labour, for yielding Auignon vnto him he recovered Naples, both by the Popes fauour (who had the chiefe authority,) as also by money, wherewith she did both win the Gouernors of places most easie to corrupt, and also leauied an army to force them that were most affected to the King of Hungary. Now she is listled againe in the Realme of Naples, with her adulterer Lewis of Tarentum, who furnished not long after this exploit of Naples and the sale of Auignon. After his death she maries presently with James of Arragon, Duke of Calabria of whom shee was soone weary, falling in loue with Otho of Brunluicke, a yong Germane Prince, of a good houle, but not of ability to support Ioane, so as she held him not as a husband, but vsed him as a Stallion. Amidst these alterations of Naples, the Sea of Rome, was not quiet, for after the death of Pope Gregory the 11, who retired from Auignon to Rome, the Colledge of Cardinals fell to a horrible contention for the Popes election: the Romanes being resolute to haue one of their owne nation, and the French one of theirs, from whence sprung that strange Schisme whereof we shall speake.

Frban the sixt, was chosen at Rome, after the decease of Gregory the eleuenth, and the French Cardinals yielded to this election, but for that they said they had been forced by the Romanes, who had them in their power and threatened to kill them, vnder colour to change the aire, hauing obtained leaue to go to Anagnia, they retire to Fundi, a City of the realme of Naples, fauoured by Queene Ioane, French by stocke and humor, and there they choose Clement the 7, for Pope, to oppose him against Frban. Clement retired to Auignon, and Frban keeps at Rome.

Two Popes, two Seas, two Factions, which trouble all Christendome with horrible confusions. Clement teckes to fortifie himselfe, and as France held for him, so did he labour to haue Naples wholly at his deuotion, by reason of the nearnesse, much importing for the City of Rome, where the chiefe quarrell was debated. Contrariwise Frban the sixt to bee reuenged on Ioane, (a partisan to Clement the seuenth his enemy) hath recourse to Lewis King of Hungary the first interested, being brother to him whom this trumpet had slaine, that hee might oppose the same scourge which had already corrected her. But Lewis excusing himselfe by his age, and the infirmity of his body, sent him Charles issued from that Lewis Prince of Durazzo, who wee said, was sonne to Charles of Aniou, seeking euen in the race it selfe, a man to punish this wicked woman, giuing him a goodly army to that end. Ioane seeing this great storme ready to fall on her, flies to Pope Clement the 7, and by his aduice adopts our Lewis Duke of Aniou, of whom we now treat.

Lewis hauing prepared his army, and being crowned King of Naples & Sicilie by Pope Clement the seuenth in Auignon, hee lands at Naples, to take possession of the Realme, whereunto the lawfull heire and the Popes authority did call him. But he came too late, for Charles of Durazzo (being parted from Hungary with his army, and happily landed) entered the Country, ouer-came Otho, the pretended husband of Ioane, and holding him prisoner, hee forced this miserable woman to yeeld vnto his mercy, the which was too great, for that hee onely caused her to bee smothered betwix two pillows, deferring as cruell a death as her life had beene execrable. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, Lewis of Aniou (thrust forward by his owne ambition,) proceeded hauing giuen such order to his affaires (after the adoption made by Ioane in his fauour, and the Popes coronation) as hee procured all the Captaines of places to hold for him, hauing ingaged them by money and golden promises, so as many places held good for him: and the people desired him, being glad to be freed from Ioane, and to haue so mighty a Lord, to maintaine them in peace.

Lewis enters the Realme of Naples: at the first he wins Tarentum and Beri, but whilest he determines to proceed in his designs, death surpriseth him, making an end of his insinuat ambition and of all his toyles: but not of his childrens, Lewis & Charles, not of their posterities. Thus Charles Prince of Durazzo, of the race of Aniou (called the Hungarien, for that he had beene borne and bred in Hungary, and brought vp by King Lewis) remained peaceable King of Naples, leauing two children, Ladislaus and Ioane, who shall prepare new stage, whereon our Princes shall soone play their parts, as you shall vnderstand. Lets now returne to France: The Duke of Anious departure put all authority into the hands of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, who began to manage the affaire of State at their pleasures. There was no great loue betwixt them, although they were brethren, but only to maintaine themselves against such as might hinder their ambitious projects. And for that they had knowne the Chancellor Dourmans, to bee wholly affected to the Regent, they perswaded the yong King to dismisse him, for some reasons, the which are not specified in the History. But Princes want no colours when they will disgrace their seruants. Peter Orgemont was appointed in his place, after the scale had remained some time in the hands of Robert of Corby first president of the Court of Parliament at Paris, and of Philip Moulins a Chanoine of the said City. But Flanders (which alwaies bred some monsters in that age) stirred vp by the English, and puffed vp by the ridiculous conclusion of this great and vaine preparation, began new troubles, and had practices with them of Paris, to draw the rest of the Cities of the Realme into some popular league. These newes put the King into great perplexity, the rather for that he had surprised certaine letters from the Maillotins of Paris, to the white caps of Gant, to make a correspondence betwixt them, the accustomed leuaine of rebellion with ill aduised people.

As these things amaze both the King and his vnclcs, behold Richard lands at Calais, with an army vnder the command of the duke of Lancaster, who at the first spoiles Picardy, and then plants himselfe before Ypre, and besiegeth it. The Gantois had made a good shew, both to the King, and Duke of Bourgogne, vntill that time, seeming resolute to obserue their former accord: but the English army being entered into Flanders, they goe to field, and ioyned with them before Ypre. The Kings vnclcs muster men in all places with great diligence, and intreat their neere friends to come speedily to their succour. The Dukes of Loraine and Bar make haste, the Duke of Britanie comes with a goodly troope. They haue suddenly assembled 20000 Frenchmen at armes, besides the succors of Loraine and Britanie, the number of foot is not specified.

Charles (thus accompanied) comes to Saint Denis in France, and hauing leaue of the Maynrs (according to the ancient custome of Kings) and giuen the fore-ward of his Army to the leading of the Constable Cliffon, and the Duke of Britanie (the Constable marching before the Duke, by reason of his place) the ground of a dislike fell out betwixt them, which being nourished by diuers occasions, shall bee the subiect of a great disaster both for the King and Realme.

The King followed (accompanied with the Dukes of Berry, Bourgogne and Bourbon his vnclcs, and the dukes of Loraine and Bar: hee lodgerth at Blandelle, two leagues from Cassel, with an intent to charge the English, who presently leaue the siege of Ypre, Cassel and Graucins, and retire to Bergues, where Charles presently besiegeth them. lish demands a parlee with the Duke of Britany, they put him in mind of the benefites he had receiued from their nation, and demand requital in this occurrent. The duke of Lancaster remaines at Calais, by reason of his weaknesse: the English Capitaines require respit to vnderstand his pleasures:

Charles makes a truce with the English.

In the end the King receiues them vpon honest conditions, to depart with bagge and baggage and to leaue Flanders, the which they performe. Being returned into England, they are accused to haue sold the Earldome of Flanders to the French, so as by Richard command they are beheaded. The Gantois made a dutifull answer, and promised obedience and loyalty to the King. A truce was concluded for one year with the English, by meanes of the Duke of Lancaster for King Richard, and the Duke of Berry for our King Charles. Such was the issue of this sudden voyage of Flanders, being a meane to settle business of a deeper consultation and more dangerous consequence; seeing it concerned not only the heart, but the whole body of State. They sought how to suppress the sedition, which was apparently bred in Paris, and by their example, in many great Cities of the Realme. To this end Charles vpon his returne from this voyage, staied at S. Denis with his Vncle, the Constable, Chancellor, and his whole Councell: they were all troubled to resolue in so important a cause. For what should they doe? To punish the poore people tired with the wars, thratned with losses, halfe dead by the feeling of so great calamities, that were to beat one lying sicke in his bed for his waywardnesse, and not to cure him of the paine which is the cause thereof. It were a meane to driue him to despair, to apply a remedy worse then the disease. And not to punish them, would argue feare, and make them grow more proud and insolent, a meane to animate them to all impunity, and to lay the way open to a disordered rebellion.

The King consults what course to take with the mutinous Parisians.

But the last aduice prevailed, being well verified, that since the payment of the fine, the Parisians were growne worse, and more bitter: hauing had conference with the Gantois audacious mutines, and the right artificers of rebellion, holding it a vertue to play the mad men against their naturall Lords: and also had so farre abused the Kings bounty, as they had presumed to sollicit the best Cities of the Realme to the like disorder. It did greatly import for the good of the Kings seruice and of the State, that such phrenesies should be suppressed by an exemplary punishment done vpon the chiefe authors. John de Marais was very deepe engaged in these tumults, and the more dangerously, for that hee cast the stone, and withdrew his arme, and making a shew of seruice to the King, he fed the people in these mad humors, very torches of sedition, vnder a colour of the common-weale: for who can beleue they would put so famous a person to death without some iust cause. I know they write diuersly, and euery man hath his iudgment free; yet is it not true nor likely, that in pardoning a whole multitude offending, they would punish him in whom there were no shew of offence. If he were not culpable at the least, he was accused of that which was the subiect of a publike condemnation.

Charles being aduised to punish the Parisians for the insolencies they had committed in his presence, caused his army to lodge about the City, and on a certaine day hee sends for the Prouost of Merchants and the Sheriues, who come vnto him to Saint Denis, to a countenance full of humility, and shew of amendment. The King gaue them to vnderstand, by Peter Orgemont his Chancellor, that he meant to go to his City of Paris, to punish the rebels and seditious, who had not respected his presence. The prouost makes answer: That the whole body of the City was wonderfully grieved for that which had been committed by men in despair, worthy to be seuerely punished, but the good Citizens had no community with these rascals, and that the whole City was ready to doe him faithfull seruice.

The King enuers Paris with his army.

There were many about the King which made all odious that concerned the Parisians, but Charles made them no other answer, but that he would be soone at Paris, and doe what reason and the duty of a good King required. Hee caused his fore-ward to march, led by the Constable Cliffon and the Marshall of Sancerre, who seize vpon the gates, the which they found open without any guards. The King accompanied with the dukes of Berry, Bourgongne, and Bourbon, with other Lords of his Councell, and an infinite number of Noblemen and Gentlemen in great shew, terrible to the people, marcheth into the City. Being come to S. Denis gate, hee causeth the barres to be beaten downe. The Prouost of Merchants, the Sheriues, with the chiefe Inhabitants of the Citie, carrying the keyes, beseech the King to giue them audience: he denyeth them, and passeth on to the house of Saint Pol, but the army is disperfed throughout all the quarters of the Citie. Presently they take away all the chaines, and send them to Bois de Vincennes. They search all houses for armes; the which are instantly caried to the Louure and the Bastile. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, with the Prouost and his Archers, goe throughout the City, causing 300 of the most seditious to be apprehended.

The next day many heads were stricken off at the Halles, and amongst the rest, that of John de Marais, whom all men had heard of late discourse so eloquently with admiration, being held for the Oracle of France. These executions were done by fits, with such a shew of gravity, as the seat of iustice did more terrifie, then the executioners arme vpon the scaffold. A whole day was spent in these slow proceedings, the City gates being kept so straitly, as no man might issue forth: houses and shops were shut vp, with so great a silence, as if all had beene dead, euery man being hidden in his house, or else so amazed as he durst not looke into the streets. The Vniuersity (which then was in great credit with the King) becometh sutor for the people, and beseecheth him not to include the innocent with the culpable. The King answereth coldly, that he would aduise what to doe, willing them to retire. In the meane time a great scaffold is made on the highest staire of the Palace, before the great image of Philip the Faire, with great shew and pompe: in the midst was a royall Throne, and seats on either side.

John de Marais, a famous aduoc-ate, with many others, excepted.

The Heralds giue commandement throughout the City in the Kings name, that euery man should repaire to the Palace at a certaine houre. The King sitting in his seat of iustice hauing on either side of him, the Dukes of Berry, Bourgongne and Bourbon his Vncles, with all the rest of his Councell in order, he commanded Peter Orgemont his Chancellor, to deliuer his mind to the people of Paris. The multitude being disarmed, compassed in round about with armed men, being bare-headed, they fall vpon their knees, seeing Orgemont rise from his chaire: who hauing made a great obeyfance to the King, hee turnes to the multitude. If thou hadst (quoth he) O City, as much care of thy duty, as thy Kings haue alwayes mildly and fatherly entreated thee, thou wouldest remember the soueraigne bounty and clemency of our late King of happy memory, Charles truly wise, who (dissi-grous to tame thy folly and rashnesse by a wise mildnesse) pardoned the strange and cruell errors which thou hadst committed against his father being a prisoner, without any respect, affliction the afflicted, and supporting his capital enemy against him, with all treachery and infolency. Thou canst not deny, ingratefull people, how much thou wert indebted to that good Prince: duty did binde thee to sacrifice thy selfe cheerfully for him in his afflictions. But all these things being troden vnder foot, hee vsed towards thee all humanity, which the most affectionate and faithfull subiect may hope for of his Prince. His sonne our King seated at this day in the royall throne, and heyre to his vertues, hath followed his fathers steps in this mildnesse and clemency, hauing supported thee more then a father could doe his child. But thou hast followed (being mad and ingratefull) thy wretched disposition, suffering thy selfe to be furiously transported by thy wicked Councillors (the fire-brands of sedition and disobedience) and by the vnuly passions of thy blind fury. The goodly worke thou hast made of late, the disloyall intelligences thou hadst with those mutines, enemies of all command and policy: the audacious practices thou hast presumed to make in the Cities of the Realme: and the blood which thou hast spilt in the bowels of this thy Country, wherof the hath horror, feeling her bosome polluted with the blood vnjustly shed by thy violent hands. All these horrible and tragicke effects are knowne to the world: for the which thou canst yeeld no excuse, which doth not double the offence. O wretched people! be not these authentick testimonies to the whole Realme, yea to all nations, of thy ingratitude, disloyalty, cruelty, villany, and fury? Miserable, what hast thou deserued? The Kings bounty? But thou hast treacherously abused it. Thou hast made shew to contemne publike authority, drunke with thine owne friendship of thy wicked Councillors. The King, the King I say, shall make thee feele, that he hath one arme to support and maintaine the good, and another to punish and root out the wicked. Thou hast seene examples vpon these wicked heads, which made thee to forget thy duty; but the punishment is light in regard of the offence: neither doest thou feele any smart, wherof thou thy selfe art not the cause. Orgemont hauing thus ended, turnes vnto the King: My Liege (sayth he) is this it which your Maicesty commanded me to lay vnto the people. It is answered the King) but this sufficeth not, in regard of what they haue deferred. This short and rough answer from the King, the Chancellors speech, vitred with great vehemency, and especially the blood richly spilt, which they did see as it were rebound vpon the place of execution: the fearfull armes wherewith the people were compassed in, had brought them into extreame perplexity, like men already in the graue: so as eury one beroughed himselfe, according to his offences he had committed: and such as had wealth, according to the enemies which did maligne them, being terrified with the tragike spectacle of Iohn de Marais.

They stand all mute, their eyes fixed on the ground, prostrate before his throne, men and women, yong & old, infinite in number. In this great silence the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne rise from their seats with a very mournfull countenance, and fall at the Kings feet, beseeching him to haue pity of his poore City of Paris, and not to comprehend the innocent with the culpable, good men with rascals vnworthy of his grace. Presently after their speech, without expecting any answer from the King, the sorrow of this miserable people, suppressed during their complaints and threats, burst forth into so lamentable a cry, as if the whole City had bene lost. All cryed for mercy: there was nothing but cries, lamentations and howlings of women & men, old and yong. The Ladies and Gentlewomen of the City, with their heire hanging downe, full of teares, cry out: Liege Lord, will you ruine your City of Paris for some rascals? let it begin by vs and ours, we desire not to suruine this misery: take pity (Liege Lord) of your people, who sue for pity. The people cry out againe with a fearfull voyce: Mercy, Mercy.

This spectacle was pittifull to behold: there was no heart so hard but relented. The King in the end answered, (the noise being quieted,) That he would not punish the good for the bad, and that he did pardon the people, vpon condition, they should be better aduised hereafter, and not suffer themselves to be seduced by these wicked ring-leaders of sedition. That for Gods sake, and at his Vncles suite, hee gave life vnto the prisoners, paying such fines as his Councell should decree. Those to whom the prisoners belonged, cryed out, God save the King: and the people freed from their feare, redouble their cries with great ioy, and so they all depart. The Councell decrees, That forasmuch as the City of Paris had bene engaged in this sedition, they should be deprived of their Magistrates, chaires and armes, and should lose all priuiledges vntill the King had otherwise determined. That for recompence of this capitall crime, as well the prisoners, as all others guilty of the sedition, according to information duly made, should pay the moytie of their goods. The which was speedily put in execution, to send home the men of war, by means of the great summes of money which they leauied by this exaction. Thus the sedition at Paris was suppressed, and afterwards at Rouen and Orleans, but with farre more rigour then at Paris. An example for all subjects, how to oppose themselves against their Lords: who soone or late make them to reape the fruits of their rashnesse and insolvency. Their Magistrates, chaires, armes, and all priuiledges, were soone restored to the Parisians, by means of the D. of Bourgongne, who from that time sought all meanes to creepe into the peoples fauour, which he & his sonne shall vie no lesse then the Nauarrois had done: this happened in the yeare of our Lord God 1387. in the month of December. This iust execution did greatly countenance the yong age of Charles, for that in so solemne an act, he had caried a countenance worthy of a Royall Maiesty: His age and the name of a King, made him know that hee was a King, together with the daily instructions which did sound in his eares, by his most inward and trusty seruants: yet his Vncles kept him still in his minority, disposing of matters in Councell by their authority. Charles was much discontented with this proceeding of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, who should rather haue preuented him, then hee them, experience hauing taught all Frenchmen what hee was. Hee therefore seeks a remedy for their error.

Hee caused a Councell to bee held at Rheimes, where it was decreed, That Charles should be free from the government of his Vncles: for that both his age and the proofe of his iudgment did testifie plainly that hee was worthy to gouerne his Realme. This resolution greatly displeased the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, who would gladly haue held a longer possession of this Royall authority which they enjoyed, being discontented with such as had put this spirit into the yong King. The Cardinal of Laon (one of the first authors of this Councell) enjoyed it not long, for hee dyed (not without suspicion of

A poyson) Iohn of Montague shall pay both principall and interest in his time. Iohn Mercier and the Lord of Noiant shall haue their parts, these shall now enter into quarter, and haue all the credit. It is this Noiant which caused the golden Hart in the Palace to bee made for a modell of that which he would make of gold, of the Ingots he had gathered together in the Treasury, hauing reduced the coyned money into this forme, left Charles a yong Prince and very bountifull, should giue it away prodigally. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne retire themselves quietly to their houses, making a shew to be very well satisfied, although they hatched a great discontent, and especially Philip, being a man of an imperious and insupportable spirit.

We haue drawne Charles out of his Minority, the first parcell of our discourse: let vs now see his Maioity, into the which I tremble to enter, foreseeing so happy a beginning to haue so lamentable an end. But alas! what shall we see therein, which wee haue not scene in our miserable age. Our experience shall bee vnto vs a mournfull commentary, most true in the reigne which we are to represent.

The Maioity of King CHARLES the sixt:

Remarkable in two respects: Of Health, and Sickness.

HE reigned thirteene yeares, either with his Vncles, or alone in his good sence, and in phrensie, not ruling but ruled, or rather rauished by the sundry passions of others. So wee will distinguish his Maioity, according to the calculation of these two seasons, and in either of them the most famous acts of these home-bred confusions.

The first time of the Kings Health,

From the yeare 1388, vnto 1393.

FRANCE enjoyed a long rest, the tempest of these popular tumults being pacified, Flanders subdued, and the English forced to hold a truce (by reason of their home-bred quarrels, the which brought forth strange effects, as wee shall hereafter shew.) Charles then vndertook the charge of his Realme, to gouerne alone, without any Tutors. The flower of his youth, framed to great affairs, and commendable for his milde disposition, promised the fruits of a reigne both wise, moderate, peacefull, and most happy. But oh the vanity of mans hopes! a dreame of him that wakes, a fruitlesse paine which hunts and gets nothing.

Being freed from the government of others, hauing absolute authority, he was desirous to marry Lewis his onely brother, and to giue him authority: neither would he abandon his cousins of Aniou, Lewis and Charles, in their pretensions to the Realme of Naples: The Estate of Milan did wonderfully import to aduance this action, for the commodity tis it hath in Italy. To this end he married his brother Lewis with Valentine the daughter of Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan, a marriage which succeeded not according to his desire, no more then his owne. An Italian woman ioyned with a Germane, shall make strange worke: to shew, that all is not gold that glisters: for both these mariages were built vpon grounds of apparent good, as farre as humane reason could comprehend, to the end they might haue great intelligences both in Germany and Italy, alliances which import much for the good of France. Philip of Valois, the kings brother, & Iohn Duke of Orleans, were dead without children, and the Duchy returned to the Crowne. Charles giues this Duchy to his brother Lewis, who was but Earle of Touraine, and now shall be Duke of Orleans, and by this name shall be much spoken of.

In this profound peace, it was necessary for Charles to make himselfe knowne to his subjects, after so many confusions. He makes a progresse into Languedoc, one of the remotest Prouinces from his chiefe City, lying vpon the Mediterranean sea, and yet one of the most fertile and best affected to the Crowne. He had especial reasons to visit this goodly Prouince, for the great complaints they made against the Duke of Berry their Gouernour, who committed great extortions by his officers, vnder colour of authority. Charles passeth by Dijon to see his Vncle the Duke of Bourgongne, who accompanys him to Auignoa. The Earle of Sauoy comes vnto him, the people of Dauphine and

Viuarez shew a wonderfull ioy to see their King after so troublesome a time. So hee comes to Auiignon, being kindly received, and much made of by Pope Clement the 7, who could not stand without him, hauing Frane the 6, for his competitor. The widow of Lewis Duke of Aniou repaired thither, who by the fauour of Charles caused Lewis the second, her eldest sonne to bee crowned King of Naples. This course wee must hold for the continuance of our History.

From Auiignon he went into Languedoc to settle his authority, the which was much respected by the people of that Country, but had been greatly blemished by the gouernment of the Dukes of Aniou & Berry his Vncles, Gouernors of that goodly Prouince one after another. He staies at Montpellier, a City of a goodly & pleasant situation; where he heard many complaints against the Duke of Berry his Vncle, for his great oppression of the country. But the absence of this Prince, and the authority of his name staid the remedy to another season. The Estates of the country made sure to haue the Earle of Foix for their gouernor, hauing heretofore liued quietly vnder him; but he would not accept of this gouernment, without the good liking of the Duke of Berry, so as all the punishment fell vpon Beizac his chiefe Treasurer, who was burnt at Beziers, purging in the fire the extortions he had committed vnder his masters authority.

death of the Mauarous.

At that time Charles King of Nauarre died, so often blemished in the truth of this History: we haue noted how he had retired himselfe from Court, into his Realme of Nauarre. As this retreat was vnto him a reproachfull banishment, so this shamefull solitariness was a ciuill death. But the Catastrophe of his tragical life was a famous proofe, that God doth often reuenge notable sins by notable punishment euen in this life. He was much broken by the exceesse of venery, and all sorts of dissolutions, the which he had exceedingly vsed with his wonderfull tyranny & cruelty. As they did anoint him with medicines fit to warme & comfort his benummed members (some say they had chafed him with Aqua vitæ, and wrapt him in a sheete) behold, fire takes hold of this sheete with such violence, as (being vnable to quench it) he was consumed by degrees, liuing some daies, as furnishing his paine; and that which increased the horror of Gods iudgment, his death made both great and small to reioyce, and was receiued in France with as great content, as the winning of a great and famous battell. There was a generall truce betwixt the French and English, so as the garisons lying still, the souldiers bred vp and nourished in armes, fighting no more by order vnder their ensignes, fought now their prey by disorder vpon the labourer and Merchant. The Countries of Rouergue, Perigord, Limosin, Auvergne, and La Marche, had English garisons, who spoiled these Countries, and did runne vp into the neerest parts of Languedoc, Velai, Genuadan, Viuarez, and Suenes, where the villages are for the most part walled in, to preuent these sudden incursions. There were many theues amongst them: Teste noire or Black-pate in the Castle of Ventador; Amerigor Marcel at Roch-Vandais, who breaking the truce, sought to be supported by the King of England, but in the end they all fell into the hangmans hands, or perished miserably by some strange death, an Image of our late confusions. Liberty had been bred vp these warriours with so great abundance, as the English passed the sea to make Turneys, and to fight at barriers, as they vse at great triumphs. There was a Tilt stepp betwixt Calais and Saint Iaquesvuert, where the Nobility made triall of their valour, as in a schoole of Fence. To take away this troublesome abundance, they tooke occasions to make long voyages into Castile and Italy, but in the end there was a very famous one offered against the miscreants of Barbary, at the Geneuois request, who suffered many discommodities in their trafficke, by these barbarous Africans. Charles granted them succours willingly, and gaue the charge of this war to Peter Duke of Bourbon, assisted with the Earles of Auvergne and Foix, the Lords of Coucy, Guy of Tremouille, John of Vienn, Admiral of France, Philip of Arthois Earle of Eu, Philip of Bar, Harcourt, Antoin, Linge, Pyquiny, and many other great men from all parts of the Realme, which ranne to so famous an action, vnder so worthy a Commander, and at so great leysure, more painfull then the toyle of warre to men that desired nothing but employment. Richard King of England, to imitate Charles, granted succour to the Geneuois, vnder the command of the Earle of Salisbury, accompanied with many Noblemen and English Gentlemen, moued with desire like vnto the French, in the enterprise of this pleasing paine. The Deputies of the kings of France and England assembled to treat of a general peace, but

A but not able to effect it, they continue a truce for foure yeares, with goodly prouisions against robberies, for the safety and quiet of their Estates. Charles gaue free passage to the English, by the Countries of Languedoc and Dauphin, to passe the Alpes safely.

All come to Genoa, to the great ioy of the Geneuois. Being shippt, they land within few dayes in Barbary. Presently they besiege the City of Africke (so our History termes it) as bearing the name of all the worst and barbarous Country. They call the African commanders Agadinor of Olfence, and Bradaist of Thunes. But our Argonauts found them which stayed their fury. The Barbarians defended themselves with an obstinate resolution. But their force did them lesse harme then the ayre, and diet, being very contrarie to their complexions; so as our army decreased daily, especially of men of accompt. This siege continued fixe weekes with much losse and no hope to preuaile. The Geneuois hauing conceiued a hope of a sudden victory, began to grow cold and slacke in furnishing of the army. The Duke of Bourbon foreseeing the difficulties which might grow in continuing obstinate at this siege, fearing the winter, and not trusting the Geneuois (who are famous for that they haue no faith) remembering the example of the King Saint Lewis, resolved to returne, without any greater losse. He trusteth vp his baggage, and brings backe his troopes into France, continuing the example to all such as are capable of reason, how difficult it is for Christians to performe these strange attempts, after the experience of many ages. The French and English hauing liued louingly together in this voyage, returned to their houses without doing any memorable act, but to haue endeauored to doe something worthy of memory to auoid idleness during so peacefull a time.

The Geneuois

Britany did then conceiue, and afterwards bring forth more preiudiciall effects then Barbary it selfe: and the way was made by light occasions to horrible and monstrous effects, to the great preiudice both of the King and Realme: for a notable testimony to posterity, what Councillors, enuy, and ambition, be in a State: wee like wretches seeke for peace, and when God giues it, we flye from it, we maligne another mans good, and decriue our selues of our owne. But alas! it were a small matter for a great personage to hurt himselfe by his owne passions, if this poyson did not spread abroad to the preiudice of the Common-weale.

D We haue said that John of Montfort remained peaceably Duke of Britany, by the death of Charles of Blois, and the agreement he made with his widow, whose eldest sonne John of Britany, Earle of Ponthieure, was redeemed from prison from England by the Constable Cliffon, who gaue him his daughter in marriage and payed his ranfome. The Constable was a Britton, and so subiect to John of Montfort Duke of Britany, his ancient and capital enemy, and yet by this successe was become his Lord.

Doublelesse in this quality Cliffon could not but yeeld vnto him as his vassall, but as Constable of France and dearly beloued of his master, the greatest Monarch in Europe, and Soueraigne to the Duke of Britany, herein the Duke must needs respect him, his place giuing him authority in many notable actions, ouer the greatest personages within the Realme. This was the ground of their hate, which not onely embarked King Charles, Lord vnto them both, but caried him so farre into the maine, as hee could nor auoid a notable shipwracke by their meanes. By the former accord, John of Montfort was to yeeld vnto Cliffon all his patrimony, whereon he had seized vnder colour of a confiscation, reuoked by Charles, which he had not yet performed. And although he had promised the King, and giuen him a new assurance, yet did he not trust the King, but continued his intelligences with the English, fortified his places, and coyned both gold and siluer against the lawes of State. He refused likewise to acknowledge Clement the seuenth for lawfull Pope, whom France approued: nor to suffer the Earle of Ponthieure aforesaid to beare the name and armes of Britany. These were the chiefe causes of their complaints and differences.

The King and his most secret Councell, Mercier, Montagu, and la Riviere, held for the Constable. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, and the Chancellor Orgemont, for the Duke of Britany, a cunning dissembling Prince, and high minded. He spake proudly, by reason of his intelligence with England, which could not faile him: and mildly when as he found meanes to doe his businesse vnder-hand, and not to breake with the King. Hee comesto Tours vnto Charles, where after many discourses their quarrels are ended by marriages: the Kings daughter (being yet young) is promised to the Dukes sonne, and the sonne of John Earle of Ponthieure (borne of the Constables daughter) to the Dukes daughter, ter, who promisseth likewise to restore Cliffon his lands; in shew friends, but in their hearts irreconcilable enemies. Hereupon Cliffon goes into Britany to receiue his lands. The Duke held a Parliament at Vannes, whither he called his Nobility. The Constable comes, fearing no enemy. The Duke had built a castle called the Hermine, where he feasts the States. The Constable is called, and welcomed with the first: this countenance did not shew what was prepared for the end of the banquet against the Constable. After dinner the Duke taking him by the hand, vnder colour to shew him his building, and to haue his aduice, as of a great Captaine and well seene in Architecture, he leads him from place to place, through halls, chambers, and closets, vntill he had brought him to a great Tower, hauing an iron doore, wherein were armed men. The Duke enters first, the Constable follows him, viewing the proportion of this worke, and the thickeesse of the wals by the windowes. But behold the Duke slips out of the Tower, where he leaues the Constable, and shuts the doore after him.

The Duke of Britanie seizeth treacherously on the Constable,

This signe giuen, the armed men seize vpon the Constables sword, and keepe him prisoner, putting irons on his legges. The Constable was not so much amazed at this strange vltage, as the Duke reioyced at this sweet content of reuenge, thinking to attaine the full of his desires, to be reuenged of a capitall and cruell enemy, and in the heat of his fury he commands a faithfull seruant of his called John Banalan, to dispatch the Constable presently. Banalán accepts this charge, but he doth not execute it. He goes to the Tower and assures himselfe of the Constables person, retaining the souldiers, whom the Duke commanded to obey him, and so he passeth the night with the Constable. But the night gaue him counsell. The Duke transported with ioy in the heat of his choler, goes to his rest, but care awaked him, and reason (of more force then his passion) lets him know the fault he had committed, and repentance followed this first act. A wife seruant in not obeying his masters passion. The Duke lying restlesse a great part of the night, riseth early in the morning, calleth Banalán, and demands what is become of the Constable; his passion bewrayes his mind before he spake, witnessing the shame he had of his choler, & his griefe for this furious charge. Banalán comforts him, and assures him that the Constable is well. The Duke wonderfully glad of this newes, which freed him from so cruell a torment, commands he should be well entreated and with respect, attending newes from the King: D from whom there comes poste vpon poste with complaints and commandements to the Duke.

And repents what he had done,

The Duke without any great delay excuseth himselfe of his imprisonment, and sends the Constable to the King. It had bene more auailable for him to haue suppressed his choler, in committing this error. But he did verifie, That he which offends doth neuer forgive. The Constable goes to the King to Blois, he thanks him for his care in his deliuerie: the Duke doth likewise send vnto him, to craue a safe conduct to come himselfe to make his iust excuses, and to shew what reason had moued him to put the Constable in prison. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne holding openly for the Briton, obtraine leaue for him to come vpon the Kings word. He comes well accompanied, and not only iustifies the taking of Cliffon, being his subiect, & in his owne country, but also he would haue the King beholding vnto him for the respect he bare vnto his officer, whom otherwise he might iustly haue put to death. It is an easie matter for great men to manage their affaires at their seruants cost. The Constable digested quietly this new affront, being glad to haue recovered his liberty: but the Duke of Britanies malice shall bee the cause of great misery both to the King and Realme, seeking new deuices to satisfie his choler, a furious beast which can neuer be tamed by flattery. It burst forth vpon a light and ridiculous subiect, which bred a horrible Chaos of sundry confusions.

Peter Craon a Nobleman of the Country of Aniou, had great credit with the King, and with Lewis Duke of Orleans his brother, who loued him so dearly, that hee trusted him with his greatest secrets, euen with his amorous passions, whereunto his loose disposition, his age, ease, and Court, made him too proane, to the great discontent of Valentine his wife, who exceeding ialous of her husband, and an Italian, seeking by all meanes to learne how he was affected, feeling him so cold to her, shee finds no better expedient then to gaîne Craon, whom shee handled so cunningly, as shee drew the worrne from his nose.

Hauing speciall aduertisement of her husbands loues, she threatens the Lady that was beloued,

A beloued, and complains to her husband, naming the reporter. The Duke of Orleans finding himselfe wronged by this disloyall affront done him by Craon, in a very light subiect, but a prooffe of his rash treachery, vnworthy of so strict a friendship wherewith he had honoured him, he complained to the King his brother, who loued him exceedingly. Both of them detecting this disloyall rashnesse of Craon, as a treacherous and an insufficient man, holding him vnworthy of their seruice, dismiss him with great disgrace, refusing to see him, or to heare his pretended excuses.

Peter of Craon disgraced.

Thus Craon retires to his house wonderfully perplexed with this disgrace, and finding himselfe not greatly safe, he retires to the Duke of Britany his kinsman and deare friend, to whom he reports his misfortune. The Duke embraceth this occasion, and with a deeper reach, perswades him that the Constable is the cause of this disgrace, making his profite of the passions of these young Princes, and proceeding in his discourse, (thrust on by the innerate hatred he bare him) he perswades Craon to kill him, to rid the world of so pernicious a man: and thereupon offers him his meanes, vpon all occasions.

The Duke perswades him to murder Cliffon.

This was that miserable counsell which hatred and malice gaue him, two bad counsellors: for if choler bea short fury, who sees not by the effect, that hatred is a continuing rage, the mother of reuenges, the seed of all misery to mankind.

As it was simply concluded betwixt them, so was it vainly executed by Peter of Craon. He had a house at Paris, whither he finds meanes to send men fit for this murder, and follows himselfe secretly: (an easie matter in this great forest of Paris) who knowing the hours of Court, and hauing set spies to observe when the Constable should goe from the King at night to his lodging, he attends him with his murderers in a little house where he should passe, and sets vpon him with twenty armed men.

The Constable assaulted by Craon.

The Constable thinking at the first, that the Duke of Orleans had done it inieft, made no great regard thereof, but vnderstanding it was Craon, he defends himselfe with a great skaine (such as they did usually weare in those dayes) who being charged on all sides by these twenty murderers, and crying for ayd, he saues himselfe (all wounded) in a Bakers shop.

The people that were neare, came running at this noyse: Craon saues himselfe on horsebacke by Saint Anthones gate, with the greatest part of these murderers: three only were taken in this disorder.

The Constable was caried to his lodging, called the house of Mercy (it is now the house of Guise, as the History obserues) all wounded. The King and Court (disquieted by so audacious an attempt,) are all the night in tumult. These murderers being examined, confesse that Peter of Craon had not only caused them to commit this act, but was also present at the execution, and so they are beheaded.

The King comes to visit the Constable lying in bed: he doth comfort him, and assures him, that he will not leaue so execrable an act unpunished. But in effect this affront so impudently done to his Constable in the bosome of the head City, in the view of all his Court, and in his presence, together with the foorne of his audacious imprisonment, and the priuie of Cliffon, who keeping silence, the indignities he had so oft receiued of the Duke of Britanie, pleaded for him, being sealed by these outrageous wounds. All these things put Charles into such a choler, and made so great an impression in his heart of hatred against the Duke, as he was farre more sicke then the Constable himselfe.

King Charles assisted by his Councell, declares Peter of Craon guilty of high Treason, and enemy to the Crowne of France, hauing attempted against his chiefe officer, and doth eate him to come and iustifie himselfe speedily. He is called, and (not appearing) is condemned for his contempt: he is declared a banished man, and his body and goods confiscated. And in the execution of this sentence, his house at Paris was razed. The Tragedy began by this act, in the year 1393, in the moneth of May, but it shall continue with many other mournfull acts, and shall cause new Seanes vpon this Stage. This sentence thus executed at Paris, it went into Aniou and Britany. All Craons places and houses were seized on, and put into the Kings hands: and the Duke of Britany was commanded by the same Commissioners to deliuer him. The Duke of Britany excuseth himselfe, swearing that he hath him not in his power, discouers the place where he is, makes offer of all his meanes for the execution of iustice: he sends to the King to reiterate his excuses, assuring him that he was not priuy to this murder. Craon was fled to the towne of Sable in Maine, which which appertained vnto him. Charles (transported with choler) lost both meat and rest, inceased by the Duke of Orleans his brother, and his most trusty seruants, Noyan, Mercier, and Montaigne, dreaming of nothing more then to be reuenged of the Duke of Britanie, whom he held to be the very cause of this attempt. Such as were of iudgement and without passion, thought no otherwise. But alas! how wake is mans vnderstanding, euen in the best things, wherein there often wants a good proceeding. Charles had great cause to be grieved with the Duke of Britany, but he should moderate the heat of his choler, by the temper of wisdom, expecting wisely a fit opportunity to punish, not troubling the quiet of his mind with such violence, in seeking reuenge of his enemy.

We may well say, That Charles had a good cause, but it was ill managed: and the Duke of Britany a bad, the which he governed with policy. Wherein our Charles should haue vied cunning to crosse his enemies cunning, following the example of his wife father Charles the fift, who vanquished the Nauarrois with patience, and flying the vntempered rashnesse of Iohn his grandfather, who seeking hastily a reuenge of the same Nauarrois his enemy, did thrust himselfe into a mortall prison.

The children are neither heires of their fathers vertues, nor of their happinesse, whose bodies they haue by the wil of God, being the instruments of their elence, but he referes to himselfe the souerainty of vertue and happinesse, to gouerne them in the difficult Labyrinth of this world. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne aduise the King their Nephew, to leaue the deciding of this quarrell to the Constable and Craon, and not to attempt any thing against the Duke of Britany, who disauowed the fact, who feeling himselfe oppressed, would seeke for extraordinary remedies to defend himselfe, whereby strange inconueniences might ensue.

But the King was resolute at any hand to make warre against the Duke of Britany. All are sent for, euenry man doth march, the Rendezuous is at Mans. Peter of Craon retires from Sable, whilst this storme riseth: but the King marcheth on, assuring himselfe that he was in Britany, although some say that he was in Arragon, and that the Queene of Arragon had giuen him intelligence, that she held a French Knight prisoner at Perpignan, who would not discouer his name. This distempered choler had much impaired the kings health, who caried in his face the disease of his mind.

His Physicians dissuaded him from this voyage, as most preiudiciall for his health: and the Duke of Britany by a new excuse, beseeched him to beleue, that hee had no dealings with Peter of Craon.

The King could not be deterred by all these difficulties, from passing on in this iourney, so wilfully vnderaken by him: although his Vncles found new deuices to stay him, both at Chartres and at Mans, employing his Physicians, to tell him, how dangerous it was to march in Summer, being extremely hot, considering the debility of his health, much impaired since his burning choler, the which had altered his blood, whereof hee had proofe by daily Feuers. But this passion of choler had so possessed his poore afflicted spirits, that such as were about him, besides himselfe, perceiued his griefe to be the greater, in that he was insensible of what he suffered: and his seruants espied that which they could not but see in him, by the extreme apprehension they had of the harme which was at hand.

Moreover, the Duke of Britany, to calme this great storme, which was ready to fall vpon him, (although in truth he had hidden Peter of Craon at Susner, and was Iory that he had not slaine the Constable Cliffon) sends a certaine Bishop of his Country to the King, called the Beard, a very famous man for the integrity of his life, to beseech him to beleue that he was nothing guilty of this attempt, neither did he know what was become of Peter of Craon, whom he would send vnto him with his hands and feet bound, if hee were in his power: That he should not make warre against his owne Country, and against a poore power, which must suffer for another mans folly. In the end this man pronounceth the threats of Gods iudgement against Charles, if hee should proceed vnto warre, so lightly vnderaken against his vassals and subiects, and against the articles of marriage concluded betwixt his daughter and the Dukes sonne, as a seale of their loues. This Bishop was heard in Council, and the Duke of Berry speaking more boldly then the rest (for the authority which his degree and white haies gaue him) laid open all that might hinder this voyage. But Charles stopt his eares to all good counsell, hauing his

A braine disposed to the distemperature which shall presently seize vpon him, running headlong into the mischief which should afflict him and all France. He parts from Mans in Iuly, (in an exceeding hot day, as the History sayes, as if all things had conspired to afflict this poore Prince) at nine of the clocke in the morning, to recue the coolnesse of the greatest heat at noone-tide, weake in head and mind, distempered with choler, griefe, despayre, and languishing: his body wearied with watching and distaste, not able to cate nor sleep, hauing his head muffled with a great hood of scarlet, and his body couered with a thicke Ierkin of Veluet, (too weighty for a sharpe winter) marching on a sandy plaine, so scale with the Sunne-beames, as the strongest did melt in sweat, and were out of breath.

Being entred the forest of Mans, behold a man bare-headed and bare-legged, attired in a coat of white rugges, steps suddenly forth betwixt two trees, taking hold of the reins of his horse, he flayes him, and sayes vnto him; King, ride no further, but returne backe, for thou art betrayed.

Charles (whose spirits were otherwise dulled) was amazed at this voice, and his blood greatly distempered. His seruants run to this man, and with blowes make him leaue the reins of his horse, and so without any further search the man vanished. After this accident there presently followes another. Charles and his Noblemen did ride in troopes diuided by reason of the dust, and he himselfe all alone pursue, with the Pages of his chamber, who were so neare vnto him, as they rode on his horses heeles. He that was nearest caried his helmet vpon his head, and the next his lance, being garnished with crimson silke. As the heat of the noone day makes men drouzy on horseback, it chanced the Page which caried his lance, (being very sleepey) let it fall vpon him which caried the helmet, making a great noise, like the rushing of armes: the King starts with amazement at this noise, and seeing the crimson banderolle of the lance, hauing his spirits weakened with the former distemperatures, transported with the imagination of this voice, sleepey with labour and heat, he imagined himselfe to be compassed in with many armed men which pursued him to the death.

A strange accident befalls the King.

The second season, from the time of the Kings sicknesse:

From the yeare 1393, to the yeare 1422.

This time of his infirmity is distinguished into many Acts, whereof this is the first Scene of a long and mournfull Tragedie.

Thus Charles transported with this frenzy, layes hold on his sword, drawes it, runnes violently after his Pages, and cries amaine, At these Traytors. The Pages conceiuing at the first, that he had bene displeased for the disorder of the Lance, flye from him. The King followes after, doubling his cry. At this noise the Duke of Orleans runnes towards him, to vnderstand the cause. The King layes at him, not knowing him: the Duke flies, and the King followes. The Duke of Bourgongne rides to him: all gather together with a great outcry: Squires and Knights compasse in the King, till that being wearied, and his horse out of breath, his most trusty Chamberlaine takes hold of him gently behind, and flayes him, chearing him with flattering words, and speaking vnto him with that familiarity that befits a faithfull seruant to a good master. Then all draw neare vnto him, they take his sword from him, they lay him on the ground, and disrobe him of his thicke veluet Ierkin, and his scarlet cap, to giue him breath.

His brother and vncles salute him: but he knows them not, neither makes he any shew to moue, being pensie, his eyes troubled, turning vp and downe, mute, sighing, panning, mouing both body and head with great amazement. All signes of frenzy appeared in this poore Prince. The Physicians are sent for in haste: they come, but hee knows them not. Brother, Vncles, Lords, Physicians, all sigh: all lift vp their eyes to heauen. Teares fall from the Duke of Orleans eyes: he beats his breast, and crosseth his armes, he approacheth neere to his poore brother, and he recules from him. All are amazed, all confounded.

O my Country! what trouble shall this poore Head giue vnto thy body? but may I lawfully sigh with my Countrymen who sighed then, foretelling the miseries that should befall them by this frenzy, as if my selfe had bene (in this disorder) a witness of so great sure of this ac-

an affliction, both to this poore Prince and to his Estate? The History doth very fitly set downe the diuers Censures that were giuen of this accident, both at Rome and Auiignon (famous places being then the seats of Popes) and also in England and in France.

The poore subiects (as men whom it concerned) spake soberly, and with what griefe; some blaming the duke of Britanie, and Peter of Craon; and others the Constable of Clifton, and Mignons of his chamber, who had drawne the King into this action: but all in generall lamented bitterly this great disaster. England was amazed at this report, and sorry for it especially the Duke of Lancaster, who had conferred with our Charles very privately in the treaty of peace which they had at Amiens. He wept, commending this good and wise Prince, being desirous of the good of all Christendome. Rome & Auiignon (being) thus banded one against the other, by reason of the Schism of Antipopes, reioiced at this calamitie befalling vnto our poore King. Yrbane (as his professed enemy) triumphed in his misery, whereinto he said he was faine by a iust iudgment of God, hauing supported Clement his competitor against him. Clement reioiced, for that hee was not fully confirmed in his authority by him: the King hauing busied himselfe with his subiects quarrels, whereas his greatest charge was to restore the dignity of the holy See to her ancient beauty. This the History obserueth of the Censures of these Antipopes.

But the diuine Oracle saies, O how happy is hee that iudgeth wisely of the afflicted, representing an admirable example in the person of Iob, to gouerne themselves discretely in their Censures. Iob hath the testimony of a very good man, and yet he had great afflictions, hauing lost goods, children, house and health, tormented by his wife, and not only abandoned, but also persecuted by all his friends, in that which was more deare vnto him then his goods, life and credit, whereof they seeked to deprime him, accusing him that hee had liued wickedly like an hypocrite, hauing but the shew of a good man, and not the integrity of a good life whereof he made profession. Such is the vaine iudgement of this world, which holds aduersity for a vice, and prosperity for a vertue; measuring things according to their passions, and not with reason, but the truth doth teach vs another lesson. O Lord how great are thy workes, thy thoughts are very deepe; the ignorant man doth not know them, nor the foole doth not vnderstand them. That wee might know the chastisements of God to be alwaies iust, although the causes be vnknowne vnto vs.

We cannot denie but there were errors in Charles; but yet we must confesse, (in acknowledging things as they be,) that he was one of the least vicious Kings of France, and if we shall examine the zeale he had to the government of his Estate, hee must hold an honorable rancke among the most vertuous Princes that haue at any time deferred well of this Monarchy. Many nearer causes of his infirmity, may be truly and soberly obserued: the disposition of his body, his manner of life, the surcharge of affaires, the weakness of his braine, the abounding of choller, griefe, and waywardnesse, the want of rest and food, the importunity of his voyage, the terror of this voice, and the noise of armes, to weigh downe the ballance ouer-charged with so heauy a burthen. But why from man do we not ascend to God?

Truly God doth hold and gouerne this rod: and as Charles was the head of this great Estate by his wife decree, so hee not onely punished the person of Charles, but the whole body of this Realme: that both great and small might learne by this pittifull spectacle, to humble themselves vnder the mighty hand of God, who hath created the spirit of man, to worke according to his good and wife will; and disposed absolutely of men and their affaires, as he pleaseth: and that this saying may be the seale of a true and sober humilitie, I haue haue held my peace O Lord, for thou hast done it, drawne from this Maxime, God doth all will, what seuer he doth. O kings! this famous example belongs to you, in so famous a King. O subiects! you must learne by the head of Charles, of what price his head is, whom God hath giuen you for King: that you may pray vnto him with all your hearts, to make him fit for the government of the whole body without the which it cannot subsist. But I will returne to our Charles. Pardon courteous Reader this digression, for the search of the vse of so famous an Accident.

This new and strange accident made them presently to dismiss the troopes, hauing other worke in hand then to make war in Britanie. All the Court is wholly affected to the kings health. He is presently caried back to Mans: his sicknesse increaseth, hee must be transported to a better aire. The Physitians aduise it should bee to Creil vpon Oise,

A one of the royall Houses, in the Country of Beauuoisin, betwixt Beauuais and Senlis, a pleasant and wholesome seat vpon the river. He is conducted thither with great care; but his frantick feuer continues still. They kecke to conceale it, lest the fame thereof should be dishonourable: but truth speaks generally. Iames Harfely an excellent Physitian of Laon is sent for, and performeth his duty happily, as shall appeare by the event. Nothing wanted that mans wit could deuise to helpe and cure the infirmity of so great a King. Let vs leaue Charles in the Physitians hands, and returne to the Crowne as sicke as the head, hauing as great need of a good and speedy remedy.

A Parliament is presently called: they assemble at Paris with all speed: all France B mourns for the affliction of their King, whom they loued dearly for his mildnesse, and the singular hope they conceiued of his reigne: whereby Charles purchased the name of Wellbeloued. The Estates assemble to resolute what was necessary for the government of the Realme in this accident. They determine first, what might be fittest for the forme of government, hoping verely of the Kings speedy recovery, being loath to seeke a remedy that might any way preiudice his authority. It was therefore set downe for a law, That they should abstaine from the name of Regent, vntill in this sudden accident, the King being ill and of yeeres. And they concluded, That during the Kings infirmity, and without any preiudice to his authority, the soueraigne government of the Crowne of France should be giuen to the Prince of his blood. But this point being decided, there was another of no lesse difficulty, To what Prince? The order of the Fundamentall law, called Lewis of Orleans the Kings brother, as first Prince of the blood: but neither his age, nor the present necessity could allow thereof. The States yeelding vnto reason, decree, That being apparently necessary to provide for the State, by reason of the Kings weaknesse, being very sicke, it were not conuenient to lay so heauy a burthen vpon so weak shoulders, as the Kings brother, a young Prince: but that the Dukes of Berry and Bourgonne, his Vncles, next to his brother, should haue the gouernment of the Realme vntill the Kings recovery. John Duke of Berry was elder then Philip, but hauing purchased an ill fame in Languedoc, to be couetous and violent, hee was nothing pleasing, so as the French were better affected to Philip the Hardy, Duke of Bourgonne, a cunning, cold, temperate, milde, patient, and popular Prince; but ambitious, D dishonourable, reuengfull, & malicious. Being therefore pleasing to the States, the chiefe charge was imposed on him: the title was common to both brethren, but the effect of the authority was proper to him alone. The Estates adde to their decree (especially in his fauour) that the Duchesse of Bourgonne should haue the first place next to Queene Isabel our sick Kings wife, and by consequence they giue her access to her chamber, and the gouernment of the children at all events. This was Marquerite the heyre of Flanders, a woman of a manly courage, raised for her great possessions, and wholly bred to ambition. This new precedence displeased Valentine the Duchesse of Orleans, who yeelded nothing vnto her in greatnesse of courage. We stand now vpon good termes, that must be gouerned by three women, a Germane, an Italian, and a Fleming, all which had absolute authority ouer their husbands: whose distaffes did cut like swords, whereof they will giue vs presently a sufficient proofe.

Contention for the government.

Philip Duke of Bourgonne aduanced to the gouernment of the Realme by a decree of the States.

Behold the Kings Vncles now at the helme, to the great discontent of the Duke of Orleans, and of Iames of Bourbon his Vncle by the mother side. The winde changeth, and the scales turne, the Court is transformed. There are two factions: but that of Berry F and Bourgonne is the stronger. The Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon make the other, but there is no equality. The authority of the whole government, and of the treasure, is in their hands to whom the States had decreed it. Such force hath this solemn consent of the French in matter of State.

Two factions in Court.

Such as had bene of Charles his most secret Councell, were out of fauour: the Constable, Begue de Villaines, Montague, la Riviere, and Mercier, they are all in bad estate, for their ouerthrow is plotted, by what meanes foeuer. The Dukes authority must beginne with them, yet there was no loue betwixt the two brethren (for who can beleuee that ambition and couetousnesse are fit to vnite friendships) but onely to ruine their common enemies, and to suppress their authority. Such as were in their rowle, had their turnes, but diuersly. The Duke of Bourgogne standing vpon his guard restrained his imperious wife, who at his first aduancement to this great command, would haue turned all topie turay: but he seekes all meanes to preuent his enemies, being resolu'd to begin with the Constable, as with the strongest, and this he concluded with his brother Berry. Montagne cunningly smels out this practice, and with all the best hee could carry away, saues himselfe at Aunyon, attending some better opportunity: but he shall returne too soone to lose his head on a scaffold. The Constable Cliffon, at his first speeche with the Duke of Bourgogne, is so checkt and threatned by him, as swallowing this pill quietly, he steals out of Paris, and retires to his house at Montclery, from whence with extreame danger he saues himselfe in Britany, hauing the Duke for his capitall enemy. But he had his son in law there, the Duke of Anion, the Earle of Ponthieure, and so many friends within the Country, as in the end the equity of his cause shall draw the Duke of Britany to reason, being his most dangerous enemy. After notice that the Constable was fled, Begue de Villaines, a Gentleman of Beausse (who had married the Countesse of Rebekke in Castile) la Riviere and Mercier were coopt vp, but all escaped by sundry meanes, onely Montagne in the end shall lose the mould of his doublet, although he seemed to haue better provided for his safety then all the rest. That we may hold for an vndoubted Maxime in all the resolutions which mans reason can set downe in greatest dangers, That what God keeps is well kept. Yet not rashly to omit the lawfull meanes of our preservation, neither to relye ouer much vpon our owne wisdomes, no more then to a rotten planke in passing of a great Riuer.

The Duke of Bourgogne had nothing lesse in his heart, nor more in his mouth then the sacred name of Iustice. Hauing the Court of Parliament of Paris at his deuotion, hee begins to plant his artillery against the Constable, by this authority. The Kings Aduocate hauing framed a complaint against him, commissions are sent into Britany to summon him, who not finding him, they proceed against him by exceptions: all formalities being obserued, they condemne him by a decree of the Court of Parliament (in the presence of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne) as guilty of high treason, having attempted against the Kings person by poison, and against the State by theft and treason: That as guilty of these crimes he was degraded of the office of Constable, condemned in a hundred markes of silver to the King, and banished the Realme.

A strange alteration, the which the History represents in these verses:

*Inconstant Fortune neuer stays, her motions turning are alwayes:
The highest mounted on the wheele, is strangely cast behind the heele.*

But truth corrects the vanity of this popular opinion. God is Iudge, he raiseth one, and casts downe another. Advancement comes not from the East, nor from the West: but God doth raise up and pull downe by his wise providence: for God that hath made the world, should not be gouerne the world: the eye sees not the Sunne through a thicke cloud, and yet it is in heauen, notwithstanding the weaknesse of our sight. That which the ignorant call Fortune in diuers euents of worldly things, is a secret operation of the wisdom of God, alwayes iust, euen when it is most vnknowne vnto vs: the which is no more polluted with humane passions, then the Sun beames with the most infected carrion, whereon it works by his heat. Oh man! distinguish the rod from the hand that rules it: doe thou thy duty, and leaue the euents to God: feare God and thou shalt haue no need to feare Fortune. An assured passport not onely to avoid the strange alterations of Court, but all other accidents of mans life which hath nothing constant in it, but vnconstancy it selfe. But every man treads on him that falls, saith the same History. Every man speaks infamously of the disgraced Constable, they cry out against him, as hauing bewitched the King. Thus the afflicted is alwayes held culpable, according to the censure of this wise world, which iudgeth only by outward circumstances. But who would beleeue, that Cliffon and his companions (who had so great an interest in the Kings health) would make him sicke? The issue will shew the contrary: verifying, that as slander is the touchstone of vertue, so there is nothing

Charles recouers
his health.

A nothing more couragious then a good cause, nor more victorious then the truth. Cliffon stirs not at all this brute, he stands vpon his guard, perswades friends, and attends the time, which in the end brought him to a safe Port, as we shall see hereafter. After his condemnation, the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne hastned nothing so much, as to aduance one to this goodly charge, whereby they might tye some great person vnto them. They offer it to the Lord of Coufly, who refuseth it, whereupon Philip of Eu Earle of Arthois is aduanced; and for a confirmation of this new league, he giues his sonne to the Duke of Berries daughter.

Thus passed the beginning of this new authority, when as Charles, by rest, a good ayre, the coolnesse of the winter, and good vtiage, beganne daily to recouer his health, comming first to the knowledge of such as were ordinarily about him, and of his wife, children and brother, who parted not from his bed whilst his vnles made this goodly worke at Paris. Hauing recovered his health, and James Harfely dismissed with an honourable reward, all France was reuiued with incredible ioy, to see their King as it were raised out of the graue, and giuen deuoutly to his prayers: but he hath a greater relapse into this miserable disease by a new accident; and this was the occasion.

Charles returned to Paris to his subjects great comfort, who sought to delight him with all kinds of sports: euery man employed his wits thereto: So as there was a new invention of a Maske of wilde men, attired in fine linnen cloth, all couered with very fine flaxe, from the foot to the head, being glued to the cloth so artificially, as if it had growne to the skin, and that they which did weare it had beene naked. They were fix, and the King would make the seuenth to lead the dance. For the annoyding of all danger of fire, which might easily take the flax, a commandement was giuen to put out all torches, but it chanced that the Duke of Orleans, vnacquainted with this Maske, came into the Hall, followed by his Pages, who caried torches (according to the vsual manner) euen as these Savage men (tied one to another like prisoners) present themselves vnto the company: the King (who marched first goes presently to the Duchesse of Berry, she holds him, and refuseth to let him goe without knowledge what he was.

And euen then the Duke of Orleans with an active resolute nesse answerable to his age and naturall wantonnesse, takes a Torch and comes neere to these Savage men, to know them by the lifting vp of their masks, when as fire takes hold of this flaxe so suddenly, as all were on a flame, not able to free themselves, being all tied to one line. The violence of the fire kindled with the rozen, caused a most horrible crie, but generally all men crie out, Sauce the King, whom they knew to be one of the Savage men. The Duchesse of Berry wraps him in her gowne, being long and large, after the manner of those times, and so drawing him out of the Hall, they led him into the next chamber, without any hurt to his person. But the amazement was such, by the horrible cries of these poore men which burnt in the flames (not able to be helped wel in so sudden an outcry) as the King could not be stayed in this amazement. They lay him on his bed, but his spirits could take no rest.

The King falls into a relapse by a strange accident.

E Thus the night passeth away, this poore Prince being much distempered in mind, and all his seruants distressed with griefe.

There fell out another vnhappy accident. In the morning it was bruted through the City, that the King was dead, so as the people did runne in flocks to his vnles lodgings, exclaiming against them for the ill guard they had kept of his person, whom they desire to see either dead or aliue, so as the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne yeelding to this violence, were forced (euen when as the King began to take some rest) to raise him out of his bed, and to lead him through the City to our Ladies Church, to pacifie the peoples fury. At his returne his spirits faile him, he falls into his former frenzy, and neuer after were they settled, notwithstanding all the helpes men could apply.

F He languished two and twenty years in this pitifull estate, and in the tediousnesse of so long an infirmity the Realme was not without languishing. Sometimes hee was in good temper (as frenzies haue their respits, and doe not alwayes distemper the faculties of the minde) but still hee fell, and euen when as he thought to doe best, hee erred most, when as he sought to retaine the authority to himselfe, and that nothing should be done but by his command. Hence sprung the horrible confusions in this reigne, for that diuers passionate men ruled his weak braine diuersly, one vndoing what another had done, couering their passions with the Kings name and authority. And all the leans and Bourgogne.

liberty to doe ill, grew from this spring. But let vs returne to the end of our painfull week. The Duke of Orleans wonderfully perplexed to haue bene the cause of this scandall, excuse himself presently in the hall, and to the King his brother, but all this did not sa-tisfie, The Duke of Bourgogne reproacheth him, and exceeds the censure of an Vnck, for he layes hold on this occasion, to make him odious to the people, as if it had bene done of purpose to kill the King.

This maske of burning men (which chanced in the beginning of the yeare 1394) shal burne farther, and kinde a greater fire betwixt the Vnck and the Nephew, for the space of ten yeares, vntill the death of Philip Duke of Bourgogne, leaving this hatred hereditary to his posterity. There is no meanes which the Bourguignon doth not attempt to wrong his Nephew of Orleans. Certaine Augustine Friars vnder take to cure the King by incisions in his head, whereby he was in great danger of his life. These counterfeits were brought forth publicly in their habits, and beheaded, but the scars of these wounds will remaine in Lewis his face, who recommended them vnto the King.

The women are dealers in these actions. The Duchesse of Bourgogne perswades Queene Isabel, that Lewis his meaning was to kill the King her husband, and his children.
These impressions are confirmed by the graue and sweet discourses of the Duke her husband, who by degrees settled a hatred in the Queens mind against her brother in law. Thus this faction is much fortified by the authority of Queene Isabel, and by her, with her husbands name, whom she makes to speake what she pleaseth, sometimes as her will directed him, but not alwayes. Yet his weake braine is the checker of all these courtly policies, by the meanes of women, who are continually about his bed or his chaire, to dissemper his braine with variety of newes springing from their wretched passions: and this poore Prince is sometimes wonne, sometimes lost, and alwayes tormented with these im-portune discourses.

Valentine wife to the Duke of Orleans, an Italian, and daughter to Iohn Galeas one of the cunningest and most subtil wits of her time, which subtilty some held the increase of by conuincing) would not yeeld to the brauadoes of these two Princeesses: against whom she opposed her selfe, not only by her husbands degree, but also by so politicke courage bred in her selfe, visiting the sicke King with such ciuill entertainment, as her greatest enemies could not finde any honest colour to deny her the doore. So as the King did not only willingly see her, but did call for her, and in his greatest fits did know her only, among all the rest, refusing to take any thing but from the hands of his good sister of Orleans. The more the Kings loue kindled a jealousy in these two Princeesses her enemies, the more it raised vp the mind of Valentine, and by her meanes, of her husband: who remembering (too hatefully) the degree whereunto he was borne, and the wrong done him in reiecting him, yet hauing neither dexterity, nor meanes to winne many seruants, he gaue the Duke of Bourgogne all aduantages, being graue, cold, pleasing, and modest: so as by his wife temper hee dissolued the heat of the Duke of Orleans immoderate vehemency, who tying himselfe with the shew of his greatnesse, makes it knowne by effects, that all the authority was in the Duke of Bourgogne, for whoe soeuer had need of any pub-like helpe, he must passe through his hands, and what businesse soeuer chanced, either within or without the Realme, the true rendezuous was at his lodging. Thus the Vnck made his Nephew to walke horsed (as they say) although he chafed and stamped beyond all measure. These diuisions troubled the whole Court, making them to neglect the affaires of State; and what can we obserue more famous in so disordered an Estate? All businesse is done in the Kings name, yet without the King, vnlesse the parties would haue him to countenance some great passion. I doe purposely omit all that which passed in this reigne touching the schisme of the Church, and the House of Aniou, in the Realmes of Naples and Arragon, not to breake off the course of my intent, meaning to represent in due place all that concerns this foraine History. Richard King of England sends his Ambassadors to Charles, to congratulate his recovery, offering him a general peace, and demanding his daughter in marriage. The Kings relapse delayed the conclusion for a time, but soone after, by the care of the Duke of Bourgogne, who had a great interest in this alliance, by reason of his Country of Flanders, it was concluded, in the yeare 1395.

Charles had some intermissions, by meanes whereof he could ride: Richard repaires to

A to Calais, and Charles to Arrdes, whither Richard came to ratifie the peace concluded betwixt their Ambassadors, and to receiue his new spouse. The Kings encountered one another with loue and kindnesse, making shewes of great good will: but it was a short ioy for either of them. For as it seemed that the quiet of these two realmes had bene settled by this generally peace, sealed by this marriage, and seasoned with so many reciprocal shewes of cordial affection betwixt these two great Kings, behold a great combustion in England, which intangles both these Kings in this common calamity. Richard being of himselfe effeminate, careless, voluptuous and idle, grew more delicate by this profound rest built vpon the alliance of his enemy, who alone might haue quickned him. He is alwayes with B his yong wife, inbracing her, dallying with her, and attiring her, with such contempt of his authority, abusing himselfe too much to his subjects, so as he grew contemptible vnto his enemies, who presumed to attempt against his person. The ordinary warres of England against France, had caused many necessary impositions without any grudging of the subjects: but when as necessity ceased by this generally peace, the people require to be relieved: William More makes an Oration vnto the King in the name of the English in generall. Richard hauing no meane in these infinite exactions to supply the charges of his idle and voluptuous life, contemned his subjects request; and in the end pressed vpon the same matter by the Duke of Gloucester and the Earle of Arondell, in the name of them all, he pers them vnjustly to death. The English mad with rage for the death of their de-C puties, flye to such remedies as despaire giues to necessity. From this generally discontent spring a strange tragedy against Richard: for the English seeing themselves thus despised by their King, they cast their eyes vpon Henry of Lancaster his Cousin: and hauing called a Parliament, they put Richard (being forced in open Assembly) to resigne the Crowne, and to condemne himselfe to perpetuall prison, as hauing abused his royall Authority and his subjects. But this tragick change concerns the history of England. This may briefly suffice for ours, in the conference of our Estate with theirs.

Charles did greatly grieve at this deiection of Richard his sonne in law, from whom he expected great loue and quiet for his subjects. But who seeth not the vanity of this world, boith great and small, to feare a shower euen when the Sunne is hottest? Hee sends for D Isabel his daughter of twelue yeares old, whom Richard had not yet toucht, being content to behold her (like a puppet) vntill shee came to age, satisfying his humour by some other wayes: how soeuer it were, it proued to the dislike of his subjects, and scorn of neighbour Nations. Isabel being returned to her father, shall be married vnto Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to this Lewis who is now in quarter, and from her shall spring a goodly plant, which in the end shall giue vs many kings in their order to prestate this Monarchy.

But, as if France had bene the store-house, or rather the common Sanctuary of all Christendome, to whom the afflicted Christians might repaire in their greatest extremities, it happened in those dayes, that Sigismund King of Hongary intreated Charles to E succour him against the Turke, the common enemy to the Christian name, who got footing in the Empire of the East. For, the schisme in the Church, the confusion of the Empire, and the daily warres betwixt France and England, had so mortified all Christians zeale from all care to support the affaires of the East, against the Turkes our sworn enemies, as the way was made easie for the planting of themselves there to our ruine.
But all the fault was not wholly in the Westerne princes: the Christians of the East were in horrible confusions; and euen at Constantinople, whereas the Paleologues had in some fort maintained the name of the Empire of the East, since the bad government of our French.

All the Lords of Greece, vassals to the Empire, ioyning with the Despote of Bulgaria against the Emperour, did strue to ruine one another. This Ciuill warre drew the Turke out of Asia (where hee was yet confined) into Europe, ouer-threw all the rest of the Empire, and in the end shall bury the whole body of this great Estate, with the Christian name, in the ignominy of our disordered passions, as in a common sepulchre. It sufficeeth to note the motiue of this warre, which was to expell Bajazet (of the race of the Ortomans, who yet holds the Empire of the East) being called in by Iohn Paleolog Emperour:
but seeing fo mighty an enemy entred within his dominions, vnder a colour to succour him, hee sought to be freed from him by the meanes of Christian Princes his friends.

The nearest was Sigismund King of Hungary, who had reason himselfe to feare this overflowing deluge, the which in the end hath ouer-runne Hungary, being at this day for the most part vnder the Turkes tyranny. But the euent was not answerable to his designe, Charles being solicited for succours, granted them, as freely as his infirmity would suffer. But the Duke of Bourgongne made the prouision: the charge of the army was giuen to his sonne Iohn Earle of Neuers, being two and twenty yeeres old, and married to the daughter of Albert of Bawaria, Earle of Hainault, Holland and Zeland, by whom he had then one sonne, who shall succeed him. The army was goodly, beautified with the presence of many great personages, as Philip of Eu Constable of France, the Earles of La Marke, Saint Pol, and Bar, the Lords of Couilly, Tremouille, Vienne, Bouciquault, Royle, Montreil, Saint Py, and Brezay, to the number of a thousand Knights and Squiers.

Being ioyned to Sigismunds army, which consisted of many Hongariens, Bohemians and Germans, they desired at any hand to haue the vangard, and to march in the face of an vnknown enemy, of whose discipline they were ignorant, and to make prooffe of their valour, against the aduise of Sigismund, they cast themselves desperately into the midst of the Turkes auantcoursers, all the Christian army being too far behind to second them; but it chanced, that Baisazet (followed by a farre greater troope than theirs) compassed them in easily as with a net, so as after they had fought valiantly, & made a great slaughter of Turkes, not able to withstand so great a force, they were all cut in peeces, or taken prisoners. Iohn of Bourgongne, and all the aboue-named Lords, were either slaine or taken, not one escaped the sword or slavery.

Baisazet moued with the great losse of his men, would haue slaine all the prisoners, but the greedy desire of ranfome was helpfull to some few of the Noblemen. The history of Germany notes but fine, all the rest were murdered after their taking, by the commandement, and in the presence of this Barbarian, who hauing resolved to kill Iohn of Bourgongne as the head of the army, was dissuaded by an old Turke a Necromancien, who laid vnto him; Preserue this young man, who shall kill more Christians then thine army. A Prince borne to the spoile and ruine of his country, whereof he shall be shortly a more cruell scourge then the Turkes. They spared him, but he spared not the blood of his cousin German, to defile his incestuous hands, and to prophane the bosome of France, which had so greatly honoured him. Enguerrand of Couilly, a great man in his time, died in prison, and Philip of Eu Constable of France (by whose death the Earle of Sancerre was aduanced to this great dignity) but after him there shall be other Constables in this confused reigne. This defeat chanced in the yeare 1396. before Nicopolis a City in Misia, nere to the which Traian vanquished the Daciens. This victorie of the Turkes had proceeded farther, by the terror it gave to those countries, but God gaue those Christians some time of breathing before the last stroke, the which came but too soon for the scornors of God: yet after this overthrow, as Baisazet prepared to pursue his victory against the Christians, Tamblun, another scourge of mankind, overflowing Asia like a great deluge, ouerthrew him, and tooke him prisoner, and so God stayed the Ottomans power for that time, but the Christians malice (abusing the patience of God) prouoked his wrath, which being instantly kindled against them, he suffered the Turkes to take Constantinople, the capitall city of the Eastern Empire, as we shall see else-where. But let vs returne to France.

The Kings children during his infirmity.

Charles had some truce with his infirmity, who notwithstanding this indisposicion of his braine, was in reasonable good health of his body, so as he had children during this time. Before his sickness he had Isabel (of whom we haue made mention) and Lewis the Dauphin Duke of Guienne. but Iohn Duke of Touraine, and Charles Earle of Ponthieu, Michel, Mary and Marguerit, two sonnes and three daughters (a goodly issue to keepe the Crowne from being an Orphline) were borne to him by Isabel of Bawaria, during the weaknesse of his spirit. And much happinesse befell him.

After the taking of Baisazet, the Turkish Emperour, and the returne of Iohn of Bourgongne into France, hauing paid his ranfome, the Lord of Bouciquault (being sent to Genoa, to receiue it to the Kings obedience, to whom they had willingly giuen themselves) he made a voyage to Constantinople with a new army, more happy then the first, freeing the City, and returning victorious into Italy. Milan belonging to Valentine by the deceale of Iohn Galeas her father, had beene surprisid by Francis Sforce, but at the returne of the Marshall Bouciquault, it yeelded to the French obedience, and so did Placentia and Paulia, cities in Lombardy. But these conquests continued not long with them, no more then the rest of Italy, by the fatal influence which hath alwaies made it a Sepulcher for the French, so as this suddaine yeelding of those Italian cities to the French obedience, was like vnto a fire of straw.

Verdun being ill intreated by the Duke of Loraine (although it were an Imperiall towne) cast it selfe into Charles his protection. Charles, the sonne of Charles of Naurrie, rightly marked with the name of bad, made great influence for his Seigneuries of Eureux, Cherebourg, and other lands in Normandie, the which Charles the fifth had taken from his father, who resigned his interest by an agreement made with him for two hundred thousand franks that were giuen him, and the Seigneury of Nemours, then made a Duchy vpon that occasion. But in these happy euents the ialousie betwixt the Dukes of Orleans and Bourgongne continued and encreased hourly, through the violent practices of their persuaders, of whom we haue made mention, who failed not to bring fuel to this fire, not only making coales to searce one another, but also a burning flame to fire both their houses, and the whole Realme. The occasion and meanes was very strange, Valentine Duchesse of Orleans (whom King Charles did know and loue during the sharpest fits of his infirmity, euen when as he knew not his owne wife Isabel) being in the Kings chamber, (whether she had brought her little sonne to play with the Kings children) the cast a faire apple, after the which the children did runne, but Valentines sonne caught it, and hauing eaten it, fell presently sicke, and within few daies after died. Thereupon they concluded directly, that this childe died of poyson prepared for the Kings sonne, which confirmed the old opinion, that the King had beene bewitched by her, so as all respect laid aside, they cried out against her, as against a rauening Wolfe. There was no other talke in Court, Paris, and through all the Prouinces of France.

The Duke of Bourgongne seemed very busie, and sent all complaints to the Kings councill, who decreed, That, to auide a great scandall, Valentine should retire from Court, the which shee did to the Castle of Aftinere, vpon the way from Paris, to Beauvais: the Duke of Orleans disdaining it much, who mult needs be toucht with this ignominy, and the peoples hatred encreasing mightily against him by this new accident. Whilst this home-bred hatred continued in Court, betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew, the Constable Cliffon fortified himselfe in Britany, both with friends and meanes, hauing by his dexterity gained the greatest Noblemen of the Countrey, by whose meanes he made a profitable peace for himselfe with Iohn of Montfort, Duke of Britany, to whom he had been a capitall enemy. The manner of this vnlooked for reconciliation is worthy of memory, to giue after ages the subiect of a notable iudgement in so famous an example. The Duke prickt in conscience, and moued by necessity, hauing banded all his Subjects against him, seeing apparently the notable wrong he had done to the Constable Cliffon, he resolved to be reconciled vnto him, and to winne his loue. But foreseeing, that hauing so often deceived him, he would no more trust him but vpon good assurance, he resolved to secure him by an extraordinary meanes, sending him his eldest sonne as a pledge of his faith. The Constable seeing himselfe possessed of this young Prince, without any other securitie then his fathers letters, stands amazed at so vnexpected a prooffe of the Dukes loue, and resolves to haue his reuenge by a courtesie not onely strange, but lesse expected: for although hee had all the reason in the world to distrust the Duke, who had detained him prisoner vnder colour of a banquer, and had sought all meanes to ruine him; yet taking a new aduice vpon this new occasion, hee parts from his house, and bringing backe this young man to his father, puts himselfe into his power. The Duke more amazed at this strange confidence of the Constable, so changeth his mind, as after that time he became his most affectionate friend, hauing built a firme friendship vpon this foundation, the which continued betwixt them the rest of their dayes, to the mutuall content of eather, and the profitable quiet of their subjects, verifying, That Courtlesse is a wife & happy counsellor of State, teaching great ment, that patience triumphs in a good cause; and that we must hate as if we should loue, euen in the greatest heat of passionate quarrels, being well said by the Ancients, That hatred must be mortall, and loue immortal.

The hatred betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew ended not so quietly. The Duke of Orleans hauing receiued this disgrace in the person of his wife Valentine, growing very impatient, redoubles his complaints, with great vehemency, saying, that it was no longer time now to obiect his age, against the degree whereunto both Nature and the fundamen-tall law of State had openly called him, seeing it was now ten yeares since this borrowed authority of the Duke of Bourgongne had given him respite to be of age to enjoy his right, the which they could not take from him without prejudice to the Crowne; that it is a visible usurpation, being no longer able to disguise his grosse practices. The Duke of Bour-gongne did frustrate these complaints by his coldnes and authority: but the Duke of Orleans grew more vehement, falling from words to deeds; and having had conference with the Duke of Gueldres, hee raised a good number of men at armes by his meanes, and lodged them about Paris, where hee enters with the said Duke, having advertised no man thereof, but only the King, who favoured his brother exceedingly, when he came to his right sense. The Duke of Berry made shew to be a neuter: but seeing the Duke of Bour-gongne to vsurpe all to himselfe, tyred with his ambitious dissimulation, he inclined more to the Duke of Orleans his Nephew, although in shew he labored to reconcile them. The Dukes of Bourbon and Anion Princes of the blood were of the like humor. The Kings Councell labours by all meanes to end this quarrell betwixt these Princes, disallowing the government of any one in particular, and confirming a command of all the Princes together, supporting it by alliances: for, Charles the eldest sonne of Lewis Duke of Orleans, married Isabel of France, the eldest daughter to our King Charles the sixt. Lewis the Kings eldest sonne, Duke of Guienne, and Dauphin of Viennois, was betrothed to Katherine of Bourgongne, daughter to Iohn Earle of Nevers, sonne to Philip. To Iohn the Kings second sonne, Duke of Touraine, Isabelle is promised, the only daughter of William of Bavaria, Earle of Hainault, and so his heire. To Philip of Bourgongne, sonne to the above-named Iohn, Michelle the Kings second daughter is promised: for these marriages were all but future promises, by reason of the young age of the parties.

This was to engage the faith to come, & now present to satisfie the discontented, Queen Isabel was twice pleased, both in her children and her race, which by this meanes was transplanted into the Royall blood of France, by her Cousin, who also carried the name of Bavaria. But what? as ambition cannot be tamed, so in all these marriages, there was more alliance then friendship, and more dissembling then truth. God must needs reconcile them at last by a stronger conclusion.

Philip Duke of Bourgongne dyes, leaving his sonne Iohn the heire of his passions, against Lewis Duke of Orleans, in the yeare 1404.

The beginning of the Ciuill wars.

Thus Philip Duke of Bourgongne, raised vp with a new hope to maintaine himselfe against his enemy Lewis Duke of Orleans; as well by the cement of this alliance, as by the increase of power, which his sonne Iohn brought him (being his right armer, the true Image of this great and haughty courage, and a new fire-brand of his ambition) dies at this time, when as hee dreamt least thereof: for hee dyed at Hall, going to visit his townes in Flanders, and to crosse the practices of the Duke of Gueldres, who was a principall support to the Duke of Orleans. Marguerit his wife (a companion in his ambition) did not survive him a whole yeare, who fearing to finde her husband too farre indebted, renounced his movable goods, laying downe her purse and girdle vpon the place appointed, according to the vsuall custome, and so required an act from a publike Notary. Griefe for her husband did not haften her death, seeing that she feared not her liuing should faile after him. Iohn of Montfort Duke of Britany (who hath kept such a stire vpon this Theater) dyed foure yeares before him, yet more wise and happy in one thing, hauing morified the hatred he bare to the Constable Cliffon, before his death, as hath beene before declared.

Thus Death doth suddenly stay mens designs, which else flye most violent. How wretched then are wee to be thus blinde in these goodly examples. But let vs returne to our Discourse.

Philip left three sons, Iohn, Anthony, and Philip: but Iohn Earle of Nevers his eldest sonne succeeded him in his great Seigneuries of Bourgongne and Flanders; and the chief

A heire of his hatred and other vices. Hee was equall to him in ambition, malice, dissem-bling, and policy, but herein hee did surmount him, that his father Philip hauing for the space of ten or eleuen yeares, crossed the designs of Lewis his Nephew, yet hee caried himselfe with such a cunning temper as holding the helme and making him to cary the bable, he made his vnlawfull government supportable by his modesty, and reasonable by the order which had confirmed him in this authority. But Iohn continues his practices with such violent fury, as within three yeares (hauing giuen the duke of Orleans a thousand crosses, and plunged France in a ciuill war) he murders his cousin germane most cruelly, defiles his Country and his blood, and continues his furious designe with so great B presumption, as countenancing this murder with a free confession, and seeking to maintaine it by reason, he omitted no kind of mischiefe, but brought in all kind of disordered confusions, as if France had beene the Rendezvous of villany and impiety. A text, the commentary whereof may be read at large in the following discourse. Behold the beginning of a ciuill war among the French, both long and furious, bred by the ill counsell of the Princes of the blood, abusing their authority. A history the more worthy the noting, for that it serues vs to marke the fits, and accidents of diseases, where-with wee haue been afflicted, to apply the vñe thereof to our owne experience.

After the death of Philip, all the government of publike affaires was without all con-trouersie deliuered into the hands of the Duke of Orleans. The King loued his onely brother dearly, and desired to grace him what he could. The Queen (to please her husband) made shew to reioyce thereat, hauing no more a Duchesse of Bourgongne to incense her, reason gaue him this preheminece, and the French obeyed him willingly, as the lawfull guardian of the French Monarchy. All things fauoured this yong Prince, if hee had not failed himselfe: but the choller hatched in his brest, hauing for so long a time swallowed vp so many indignities, the immoderate heat of command, so much desired, and the ambition and couetousnesse of his wife Valentine, all these pluckt from him the fruit of these fauourable occasions to settle his greatnesse, and gaue his enemy meanes to ruine him.
These errors were accompanied with indifcretion, which commonly shakes the misfe-rable. The Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, his vncles, had fauoured him much, during the D Bourgignons reigne, and their age had greatly countenanced his authority, if hee could haue vied them rightly. But this yong Prince was so pleased with the sweet of command, as hee was loath to impart it to any: the which must needs discontent them, although (being wife) they dissembled it, yet this dislike encouraged the Bourgignon his enemy to attempt against him.

The couetousnesse of Valentine prepared the way to these disorders. Lewis was desirous to purchase the Duchy of Luxembourg, his wife urged him thereunto hourly, wishing him to deuise some meanes to make the King to pay for it. Vpon this aduice Lewis propounds in counsell, that for the Kings important affaires there must bee a taxation made. There neuer wants some pretext to colour these exactions, but in effect it was E for this purchase. Iohn duke of Bourgongne opposeth for the good of the common-weale. On the one side it was a goodly meanes to shew both his loue to the people, and his zeale to the Kings seruice: and on the other, a reasonable subiect to make the Duke of Orleans odious. Yet this proposition passed in counsell through the absolute authority of the duke of Orleans. The Bourgignon imbraceth this occasion, and flatters the Pa-risians, to ioyne their loues, and to oppose them against his enemy, who could not be more odious then in this cause; and even then they grew into such dislike of him, as they could neuer loue him. This was spred throughout the Realme, and the Duke of Bourgongne hauing protested that this charge was imposed vpon the subiects against his consent, laying a good foundation of firme correspondency with the Parisians, he retires into Flanders to take possession of his mother *Marguerit*s inheritance, and credit, with that rich people; but in effect it was to build vpon the hereditary hatred hee had against his cousin and capitall enemy.

To omit nothing that might auail him against the duke of Orleans; being at Brussels he sends his Ambassadors to King Charles, beseeching him, with all affection to consum-mate the marriage betwixt Lewis his eldest son, duke of Guinne and Dauphin of Vienn, and Katherine of Bourgongne his daughter. Charles thought it fitt to content his cousin Iohn vpon this demand, but his brother Lewis crossed this marriage, as prejudiciall to the House of France, being already weakened by the vining of Bourgongne to Flanders, the which would be much more fortified by this alliance with the Kings sonne. Johns Ambassadors (after long delays) returne home without any effect, making their master acquainted with the cold proceedings of the Court, the which required his presence. In the end, he resolves to goe in person, to sollicite a matter of so great importance. But being ready to march, behold the King of England sends an army into Flanders, to besiege Sluse, which makes him yeeld to necessity, and to demand succours of the King, as his soveraigne, against the common enemy of the State, staying himselfe in Flanders, to prevent these practices of the English. Lewis of Orleans (pretending a truce betwixt France and England) causeth succours to be denied him, as if they should draw a warre vpon France being already tired with so great and long troubles. John held himselfe much wronged by this denial, and to have the better meanes to returne to Paris, he compounds with the English, being desirous to make it knowne, that hee would oppose himselfe against the Duke of Orleans designs, taking hold of the occasion which hee himselfe offered him to his great prejudice.

The imposition was leauied by the D. of Orleans his command, and commissions were brought into Flanders. At Paris it was exacted with all rigour, but John commands his subjects of Flanders not to pay it, and goes wel accompanied to Paris to assist the people, who greatly discontented with this burthen, durst not yet vtter their griefe, expecting the countenance of a great commander. The Parisians incited against Lewis of Orleans, sollicite John of Bourgongne to come to Paris, being resolved to employ all their meanes in the defence of this cause, which they held to be very important for their reliefe. John desired nothing more so as redoubling his courage at these calls, hee goes in haste to Paris, and sties at Louvre in Paris, giuing the Parisians notice to come vnto him. The King remained at Paris, as he was accustomed, the Queene and Lewis of Orleans having discovered the duke of Bourgongnes intent, and fearing lest (being the stronger, and having the Parisians at their deuotion) he should force the King to marry the Dauphine Lewis made sure to his daughter: they thought it best to conueigh this yong Prince into Germany, to some place of safety. And going together first Paris they left the Dauphin with Lewis of Bavaria (his vncle by the mothers side) who should conduct him secretly in alitter to Corbeil, where a goodly troope attended him. The Bourgignons follows giue him present intelligence of their departure. John follows so speedily as he ouertakes the Dauphin Lewis at Ville-Isuise, conducted in a litter by Lewis of Bavaria his vncle, and brings him backe gently to Paris, where they receiue the Duke of Bourgongne with great ioy, and are glad of the Dauphins returne, going to meet them in great pompe, at a ioyfull triumph. John being come to Paris, hath conference with them of this faction, and finds them at his deuotion. The Prouost of Merchants, and the Vniuersity assure him of their faithfull seruice, they intreat him to vndertake the reformation of the State, a charge which he doth willingly embrace, as a fit maske for his ambitious humor.

He then presents a petition to the King, beseeching him to reforme the State, strangely corrupted by the ill government of the treasure, whereby the subjects were oppressed with insupportable charges, and sacred iustice ill administered, the ordinary subject of the peoples complaints: but in effect it was to araigne the Duke of Orleans. The King forbore to make any answer vnto his brothers returne, being president of the councill, and greatly interceded in this complaint: but these were words without effect, if force had not followed this admonition.

The Bourgignons, had brought great troopes, vnder the conduct of John without Pitty, Bishop of Liege, and the Duke of Cleues. The Duke of Orleans had also assembled an Army from diuers parts, by the Lord of Harpendanne, fortified with the Forces of the D. of Loraine and the King of Sicily, being made ready for the voyage of Naples. Thus the Isle of France is full of souldiers of one livery, but of contrary humours, as the manner is in ciuill warres, French against French, and kinsman against kinsman, all making profession to maintain the good of their Country in ruining it.

John of Bourgongne in shew had the aduantage, being in the capitall City, and possessed of the peoples hearts: hee had the King in his power, and (for a gage of this new authority, which men honor like the fun rising) the Dauphin of the house of France, whom hee pretended to bee his sonne in law. All these considerations made his heart swell, and his tongue to speake proudly. But Lewis Duke of Orleans founds forth the name of publicke authority, which then remained in his hands, as in a sacred guard. The most passionate make a stay at the name thereof, to attend the cue of so great a quarrell. Such force hath the name of lawfull authority and order in a State, whereon it depends as on a firme foundation.

These armies thus lodged about Paris, the Generalls minds appeared in the deuices of their standards. In that of the duke of Orleans was written, Je l'enure, with a staffe full of knots painted in it, signifying that hee would knocke him on the fingers that should presume to touch his authority. In the D. of Bourgongnes was written in Flemish, ick houd, that is to say, I hold it, with a ioyners plane to make smooth the knotty staffe, and so to encounter the force that threatned him: yet these passions were suppressed by the only respect of authority, without the which all had tended to a violent spoile. The Princes of the blood (who were not ingaged in these quarrels) labour to reconcile their cousins, seeing the Kings infirmity will not suffer him to vse his absolute authority.

Lewis of Aniou, King of Naples and Sicilia, and Lewis of Orleans, were with the Queene at Melun, the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, and the King of Nauarre, are at Paris with the King, and all the faction of Bourgongne. The King of Sicilia comes to Paris, hee les the dukes of Berry and Bourbon vnderstand, how necessary it was to quench this fire in time. All these Princes are willing to mediate an accord, but the indiscretion of the Duke of Orleans had almost spoiled all.

At the first he grew amazed, but seeing no man to stir, and having some feeling of his authority, he began to speak bigge, writing to Paris, and to the best Cities of the Realme, against such as had made this petition. And (contrary to the aduice which the Princes his cousins gaue him, not to part from Melun) hee resolves to come to Paris, and to oppose himselfe against the duke of Bourgongne. The City and Vniuersity of Paris send an honorable deputation vnto him, excusing themselves, beseeching him to hearken to a good reformation, but he fo checkt the deputies, as they returned ill satisfied, to a people big with a seditious humour. He shewed himselfe indifereet in two sorts, excusing himselfe when no man accused him, which was properly to accuse himselfe, and in waking of a sleeping dog, incensing this mutinous people, who were then kept in awe by his onely authority, not daring to mutter against him but in secret. The Bourgignons desired nothing more then to haue some apparent cause to draw this people into mutiny, giuing it out openly, that the duke of Orleans came in armes to spoile the City of Paris. Behold the Parisians are in armes, prepared both within and without, to withstand the Duke of Orleans coming: they beate downe pentises within the City, to make the streets more free for to cast stones. The people troope with the Duke of Bourgongnes men, and issue forth armed about Mountfaucou, in view of the Orleansois, lying in great numbers vpon the plaine.

The Chancellor of France, accompanied with the Presidents and Councillors of the Court of Parliament, goe to the Princes, aduertising the Duke of Orleans of the danger of a great confusion, if he did not foresee it. Hereupon Lewis commands his troopes to retire, and sties at the Castle of Beauty vpon Marne, to haue the better meanes to heare from his Vncles, who (by the authority of reason and alliance, after many voyages) reconciled Lewis of Orleans, and John of Bourgongne, having scene and embraced one another like kinde Kinsmen, with all outward signes of perfect and cordiall loue. This was but a coloured peace, the which in the end was so heauy a burthen to them both, as it weighed them downe, and by their owne willfull follies, as if they willingly fought their owne ruines, verifying this assured maxime: That man hath no harme, but what he seeks himselfe, confirmed by the truth of these Oracles; T hey haue no harme, but by their owne iniquity: and, My people haue not obeyed my voice: and, Isaie would none of me, ratified likewise by the experience of all men, all Estates, and all ages. The duke of Orleans fought his owne death, in prouoking his enemy without reason, and the duke of Bourgongne in murdering him, erected a scaffold to shed his owne blood.

This agreement made, John of Bourgongne informs the King and his Councill, how much it did import to take the towne of Calais from the English, where the commodity of landing, and the necernesse of the Kings estates, gaue the common enemy great meanes to molest the Prouinces of Flanders and Picardy, requiring aid and succours from the

the King to besiege it; the which hee grants. Whereupon he with all his Cities, makes great preparations to fortifie the French Army, the which enters into Picardy, attending a commandement to beleaguer Calais. The artillerie and munition was ready to goe to field, through the great diligence of the duke of Bourgogne, stirred vp with hope to pull this thorne out of his foot, and to free the traffick betwixt his subiects and France, when as suddenly the Kings letters patents come to the heads of the army, commanding all men of warre, of what condition soever, not to passe any farther, vpon paine of their liues. This unexpected countermand, accused the Duke of Orleans as the author thereof, and gaue occasion to all men that desired the good of France to detest him, as seruing his owne passions, to the preiudice of the common-weale: but about all, it gaue too important a cause of discontent to the Duke of Bourgogne, who infinitely grieved with so inexcusable an affront, and such inhumane circumstances of a cruel indignity (for whereto serues it to discover in particular, the griefes of so apparant an injury?) he resolues to haue his reuenge once for all. Thus fure the Duke of Bourgogne had reason to complaine of the Duke Orleans; but he exceeds, from reason he flies to passion, the which is a dangerous Councillor; which presented vnto him a pernitious remedy, being then pleasing to his troubled minde, leauing him nothing but a late repentance, and his body taken in the trappe which he himselfe had made.

A new cause of discontent betwixt the Duke Orleans and Bourgogne.

The Duke of Bourgogne resolves to kill his cousin of Orleans.

Thus Iohn resolues to free himselfe of his cousin the Duke of Orleans, who he supposed would be a perpetuall and irreconcilable enemy. The motives of this cruell resolution, are visible by the forepassed actions. But they added ielousie herunto, an intestine fire, which consumes him that lodgeth it in his bosome. The originall of the History speaks nothing hercof, for this shamefull injury (which the wife conceale) was not spoken of by those that were chiefly interested. But the learned obserue, that the D. of Orleans had vied his cousin of Bourgongnes wife too familiarly, when as her husband was in the voyage of Hungary. A yong Flemish Princeesse and browne, of whom they had made a song, the which the duke of Orleans caused to be put into musick, and to be sung before the ielous husband, at a banquet which hee had made him, hauing the Princeesse picture in his Cabinet, and vinting that it was the triumph of his loue. These are stabs which pierce the hearts of generous men with an incurable wound. This they set down for one of the motives of the Bourgougns hatred against his cousin of Orleans. This vanity cost Lewis of Orleans deare, being giuen exceedingly vnto women, and as it was one of the causes of his death by the iust iudgement of God, so is it considerable, for being slaine by his enemy, amongst his other vices, he shall reproach him of luxury, to iustifie the murder. But let vs obscure the sequell of this Tragedy.

Lewis Duke of Orleans is slaine by Iohn Duke of Bourgogne, and in the end Iohn makes a counterfeit peace with the children of Lewis, but it is the renning of greater troubles.

*I*OHNE of Bourgongne hauing resolved to kill Lewis of Orleans his cousin Germane, went to Paris, with so good a shew, as if hee had no intent to breake the accord so solemnly made betwixt them. That which most troubled him, was to see his enemies authority confirmed by this reconciliation, hauing the absolute government of the State, respected as the Kings brother, and the first Prince of the blood. And (to giue him greater authority and power) the good King Charles had giuen him for a new yeares gift in the year 1407. the Duchy of Guienne for his portion, whereof the Daulphin then carried the title. This new fauour and great aduancement, kindled the coale of ielousie in the Bourgougns braine, being already much transported, and holding it for certaine, that hee should neuer by any ordinary course preuaile against so passionate and powerfull an enemy, who as his meanes did increase, so would his desire augment to ruine him. He therefore thinks it convenient to prevent him, and draws vnto him men fit for so audacious a murder, Raoulet of Auroville a Noiman, an ancient seruant of his house, and discontented with the Kings brother, for that he had taken from him the office of Generall of Normandy, and a souldier of Guines called William Cortcheuze, with others of the same humour, to the number of eightene. This William had a brother called Jean of Courtcheuze, a groom of the Kings chamber, who should be the instrument to draw this poore Prince into the pitfall. The Queene lay then in child-bed, the Duke of Orleans goes to visit her after supper, when as this Jean of Cortcheuze goes to the Queenes chamber to tell him, that the king desired him to repaire presently vnto him for very important affaires. The Murtherers were lodged secretly in a house by the which the Duke should passe. Being mounted vpon his mault, accompanied onely with two Squires vpon one horse, and one that followed on foot, his pages carrying torches both before and behind him, as the horse (which carried the two Squires) came before the house where this ambuscadoe lay, hee began to snort and to run. The murtherers issue forth instantly and charge the Duke, at the first they cut off his hand which held the reignes of his horse. He cries out, I am the Duke of Orleans, and they answer, it is you we seeke for. They double their blowes with such violence, as they beat him downe and cleaue his head, so as the braines lay scattered vpon the pavement.

The Duke of Orleans murdered by the Bourgougns.

The yong Squire that remained with him, runs desperately among their weapons, and is presently slaine vpon his poore master. The pages had already giuen the alarm at his lodging, and many came running to succour their Lord, whom they find thus massacred. There was nothing to bee heard but cries and lamentations, whilest the murtherers (hauing fired a house and cast Calthrops in the streets) get themselves into the Duke of Bourgongnes house. Thus the night passeth in miserable lamentations. Valentine doubles the terror of this horrible accident with fearfull out-cries. The Princes his cousins run thither to participate in this sorrow. All weepe and lament, all cry out in this mournfull house. When the day appears, they finde his hand on the one side, and his braines scattered on the other. The reliques of his head are gathered together with teares, and all is kept for an honourable funeral.

O head! how many mischiefs attend thee? Oh murtherer! thou shalt bee murdered: disloyall, thou shalt be disloyally slaine. I haue horror, yea I tremble to shed this blood againe by my report. The very enemies of Lewis were amazed at this audacious murder, foretelling the miseries that should follow. The Queene wonderfully passionate, causeth herselfe to be removed to the Kings lodging, and doubles the guards. In the end the king hath notice thereof, and apprehends it according to the weakness of his braine, but the Princes provided presently for his safetie and their owne, euery man fearing for himselfe in so strange an accident.

Such was the violent death of Lewis duke of Orleans, traiterously slaine at Paris by Iohn duke of Bourgongne, the twentieth day of Nouember, in the year of our Lord 1407, who thinking to kill his enemies, slew himselfe, and left this blood prodigiously shed, as a mournfull Legacy to his posterity; and hoping in his ouerweening spirit, to vsurpe France from the lawfull heires, he lost Bourgongne for his posterity: neither could hee hinder his issue whom hee had so treacherously murdered, from the happy enioying of the whole Realme; for Lewis D. of Orleans left three Sonnes by Valentine the heire of Milan, Charles, Philip and Iohn: from Charles the eldest (being duke of Orleans,) is issued directly King Lewis the twelfth, the father of the people, and of Iohn Earle of Angoulesme, father to King Francis the first, the father of the Muses, who hath giuen foure Kings successfully to our Monarchy. But of Iohn of Bourgongne wee can reckon but two successors, Philip and Charles. Philip was his son, who by the patience of God left Charles in his place, but Charles suffered for his grandfathers errors and his owne, for he died in blood: his pride was entered in an vknowne tombe, and Bourgongne was plucked from the fellonious hands of this murdering race, and vnto the Crowne. Now Iohn of Bourgongne shall commit strange disorders during 12. yeares, from the date of this massacre; and it seemes that blind Fortune hath adorned his temples with bayes and triumph, to guard on these execrable crimes: but he is not freed that draws his halter after him. He shall soone pay these principal and interest to Gods iust iudgment, which slackes not, although it seeme slacke, but comes in due season, marching slowly, to take all excuse from the obdurate and impudent sinner, recompensing in the end this apparent slacknesse of punishment, by the greatnesse of eternall paine.

But let vs returne to this desolate house: Valentine widow to Lewis, with her 3. sons, and Isabel of France the Kings eldest daughter, wife to Charles, the eldest sonne of Lewis, now Duke of Orleans, by the decease of his father, come all to our poore King Charles, (being sicke) to demand iustice. All cast themselves at the Kings feet, as much discomforted as themselves, for the cruell death of his only brother, whom he had alwaies loved dearly both found and sicke. Lewis of Aniou King of Sicily and Naples, the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, with all the Princes of the blood, accompany them in this lamentable fate, wherein Charles promifeth to give them satisfaction.

The Kings Councell being assembled, they require an account of the Prouost, what he had done in search of these murderers. He answers, that having done his duty hee could not find any thing. That there were no places vnsearcht, but Princes and great mens houses, where if he might be suffered to enter, he would doe his best, to discover the murderers. The Princes were all in Councell, and the Bourguignon amongst them, all promise it freely: Iohn of Bourgonne (guilty of the crime) holds his peace: and as they beheld one another, hee riseth, and drawing the King of Sicily and the Duke of Berry apart, hee confesseth, that through the devils motion hee had committed this murder.

These Princes (being amazed) conceale it for that day. The next day coming to Councell, the duke of Berry willed him to retire himselfe. Thus amazed hee returns to his lodging, and presently without any stay he flies with five more into Flanders, wherethe murderers likewise finde a sure retreat. That conscience which at the first had terrified him, is now hardened: and that which had moued him to confesse himselfe the author of this murder, doth now animate him with new motions, to become obstinate, and to maintaine by vniust force, that which he had committed by furious violence. Having sought the loue of all the Cities of Flanders, hee finds them willing to support him, in right or wrong in his necessity: vpon this assurance hee calls an assembly at Gand, to tolerate those succours whereof he stood in need.

At the newes hereof, the zeale of Iustice growes cold in Court, they seeke an accord with him whom they should pursue: the King of Sicily, and the Duke of Berry goe to Amiens, being prouder then if he had done a meritorious act, where making open profession of his pride, hee had placed ouer the doore of his lodging, a table wherein were painted two Lances across, whereof the one had a well steeld head for the warre, and the other a burr head for the Tilt, as giuing the choice of warre and peace: publishing generally, that hee not onely had done the murder, but that he would and ought to doe it. And to the end he might be mad with reason, he findes Diuines in those dayes that confirme him in this passion, and protest to maintaine it by Scripture, as the sequell will presently shew. The Princes that were sent vnto him (not able to moue him to confesse his fault, and to humble himselfe) they command him in the Kings name not to come to Paris. He answers them boldly, that he would presently goe, to informe the King what reason had moued him to punish the common enemy of France.

And hauing reuiued his practices at Paris, by meanes of his intelligences, he gathers together a great army, and accompanied with his two brethren, and the Dukes of Lorain and Cleues, he comes to Saint Denis, and lodgeth his troopes about this great City, who willingly stretch forth their hands vnto him, as to their redeemer, who should purchase them perpetuall rest. The Princes goe vnto him, and entreat him in the Kings name, not to enter into Paris, but with his ordinary traine of 200 men. Iohn makes them answer: That for the surety of his person, hee could doe no lesse then to goe well accompanied: and the next day hee arrives at Paris with all his troopes, being receiued by the Parisians with cries of ioy, as a new Monarch. He fortifies himselfe in Bourgonne house, where he is visited by the whole body of the Citie and the Vniuersity, who seeke to support this execrable murder. The next day the game is played with a strange prelude. Iohn Petit, a Doctor of Diuinity, maintained (with wonderfull impudency) that the Duke of Bourgonne had caused the Duke of Orleans to be worthily slaine, by reason of many notable crimes, whereof he doth accuse him. The Original of the History doth set downe these detestible frenzies, to shew how much disorder preuailes in an Estate without a head. The Councell of Constans shall condemne this Impostor, being accused by the Colledge of Sorbonne, who shall disauow this mercenary man, after the death of the Duke of Bourgonne.

The issue was answerable to his speech. The King being sicke in minde, and the Princes fainting, Iohn of Bourgonne is absolved of the murder committed on the person of his cousin germane. The King (to couer this bad act) declares by his letters patents, That in case he died, he would that Lewis his eldest sonne, Dauphin of Viennois, should haue the govern- ment of the Realme, and after him Iohn and Charles his younger sonnes one after another, without any Regents. But the Bourguignon was ignorant, that this decree gaue him authority that should punish him: being also aduised (for some speciall considerations) not to deale any more with the affaires of France, but with his owne. So he retires into Flanders, not daring to attempt any thing, being thus iustified and absolved.

This infolency, accompanied with some indignities against the Kings maiesty, displeased the whole Court: and not iustificable by the Bourguignon faction, it caused Valentine and her children to renew their complaints to the Kings Councell, who stoutly made a decree against Iohn Duke of Bourgonne, for satisfaction of the murder committed by him on the person of the Duke of Orleans. But what auails it to report that which took no effect, but onely to prove, That when lawfull authority is suppressed, Iustice is of no force, and the stronger treades vnder foot the right of the weaker. As it proued in this ridiculous and imaginarij sentence, giuen in fauour of the children of Orleans against the murderer of their father: for it was scarce recorded for the benefit of the interested, when as newes came of the victorie which Iohn of Bourgonne had gotten against them of Liege, in fauour of Iohn of Bauaria surnamed Without-pitty, their bishop. This did quite change all their thoughts, countenances and words in Court: all Commissions for the leauing of souldiers, for the execution of this decree, by force are reuoked. There is no talk, but how to warrant the King and Dauphin from the Bourguignon, who without doubt would (according to his humour) bring his victorious army to Paris, to disannull the decree vpon their heads that should maintaine it. So as the Dauphin with the Dukes of Berry and Bourgonne conduct the King to Tours for his better safety, being vnwilling to leaue him in the Parisians power, who were passionate partisans of the Bourguignon.

The Parisians are wonderfully discontented at this departure: they arme, draw their chaires, as in a time of war: and call in the Bourguignon, assuring him of their hearts and meanes. He comes speedily with a great army, and staies at S. Denis, contrary to the Parisians expectation, who thought he would haue kept the more stir, hauing so great forces. But hee wisely weighing the vanity of popular tumults, resolves to husband this occasion, and to make his peace with the King and the House of Orleans, hauing so great an advantage ouer them, to ratifie the abolition which he had obtained against all euent. He then sends his Ambassadors to King Charles to Tours, William duke of Bauaria, the Lords of S. George, Croy, Vieville and Dolchaing, to treat a peace with him and the children of Orleans, making great shewes of humility and loue.

This new course moued the King and Princes, the which they expected not from the Duke of Bourgonne, being so late a Conqueror: so as they easily yeeld to an agreement, vpon conditions; but still to the preiudice of the poore widow, and afflicted Orphans. In this confusion, Valentine Duchesse of Orleans (seeing her paines lost in the pursuit of so iust a cause) dies for thought within few daies after: leauing great trouble & few friends to her children, and great ioy to the Bourguignon, seeing his cause won by the death of this courageous woman, who onely might oppose her selfe. The King comes to Chartres, to solemnize this peace, hee sends for Charles Duke of Orleans and his brethren, and for Iohn Duke of Bourgonne; and all appeare at a prefixed day. A scaffold is made, where the King sits in his seat of Iustice, enuironed with the Princes of his blood, in great state. Iohn Duke of Bourgonne (approaching neere the King) kneeles downe with Dolchaing his Aduocate, who speaketh thus: Liege Lord, behold the D. of Bourgonne, your seruant and cousin is come vnto you, for that hee vnderstands you are much offended with him, for the deed done and committed on the person of my Lord the Duke of Orleans your brother, for the good of the Realm & of your person, as he is ready to let you vnderstand whensoever it shall please you, and therefore my Lord, hee doth humbly beseech you, that it would please you to forget the wrath and indignation you haue conceiued against him, and to receive him into fauour.

After these words, the King commanded the Duke to retire himselfe: which done the Queene, the Dauphin, the Kings of Sicily and Nauarre, and the duke of Berry fall on their knees before the King, and the Queene said; Dread Lord we beseech you to grant the request of our Cousin the Duke of Bourgonne. The King answered, We will and doe grant it for your sakes. The Duke of Bourgonne being called againe, kneeles before the King, who sayes vnto him, Faire Cousin we grant your request, and pardon you all. The Duke hauing hauing thanked the King, rifeth. Behinde the Kings chaire flood Charles of Orleans with his brethren weeping bitterly. The Duke of Bourgongne goes vnto them, accompanied with his Aduocate, and hauing saluted them with a very humble countenance, the Aduocate spake thus vnto them, My Lord, the Duke of Bourgongne here present, intreats you to put out of your remembrance that hatred which you may haue against him for the outrage committed on the person of my Lord of Orleans your father, and that hereafter you will remaine good kinsmen and loving friends. The Duke added, And herof I pray you. But they answered nothing. Then the King said vnto them: My faire Cousins, I will haue it so. And they answered: Liege Lord, seeing it pleaseth you to command vs, we yeld thereto: for we will not disobey your commandments in any thing. The Duke accepted it, thanking the King and his Cousins of Orleans. Then the Cardinall of Barre brought the holy Testament, wherein both parties did sweare a peace, neuer to remember what was past, and to hold a perpetual league of friendship. And the King said, We will, that hereafter you liue like good kinsmen & friends together, and most straitly charge you not to wrong one another, nor any other person that hath fauoured you: neither shew any malice or hatred vnto them, as you tender our displeasure, except such as committed the said murmur, whom we banish our Realme for euer. These are the very words faithfully collected out of the Originall of that age. This hapned the ninth of March, 1409. Then followed nothing but mariages. The Duke of Bourgongne married his two brethren, Philip Earle of Neuers with the heire of Cously, and Anthony Duke of Brabant with the heire of Luxemburg. He is greatly in credit with the King and Queene; his traine seemed greater then his Masters: the bounty of his kitchin draws men from all parts; but hee had not made his peace with God, neyther (in his heart) with those poore Orphelins, destitute both of friends and meanes, at whose cost this peace was made, the which was but counterfeit, and continued not long.

John Duke of Bourgongne governeth all in the Kings name and the Daulphines. The Faction of Orleans opposeth. The Ciuill warres reuine: ended with a peace: and the new authority of the Daulphin, who dispossesseth the Bourgignon, and restoreth them of Orleans.

From the yeare 1409, vnto the yeare 1413.

After this accord the Court takes a new forme. Queene Isabel thinks no more of her poore Nephew of Orleans, shee is wholly the Duke of Bourgongnes. The Duke of Berry follows the same traine. For prooue of a cordiall friendship, the Queene doth openly fauour the marriage so long promised, of Lewis the Daulphin her eldest sonne, with Katherine daughter to the Duke of Bourgongne; the which marriage was solemnized.

John governeth the Court.

Now John of Bourgongne is father in law to the Daulphin: it is hee which gouernes both his heart and house. Moreover, Charles King of Nauarre, Lewis duke of Barria, the Duke of Loraine, Britany, Barre, Alanfon, Cleues, Vaudemont, and (after their example) the greatest Noblemen in Court, are all on his side. There is nothing but feasting in his house; all ioy, whilst the Orphans of Orleans weepe. Paris honours him as their protector, and trusts none but him: and John doth affect nothing more carefully with the King and Daulphin, then the loue of the people. Hee doth all hee can to please them. The chiefe subiect of his discourse is to reforme the State; to seeme thereby more affectionate to the common weale. In a solenne Feast (where all the Court was present) he gaue to his friends, instead of a banquet, plomets of gold and silver, shewing by this figure, that his desire was to rule the State well: and to shew the effect of his words, hee produced this notable occasion.

All men cryed out of the Treasurers, as horre-leeches of the common treasure; and the chiefe causes of bad husbandry, whereby the King and people were so much impoverished. Wee haue made mention before of one of the Kings chiefe minions called Montagu, who had too soone fled the storme: being returned hee growes in greater credit with the King then before, who giues him the office of Lord Steward, and marries his eldest sonne to the sister of the Lord of Albert, his Constable; although Montagu were but of a meane calling. The shew of his traine exceeded Princes houses, and made him odious to all in generall, so as they accused him to haue robbed his Prince, and the publicke Treasure.

The

A The Bourgignon begins with him, in the reformation of the State. The Princes of the blood were easily drawne to allow of this proceeding: so as Montagu was taken, condemned, and speedily beheaded. Whether this were done by commissioners, or iudicially (as it was said to be iustified after his death) it is not certaine. This is a good lesson for meane men, that grow rich by the publike treasure, not to abuse their wealth by excessive pompe: to keep their credit in Court, and to flic the fury of great men, vnder his protection that hath power of life and death, arming themselves with a good conscience and vnproueable in their charges. But the Burgignon had a farther reach then Montagu: for vnder colour of the publike good, he reuenged himselfe of him, who else might haue crossed his delignes. His meaning was, not to reforme the State, but to gouerne it absolutely. Thus he seeks to vsurpe all, and in the ruine of Montagu, hee will haue all men know that he hath power to hurt and helpe. This first insolency furthered his enemies, being in a manner forsaken of all men, euen of their owne blood: for John Duke of Berry (caried away with the vent of this new fauor) had subiected himselfe to the Bourgignon: but finding himselfe contemned by him, who tooke all to himselfe, and reiected such as had serued him to rise, John resolves to ioyne with the house of Orleans, and to oppose themselves against the Duke of Bourgongnes greatness.

This is the beginning of the two factions of Orleans and Bourgongne, which troubled all France during this reigne. This league (whereof the house of Orleans bare the name (as the first and most interessed) was concluded at Gien in the yeare 1410, the tenth of March, being defensive and offensive against the house of Bourgongne. The chiefe were Charles Duke of Orleans and his brethren, John duke of Berry, Lewis Duke of Bourbon, John Earle of Alanfon, Francis Earle of Cleremont, Bernard Lord of Armagnac, and Charles Lord of Albret Constable of France, with their friends and followers in great numbers. Of the Bourgignon faction, were John Duke of Bourgongne with his brethren, Charles King of Nauarre, (sonne to that wretch of whom we haue made mention) the Dukes of Loraine, Brabant and Britanic, the Marquis of Pont, the Earles of Neuers, Vaudemont, Saint Pol, Ponthieure, and many others. This mournfull diuision continued vnto the yeare 1419, in the which John was slaine, but it ends not yet. During these eight yeares we shall see diuers changes, one in, and another out, as they could enable themselves with the Kings authority, which is the strongest batteric of ciuill warres. Now the Duke of Bourgongne is in quarter, and plants his Ordnance against the Orleans, as guiltie of high treason: but shortly he shall be dispossessed, and they of Orleans shall take their turne.

The house of Orleans complains, that they are not respected according to their degree: they sue to be admitted to the priuiledges due to Princes of the blood, and that the duke of Bourgongne should not command absolutely, holding (as they said) both the bodies and wils of the King, Queene, and Daulphine in captivity. They assemble in great troopes, first at Chartres, and after (to manage their affaires with greater shew, neere vnto the capitall City of Paris) they lodged at the Castell of Winchestre, then called Bicestire, but now ruined. The Duke of Bourgongne accused the Duke of Orleans for practising to take the Crowne from the King and Daulphin, perswading the King to what hee pleased against them, as against rebels and disturbers of the publike quiet. This fire continued but seuen or eight moneths, wherein there chanced no memorable accident, but onely the death of Lewis the good Duke of Bourbon, who died for griefe in the beginning of this war, being accused as the motiue of these troubles.

Queene Isabel laboured to reconcile these Princes, but the preuailed not, being suspected by the Orlean faction, whom she had left without cause, to ioyne with the Bourgignon. After some Edicts of confiscation, not executed (like Canon shot spent in the aire) a space was made by meanes of the duke of Berry, vpon condition that he and the Duke of Bourgongne should ioyntly haue the Daulphin in guard, and the house of Orleans should be respected in their degree, and that Peter of Eftards (a sworn enemy to their party, and a most passionate seruant to the duke of Bourgongne) should be no more Proprietor of Merchants. This was concluded at Winchestre, whereof it beares the name, the twentieth day of Nouember in the same yeare, hauing contended this sommer about Paris onely, to the hurt of the poore people, discontented chiefly with the Gascons that came out of Armagnac, who gaue their name to the troopes of the Orlean faction, call I for this occasion Armagnacs, wearing for their colours a white scarf, the which they have used in our last troubles. This first Peace continued not long, neither were all promises performed. The Bourguignon did eate the cake alone, and yet he complained first, as having to doe with children. Hee sends the Lords of Croy and Douries, to the Duke of Berry, to dissonce him from the Duke of Orleans his Nephew, who having intelligence of their negotiation and passage, caused them to be surpris'd in Sologne, and brought prisoners to Blois: but he sent backe Douries, and detained Croy, as suspected to be guilty of his fathers death, and by consequence punishable by the treaty of peace. The King commands him to set him at liberty: and hee demands iustice of his fathers murderer. Hereupon they goe all to armes. They cause the King to summon him by his Edicts, whereunto Charles Duke of Orleans answers, by a challenge to the Duke of Bourgongne, as the murderer of his father, and the author of all the miseries which then reigned in France.

Beginning of the second warre.

Thus began this second warre, the 20 of Iuly, the yeare following, 1411. the Princes passions giuing the poore people scarce seuen moneths respite to breathe in so many calamities, which they suffered through their voluntary diuisions. The Orlean faction assembles at Gergeau vpon the riuier of Loire, to resolute of the meanes to make warre against John Duke of Bourgongne, whom the challenge by a publike cartell, as the murderer of a Prince of the blood, the Kings onely brother: and as vsurper of the royall authority, holding the persons and wils of the King and Daulphin captiue. John duke of Bourgongne had great aduantages; the Kings authority, and the Daulphins, (who was heire apparent to the Crowne of France) the capitall City of the Realme, the approbation of the best Cities, most of the Prouinces, and without comparison greater meanes of himselfe, both for men and money.

This second war continued a yeare, it began in Iuly, 1411, and ended the yeare after, 1412, in the same month, far more variable and violent then the first; and memorable in this, that the vanquished was victor, and the victor vanquished. The same authority which had supported the stronger, was in the end fauourable to the weaker: such as most pleased their masters humor, receiued death of him for their reward. Very necessary obseruations to iudge of these ciuill wars. The Orlean faction went first to field. They were about seuen or eight thousand horse. The number of their foot is not specified. Charles duke of Orleans makes the body of his army in Gastinois: the duke of Bourbon in Bourbonois, and the Earle of Alanfon in Vermandois. Peronne, Chauny, Neele and Han, yeeld vnto them. Cleremont (which belonged to the duke of Bourbon) is fortified: they seeke to surprize Retell and Bapaumes, but in vaine. This was the first fallie begu by them of Orleans: but the Bourguignon takes another course, he prepares the kings Edicts against them, hee employes the peoples force within the Cities, and armes in field, and all auailles him at the first. He had a great army both of horse and foot, the which doth presently march into Picardy, where the Orleanois had begun, and easily recouers what they had gotten. Han stands resolute: they besiege, take, spoile and sacke it.

The Bourguignon
craues aid of the King of England.

The Flemings which were vassals to the duke of Bourgongne, being laden with spoile, craue leaue to returne home, neither could the dukes promises, nor threats retaine them, but they leaue his army and depart. This had almost ouerthrowne his affaires, hee abandons Mondidier, the which was presently surpris'd by Peter of Quefnes, Lord of Gannes of the Orlean faction, and putting his army into Garisons, doubting the euent of this war, he sends with all speed to Henry the 4.ing of England, crauing succours in this necessity. Henry makes his profit of these ciuill diffentions in France: he presently sends twelue hundred men to the Bourguignon, to supply the Flemings want, vnder the command of Thomas Earle of Arondell. The Orleanois lose no time; and for their nearer approach to Paris, they surprize Saint Denis, and Saint Cloud, places of importance, and fortifie Corbeil for the passage of the riuier, of purpose to furnish this great City, which liues by daily prouisions brought from diuers parts. But he finds one to countermeine his practices, vsing the same instrument he had employed to hurt him. The Orleanois keeping the field about Paris, must needs be the cause of great calamities. And all this was acted in the view of the King and Daulphin.

John informs the King of his enemies infolency, who (without appealing to his Majesty) presumed to spoile the heart of France, as if they were strangers or enemies. Charles

apprehends this error but too easily, desiring nothing but rest: but Lewis the Daulphine especially is incensed by these informations, and his choler increaseth daily against his cousins of Orleans. The Bourguignon sayd, that they played the Kings, and could not coneeale their intention, which was to seize on the Crown, seeing they presumed to take armes against the King. There are rigorous Edicts made against the Orlean faction, as against rebels, and guilty of high treason. All their goods, honours and persons, are confiscate which remaine in this army, if within fifteene dayes after publication of the Kings letters patents, they retire not themselves to their houses. And to begin with the greatest, Charles of Albret Constable of France, and Arnold of Corby the Chancellor, are dispossessed of their dignities, and the Earle of Saint Pol preferred to the first place, and Dolehaing the Duke of Bourgongnes Aduocate to the last.

This storme makes worke at Paris, they seeke out all of the Orlean party, and presently cast them into prison: Peter of Effars being restored to his place, remembers the article made against him at Winchester, and armes the people against them. Whosoeuer is found out by the Parisians, being of the Orlean faction, he is brought with hazard of his life to prison. All is lawfull in this popular rage, so it be against the Armagnacs. All these engines forced from diuers parts, doe strangely shake the Orlean party. Such as were restrained within any townes, durst not breathe: and many in the army slip away daily, fearing the rigour of these Edicts, which were executed with all severity.

Charles Duke of Orleans (having taken counsell of the Princes and Noblemen, his associates, what course to follow in this alteration, before a greater inconueniency) resolves to draw the Bourguignon to battell, although hee were fortified with these new forces from England. So as having passed the riuier of Oyse, vpon a bridge of boats, (all the passages being seized on by the Bourguignon in the Kings name) he presents himselfe before the gates of Cleremont in Beauuois, where John his capitall enemy remained. The Orleans army is faire, beautified with the presence of great personages: the Duke of Bourbon, the Earles of Alanfon, Cleremont, Albret, Verurs, Vienne, Bouciquant, the Archbishop of Sens (brother to that Montagu which was beheaded) Craon, Montbason, Hungeff, with many Barons, Knights, and Squires, all resolute to end this quarrell by battell: and to that end (having desired the Duke of Bourgongne) they attend him, betwixt Cleremont and Catheray. But the Bourguignon leaving them there to spoile that goodly and fertill Country of the Isle of France, whereby they increased the hatred and curse of the people, more incensed then euer against these Armagnacs, exclaiming of him as of a coward that durst not fight, he arises at Paris, to the peoples great content, who attend him with all deuotion. He presently takes Saint Cloud and Saint Denis from the Orlean party, to their great losse, notwithstanding any diligence of Charles their head, who proclaimed a victory before the combat. Thus Paris is freed without any restraint, and all the Orlean party brought very low. Neither Charles nor his associates talke any more of fighting with the Bourguignon: they had worke enough to retire themselves, and to defend their townes, expecting a present siege. John of Bourgongne failes not to husband this good successe, and (to countenance his forces) he doth ingage the King and Daulphin in the pursuit of his enemies halfe vanquished. So his victorious army enters into Beausse, turning head towards the Duchy of Orleans, the inheritance of his chiefe enemy. Estampes yeelds to the King. The Duke of Bourbon is there taken prisoner, and sent presently into Flanders.

Whilst that all things succeeded thus happily for the Duke of Bourgongne, Henry the fourth, King of England calls home the troopes he had sent to his succour, vnder the Earle of Arondels command, entreating the Duke to hold him excused, if he did vse his owne at this need. He had no meaning to fauour the stronger party, but to succour the weaker, as experience did soone teach. This sudden alteration did somewhat stay the Bourguignons designe to attempt Orleans: but making warre aduisedly, hee attends his enemies proceeding, and taking an honest leaue to retire, by reason of the winter, hee comes to Paris, where (not to lose any time) he continues the Kings thundring Edicts, and executes many of his prisoners, to fesh the people. To blood he addes Ecclesiasticall Excommunications against the Armagnacs, whilst the Orleanois take cold by making war in Charolois, and sending for succours into England, seeking for reliefe in the same place where their enemy had found a scourge to whip them.

The English
troopes leaue
the Bourguignon.

Certain letters (carried by a Monke from the Duke of Orleans to the King of England) were intercepted, and brought to Paris, being examined in full assembly of the Vniuersity, and from thence imparted to the people, with the Bourguignons Commencaries. They made the Orlean faction so much the more odious, as if the Dukes of Orleans, Berry, and Bourbon (combined together) had sought to take the Crowne from the King and Daulphine, and to dismember the Realme in giuing part of it to the English, and to diuide the rest among themselves. Strange newes without any subiect, which vanish at their breeding; but yet they serue to put poffe according to the designe of their Architect.

The King and Daulphin (being possessed by John of Bourgongne) haue no thought but to ruine the Orlean party, and putt vp with this first successe, hoping to finish the rest, they employ all their meanes to leaue a great army, the which (through the Bourguignons care) was held to be an hundred thousand men. A notable number, after so many miseries, and in so great a confusion.

The City of Bourges was of great importance, for the vniing of the Prouinces on that side Loire, where the associate Princes had their greatest supplies of men. The Bourguignons greatest malice was against the Duke of Berry, who not onely had forsaken him, but (for his degree and age) understood much in his enemies affaires. They resolve therefore to besiege it, to make the way more easie for the conquest of the rest. In the beginning of the Spring, the King and Daulphin goe from Paris to their army, which assembled in Gastinois: being entred into Berry, the lesser Townes yeeld without question. Dun le Roy, Fontenay, and Sancerre. Bourges being summoned, makes answer: That neither the King, nor Daulphin did make this warre, but the Duke of Bourgongne, who holding their persons and wils captive, would deprive the Princes of France of their right, hauing imbrued his murdering hands in the blood of the first Prince of the Crowne, seeking to vsurpe the State. There were very many good souldiers within the City, which were supplied with all that might be wished for in a long siege. They intreated the enemy (in scorn) that he would approach neere the City; and they leaue their gates open in a brauery. Many fortunate sallies are made by them, crying in field, God save the King. They take many prisoners. The waters abroad are poisoned, and many dye before they discouer the cause.

All rings out with military railings of Armagnacs and Bourguignons: but the greatest defeat is in spoiling of the Country. All the prouision being caried into the City, what a spoile should an Army of an hundred thousand men with their followers make? and (to increase their misery) all the houses of the champion Country were either sackt or burnt. The English (being victors in France) neuer committed greater spoiles then these French Armies.

As the duke of Berry (the Lord of that country) was much grieved to see these spoils, for the Daulphin (the heire apparent of the Crowne) was discontented with his father in lawes ambition, growing odious vnto him. His blood (which could not degenerate) moued him to compassion, and the blood vniuilly shed, troubled his conscience. For, to what end should they ruine a whole Realme to maintaine so execrable a murder? If zeale to reforme the State (saith he) be the Bourguignons intent, is this the way? His father (being sicke could not apprehend these things; by reason of his infirmity: what reproach then were it for him (being his eldest son) to suffer himselfe to be baffled by his father in law, like vnto an infant? These apprehensions moued this yong Prince, who nothing dissimbling his conceptions, told his father openly, that hee was not pleased with these confusions, and that they must find out some meanes to pacifie them. It chanced one day, as they aduertised the King, that in a sally made by them of the Towne, they had slaine some one of his seruants, the Daulphin cried out in the presence of the Bourguignon: Shall we neuer haue an end of these miseries? I am resolved to make them cease. The Bourguignon hauing before discovered some coldnes in this yong Prince, found his mind now to be wholly changed. He therefore replied mildly: That it should be well done, so as they of Orleans would acknowledge their error. How (saith the Daulphin) shall they acknowledge their fault, if we doe not know them for our blood? And then they resolved to make a peace. The Duke of Berry had layed the foundation by Lignac, great master of Rhodes, who failed not to imbrace this occasion, seeing the Daulphin so well affected. The Earle of Sauoy had sent his Ambassadors, to exhort both parties. After a months siege they begin to treat of the meanes to pacifie these troubles. The Bourguignon makes haste to be the first in all things, and parles with the duke of Berry betwixt two bars. One accuseth, the other excuseth, but in the end a peace is concluded by Deputies.

The Princes, at an enteruiew imbrace one another, with all shewes of cordiall loue, such as their blood makes shew of, after long bitterness. The Bourguignon onely is troubled, doubting this peace to them would be a war to him, for that hee had no peace in his owne Conscience.

The King enters into Bourges, where the peace is signed, and for that reason it was called the peace of Bourges, the 23 of Iuly, in the year 1412. A Parliament is called at Auxerre, to confirme it by solemne oath. The Princes are receiued into fauour with the King and Daulphin, all Edicts made against them, were disannulled and of no force. They and theirs restored to their degrees and dignities: all things to be forgotten. The names of Armagnac and Bourguignon (as infamous markes of ciuill dissensions) forbidden vpon paine of death: and the English (come to the succour of the associate Princes) to be satisfied out of the Kings Treasure. Without the City of Auxerre, neere to the Abbey of Saint Marian a stately scaffold was made, where the King sitting in his seat of Iustice, enuironed with his Princes, the officers of his Crowne, and the chiefe Deputies of the Parliament, the peace was proclaimed with as great ioy, as the war had been tedious and mournfull. To confirme this peace with John of Bourgongne, Philip Earle of Vertus married his daughter: C but all this could not reconcile him to the house of Orleans. The Daulphin reioyced much at this peace, and made all shewes of loue to his cousins lately reconciled, being grieved that there had bene so long dissention betweene them: desirous to repaire what was past, and about all to maintaine an inuioable peace within the Realme. The good sicke King present at all, yeelded his consent and authority, sometimes inclined to good, sometimes to ill. Queene Isabel held with the strongest: but all these good motions were crossed by the Bourguignon, so as all the confusions of this reigne are not yet ended.

John Duke of Bourgongne seeing himselfe crossd by Lewis the Daulphin, and the house of Orleans restored to grace, sirs up new troubles, from the year 1412, vnto 17: when as the Daulphin dyed, but the troubles ceased not.

FRANCE began to hope for better, by the meanes of Lewis the eldest sonne of King Charles: hauing a desire to make a peace against the Bourguignons will. But this was notall they expected of the Daulphins first resolution: yet the weaknesse of the sicke King, and the inconstancie of this yong Lieutenant gaue the subtil braine of John of Bourgongne too great an aduantage to suffer the French to enioy the fruits of peace so much desired, who neuer yeelded to bare threats, but grew more resolute. And notwithstanding this alteration of the Daulphin his sonne in law, yet he left not the Court, being E alwaies neere the King, keeping the Councell in breath, who were for the most part all of his faction: and although the worshipped they Sunne rising, yet seeing the spirit of this yong Princeto be weak and inconstant, and the Bourguignons firme resolution, they stood vpon their guard, doing nothing that might openly offend either the one or the other, but vnder-hand they fought to please the most politike and redoubted master; who else might proue a most cruell and dangerous enemy.

Thus were affaires handled in the Kings Councell. And as not onely the Court, but the whole world, is an ebbing and flowing of diuers humours, the which doe change according to occasions; and the scaffold whereon dissembling, trechery, and treason play their parts diuersly: so at that time the Bourguignon (a principall artizan of these goodly F shewes) found an ample subiect wherein to employ his filthy trade. But although he seemed to haue gained all, whatsoeuer he desired that should come to passe, and to haue attained the full of his desires, yet all his enterprises came to nothing, and in the end he payed (with the price of his blood) the great debt of his horrible wickednesse. But this Act shal haue many Sceneces. In the first, our History shal set downe the new government of Lewis the Daulphin. This yong Prince was not capable of so great a charge, hauing an idle braine, being carelesse and voluptuous, giuen to his owne will, obstinate, taking no aduice from any but of himselfe, or from yong men of his owne humour: loth to yeeld to any that that vnderstood more then himselfe, and especially to his vnclcs, whose graue heires hee disdained: neyther could hee loue his father in law, being resolu'd to gouerne the Realme alone. The Queene seeing her sonnes humour inclined to loue the House of Orleans, made shew to fauour them: but in effect hee was indifferent, being wholly giuen to flatter her husband, and to gouerne him according to the time.

The Bourguignon dissembling his sonne in lawes wayward humours, was alwayes neere the King, giuing him such goodly reasons, as the good Prince could not gaine-say him. The subiect of his suites was pleasing to the Parisians, whose good liking he entertained chearefully; but alwayes with an intent to be reuenged of his enemies, vnder this goodly name of the Common-wealth, as the soueraigne end of all his designs: but in effect he held still one of the chiefeest places, not yielding in any thing, to gouerne them which seemed to rule, and to keepe backe such as might crosse his authority. By the Peace of Bourges the Constable of Albret should be restored to his dignity; and Arnold of Corby to his Chancelorship. They delay him from day to day, but in the end they are restored with much difficulty. The meanest haue many delays, more troublesome then a flat repulse, being more willing to leaue all, then to make these fruitlesse pursuits. Arnold of Corby being honourably restored to his place, resigned it into the Kings hands, to auoid the danger of so confused a time: more wisely then Henry of Marle that succeeded him, being slaine at the massacre at Paris, with the Constable of Armagnac. But the Bourguignon flew a higher pitch then to preiudice the House of Orleans in their goods and honours; or to crosse their affaires and their followers. He found no better expedient then to doe as he had done with Lewis their father: for a dead Lyon doth no harme. To this end hee assembles some of his most trusty followers at Paris, to finde meanes to murder the Dukes of Orleans, Berry and Bourbon: but Peter of Effars (one of his most violent partisans) discovered this practice, for which hee soone after smarted.

By the Treaty of Bourges, the English (which came to the Duke of Orleans succour) must be satisfied. They presse for payment, one part being discharged (to the Duke of Orleans great hinderance) he was forced to leaue his Brother John Earle of Angouleme in hostage for the rest: being carryed into England, hee was in the end redeemed, after much trouble and many delays.

In this Article the Bourguignon made shew of his good husbandry; soliciting the English vnder-hand, on the one side, for to presse Charles his principall debtor; and on the other side he cryed out against the disorder of the Kings treasure, so ill gouerned, as there was not sufficient to furnish the ordinary expences of his house: pretending all these great summes to be wasted by the Treasurers, cyther in gifts, or in superfluous expences. This complaint was very plausible, but it was a pitfall to catch his enemies, and to mutine this discontented people, by reason of their great oppression, being easie to bee moued at the name of the Common-wealth. He soone obtained from the King a generall Conuocation of the chiefe Cities, to reforme the abuses of the Realme; and especially of the treasure, for the reliefe of the poore people. To make this party good, the City of Paris must make the first point: but the Vniuersity which stood as a neuter (dealing with nothing but their bookes) should make the proposition and first instance.

The cause was vehemently set downe by a Doctor (chosen for the purpose) and auowed by the City and Deputies of the prouinces: such as were subiect to accumps, were much terrified, and the greatest number fled: such as were taken, lost their heads at the Halles or Greue, to the peoples great content, who highly commend the Duke of Bourgongne, as the onely Prince which loued the good of the Realme. The Dauphine grows ieaalous at the sound of these praises (as preiudiciall to his honor) vowing neuer to suffer the Bourguignon to attempt any thing against his authoritie. Such as were interested, sed the young Princes humour: who (by the meanes of Lewis of Bauaria his vnclc by the mothers side) perswade him to take the name of Regent for a marke of his greatneffe.

He takes this title, and giues notice to the Duke of Bourgongne, that it is now high time he were knowne in his degree. The Bourguignon (protesting that he hath no other obiect but the good of the Realme) makes no shew to deale in these affaires, leaving the gouernement thereof to whom it appertained: yet vnder-hand hee caused the Parisians to arme; and (least the better sort should be called into question, hee employeth the basest, being led by one Cabosh a butcher, followed by a multitude of rascals, who (being armed)

A armed) come in troopes to the Regents lodging, and require of him by rowle the chiefe enemies of the Bourgignons house, who (they said) had gouerned the treasure, or had bene enriched by excessive gifts. Amongst the which was Peter of Effars, who (without any long processe) lost his head, receiuing a iust reward for his great wickednesse, by his hands, who had then caused him to commit them. But this was not one daies fury: the next day the people assemble in great multitudes, and taking white caps for their badge, they came to Saint Pol, where the King lodged, and demand audience, hauing seized on all the passages to his lodging, after a terrible manner. A Carmelite Frier was speaker for the people, accompanied with the Deputies of this multitude as his ruffians. Being entered into the Kings chamber, after many tedious speeches, he demands reformation of the State, protesting they would not be fed with words: they vrged the King to punish such whose names they had contained in a list, being guilty of capital crimes. The Duke Bourgongne makes a good shew, and answers: That the King would consider thereof. This Frier replies impudently, that they would not depart before they had such as they demanded. Their rage was such, as the King and Princes tooke white cappes, the marke of the seditious. They demand the chiefe seruants of the King, Queene, and Dauphine, not onely men, but all women which had bene in any credit: and aboute all, Lewis of Bauaria the Queens brother. There was not any one but stood amazed at these audacious impudencies.

The Queene comes weeping, she intreats the King, the Monke and the deputies of the people. They answer, it is their charge, and they cannot alter it. The people cry from the base Court with a violent noise, that if they deliuer not these prisoners, they will force the lodging. So as after all these intreaties, Lewis the Queens brother with the rest (specified in the rowle) both men and women, yield vnto the mercy of these mad and furious men, and are by them led into diuers prisons.

This night passed not without many murders, many were strangled, and many cast into the riuer, without any other formes of iustice, but the Bourgignons secret commandement: who (with his cold and graue countenance) made shew to haue no interest in the action. The City was neuer in so lamentable an estate, by this shameful contempt of Law, order, and of the King, Princes and Magistrates. There is no talke but of blood, killing, hanging and drowning of poore prisoners.

The horror of this confusion toucht the hearts of the most passionate. The Vniuersity (which had bene the mouth of these captious complaints) repaires to Henry of Marle the first president, and to John Luenal of Virfins the Kings Aduocate, protesting that they were not guilty of these infamous disorders. And hauing taken aduice, they resolute to go to the King, as well to purge themselves of the suspicion of these abominable confusions, as to intreat him to giue eare to a good peace. They giue him meanes to win the heads of this popular faction, and set vp an Ensigne with the Kings armes, and cry in all parts of the City, Peace, peace good people: an inuention which preuailed much in this action.

Euill counsell is most hurtfull to him that giues it: the Bourgignons practices light on his owne head. The people seeing themselves disauowed by the Vniuersity (who then had great credit for their esteeme of wisdom and knowledge) hauing the King and his Parliament opposit, being abandoned by their Tribunes, they hide themselves in Bourgongne, and hee himselfe feeling the storme to approach, retires to Champaigne, attending the event.

The Orlean faction repaires to Paris with speed, and were receiued ioyfully by the people, as the anchor of their hope. All the world exclaimes of the Bourgignon as the onely motiue of the troubles of France, and vnworthy to hold so honourable a rancke among the Princes of the blood. The Queene feeds this dislike, for the interest of her brother imprisoned, & the King thunders forth his Edicts against the Bourgignon, the which are seuerely executed vpon such as are apprehended. Scaffolds, riuers and streets witness the reuenge of the murders committed by the Bourgignons vpon the Orleans. All officers preferred by the Bourgignon are displaced, and all such as had supported him are ill intreated. Valeran Earle of Saint Pol, is put from the dignity of Constable, Gauchard Dauphin of Auvergne, from that of great Master, and Charles of Rambures from being Master of the Crosse-bowes, the which is at this day as the Colonell of the infantry. Three hundred men and women of the Bourgignon faction, are banished banished by a decree of the Court of Parliament. John Duke of Britany leaues the Bour-aignuon and comes to Court against him.

To conclude, all bandy against the Bourguignon, yet he is nothing amazed, but continues constant against all stormes. He craves ayde of his Cities in Flanders in this necessity: being thus perplexed, there fell out a favourable occasion to raise him vp againe. The Queene being much discontented with him, incensed the Dauphin. This young Prince had some of his household seruants from the Bourguignon: these vsing the authority of a nother, takes them from him, and puts them in prison: the reason was, for that the feared the men were of the Bourguignons faction. The Dauphin takes this as an affront, and writes to his father in law to assist him. The Bourguignon embracing this vnexpected occasion, calls a new assembly of his subjects, and shewes them these Letters. And making his profit thereof, he giues them to vnderstand how needfull it was to leaue an army, to free the King and Dauphin, whom the Orlean faction held in captivity. And vpon this cause he writes to all the Cities of the Realme, intreating them to assist him in so good a worke; and worthy of good subjects to their Prince. Hereupon hee leaues an army, and goes to field, making a publike declaration, That he takes armes to set the King and Dauphin at liberty, and is followed by many French, so as his army increaseth daily. Having passed the river of Somme, he enters into Champagne, and doth summon Senlis, to send him the keyes of their gates, as marching for the Kings seruice: but a countermand comes from the Dauphin, which doth frustrate his designe.

The Dauphin
disauiwes the Bourguignon.

The Dauphin (won by the Orleansois) protesteth that he had neuer written these letters, and disauiwes the Bourguignon: he writes letters vnto him of a contrary tenor, requesting him to forbear to torment the people vpon so vniust a cause: protesting that he was not only in full liberty, but doth also enjoy his authority, by vertue whereof he commands him to dismisse his troops, and to leaue France in quiet. The Bourguignon goes on his course, meaning to enter Paris, and to stir the people to a new sedition, and so hee marcheth with his troops neere to the City, and stayes at Saint Denis: but his proiect had no successe.

The Dauphin assures the City wals, and the peoples hearts against him, who seeks by all meanes to speake to the King or people, approaching himselfe neere the City, sending his Heralds, with Letters, planting his colours neere the gate, and in the end conueys a flasse with Letters in it: but all this would not preuaile. The King doubles the battery of his Edicts against him, as guilty of high treason, and a disturber of the publike peace: commanding all men that were in his army to leaue him, vpon paine of confiscation. Hereat the greatest part of his troops flye away, yea his Flemings abandon him, who had alwayes protected vnto him in all his assemblies, neuer to cary armes against the King nor Dauphin. In the end the King and Dauphin, accompanied with the Princes of his blood, march with a goodly army, they besiege Champagn (where the Bourguignon had left a garison) and take it by composition: from thence they march to Soissons a towne of greater strength, having taken it by force, and Enguerand of Bournonville his right hand in it, hee leaues the towne in peace, and cuts off Bournonvilles head at Paris, with many of his companions, to the peoples great content, glad of this new blood: and in the end hee passeth to Arras, the which he besiegeth with his victorious army.

The Bourguignon amazed at these vnexpected euents, demands peace of Charles, and obtaines it with much intreaty, by the meanes of the Countesse of Hainault his sister; and the Duke of Brabant her brother. It is called the peace of Arras, being made at that siege. This was grievous to the Dukes of Orleans and Berry, who said, that both the King and Dauphin had promised them, not to lay downe armes, before they had utterly ruined the House of Bourgogne. But God wiser then they, would vnto all the French, to oppose them with a common consent, against the English their common enemy: and will soone shew, that it is a meere vanity for mortall men, to nourish immortall hatred against their enemies, to satisfie their insatiable revenge. We haue said, that Henry the fifth, King of England, watcht all opportunities to feed the confusions of this miserable reigne: and to that end he did sometimes succour the Bourguignon, sometimes the Orleansois, still supporting the weaker. And knowing well the Duke of Bourgognes humour, seeing the Dauphin incensed against him, he leaues a goodly army, to make a benefit of these diuisions. The count fauoured his desire, but not his proiect: for meaning to assist the Bourguignon, he finds that he had made his peace with our Charles.

Having

Henry the fifth, King of England enters France with an army, and demands Katherine the Kings daughter.
He marcheth into Picardy.

Having landed at Harfieu, a sea towne seated vpon the River of Seine, he sends his Herald to demand his daughter Katherine. This was a matter far fetcht, and a strange course, but this daughter must be the ground of many miseries for this Realme, and likewise an occasion to free this Realme absolutely from the English by a strange meanes, and (as we may say) admirable, as the course of our History will shew.

Henry takes Harfieu by composition. Before he takes possession of this conquest, hee goes bare-footed to the Church, to giue God thanks. He had not his whole army with him, one part attended him at Calais, having an intent to ioyne with them, and so to fortifie his troops. With this resolution hee lodgeth at Fauille, and passing through Caux to the County of Eu, he comes to Vimeu, to passe the River at Blanquetaque (an infamous place by the losse) where the passage being surpris'd, he takes his way towards Arennes, and from thence to Baillu in Vimeu, seeking to passe the bridge at Remic: but notable to force it, he recouers Hangest vpon Somme, and so passeth the river at Voyenne and Bethencourt, places ill guarded by them of Saint Quintin: and then hee lodgeth at Mouchy la Gache, toward the River of Miramont.

He had in his army six thousand horse, and twenty thousand foot. That of King Charles was farre greater of it selfe, besides the Bourguignons troops (which were drawne together for another intent then to fight with the English: they were in all about twenty thousand horse, and threecore thousand foot, and therefore Henry did thin the battell, and sought how to saue himselfe through the fennes. Our accustomed rashnesse, and wilfull forgetfulness of two experiences past against the same nation, and in the like occurrences, made vs to note with blacke and mournfull letters that our throw and calamity. Henry deminded passage to returne into England, yielding vp Harfieu and other places conquered in this voyage: but we fought our owne decay. The Constable Albret commanded the Foreward that day, and with him were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earles of Eu and Richmond, the Lord of Bouciquault Marshall of France, and the Lord of Dampierre, Admirall. The battell was led by the Duke of Bar, and the Earles of Alençon, Vandemont, Neuers, Blamon, Salines, Grandpre and Rouffy. The Rereward by the Earles of Marle, Dampmartin, and Fouquerbergue.

Henry (being denied passage by the Constable) resolues to fight, putting his trust in God and his owne valour, determining to vanquish or dye, he made choice of a place of hard access; and the better to fortifie his archers, every one had a sharpe stake planted before him. The French ordered as before, attended their enemies, either looking who should begin the game. Impatiency forceth the weaker, like desperate men, the English Archers begin the fight with such a fury, as the French foreward cannot endure the violent fall of this furious storme: the Constable Albret was slaine fighting in the foremost ranke. The duke Anthony of Brabant, brother to John duke of Bourgogne, (seeing this disorder) leaues his troupe to redresse it, but he was also slaine by the English bow-men, with his brother Philip Earle of Neuers. The battell was likewise forced after a great fight. The rereward fled, and saued themselves in the nearest places of retreat. So as the losse was not so great as the shame and ouerthrow. They number ten thousand men slaine, but their rashnesse was inexcusable. The head smited for it, and the Bourguignons brethren had there an honorable tombe. Charles duke of Orleans and Lewis of Bourbon, the Earles of Eu, Richmond and Vendosme (the strongest pillars of the Orlean faction) with many Noblemen and Gentlemen, were taken and led into England. This defeat chanced the 20 day of October, in the yeare 1415. called the euill battell of Agincourt. And as one mischief comes neuer alone the bodies slaine at this defeat were scarce buried before Lewis the Dauphin dies. This Lewis (eldest sonne to our Charles, sonne in law, and a terror to the Bourguignon) was little lamented of the people, and lesse of his father in law, who hated him to the death. A Prince of little valour and much toile, more busied with himselfe then with the affaires hee managed, the which he made troublesome by his insufficiency and presumption to know much, vnwilling to learne from others what hee vnderstood not, for the good of the State and his owne duty.

John duke of Touraine his brother, succeeded him in degree, as the first Prince of the blood, and the Earle of Armagnac was made Constable, in the place of Charles of Albret who shall minister good occasion to speake both of his life and death. John duke of Berry brother to our Charles the fifth, augmented these losses. ning, commendable in all things, but for his courteousnesse, the which made his vertues of a lesse fame. A blemish very ill becoming a generous and heroicke spirit. These great losses should have made the Bourguignon humble, but he became more insolent, making new practices to raise himselfe, having no competitor. Embracing this occasion, he gathers together what troopes he can, with an intent to goe to Paris. The Queene and Constable of Armagnac (unwilling he should come armed) command him in the Kings name, not to approach. The Parisians were not then so well conceited of the Bourguignon, being restrained by the Court and Vniuersity, but especially by the Kings authority being present, who spake whatfoeuer his wife and the Constable would haue him, being then alone in authority in the Kings Councell.

The Bourguignon renews the warre.

The Bourguignons troopes kept the field, committing all kinde of insolencies and spoiles: against whom the King made Edicts as against common theues, giuing the people liberty to kill them. But this did nothing mollifie the heart of this reuengefull Prince, borne for his Countries misery, having no other intent but to afflict it with new calamities. To this end (as in the Kings sicknesse the Daulphin had the name and authority of the State) he sought to winne the fauour of Iohn, succeeding in the right of his brother deceased. This occasion was offered, but the issue was contrary to his designe.

The Emperour Sigismund comes into France.

The misery of our France was such, as the common duty of humanity, moued foraine nations to pity, foreseeing our ruine, if the warre betwix: France and England continued. In this common desire, the Emperour Sigismund (by the consent of the Germanes) came into France. His traine and the good worke he vnderooke, deserued an Imperial Maiestie, but the end will shew his intent to be other then he protested. Being arriued in France (to the great content of all the French) he findes our Charles at his deuotion, who receiued him with all the pompe he could giue to so great a Monarch, making shew of the great desire he had to make a peace betwixt the French and the English, for the generall good of both Estates. But this accord was but halfe made.

The Emperour (having remained some time with Charles) goes into England, where he finds Henry of another humour, pufft vp with the happy success of his affaires and the weaknesse of ours, and in truth the measure of our miseries was not yet at full. So Sigismund (having perswaded Henry in vaine) returns into France. Charles (to honour him) sends his sonne Iohn Duke of Touraine and Daulphin of Viennois into Picardy, to meet him, having married the daughter of the Earle of Hainault, as great a friend to the Bourguignon, as ill affected to the French. The Emperour seeing his labour lost, in seeking this reconciliation, takes his shortest course into Germany, leaving a reasonable subiect to the cleare-sighted, to iudge that hee had another intent then to settle a peace in France, by countenancing of the Bourguignon, the instrument of her miseries: for after this young Prince had spoken with the Emperour, hee is wholly changed in fauour of the Duke of Bourguigne, and resolves to bandy with him against the Duke of Orleans. This foundation being layd by the Emperours policy, it was fortified by the Earle of Hainault, father in law to Iohn the Daulphin. Now he embraceth the greatest and most dangerous enemy of all true Frenchmen with a wonderful affection.

The Daulphin Iohn dies.

But the subtilly is taken in his owne snare, and the end doth bewray the intent. As all things tended to a manifest change by means of this young Prince, enchanted by his charmes, having a spirit like vnto waxe apt to receiue any impression, from so subtil an artificer as the Bourguignon, behold death cuts off all these hopes, cast in the mould of this new authority, buried in Iohns tombe, who died during these practices, at Champagne, when as the fire began to kindle in fauour of the Bourguignon, and to the apparent resulting of troubles in France.

To Iohn succeeded Charles Earle of Ponthieu, the youngest son to our Charles the sixth. He remained also the first Prince of the blood, with the prerogatives of the fundamentall law. A Prince that shall minister much matter to talke of his life in the course of our History, guided by the singular prouidence of God, to raise vp this Monarchy, almost ruined. The last, but the happiest of all his brethren: for this is that Charles the seventh, who (having corrected that furious Giant of Bourguigne) in the end shall expell the English, and haue a free way to his posterity, to restore this Estate, to secure the ruine. But this shall not be without many painful difficulties, the which the order of our History commands vs to represent in their due places.

Iohn

Iohn of Bourguigne the murderer of Lewis of Orleans (having added new troubles to the former) ioyues with Isabel Queene of France: Who having declared her selfe Regent of the Realme, makes warre against her sonne Charles the Daulphin; seizeth vpon Paris, and there commits a cruell massacre, where the Constable of Armagnac, and Henry of Marle Chancellor of France, are slaine. But this Iohn of Bourguigne is in the end slaine by the Daulphin.

The Queene takes vpon her the Regency.

From the yeare 1415, to 1419.

A New kinde of misery now supplies the stage, to despight Nature by the franticke drunkennesse of our confused passions. An vnnatural mother forgets her onely son, the bandies with his capitall enemy against her owne blood, seeking to transport the hereditary Crowne to strangers, a Crowne inalienable by the Law of State; to the end this Medea might fight both against Nature and the lawes of the Realme. A horrible phrensie, ast of Ciuill warre, that is to say, of the assured ruine of the State. They call it Ciuill (being the ruine of Citizens) but very vnciuill indeed: for if we shall iudge thereof by the barbarous and brutish cruelties, what is there in the whole world more vnciuill? But alas, behold the image of vnkinde confusions, wherof the fury of our warres hath made vs eyewitnesses; for haue we beheld lesse, having seene the Crowne set to sale, and our Kings blood shed vpon our Scaffold? But the History requires audience, to report things in their order, as they haue chanced, according to the causes and motives.

A strange confusion, the mother against the sonne.

Charles Earle of Ponthieu had married the daughter of Lewis of Anion, king of Sicilia, a capitall enemy to the Bourguignon. So this young Prince bred vp from his youth in hatred against the house of Bourguigne, must be the instrument to ruine him and his whole race. He loued his pleasure much, and sometime he gaue himselfe vnto it with too great a scope; yet he could apply himselfe well to serious affaires, and force his spirits in necessity: firme in his resolutions, and immoueable in his designs, wherin he happily ended his dayes, restoring the Realme strangely shaken by the errors and losses of his predecessors. In this beginning of his new authority, he was faithfully (though not profitably) assisted by the Constable of Armagnac, one of the chiefe pillars of the Orlean party, and almost alone, since the imprisonment of the duke of Orleans, and the death of the duke of Berry, the King continuing in his infirmities, sometimes better, sometimes worse, but always weak both of body and minde.

Charles an enemy to the house of Bourguigne.

The Bourguignon had his troopes together, to the great spoyle of the Country, who complained still without any redresse. This Prince being resolute in his course, seekes all occasions of new garboiles, his hatred encreaseth daily against the contrary faction, seeing them advanced and in credit, being out of hope to haue any interest in this new Daulphin, who was wholly possessed by Armagnac, an old fox, and an irreconcilable enemy.

He hath practices in Amiens, Abbeuille, Peronne, and all other good townes of Picardy: who by reason of neighborhood are easily drawne to his party, making goodly protestations to maintaine them in peace and liberty vnder the Kings obedience. He writes likewise to all the good townes of the Realme, complaining of the death of Iohn Duke of Touraine, a Prince whom he assured to be wholly giuen to the good of the State, and for this cause had beene poysoned by the enemies of the publike quiet. But his true intent was, to make lush odious as were in credit about the Kings person, although hee named them not in his letters; but in noting them he made a still and a dangerous warre against them, encouraged by his forces and perswasions, who entering the Cities freely, and causing his letters to be publicly read, he moued their hearts by the feeling of former confusions, the blame wherof the Bourguignon laid vpon his enemies.

The King (that is to say) his Councell, being encountered both by writings and force, should likewise oppose armes & writings against the Bourguignon; but he sends the Lord of Cagny to treat with the Bourguignon, which negotiation was fruitlesse, both for that the person sent vnto him was odious, as also by reason of his charge, which was not pleasing vnto him. He had an intent to put Cagny to death; but the respect of his Master withheld him, making answer to all his instructions, specified at large in the original of this

The Bourguignon army and draws in the English.

A meeting at Rouen.

The Dauphin encountered by three great enemies.

The Bourguignon. The English.

Hillory. But what avails it to repeat many vaine words without any effect? In briefe, these are but accusations and excuses, plaints and counterplaints. All protest to be the Kings servants, and all blame the King in troubling the Realme. What plainer Commentary can we desire of these factions, then what we haue heard and seene in our time? The Bourguignon made a more dangerous war then with papers; he had secret practices within the cities, to winne the inhabitants. Hee also drew the English into armes, and armed himselfe, laying the forces together, but with diuers intentions, yet their generall designe was, to afflict France, fishing in a troubled water, making their profit of our confusions, and building their affaires vpon the ruine of the realme.

The Dauphin Charles plus another part, he had scarce knowne the Court, when as he was forced to goe into Anion, to the funerals of Lewis duke of Anion King of Sicilia his father in law, and to assure the Duchie, being in some danger by reason of the neighbourhood of the duke of Barrie, a doubtfull friend in the incertitude of those confused times. Being armed, behold a charge of difficulty for the first fruites of his new authority. The people were mutined at Rouen, they had slaine Gaucoart gouernour of the city, the Advocate, and the Kings preceptor, and besieged the Castle; and to multiply these calamities the Bourguignon is in field, and besiege S. Florentine. The Kings army is not dismissed, but dispersed into diuers parts, according to the necessity of his affaires. The Dauphin hauing need of the greater part for Rouen, sends the lesser to the besieged; but the succours being weake and slacke, Saint Florentine yeelds to the Duke of Bourgogne. This hard beginning might haue bene prejudiciall to his affaires at Rouen, but they succeed better; for the chiefe of the City met the Dauphin, and excuse themselves of this tumult, imputing it to the people ouer charged: they beseech him to pardon this fault, and to receive their voluntary obedience. Thus he is honourably received into the city, already pacified, and takes all things with mildnesse.

But there are other newes of harder digestion; for the Bourguignon marcheth to Paris with a great power, and the English takes port in Normandy with a thousand faile. There were reasons on either side to ballance these great difficulties, and to trouble the Dauphin: for whether shall hee goe first? If hee march to Paris, the English will conquer without resistance: If hee make head against the English, then Paris is lost, being wholly inclined to the Bourguignons practices: who sees not but the losse of the capitall city of the realme would be his ruine, and the overthrow of all his designs? but Charles did not foresee a greater difficulty at hand by his mother, more waighy and dangerous then all the rest; yet must hee aside all these other stormes, not without great danger; that the providence of God, the preserver of this Monarchie might shew itselfe more admirable, restoring this estate, being in this wretched losse. For Charles (who in so sharpe an encounter reaped so wondrous victory) owes the homage vnto God, who gaue him means both to fight well, and to vanquish happily. The Dauphin standing doubtfull betwixt these two great extremities, returned to Paris, to defend the city against the Bourguignons practices, and to assure the Kings affection, who knew would speake whatsoever he pleased, being in his power. Henry Maistre, Chancellor of France, remained at Paris with the King, being wholly a the Dauphins sensation. The people stir not, being kept in awe by the Parliament: Valentin, who were then well vained. But experience will foone discouer the inconsistency of humane stormes, when they seeme most assured, and the vanity of a multitude being the effect of popular motions.

The Bourguignon more insatiable, doth publish his protestation, and displays his colours, causing a new alarme. He makes a declaration, containing the causes for the which he hath taken arms. He reformed the State, extremely desolate, by the ill government of both isles, since the which he (ordinarily) managed the affaires of the realme at their pleasure, and without any of the persons, oppressed them with extraordinary charges, against all right and reason. He grew soe to haue no other intent, but to restore the Realme to her former liberty, but he shall change his copy, imposing new exactions, to the prejudice of the people; and shall grow shamed with such as shall oppose themselves: so as it seems all this was but a make to abuse the people, vnder the goodly shew of ease & liberty. But as at the first all seems goodly, so these glorious beginnings won him great credit with the French nation. Thus as an begins to march through Picardy toward Paris. All Cities open their gates, where he doth presently proclaim an exemption of all subsidies & other charges,

A charges, except of salt, as the gentlest imposition, seeing that all men without distinction paid their port. But about all, he was very careful, that his army should live orderly and modestly, without any oppression to the poore people, being his ordinary delinquencie, as one greatly grieved for their afflictions, and being very desirous of their quiet and content.

These examples proclaimed his vertues, and wonne him the peoples hearts. Other cities in Picardy follow this example: Beauvais yeelds willingly vnto him, and shewt out forioy at his entry, he goes presently to Senlis, kept by Robert Duple for the Armagnacs. The citizens (desirous to imitate the rest) seize vpon their gouernor, open their gates willingly, call in the Bourguignon, and receive him with all ioy. From thence he marcheth speedily to Beaumont, the which hauing endured some Canon shot (being besieged to the house of Bourbon) yeelds vpon an easie composition. Ponthoife and Melun obey without any dispute. So by degrees he comes before Paris, and to shew his army to the Parisians, he lodgeth at Mont-rouge, but to approach neerer, he incamps slower, in a place called, The withered Tree, vnto this day; by reason their flood a great dried Tree. A preface what should afford befall his greene and flourishing designs. Being there, he writes his letters to the King and city of Paris, full of cunning admonitions, beseeching the one, and exhorting the other, to hearken seriously to a good reformation of the State, the true and soveraign end of his armes.

In the meane time hee loseth not an houre. John of Luxembourg (during this his necessary abode at Paris) goes with a part of the army, to try the voluntary cities, and every day made new conquests. Chartres, Estampes, Gaillardon, Moncheury, Auneau and Rechefort: obey: and after some dayes of rest (to annoy Paris) he besiege the Corbeil, a place of importance for the victualling thereof. But whilst he pressed Corbeil with exceeding hast, behold he suddenly abandons it against the opinion of all men.

The Dauphin and the Constable of Armagnac supposed, that seeing that he had lost his labour at Paris, he would seeke to possesse himselfe of places of easier conquest, according to his course begonne. But the effect will shew that his rising was to an other intent, which bred a horrible combustion throughout the whole realme: for Isabel Queene of France, (discontented with her sonne Charles) incites the Duke of Bourgogne to free her from captivity. Shee was then at Tours, with some guard, by the Kings commandment, for the which she blamed her sonne, and the Constable, who then had the gouernment of the Court. They kept not so strict a guard of the Queene, but she had liberty to walke both within and without the City, euen to the Abbey of Marmontier, where she had her chiefe deuotion. This was a meane to give intelligence vnto the Bourguignon, and to slip into his hands as we shall shew. Reason requires, the History should set downe the moriue of so vnnatural a discontent: but she is silent, and reports only a very light occasion. That the King coming from visiting of the Queene, who held her State at Bois-de-Vincennes, and returning to Paris, he met Lewis Bourdon a Knight going to Bois-de-Vincennes, who coming neer to the King, bowed himselfe on horse-back, and passed on without any other reverence. The King fends presently his prouost of Paris after him, commanding him to apprehend him, and to keep him safely. The prouost executing his charge, tooke the said Knight and brought him to the Chastelet, where by the Kings command, he was cruelly tortured, and drowned in the river of Seine: and some few dayes after, by the commandement of the King, the Dauphin, and such as then gouerned at Paris, the Queene (accompanied with her sister in law the Duchesse of Barria) was sent to Blois, and so to Tours, to remaine there in meane estate. William Trel, John Picard and Laurence Dupuis, were appointed for her guard, without whose consent shee durst not attempt any thing, no not to write a letter. These be the words of the Original.

This her imprisonment, was aggravated by a new rigour. All the treasure which she had in Churches, or priuate houles within Paris, was seized on by the Constable of Armagnac, a free executioner of these proceedings. This shewes a notable dislike betwixt the husband and the wife, but the mother and sonne: but the cause is not specified. If it be lawfull to search into this secret, shall we say, that Queene Isabel mother to our Dauphin, louing the one better then the other (as the variety of the mothers affection to their children is too common) had strained all her credit to countenance John, after the death of Lewis, being thus ingaged with the Bourguignon, whom she did hate deadly, by reason of the imprisonment of her brother Lewis of Bawaria? but as she had first loued, and after hated him, might he not in like sort receiue him againe into fauor, as the diuicifity of her passions did moue her by new occasions, to loue or hate the same man?

The Emperor Sigismund proceeding made it very suspicious, being the greatest instrument of the alliance betwixt John and the Bourguignon. And to what end did the Bourguignon goe to him into Sauoy after all this? It is likewise to be considered, that the sodain death of John encreased this womans fury against her sonne Charles, holding it for certaine, that by the Constables counsell he had caused him to be poysoned. Ambition and choller are furious beasts, not to be restrained by respect, especially in a woman, in whom hatred and reuenge made deepe impressions. Jealousie might likewise be a violent counsellor vnto Charles. As it Charles (animated by the Constable of Armagnac, fearing lest his mother had some great practice with the Bourguignon and his associates) had incensed the King against her, hauing moued him with some other pretext. But in effect it was wholly to restrain this womans power, depriving her both of liberty and treasure, but the euent will tell, that she was not alwaies buied at her distaffe, or in her deuotion. The search of the motives is necessary in a History, especially in famous actions, but the doubtfull coniectures are free to euery mans iudgement. This is all the certainty of this action.

The Bourguignon being called by Isabel, leaves the siege of Corbeil, lodgerh his footmen in the townes of Beaufe, that were most fauorable vnto him, and with his horse

(which were about ten thousand) he goes into Touraine, when as behold (the Queene, being one morning at her deuotion in the Abbie of Marmoufrier, according to her custome) he arriues with his horlemen at an houre appointed. He meetes the Queene, receiues her, and enters the Citie with her, without any difficultie, hauing first cunningly seized vpon the gates. Being entred, hee proclaimes an exemption of charges in the Queenes name, and (being accompanied by the people) he presents himselfe before the Castle, which opens vnto the Queene, being exceeding glad, to see her selfe at liberty and to command freely. She referres her selfe wholly vnto the Bourguignons will, who likewise seeks to vie her name to make his designs more plausible. Hauing therefore assured Tours they march to Chartres, a more conuenient towne for their affaires, lying so neere vnto Paris. Being there, & hauing assembled all the Clergy, Nobility, the three estates, and such Citie as they could of their faction, hee cauleth Philip of Morueliers to make knowe vnto them, That by reason of the ill government of the Realme, through the great weaknesse of the King her husband, and according to the degree whereunto God had raised her, being Queene of France, she desired infinitely to reforme it. And the rather for that Charles her sonne (corrupted by the ill counsell of the enemies of the State) shewed her not the duty of a child, to her griefe. So as to prouide good and wholesome remedies for the prelauation of the State, and for the seruice of the King her husband, by the good aduice of her cousin the Duke of Bourgongne, a prince of the blood, she declares her selfe Regent of France. The which was pleasing vnto them all, with this title: Isabel by the grace of God, Queene of France, hauing by reason of the King my Lords infirmity the government and administration of the Realme, by an irrenocable grant, made vnto us by our said Lord and his Councell. And for confirmation of this new authority, she caused a seale to be made, whereon was grauen her image, standing right vp, with her armes hanging downe to the earth, as one without comfort and requiring helpe: on the one side were the armes of France, and on the other, that of France and Bawaria quartered, with these words. This is the seale of Causes, Soueraignties and Appellations for the King.

The Queene declares her selfe Regent of France.

There were two Soueraigne Courts of Iustice erected, one at Amiens, and the other at Troy in Champagne, with expresse charge not to goe to Paris. The office of Constable was giuen to the Duke of Lorraine, by the deprivation of the Earle of Armagnac, and the Chancellorship of France to Eustache of Laistre, by the giuing ouer of Henry of Marle. As these things began to kindle a new fire of miseries, there were certaine Bishops which labored to reconcile the Queene and Daulphin. The Bourguignon accepts of the motion: but the Constable of Armagnac breaks off the treaty. An article which shall make him more odious with the people. The Bourguignon hauing retired his army, and put his men into garrison, goes into Sauoy, where at that time the Emperour Sigismund was,

A (who erected the Earledome of Sauoy into a Duchie) and there did conferre with him at Mommellian. This was not without some great designe.

In his absence Philip of Bourgongne his sonne held a Parliament to resolue vpon the meanes to make warre with more aduantage. Thus the Bourguignon wrought for his part. The Daulphin seeing the fields freed and without any enemy, thinkes good that the Constable of Armagnac should besiege Senlis, and the better to countenance his armes, the King himselfe goes with the army. The Towne being prest, they take a day to yeeld, if by the 17 of April they be not releued. John of Luxembourg (whom the Bourguignon had left in Picardy, for the fury of those places) gathers together what troopes he can, and comes at the day prefixed: at which time the townes-men made a great sally vpon the Kings campe, fying their tents and pauillions. The Constable (moued with this affront) cuts off the heads of foure of their hostages, and they kill fix and fortie of his men that were prisoners. In the meane time John of Luxembourg approacheth towards Creil, meaning to fight with the Constable, vying him by sundry skirmishes, hauing sent Charlot Daillie towards Dampmartin with a good troope to stop the passage.

The siege of Senlis.

The Constable (fearing the euent of a battaile, being loth to hazard the King) would not ioyne, but desirous to find some honest colour to auoyde the fight, he sends a trumpet, to know who commanded these troopes. And vnderstanding it was John of Luxembourg, he answered in a brauery. Seeing it is neither the Duke of Bourgongne, nor his Sonne, they are not for vs, let vs goe to Paris. So he retunes without fighting, whether the chiefe of his affaires drew him, not fore-seeing the mischief which attended him, by reason of this retreat, being too preiudiciall to his honour: for the Parisians who hated him, and yet feared him for the reputation of his valor, began now to contemne him, noting in this retreat a kinde of cowardise, as hauing refused to encounter John of Luxembourg, who had so brauely offered him the battaile. The brute of this shameful departure was published by the Bourguignon faction to their masters aduantage. They inbrace this occasion being loth the peoples heart should grow cold by any better successe, observing likewise that the King, Daulphin, Constable, Chancellor, and all the chiefe of that party were at Paris, to be all surprised together. The Duke of Bourgongne was vpon his returne from Sauoy, but he departed not without good instructions from the Emperour.

But leauing the Bourguignons army in field, let vs note the estate of that great City of Paris. Perrinet Clerc a Smith; John Thibert a Broker, Perrin Bourdichon a Cooper (such were they whom the Bourguignon had made his Colonels at Paris) hauing practised all their friends with great secretie, and ingaged many, they aduertise the Lord of Lisle-Adam (who was gouernour of Ponthoife for the Bourguignon) of their enterprife: the which was to deliuer him a gate, and a good troope of the Inhabitants within the heart of the City, so as they might haue fouldiers to second their attempt. Lisle-Adam accepts thereof, and the euent was answerable to the designe: for these vnder-takers assigne him Saint Germaines gate: Perrinet had the Keyes. Lisle-Adam presents himselfe at midnight, being the houre appointed, with eight hundred armed men. He findes the gate open, and Perrinet attending him. Then he puts his men in battaile, lest hee should be taken in disorder, Perrinet shuts the gate and casts the Keyes into the ditch: and then without any noyse, he marcheth with this troope to the lesser Chastelet, where he had left a squadron of foure hundred men vnder the great vault, to lye more couertly.

Lisle-Adam hauing ioyned his troope with the Citizens (so as the one might assist the other, hee sends forth diuers troopes to giue the alarm in diuers quarters of the City, with charge to moue the people to armes. Euery troop marcheth speedily to his quarter, crying out with a terrible voyce in the dead of the night, Rise good people, peace, peace, God save the King and the good Duke of Bourgongne. At this noyse all rise, some to hide themselves, others to arme: so as in short time a great multitude (being armed) wander vp and downe the streets ready to fight. Their Captaines appoint them what houses of the Armagnacs they should force. The first troop must seize vpon the King; but before all was ready, the alarm was generall. Such as had most interest are soonest vp. Tannequoy of Chastel, prouost of Paris (a very trusty seruant to the Daulphin) wraps him in a sheet and carries him into the Bastile. A good Ieuaine which shall one day raise the dow, and the hand of him that kneads it. Some others also retired themselves thither, which shall serue in this Seecane. John Louet, Robert Masson, the Vicont of Naibone and Bouciquant.

The King taken.

The Chancellor taken.

The Constable taken.

The Dauphin saves himself.

The Dauphin secret to recover Paris.

The Constable of Armagnac in a disguised weed saues himselfe in a neighbours house. A But all this troope flies to the Kings lodging at S. Pol. These Tribunes cause this poore sickle Prince to rise, without any respect: they force him to promise what they please, and to ride through the Citie, crying, God save the King, and peace: thinking by his presence to increase their troope, and to countenance their confusion.

This done, every troope seeks his quarter, and many are taken. The Chancellor of Marle is surprised in his lodging, and Raimond de la Guerre, who were good supporters of the Armagnac faction: many Presidents, Councillors, and masters of the Accompt were taken without any respect of persons. The Cardinals of Barre and Saint Marc, the Archbishop of Reims, the Bishops of Senlis, Bayeux and Constance, were carryed away and imprisoned: all the prisons are filled with honorable persons. But what is become of the Dauphin and Constable? They search, they hunt in all places; yet finding nothing, they command by sound of trumpet, that every man should presently vpon paine of death discover the Armagnacs. The Dauphin was safe, but the Constable (discovered by his Host) is taken, carried away by one of these Tribunes and imprisoned; hee was in danger as he past through the streets, riding behinde him that had him in guard.

This was the night spent untill day, yet without any murder; and it seemes this was by commandement. This hapned in the yeare 1418, the 25 of May, a pleasant day, the fore-runner of a mournfull Winter. The Dauphin having escaped this danger miraculously by the good aduice of Tamargay of Chastell, he resolves to doe his best in retiring himselfe else where, and not to hazard his person with this furious and murderous people. By the faithfull meanes of this good seruant, hee goes forth secretly in the night, and slips into Melun, leaping from place to place, like a bird that flies from bough to bough. From Melun he goes to Nemours, whether he sends for his most trully servants, of whose helpe hee had neuer greater need. The Marshall of Rieux comes vnto him with many of the Nobilitie: they consult of the meanes to recover Paris before it be surprised with fouldiers.

So they gather together fifteene hundred horse with all speed. The Marshall of Rieux hath the charge to lead them: while the Dauphin preserves the fortune of France in safety. A dangerous enterprise, which had no successe, but the honour to haue attempted. A thing altogether impossible, the which was executed with much lesse losse then the danger was great. The B. de held Saint Anthouies gate sure, for the Dauphine. The Marshall of Rieux enters it with his troopes, and marcheth boldly to the Kings lodging, but hee finds it empty, the king being retired to the Louvre. The alarm is given throughout the whole city, they must thinke of their retreat, stones, tyles, arrowes, and all things else flie from the houses & windowes, the chaires are drawne, and the streets full of armed men: all cry kill the Armagnacs. The Marshall of Rieux leads his men happily in this retreat, and hearing Saint Anthouies gate hee draws them forth so closely, as he escapes this great and imminent danger with little losse.

This alarm had put the people into armes, who hauing chased their enemies out of the heart of their city, were quiet for that time, expecting some further command from the Bourguignon, and an end of this terrible tumult: whilst they take breath, others are drawne into the like murdrie by their example. All the townes of Picardie, fauouring the Bourguignon greatly, make bonfires. Compiegne, Creil, Saint Maxance, Mouchy le Preux, Pont a Chotay, Neion, Laen, Soissons, Chauny, Peronne and Gisors (expelling their garisons) declare themselves of his party. Some dayes are spent thus quietly, since the first taking of prisoners.

But behold a new tumult like vnto a violent wind, which chanced the twelfth of Iune. In the morning all the people arme by the command of their Leaders. This furious multitude goes forth of their houses (like a swarme of Bees creeping from their combs) armed with all sorts of weapons. In short time there are forty thousand men assembled in the streets and market places. John of Luxembourg, Jamies of Harcourt, the Vidame of Amiens, Lisle Adam, Possence, Chaffellus, Coben, Lambour the new prouost of Paris, (with many others most trusty seruants to the Bourguignon,) are on horse-back in troopes, to second this multitude on foote, ready to fight as in a day of battaile, when as about foure of the clocke (like as when the heauens darkned with thick clouds, and the ayre overcast, the thunder tumbling in the ayre, suddenly when the lightning appears, the crack breaks forth

A torch and teares a Towers top) this furious multitude, flocking from all parts of the City with a silent stillnesse, burst forth into diuers parts. They open the prisons and kill such as they meet, without any pity.

They murder Taylors, their wives and children, men and maides, but especially the poore prisoners are their obiect. In this tumult all crie, all howle, all are amazed. The confused cries of the murderers and murdered rebound vp to heauen. The Constable of Armagnac, and Henry of Marle (being brought forth with shoutes and reproches) are beaten downe and laid by for the triumph. The Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Xaintes, and the Abbot of Saint Cornille got the faway. The Earle of Grandpre, Raimond de la Guerre, Helior of Chartres, Enguerand of Marcouilly, Charles Poupard, the Officers of the Court of Parliament, Chambers of Accompt, Requeits and Treasure, to conclude, all that are of any account are massacred. The blood runs through the City, the streetes and walls overflow. The noted Armagnacs are thus murdered, but the fury of this mad multitude extends farther, even against such as had bene with them, and of their owne faction: for many affectionate Bourguignons were beaten downe, every man seeks his enemy to kill him vnder this pretext. The rascalls fell vpon the rich, and killing them as Armagnacs, they spoile their houses, as a lawfull prey of their conquest. The eye of this furious multitude spares neither sexe, age, nor quality. The Duke of Bourgongnes followers are lookers on of this spectacle, and watch that none escape.

The History makes mention of fixteene hundred cruelly murdered on this miserable day, noted to the dishonour of these detestable murderers, and to the griefe of France, to see her owne bowells thus defiled with her blood, and her memorie blemished with this crueltie. This furie continued from foure of the clocke on the twelfth day, vntill tenne the next day, nothing ceasing for the nights rest. These madde men (hauing refreshed themselves) seek out the rest to finish their most cruell worke.

The prisoners of the great Chastelet made resistance against their fury: they are besieged, forced and massacred, the greatest part are cast from the toppes of the Towre, and fall vpon their pikes, halberds and other weapons. The bodies of the Constable and Chancellor, lying naked vpon the stones, are caried to the marble table in the palace D. hall. To note the Constable by his accustomd carie, they flea a bend of his skine and yeie it about his body. This spectacle is drawne about the City three daies together, and then caried out in a dung-cart, to a place where they cast all their carion and filth, without any buriall.

The Bourguignon was at Digion during this tumult at Paris, who was presently advertised thereof. The History saies, that he seemed very glad of the taking of the City, but very sorry for the murder of the prisoners; but God, who kept a true register, shall one day put him in minde thereof. And in truth, he that shall duly consider all the circumstances of this confusion, cannot imagine, but it was done by his command. He gathers all the forces he can together, to guard the Queene to Paris, as it were in triumph. The Parisians meet him with great pompe, they offer him their most affectionate seruice, and present the Duke of Bourgongne and the Earle of Saint Pol his brother with purple velvet gownes, pondired with Saint Andrews croises, the which at their requests they presently put on, and so (drawing neere the Queenes coach) they enter the city of Paris, the people attending at their entry, and crying, God save the King and the good duke of Bourgongne, the Coach being couered with flowers which they cast vpon it. And this was the Queenes and the duke of Bourgongnes entry after the massacre.

But this Parisian ioy was soone returned into heauinesse, for within three moneths after this butchery, the plague entred the City, and slue about fourescore thousand persons in three moneths. The History obserues, that Perinet and his companions (after they had eaten what they had gathered together by spoyle) perished miserably, little enioying their thefts. Most of the Noblemen and Gentlemen which had assisted these murderers died of the plague, except Lisle Adam, who was referred to receiue his punishment from Henry of England, although vpon another occasion, as you shall see hereafter. And was not this God who reuenged this crueltie? But let vs returne to our discourse, for seeing the punishment was so sudden, we might not well remit the rehearsal to any other place. Charles looks but coldly vpon his wife, whom hee loved not, neither in health nor sicknesse. Hee welcomes the Duke of Bourgongne with a cheerefull countenance, nance who had wonne his heart, by framing himselfe to his weaknesse with milde speeches, shewes of honour and apparant humility, impressions of common sense, wherof phrensie for the most part doth not deprive madde men.

The Kings Councell assembled presently, many things were propounded the first day, they beggan with Officers, the Constables place was confirmed to the Duke of Lorrain, and the Chancellorship to Eustache de Laistre. Lisle Adam and Chastellans are made Marshalls of France, for their well deserting at the massacre at Paris. Our Bourguignon creates Charles of Lens Admirall of France, being Captaine of Paris; and Philip of Monuilliers the Queenes Advocate, first president of the Court of Parliament.

The English raise all Normandy.

During this confusion, Henry King of England makes other worke. Hee was in Normandy, taking townes and castles without any resistance. Touques (a castle held impregnable) was forced by him, during the passions of our mad-man, as the first fruits of his conquests, Louviers, Pont Larche, Caen, Cherebourg, Falaiffe, Argenton, Alençon, Constance, Saint Lo, and other places followed, to make the way open to Rouen without any great difficulty.

Rouen is besieged in a manner the very day of the massacre at Paris. Henry doth assault it with all the force and policy he can, as the Dongcon and chiefest strength of all Normandy. The citizens give a testimony of good and faithfull subiects by their valour and constancy. They demand succours from the King, with a protestation of the event. The Count makes shew to stirre & to provide for their defence, but what remedy can the dead give unto the sicke?

In the end, after all their resistance, seeking to maintaine themselves vnder the obedience of France, Rouen yeeldeth to Henry King of England vpon hard conditions. To pay him three hundred sixty five thousand crownes of gold, and three citizens at his choise to doe his pleasure with. And so he suffered them to enjoy their priuiledges. Of the three which he had chosen to punish, he pardoned two, and caused Alain Blanchet, Captaine of the commons to be beheaded, worthy to be eternized in our History, dying for the seruice of his King and country, in a time so famous for so desperate a confusion. The sequell was great, for not onely all the townes of Normandy yeeld vnto him, but also the Isle of France was so amazed, as all obey him euen to the gates of Paris, where the fury of our miserable dissensions prepared a Throne for the sworn enemy of our Realme.

I am weary to report our shamefull losses, as reuiuing our old sores. Henry might haue grauen in his triumph, I came, I saw, and overcame: onely Mont Saint Michel in Normandy was maintained vnder the obedience of our Crowne, through the valour of some Gentlemen Normans, whose names the history owes to posterity. John of Montfort Duke of Britanie (seeing this happy successe) makes composition with the English, shrowding himselfe vnder his protection, but he shall soone leaue him, when a more happy season shall make him turne to the Dauphin. In this shipwracke the Queene and the Bourguignon had meanes to glut their ambition and fury at Paris, beholding the ruine of France, hoping that in all extremities they should make their peace with the King of England at their Countreys cost, hauing a Daughter for a pawne and confirmation of this accord.

The Bourguignon treats with the English but in vain

They send Ambassadors to Henry King of England being a conqueror, and for a baite they carry the portrait of Katherine of France, the Kings daughter, a Princess of excellent beauty, who must likewise bee the leuain of our miserie. But Henry finding this figure to be faire, desires to see the essentiall substance, so as the Queene and the Bourguignon (gouerning the spirit of this poore sicke King) conducts him in person with his daughter, to their enemy nere to Meulan, to aduise of a meanes for a generall Peace; but they departed without any conclusion, by reason of the great demands which Henry made, putt vp with this victorious successe, seeking to sell his friendship at too high a rate. Yet the Image of Katherine had made an impression in his heart, being much discontented that they had refused her with these conditions.

He growes discontented, and cile him-

The Bourguignon likewise found lesse kindnesse then he expected, and returned malecontent, for that Henry (putt vp with these fortunate incounters, and caried away with hope of future victory) spake more proudly then the Bourguignons humour could well digest, which was the cause of his distemperature: for Henry said in his choler, That

A he would haue both daughter and Realme, whosoever said nay, and that there was no sufficient security for what they promised, seeing the Dauphin did not consent therunto. A pill which the Bourguignon could not easily swallow. So he chawed vpon this speech of the English, which drew him to his ruine, for euen then he began to study by what meanes hee might reconcile himselfe vnto the Dauphin, hoping to finde a better composition with a young Prince his kinsman, and weary of the wartes, then with the English growne insolent by his victories. Charles was not quiet in mind, fearing lest in these treaties they should conclude something to his prejudice. So as they both inclined to an accord, but vpon diuers causes, to oppose against their common enemy with a common force. But before B we shew the effect of this common desire, wee must see both the estate of our Dauphin (since he retired himselfe from Paris) and of the Bourguignon, since he became Tribune of the people.

Although this terrible storme might haue shaken the young yeeres of the Dauphin Charles, vnacquainted with the affaires of the world, and his disposition (inclining to pleasure) seemed vnfit to endure much paine and toyle: yet the effects at need shewed his constant resolution against all difficulties. They attribute this constancy and resolution to the faithfull counsell of his seruants, yet was it much for him to follow it. Tannequoy of Chastell, John Louvet President of Provence, the Viscount of Narbone, and Robert Massier were those which serued him most for Councell in the beginning, but God soone after did raise him vp strong hands to manage armes courageously and valiantly, la Hire, Polshon of Saint Treille (whom commonly they call Zinnailles), the bastard of Orleans, with other braue and fortunate Captaines, which shall bee famous in the course of our Historie.

But the Realme was strangely diuided into these factions. The Kings authority and the capitall City were for the Queene and the Bourguignon. Picardy, Bourguigne, and many townes in Bry, Champagne and Beausse obey them absolutely after these massacres. Only Sens in Bourguigne held out, the which they could not pull from the Dauphin. The Prince of Orange (of the Bourguignon faction) makes war for him in Dauphin and Languedoc, to crosse the affaires of our Charles, who notwithstanding had the greatest part D of the Country at his deuotion, with the friendship of Auignon, and of the Earldome of Venaisioin or Venise. The English possessed all Normandy, and a great part of Guienne; but Rochel, Poitiers, Saint John D'Angely, Angoulême, Fontenay, and some other townes acknowledged the Dauphin. All Aniou was his, Auvergne, Berry, Bourbonois, Forest and Lionois obeyed him, so as they are deceiued which thinke that hee onely held the City of Bourges in those dayes, vnder colour that his enemies called him King of Bourges, because he made his chiefe residence there, when as his mother called her selfe Regent. He likewise tooke vpon him the name of Regent: A name which fortified his title with great authority, and did countenance his affaires in those difficulties and confusions.

E The Queene and the Bourguignon laboured by all meanes to winne him, they sent him his wife honorably attended, with all her iewels, promising him his place with respect and obedience; but their meaning was to bee rid of him, not able to know how to conforme him to their humours. In keeping himselfe far from them, hee preferred his head for the Crowne; the which attended him; he prevented the ambitious designs of his enemy, and made himselfe to be more respected throughout the Realme.

At these horrible massacres, his Captaines ronzed vp their spirits. Boquianx seized on Champagne, Pierre Fons, and Soissons for him, who (molesting Picardy, and the Isle of France with their daily roades) held Paris in iacalouse. He himselfe had part of the honour in the execution of these conquests, not leaving all to his seruants, for he leapt out of F Aniou into Touraine, besieged and tooke the City of Tours. The Duke of Britany seeing the happy successe of the Dauphins affaires, leaues the English, and ioynes with the Dauphin, as the strongest part.

Behold the estate of our Dauphin, who growes constant and resolute amidst these tempests, and what was the estate of our Bourguignon? In the beginning his partisans were all fire and flame, for the zeale of his seruice; but finding not what they expected at his hands, or any successe in his affaires, but rather the discommodities of Paris and other places vnder his obedience to encrease; this heat abated daily, finding by experience, that the cause of these warres was light, being but humours and private quarrels, very prejudiciall to the State, the which the English did sappe, vndermine, and ruine, seizing daily vpon whole Prouinces, without any difficulty.

The people grow in dislike with the Bourguignon.

Thus Henries victories were plaine demonstrations to the most passionate, to discourage the Bourguignons dissembling: for, who sees not but his end was to gouerne, to the ruine of France? In the end euery one coming to his right wits, findes that of a Frenchmen he is become an Englishman. The folly or fury of a faction could not mortifie the feeling of lawfull obedience, vnder which they were borne. To what end (sayes the common sort of these cleere-sighted) shall we vndoe our selues, for the passions of the Duke of Bourgongne, opposing himselfe against the lawfull heyre of the Crowne? Thus the Bourguignon sees the affections of his partakers to grow daily cold. A worme which tormented him hourly, hauing grounded his chiefe hopes vpon their constancies, who promised to stand firmly to him at all euents.

Doubtlesse, whatsoever the Gyants of States haue imagined, setting one hill vpon another, the Pyrennees vpon the Alpes, with all the Appenin, to scale the throne of the French Monarchy, promising vnto themselves euents according to the moulds of their imaginations, yet cannot the French yeeld to any strangers command, no more then to change nature and become a stranger.

But to encrease the Bourguignons hearts griefe, his chiefe instrument not onely failes him, but is ready to turne violently against him. For what hath he not attempted to win the loue of this multitude at Paris, and of the greatest Cities of the Realme, making them helpe, that he burnt with zeale of their good, and the publike weale, the onely end of all his designs; feeding them with these goodly and popular promises of exemption of charges and impositions? But they beginne all to mutine, seeing he spake one thing, and did thinke another, and oppressed them more then those whom he had condemned as the causes of publike oppressions: for what yeer he imagined, yet had hee need of money. For how could he else make warre? how could he entertaine his great traine? his partisans, and his reputation among strangers? and where should he rayse it, but vpon such as obeyed him? to seeke it at such as could resist, were to mistake, and to make his reckoning alone in vaine. Moreover, this people (whom hee had so much countenanced, making themselves masters by his power, to become by their means master of his enemies) would be generally obeyed, and why not of the Bourguignon? seeing hee had opposed himselfe, and prescribed a Law to a sonne of France? If the Bourguignon doth worse then he hath done, shall not the people reduce him vnto reason? Hee hath promised exemptions of subsidies, and they are more grievous then before. Wee haue preuailed (say they) against a Constable, against a Chancellor of France, yea ouer the King and Queene, making them to yeld her brother, and most trusty seruants, and shall we not suppress some few gallants, seruants to the Duke of Bourgongne? This was the Parisians ordinarie discourse: and their Tribunes (who were not so well entertained as before) beginne to mutine. They resolue to seize vpon some of the Bourguignons Favorites, & to punish them, who had perswaded him to renew the impositions, contrary to his promise.

These men (the concealing of whose names, notes the baseness of their qualities) hauing intelligence of this search, fled into the Bastile, and the people follow after as if they would overthrow it. A great multitude begins to vndertake it, and had preuailed, if the Bourguignon had not instantly come much discontented, who seeing himselfe enuironed with so great a troope of armed men, fearing the losse of his head, he was forced to deliuer his seruants to the people, who put them all to death, to teach the Bourguignon that they had no lesse authority and power ouer him, then ouer the King, and the Dauphin his sonne. This occasion thrusts the people into greater fury, who (being thus armed) choose a Head, called Cappeluche Bourrel, to finish their executions vpon some such as might recuite these impositions and publike charges. They march through the City, and enter into many houses to rob and spoile vnder colour of apprehending of such as had assisted at these innovations. The rich men feared for their owne particulars, but the Bourguignon more then all, knowing himselfe to be the author of this disorder, hauing thrust the people into armes: for what successe should this disordered libertie haue, but to fall vpon the authors thereof? Hauing therefore wonne some of the chiefe

A Commanders, they choose out a troope of the most willfull munitious, to bee freed of them, vnder colour of sending them to the warre against the Dauphinois, which had surprised the cattle of Montleher, and began to run euery to the gates of Paris. Yet they retained Cappeluche Bourrel, vnder colour of some speciall seruice. But the Bourguignon being growne the stronger, with the chiefe of the City, he causeth Bourrel to bee taken and hanged, with some number of his associates. This multitude being at Montleher, discontented with the Bourguignon, leaues the siege, and returns to be reuenged: but the gates were shut, and the wals well guarded, so as all passed without any more adoe. But the Bourguignon was much perplexed, being troubled in mind to haue put a sword into a madmans hand: being afraid of an vnure guard, and a foretelling that his Empire should not continue long.

So, the repulse he receiued from the English, the coldnesse of the Nobility of his party, and the peoples change, were the moitiues which made him wish for the Dauphins friendship, who now preuented him, although he had often refused it. That which moued Charles thereunto, was necessity, and the hope of a greater designe, finding no better means to stop the current of the English victorie, and the Bourguignons treacherie, then to ioine with him, attending some better occasion. The successe fauoured this counsell of his followers. He sends Tannequy of Chastel to the Duke of Bourgongne, to make the first proposition, and after him the Lady of Giac (in whom the Bourguignon had great confidence) to appoint a day and place for a parlee, and to seeke the meanes of a good peace. They meet at Pouilly the strong, neere vnto Melun, in the open field with their guards. The Bourguignon talked to the Dauphin, on his knee, & held his stirrop, although Charles refused this submission. Proofoes to shew with what necessity he sought his friendship, as a man that is beaten with all winds and out of breath. So they conclude an inuolable peace, and to bandy themselves against the common enemy of France, promises are made on either side, with all demonstrations and protestations of a firme and inuolable friendship. The Articles of their accord and contract are set downe at large in the original of our History. This peace betwixt Charles the Dauphin, and John Duke of Bourgongne, was made neere to Pouilly the strong, vpon Ponthiel, a league from Melun, in the year 1419. All France reioyced, as after a long and sharpe winter, when the Sunne appeareth in a pleasant Spring. The King and all the Parliaments ratified this accord, which euery man held for the gage of firme friendship betwixt these Princes, and their loue for a firme pillar of the Realmes quiet. But the prouidence of the protector of this French Monarchy had otherwise decreed. These reconciliations could not serue for sufficient cautions against his iustice, worthily incensed against the Bourguignon, being guilty of horrible crimes, and the willfull abuse of his patience. The course which Charles held to be rid of his enemy, is not commendable: but in one and the selfe-same worke, we must wisely distinguish of that which is of God, and that which is of man, to approue the good which is alwayes iustified in Gods ordinances, and to blame the ill, alwayes to be blamed in man: that we may stop our mouthes, and open our eyes, and not reply against the iudgements of God, but view the strange and extraordinary punishment of the Bourguignons strange and extraordinary crimes, who during the weakness of our poore King, hath so much troubled the Realme.

We haue said (and the course of the History will shew it very plainly) that the Dauphin Charles suffered himselfe to be gouerned by his seruants. By their aduice hee had made this accord with the Bourguignon, wherein they had either of them severall respects: although eithers intent was to make his profit with the others losses, in circumventing of his companion. But he that made his account to deceiue (hauing not yet changed his mind, although the present necessity made him to change his countenance) was deceived: and which is more, he which built his greatest designs vpon murder, is murdered, being the onely expedient the Dauphins seruants could deuise to free him from their troubles, in dispatching the Bourguignon once for all.

The resolution was very great, but to perswade this Prince thereunto, was of greater difficulty. A young man, iust, wise, moderate and of a very milde disposition, so as they had much adoe to perswade him to so bold and violent a remedy. Why my Lord (say they) can you beleue that the Duke of Bourgongne is any thing amended? although hee stoop now to necessity, can he bend his heart to reason? haue you forgotten what hee did to your deceased vncle the Duke of Orleans, when as he held the same degree that you doe now? did he not kill him, and maintained it as well done? braued the King in Paris, armed himselfe against him, and forced him to iustifie this execrable murder? Hee masked himselfe with a shew of good meaning, to make his accord with your poore Cousins of Orleans, but was it not with an intent to ruine them with the more facility, seeking to diuide them from your deceased vncle the Duke of Berry, incensing the King and your eldest brother against them, making Edicts against them, as guilty of high treason, and pursuing them with cruell force; when as your brother (discouering his wickednesse) had forsaken him, and that he (yeelding to necessity as he doth now) concluded a peace: did he not arme himselfe by a new deuice, to ruine your blood, opposing both Paris and the States of the Realme, vnder the name of the Common- weale, to put to death the best seruants of the King your father, incensing the people against them, being the furious executioners of this execrable rage? And when as he found these popular furies not to succeed well, hath he not fled to force? yea seeing his great enemy your cousin of Orleans prisoner, and your vncle of Berry dead, hath he mortified his cruell designs in these common calamities? He hath rather stirred vp the Emperour to trouble the State, laboured to draw your deceased brother Iohn to his humour, to kindle new fires, and to consume you in them. You (my Lord) are he who onely troubles him, who onely may frustrate his designs, and therefore he strues to take away your head, and set your Crowne vpon his: what hath he not attempted against you? His last actions are worse then the first: there he sought to abuse your brother with your cousins, here hee opposeth your mother against you. There he did openly fight against the law of State, here he doth openly oppugne the law of nature. There (by his policy) he did nourish ialousie betwixt kinsmen, here by his audacious violence he teares in funder the womb wherein you did lie, to ruine the State. For to what end doth he giue the regency to your mother, (the King your father liuing) and you being borne Regent during his life, and King after his death? To what end should he flye to a furious multitude, to decide your controuersies? He hath armed forty thousand men in the capitall City of your Realme, and accompanied them with his men-at-arms. To what end serued all that, but to make a tragicall conclusion of his violent passions? why did he cause that massacre to be made when you were in the City, and sought for you so carefully, but to vse you as they did your Constable and Chancellor, and as many of your good seruants as fell into their hands? And after all these exploits, the Bourguignon must call the English King into France, to giue him your sister in marriage: rather to take your Crowne from you by peece-meales: for seeing hee cannot haue it all, hee seeks to diuide it. This is the apple for the which he sows so much dissention. The law reiects him, and he appeales to faith, to shadow himselfe with her cloake, and to deceiue you with more open shew. He therefore kisseth your hand, he kneeles, he holds your stirrop, to hide his treachery with a shew of humility. Will you beleeeue (my Lord) that he is in bad teames with the King of England? They ayne both at one common object. They haue sworne both to take away your life, but the Bourguignon may effect that which the English cannot. And that which they cannot worke by open force, they pretend to effect by policy, couering it with this goodly shew of peace. What effects hath he giuen you of this reconciliation? what towne hath he rendered? nay, what men hath he dismissed? Continuing still in armes he discouers his intent: he meanes to ruine you with his Forces, being lodged in your bowels. His designs being well knowne vnto you (my Lord) will you suffer him to preuent you? We ought to watch for you and seeke the meanes to crosse him. It is lawfull to repell craft by policy. Faith is a holy thing, but who can with reason gaine-say, if a thiefe denies his name to circumuent vs, but that it is lawfull to surpriue him with his owne armes? To draw an enemy into a mischief which hee had prepared for a good man, is no trechery, but wisdom; especially when there is question to preserve the State. Are you (my Lord) a private person? All this great bodie (whereof God hath made you the head) stretcheth forth the armes, and craues your aide against this thiefe, which hath sworne the ruine thereof. He attends but the houre to dispatch you, and to seize thereon. The safest counsell is to preuent him: your enemies head shall preserve yours, and all your good and faithfull subiects. My Lord, we protest there is no priuate interest of ours, all is yours, and the publike-weales. The faith we haue vowed vnto you, commands vs to deliuer our free aduice. We haue liued, doe liue, and will

A line, your faithfull seruants, euen vnto the death. The heart makes the mouth to speake, but our hands shall execute your commandements.

The Dauphin (encouraged by these persuasions of his seruants) resolues. Wee haue said, that he parted from Tours, to parlee with the Bourguignon; but after that accord, he made a voyage into Berry to assure those places, and to leaue men, in shew to ioyne with him, and to oppose against the English with their common forces, but in effect it was for the murder of his greatest enemy. He had then twenty thousand fighting men with him. With this troope he comes into Soulogne, approaching neere vnto those places where his men might best be employed. Montreuil-saur-Yonne (a towne in Bry, where the Riuier of Yonne loseth her name, ioyning with Seine) held for him. From thence he sends Tannequy of Chastel (a very sufficient man of his household, and his trusty seruant) to Troies in Champagne, to the duke of Bourgongne, desiring him to come vnto him to Montreuil, to resolute vpon the effecting of their accord, and to employ their common forces against their common enemy, hauing brought them to that end, protesting that he should be much grieved to see them burthen some vnto the people without vse. Moreover, hee had some very priuate affaires to impart vnto him, as vnto his best and dearest friend.

Tannequy had no other answer from the Bourguignon, but that it were better for the Dauphin to come to Troies to the King and Queene, his father and mother, to conclude things in their presence, and by their authority, the which should be very necessary, to reduce the affaires to some good course. Some dayes are spent in refusing and re-intreating. The Bourguignons conscience caused him to feare, & the proceeding was suspicious; but that the apparent dislike betwixt the mother and the sonne, needed the mediation of such a friend as the Bourguignon. This was a goodly pretext, to draw the Duke of Bourgongne to be a mediator of peace betwixt the Queene and the Dauphin; and the charge of their armies (being idle) was not small, the which urged this enteruiew. The Lady of Giac (of whom we haue spoken) was employed againe to sollicite this treaty. So as the Bourguignon comes to Bray vpon Seine, whither the Dauphin sent the Bishop of Valence vnto him, he was brother to Charles of Poitiers, Bishop of Langres, in whom he had great confidence. This Bishop had in the end power to perswade him to goe to Montreuil, where the Dauphin attended him. The Bourguignon goes accompanied with five hundred horse, two hundred Archers, and many Noblemen, among the which was Charles the eldest sonne of the Duke of Bourbon, whom the Duke of Bourgongne had corrupted to weaken the Dauphins party, being a Prince of the blood. The Dauphin had prepared the Castle for the Bourguignon, but he vnfurnished it of all munition for warre and victuall, and caused the bridge to be fortified with three turnepikes, to stop their free entrance into the towne, whither the Bourguignon must come by duty vnto the Dauphin. This succeeded according to his designe, but it caried the shew of an enemy. The Bourguignon sends three gentlemen of his household to the Dauphin, Theoullangeon, Ernoy, and Soubreier to aduertise him of his coming. They giue him notice of the two Barricades made vpon the bridge, and wish him not to aduenture. Hauing referred it to his Council, all being on horsebacke, he resolues in the end to passe on: hee lights at the Castle where his lodging was assigned, and sets his guards at the entry of the gate towards the towne. Here vpon Tannequy of Chastel comes vnto him, who after due reuerence flured him from the Dauphin, saying, that he attended him at the bridge foot, at the towne gate.

Then Iohn of Bourgongne, hauing chosen out ten of his most trusty followers, (Charles of Bourbon, the Lords of Nouaille, Fribourg, S. George, Montagu, Vergy, Ancre, Pontauillier, Lens, Giac, and his Secretary Seguinat) he approacheth to the first barre, where he encounters with some from our Charles, who entreat him to enter vpon his masters word, and assure him by oath. Before he enters, (as if his heart had foretold his harme) he stayes suddenly, and asks aduice of his company, who encouraging him to passe on, he enters the second barre, the which was presently lockt, and then hee caused some to goe before him, and some behind, he remaining in the midst. Tannequy of Chastel comes to receive him, and the Duke laying his hand vpon his shoulder very familiarly: This is he (sayes the Duke) in whom I trust. I will conclude this bloody Catastrophe with the very words of the Originall. And so hee approached neere vnto the Dauphin, who stood all armed with his sword by his side, leaning on a barre. Before whom hee kneeled with one knee on the ground, to doe him honour and reuerence, saluting him most humbly. Whereat the Daulphin answered nothing, making him no shew of loue, but charged him with the breach of his promise, for that he had not caused the warre to cease, nor drawne his men out of garison, as he had promised. Then Robert de Loire tooke him by the right arme and said, Rise, you are but too honourable. The Duke hauing one knee on the ground and his sword about him, which hung not to his mind, somewhat too farre backe, kneeling downe he laid his hand on his sword to pull it forward for his ease. Robert said vnto him, Doe you lay your hand vpon your sword before my Lord the Daulphin? At which words Tannequy of Chaffell drew nere vnto him on the other side, who making a signe, sayd, It is time; striking the Duke with a little axe so violently on the face, as he cut off his chin, and so he fell on his knees. The Duke feeling himselfe thus wounded, laid his hand on his sword to draw it, thinking to rise and defend himselfe: but he was presently charged on his sword to draw it, thinking to rise and defend himselfe: but he was presently charged by Tannequy and others, and beaten dead to the ground. And suddenly one named Oliuer Layet, with the helpe of Peter Fortier, thrusts a sword into his belly vnder his coat of maile. Whilest this was doing, the Lord of Nouailles drew his sword halfe out, thinking to defend the Duke: but the Vicount of Narbonne held a dagger, thinking to strike him. Nouailles leaping forcibly to the Vicount, wrested the dagger from him, being so fore hurt in the hinder part of the head, as he fell downe dead. Whilest this was acting, the Daulphin (leaning on the other side of the barre) beholding this strange sight, retired backe as one amazed, and was presently conducted to his lodging by Iohn Lounet and others his Councellors. All the rest were taken except Montagu, who leaped ouer the Turnepike, and gaue the alarme. There were none slaine vpon the place, but Iohn Duke of Bourgongne and Nouailles: S. George and d'Anere were hurt. The Dukes men charged home vnto the Turnepike, but they were easily repulsed. His troops retiring to Brayac pursued by the Daulphinois, with losse, and in the end the Castle is abandoned by him that had it in guard. The Dukes bodie (stript of all but his doublet and boots) is drawne into a Mill, and the next day buried. This happened the tenth of September, in the year 1419. Behold the end of Iohn Duke of Bourgongne. Seeing then this murder troubled the Daulphin, who had caused it to be committed, what stony heart would not be amazed therat? Truly the breach of faith is vnexcusable, howsoeuer it be disguised: for as faith is the ground of humane society, so doth it extend euen vnto enemies, with whom it must be inuolubly kept.

This blow shall be deare to Charles. Through this hole the enemy shall enter so far into the Realme, as he shall put him in danger, and in the end he shall be forced to confesse his fault not able to excuse himselfe without accusing of his Councellors. But from vnjust man, let vs ascend to the wisdom of that great Iudge of the world, who is alwayes iust. The Oracle cries, He that strikes with the sword, shall perish with the sword: and, The disloyall to the disloyall. They loved misery, and misery found them out. And wise Antiquity layes, God punisheth great wickednesse with great paine, euen in this life. And, Hardly can tyrants descend into the grave with a dry death, that is, without blood or murder. Oh iustice of God, alwayes iust, alwayes wise, and alwayes good! Thy iudgements are righteous O Lord: condemn the error of men, yet I held my peace because thou didst it. Draw the curtaine. Iohn of Bourgongne hath playd his part vpon this Theater. Hee had slaine the Duke of Orleans traiterously, and now he wallowes in his owne gore, being treacherously slaine by the Daulphin Charles. Now let vs see the care his sonne Philip Earle of Charolois had to be reuenged of Charles for this cruell murder: but all is not yet ended.

The

The Catastrophe of this miserable reigne.

Philip sonne to Iohn Duke of Bourgongne stirres up great troubles against Charles the Daulphin, in reuenge of his fathers death. By whose meanes Isabel, an vnkind mother, makes warre against Charles her sonne, and peace with Henry the first, King of England, then a capital enemy to the State. She giues him her daughter Katherine in marriage, and procures King Charles the first, her husband, to declare Henry his lawfull beyre, and to disinherite his onely sonne Charles the seventh from the Realme of France.

B During these occurrences Henry the first, and Charles the first dye, leaving the Crowne of France in question betwixt Charles the seventh, and Henry the sixth, proclaimed King of France at the Funerals of Charles the first.

From the yeare 1419, to the yeare 1422.

AFTER this tragickall and strange murder of Iohn of Bourgongne, Philip his sonne, Duke of Bourgongne, by his decaise, seekes to be reuenged vpon Charles the Daulphin, and Charles to defend himselfe. Philip was then in Flanders. The Parisians (passionate partisans of the Bourguignon) who had seene the Duke of Orleans murdered without mourning, and they themselves had massacred the chiefe officers of the Crowne, and had shed the blood of many good men for his pleasure and passion, hauing repayed the blood treacherously slaine by him in the same coyne, they now grow into a greater mutiny then if the King himselfe had bene slaine. They send their Deputies to Philip, and promise not onely to be faithfull, but to assist him with all their meanes, to reuenge the murder committed on the person of his father. And at the same instant, Montagu being escaped from the Turnpike, writes to all the Cities vnder the Bourguignons obedience, of this accident, the which he could report as an eye-witnesse. Charles on the other side writes to all the good Cities of the Realme, yelding a reason of this murder, and imputing the fault to the Bourguignons bad dealing, who would haue slaine him at a parlee, exhorting the people not to mourne for the iust execution of a man borne for the ruine of France, who had willingly thrust himselfe into this mischief: offering all his meanes to settle the Realme in peace, according to the authority whereunto God had called him. But in talking, he seekes to assure himselfe of some Countries, Stephen of Vignoles, called la Hire, and Poton of Xaintrailles, winne Crespigny in Laonois, and Caradoz of Quefne with Charles of Flauay take Roze, places very important to trouble the Cities of Picardy, where the Bourguignon was chiefly obeyed. The strong Castle of Muin opposite to Crespigny, and Roze is surprized by the industry of his seruants, and keeps all Vermandois and Laonois in alarme. This beginning caused Philip to seeke all speedy meanes to crosse Charles his proceedings, being resolute to continue what he had begunne: yet the Parisians were in some feare, pressing Philip againe not to abandon the seruants of his house, the which made him more prompt in the execution. Philip being assured of his Flemings, obtains a suspension of armes from Henry the first, King of England, and a day and place appointed to treat a generall peace betwixt the two Realmes. Then marching with his army through Picardy, hee recouers Crespigny, Roze and Muin, to the great content of his partisans: and so he arrives at Troies in Champagne, the appointed place for this Treatie.

Isabel Queene of France (a cruell Medea, and an vnnatural mother) continued her tragick choller against her sonne, who hauing defaced the common feeling of nature, did soone forget the honour she had receiued to be married into the House of France. Being thus wedded to the Bourguignons passions, shee tormented her poore husbands spirits, being exceeding weake, perswading him that his best course was to disinherite this wicked sonne, to declare his daughter heyre, and (in marrying her to the greatest King vpon the earth) to giue her likewise the Realme after his decaise, and to her issue, as descended from the blood of France. Philip comming to the King, found new worke: for presently Henry the first, King of England, concludes a peace with King Charles the first, weds Katherine his daughter, and doth obtaine by Letters Patents, that establishing a firme and free peace in both the Realmes of France and England, in regard of the marriage of Katherine of France.

The lawfull heire reiectod, and Henry the declared heire of France.

France, he is declared Regent of the Realme during the life of King Charles, to whom the title of King remains, and to Isabel his wife the title of Queene during their liues. But presently after the Kings decease, the Crowne and Realme of France with all their rights and dignities should remaine vnto him, whom King Charles the sixt calls by his Letters Patents, his misdece and welbeloveng sonne, and to his heyres in chiefe. They cause this poore sicke King to sweare vpon the holy Bible, and to promise this for him and his, with all exemptions and necessary clausies in so great and important a businesse. This goodly act (the fruit of the furious passions of ciuill war) was made at Troies the 21 of May, in the yeare 1420.

This done, the French and English forces ioyning, and marching vnder the same colours, acknowledge one Commander, and for their first exploit they winne Montfaucon-Yonne, where they take vp and bury John of Bourgongne againe, and so marching on as against Rebels, they take Melun, Meaux and Moret, and besiege Champagne. But lest matters should grow cold, Henry of England (whom they call Regent) returns to Troies, and with a goodly traine, conducts the King, Queene, and his new wife Katharine, to Paris, being better followed and serued then the King himselfe. The Parisians folly did wonderfully embrace the coming of this new Royalty, promising vnto themselves a new heauen: but this humour lasted not long, hauing tried the power of foraigne Princes, and the command of their Kings by very contrary effects.

bourguignons proceeding in his new Royalty of France. The Bourgignons craues iustice against the Dauphin.

The Regent held a Councell presently in great state, in the Palace of Saint Pol, being the Kings lodging. Two thrones were erected for the two Kings, and a seat vnderneath for Philip of Bourgongne. The Kings Councell (being few in number) is supplied by the Court of Parliament, and the Vniuersity. Philip demands iustice of the murder committed on the person of John of Bourgongne his father. His Aduocate Rollin made this instance. The Kings Aduocate and the Vniuersity assisted him in the pursuit. King Charles promiseth iustice against his sonne the Dauphin, and to doe all good offices for King Henry his new sonne. This was the first act of the new Regency, against the onely sonne of his House. And moreover they decreed, that hereafter all the treasure should be governed by the Regents authority and command. Henry resolves presently to call a Parliament for the necessity of his returne into England, whether he meant to conduct his new Spouse. A Parliament was held according to this decree, but all were amazed at this sudden alteration, euen the very report of my History hath some feeling thereof: for what canst thou see herein (gentle Reader) but frozen ice, in the remembrance of these confusions, renewed by the feeling of our owne? Thus the Regent caused Charles Duke of Touraine, and Dauphin of Viennois, to be called to the Marble table. All solemnities obliterated, and he not appearing, by a decree of the Councell, and of the Court of Parliament, he was banished the Realme, and iudged vnworthy to succeed in any of the Seigneries, as well present as to come. The Dauphin appeales from this sentence, To God and his sword, who in the end doing him iustice, shall blesse his sword, and make it victorious over his enemies.

The Dauphin banished.

The Parisians (discontented with the violent courses of the new Regent) beganne to abate their ioy within few dayes after, before Henrys returne into England. Philip of Bourgongne Earle of Saint Pol, Cousin germane to the Duke of Bourgongne, was gouernor of Paris by the appointment of King Charles. Henry displaceth him, and appoints Thomas Duke of Clarence his brother. He sets English guards in all the strong places of the City, and displaceth the French and Bourgignons, and yet durst they not mutter. The Lord of Lisle-Adam made Marshall of France (for that he had assisted at the taking and massacre at Paris) was as much out of fauour with this new King, as hee was pleasing to the Parisians. The Regent sends men to apprehend him, whom (as they led to the Bastile) the people made an offer to rescue, but they were sharply repell'd by the English, and well beaten: a iust reward, hauing wished for a strange King: but they shall soone haue other employments, to teach them to know new bread from old, which they had so much disdain'd. Thus Henry the sixt made the Parisians to know in time that he had authority to force obedience, in punishing fooles and rebels growne contentious in confusion.

On the other side, the Dauphin faints not at the first brute of this new royalty, but growing resolute against all formes, he loseth no opportunity to aduance his affaires. We haue shewed how that Aniou obeyed him. The new Regent commands the Duke

A of Clarence his brother to make war in those parts. So hee enters the Country with his army, as it were to take possession of his owne. He presents himselfe before Angiers the chiefe City of that Prouince, presuming that all would presently obey him: but the issue did not answer his hopes, for he found all the French resolute to defend themselves against a stranger, and to obey their naturall King; hereupon the French ioyne together, they arme and goe to field. The English being out of hope to take Angiers, turne head against the French army lodged at Little Bauge, which attended resolutely the force of a mighty and victorious enemy. On the other side, the imaginary hope of victory thrust on the Duke of Clarence against our men, whom he held to be halfe dead, but he findes them reuiu'd, ready to sell their liues at a deare rate. The battell was very bloody, the one fighting for Empire and honor, and the other for their liues and alars. The euent was vnfortunate for the English. The Duke of Clarence was slaine, and the English army lost 1500 men vpon the place, for the first fruits of their new Regency, and a gage of their pretended Royalty. This famous encounter hapned in the yeare 1420, the 9 of April. As in the fir of a dangerous discale, the first motions of nature are very important, so is it in State. A light beginning after a great danger, drawes a great consequence either to good or euill. This first action had a great traine. Charles his party began to rise, as if the good hap of the lawfull heire reuiuing, had taken a new forme in feeling his authority. John of Montfort Duke of Britanie fauoured this first successe of Aniou. After that the English had seized vpon Normandy, he put himselfe vnder his protection: but now he turnes taile, and allies himselfe with our Charles against him, in a defensive and offensive league. What remains of the History of Britanie, I will reserve for another place: let vs now returne to our discourse. At the same instant James of Harcourt leaues the Bourgignons partie. He makes warre in the Country of Vimeu and takes diuers places; Pont Remy, Saint Riquier, la Ferte, Mareuill, Diancourt, Araines, and other small places. The Bourgignon goes to field, the smallest townes yeeld vnto him. He besiegeth Saint Riquier being well defended by the Lord of Offemont, but newes comes that the Dauphins Army approacheth. The Bourgignon resolves to meet them: he sends forth part of his forces; they are dispersed vpon a false alarm, that the Duke of Bourgongne was dead. As they were in this disorder, behold, he shewes himselfe to his souldiers full of resolution, and so fitly, as hauing rallyed his men and encouraged them, hee not onely repels his enemy, but defeats them, takes Riquier, and frees Picardy from feare. Such is the variety of our encounters: the conqueror is here conquered.

The English defeated, & the Duke of Clarence slaine.

The Bourgignon being in field, our new Regent comes from his Realme of England with new forces: hauing resolved to employ all their meanes ioyntly to ruine the Dauphin, before he should fortifie himselfe with any new successe: they disperse their forces into diuers parts of the Realme, hauing more men and money then the Dauphin. The Prince of Orange held the Dauphin in awe. The Lord of Roch-baron made warre in Forest and Auvergne, and the body of the Army with the Regent and Duke marched against the Dauphin, who was retired to Bourges a strong City, and of a situation, lying in the midst of such Prouinces as obeyed him. This army marching with a victorious shew, besiegeth Dreux, and takes it by composition. Chartres yeelds willingly: from thence he marcheth with an intent to draw the Dauphin to fight, but the Regent (seeing him retire to a place of hard access) resolves to free all the Townes about Paris, but especially Senlis and Soissons, townes of importance. He hoped to vanquish him by degrees, and in the end to giue him the mate.

The greatest plots of Henry.

But all enterprises succeed not: Man purposeth, but God disposeth, who meant to try, but not to ruine France. All succedes not withfully to the English, being King of France in conceit. The Prince of Orange is beaten in Languedoc, and Tanneguy of Chastell Steward of Beaucaire, hauing happily recovered Pont Saint Esprit, (a towne of importance, vpon the passage of Rone) all the rest yeelds to the Dauphins command: so as he could hardly keepe his Towne of Oranges. Aignon fauoured the Dauphin. Roch-baron was taken at Seruette by Imbert of Grosse, Seneschall of Lions, and so Auvergne and Forest were subiect to the Dauphin: who seeing himselfe without an enemy, and forces ready for his defence, he besiegeth la Charite and takes it. From thence he goes to Colne, where he finds great resistance, yet he doth presse it with such violence, as they are forced to come to a parlee. They prefixe a certaine day to be succoured by the new Regent

Regent, or to yeeld to the Daulphin. The Regent assures them of reliefe, exceeding glad of this occasion, to draw our Daulphin to the combate, wherein he hoped to vanquish him.

But he had not made his accompt with death, who holds his assignments more certain, then all Monarches: for resolving vpon this voyage, although hee had many other affaires in hand, he fell sicke, and of a strange discafe, which the vulgar sort teame Saint Fiacre, and Physicians * Phyriasis. Enguerrand assures, that the chiefe discafe whereof he died, was Saint Antonies fire: but it is more credibly reported, that hee died of a Plurisie, a discafe in those dayes so rare and vnknowne, that Physicians being not therewith acquainted, nor with the cause whence it proceeded, could not prescribe nor apply any remedy. Henry having his mind fixed vpon this voyage, and his supposed victory, parts from Senlis, hauing taken leaue of the King, Queene and wife, (whom he shall see no more) hee caused himselfe to be caried to Melun in a litter: but feeling himselfe prest by his infirmity, he returned to Bois de Vincennes, where hauing taken his bed, hee sent his army into Bourgoigne vnder the command of the Duke of Bedford his brother, and the Earle of Warwicke, commanding them to pursue the Daulphin. At the bruce of this great army, the Daulphin Charles leaues Coiffe and retires to Bourges: and so the towne was freed.

Henry was not so freed from his sicknesse, the which increasing daily, made him to thinke of his end, disposing as he pleased touching his sonne Henry the sixth of that name, whom he had by Katherine the daughter of France, and the Duke of Excester his Vnde to bee Regent of England, commanding them expressly to liue in concord with Philip Duke of Bourgoigne, and neuer to make any peace with Charles of Valois (for so hee called him) vnlesse they might haue Normandy in fouereignty, neither to release the Duke of Orleans and Bourbon, vntill his sonne were of a competent age.

And thus Henry the sixth dies, being neere about 42 yeares old, in the vigor of his age and spirit, borne and aspiring to great matters, hauing already giuen proofe of what he might haue done if he had liued longer. But God would punish France by an Englishman, yet would hee not suffer France to haue any other King then a French-man. This unexpected death, in the great course of Henry the sixths victories, hapned the last day of August, in the yeare 1422, followed soone after by one no lesse memorable. For Charles the sixth our good King, (but subiect to the miserablest reigne that France had euer scene to that day) fell sicke and died the 22 of October in the same yeare, fifty dayes after the decease of Henry of England. A sicknesse and death remarkable in so great a King, for after that he had languished in so long and infamous an infirmity, he died in a manner alone. They name but the Chancellor, the first chamberlaine, his Almoner, with some groomes of his chamber which were present at his end. After his death hee was visited by such as had caused him to die liuing, and by his miserable life had made all the Realme to languish. At the funerals of this poore Prince, after the Herald had proclaimed, The King is dead, another cryed, God saue the King, God send a long and happy life to Henry the sixth, by the Grace of God King of France and England, our Soueraigne Lord. To the end that passion might triumph ouer the infirmity of our King, even in his graue. This Henry shall be crowned King at Paris soone after. But where is that Isabel, or rather Iezabel, who had so much tormented her poore husband? I seeke her in all the corners of this History, yet cannot find her. She who caused so great diuisions, dies without any memory, but to haue liued too long for France and her children. Oh the vanity of this world! which doth inerre the most busie in the forgetfulness of the graue, when as they thinke themselves raised to the toppe of their desires.

Thus Charles the sixth reigned, thus hee liued, and thus hee died, miserable in his reigne, miserable in his life, but most happy in his death, as well to free himselfe from paine, and by this occasion, his whole Realme from confusion. His manners, his race, his reigne and his age doe appeare by that which we haue written. He liued 34 yeares, and reigned 42. He had many sonnes and daughters. Katherine is famous, hauing bene the mournfull gage of many miseries. Of three sonnes which came all to the age of men, Charles only remained successor of his Crowne, but not of his fortunes, for hee shall settle the Realme, redeeming it out of Strangers hands, as shall appeare in the following discourse.

CHARLES the seuenth, The 54 French King.

1422

After the long and painfull carriere of the fore-passed reignes, were it not time now to breathe? Since the vnfortunate battell of Cressy, we haue felt nothing but thornes, tempest, combustions, and shewes of ruines. And it we shall abate that little happinesse which Charles the fifth brought vnto our Ancestours, there are not lesse then seventy yeares of confusion. But all is not yet ended: we must passe 30 yeares more before the conclusion. And as if we felt the crosses of our fore-runners, we must shut our eyes, recouer new Forces, grow resolute against all stormes, and end courageously with them the remainder of this painfull course (in the troublesome discourse, which we shall find in the beginning of this reigne): to see in the end a happy Catastrophe in the restoring of this Estate, and the vniõ of the Church, diuided by a long and dangerous schisme, which disquieted Christendome, during the troubles of this reigne.

Notable particulars of this reigne.

Here our Frenchmen may reade with admiration and profit, that as it is not now alone, that France hath bene afflicted, so God doth now begin to watch our end, deliuering it by miraculous means, when as it seemed nerecst to ruine. Here Charles the seuenth the least and last of his brethren, shall deface the ignominy of France, and triumph ouer the victories of a stranger, who had in a manner dispossessed him of his Realme. Of a truth God meant to punish vs by means of the English, but not to ruine vs. The French cannot bee commanded but by a French-man. The Ocean is a strong barre to diuide these two Estates, content with their owne rights: This reigne abounding in miraculous accidents, is the more considerable being the perfect Idea of the reigne of Henry the fourth lately murdered.

The order of this discourse.

But to represent so variable a subiect with profit, it is necessary to distinguish it in order. There are three parts famous both for the subiect and success. The first shewes the confused and trouble some beginning of this reigne, vntill our Charles was solemnly installed King, and thereby acknowledged of all the French, for vntill that day the greatest part called him Earle of Ponthieure, or King of Bourges, in mockery: and such as were more modest termed him Daulphin of Viennois. The second puts him in possession of his royall authority, shewing by what means hee reduced the Cities subdued by the English to his obedience, beginning with the City of Paris, and so proceeding to the rest of the Realme, expelling the English from all, but onely Calais. The third shewes the end of this reigne, discouering the Kings domestical contentments, which hastened him to his graue, after the happy euents of all his difficulties.

So this reigne continued thirty nine yeares, variable in good and euill. The beginning difficult, the midst happy, and the end mournfull. This is the Theater of mans life, where ioy, sorrow, happinesse and misfortune, play their parts diuersly both with great & small. Charles the seuenth was 21 yeares old when hee began to reigne, and reigned 39 yeares: for after the decease of his father Charles the sixth, he tooke vpon him the name of King of France, (notwithstanding the pretension of the English) the 22 of October in the yeare 1422, and hee died the thirteenth of Iuly, 1461. He was married at eleuen yeares of age, to Mary Daughter of Lewis Duke of Anjou and King of Sicily. By this marriage hee had three sonnes and siue daughters. His sonnes names were Lewis, Philip, and Charles. Lewis the eldest shall succed him to the Crowne. Philip died very young: Charles liued somewhat longer, but without any great success, hauing only the titles of the dukedomes of Berry, Normandy and Guienne. His daughters were Radegonde, Toland, Katherine, Iane, and Magdalen. The first died, being betrothed to Sigismund Duke of Austria. Toland was married to Amedee Duke of Savoy: Katherine to that great Charles Duke of Bourgoigne, who shall be his owne ruine: Iane to Iohn Duke of Bourbon, and Magdalen to Gaston Earle of Foix: and this was race. His manners will appeare by his life: he was of a tractable and gentle disposition, capable of counsell, but louing his ease too much, and suffering himselfe to bee often caried away by his seruants. And yet as God would

Regent, or to yeeld to the Daulphin. The Regent assures them of reliefe, exceeding glad of A this occasion, to draw our Daulphin to the combat, wherein he hoped to vanquish him.

But he had not made his accompt with death, who holds his assignments more certaine, then all Monarches: for resolving vpon this voyage, although hee had many other affaires in hand, he fell sicke, and of a strange disease, which the vulgar sort termne Saint Fiacre, and Physicians * Phyriasis. Enguerand assures, that the chiefe disease wherof he died, was Saint Antonies fire: but it is more credibly reported, that hee died of a Plurisie, a disease in those dayes so rare and vnkowne, that Physicians being not therewith acquainted, nor with the cause whence it proceeded, could not prescribe nor apply any remedy. Henry having his mind fixed vpon this voyage, and his supposed victory, parts from Sens, having taken leaue of the King, Queene and wife, (whom he shall see no more) hee caused himselfe to be caried to Melun in a litter: but feeling himselfe prest by his infirmity, he returned to Bois de Vincennes, where having taken his bed, hee sent his army into Bourgogne vnder the command of the Duke of Bedford his brother, and the Earle of Warwick, commanding them to pursue the Daulphin. At the brute of this great army, the Daulphin Charles leaues Cosne and retires to Bourges: and so the towne was freed.

Henry was not so freed from his sickness, the which increasing daily, made him to thinke of his end, disposing as he pleased touching his sonne Henry the first of that name, whom he had by Katherine the daughter of France, and the Duke of Excester his Vnckle to bee Regent of England, commanding them expressly to liue in concord with Philip Duke of Bourgogne, and neuer to make any peace with Charles of Valois (for so he called himselfe) lest they might haue Nomandy in souereignty, neither to release the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, vntill his sonne were of a competent age.

And thus Henry the first dies, being neere about 40 yeares old, in the vigor of his age and spirit, borne and aspiring to great matters, having already giuen proofe of what he might haue done if he had liued longer. But God would punish France by an Englishman, yet would he not suffer France to haue any other King then a French-man. This vnexpected death, in the great course of Henry the firsts victories, hapned the last day of August, in the yeare 1422, followed soone after by one no lesse memorable. Notable particulars of this reigne.

Here our Frenchmen may reade with admiration and profit, that, as it is not now alone, C that France hath bene afflicted, so God doth now begin to watch ouer it, deliuering it by miraculous means, when as it seemed neere to ruine. The order of this discourse.

E So this reigne continued thirty nine yeares, variable in good and euill. The beginning difficult, the midst happy, and the end mournfull. This is the Theater of mans life, where joy, sorrow, happinesse and misfortune, play their parts diuersly both with great & small. Charles the seuenth was 21 yeares old when hee began to reigne, and reigned 39 yeares: for after the decease of his father Charles the sixth, he tooke vpon him the name of King of France, (notwithstanding the pretension of the English) the 22 of October in the yeare 1422, and he died the thirteenth of July, 1461. would vie him for the establishing of the French Monarchy, so did he bring him vp in the schoole of affliction, to fortifie him against all difficulties, assisting him with great and worthy persons, both for warre and counsell, by whose meanes he did raise vp this Estate, yet with great and confused combats, and by a long and painfull patience. But let vs proceed to that which hath chanced vnder his reigne, most worthy of obseruation.

The miserable estate of this reigne, vnto the Coronation of Charles the 7, during seuen yeares:

From the end of the yeare 1422, vnto 29, in the moneth of Iune, when as he was solemnly installed King in the City of Poitiers.

Such was the estate of Charles, when his fathers death called him to the Crowne. We haue seene after that the miseries of France had caused his mother Isabel to forge her owne blood, making him to bee rejected from the Crowne, and Henry the fifth King of England substituted in his place, yet he fainted not in these extremities, but did valiantly withstand the pretended designs, by whose death God soone laid the foundation of this Realmes restoring. Yet after the death of King Henry the fifth, Charles was encountered with infinite difficulties. Hee had small meanes, fewer friends, and many mighty enemies. Hee scarce enjoyed the least part of his estate, followed by intreaty, and obeyed by halves, euen of such as made profession to be most faithfull. The Cities had diuers motions, as priuate interest drew mens mindes to that party which they held most profitable. There were but too many which followed the fortune of the English, being a Conqueror, the corruption of man inclining commonly to the stronger. But amidst these vncertaine humours of people, hee had enemies which encountered him with advantages apparently victorious: for Henry the sixth although hee were very yong, yet did he exceed him in all things: hee had a Realme hereditary and absolute: the best part of the French Monarchy: the assistance of the Duke of Bedford his vncke, with many worthy men, and great meanes. To these enemies were ioyned some great men, which D filled in a troubled streame, euenly one imagining to haue a part of this garment, building their designs vpon the Sepulcher of Charles, and the alteration of the State. Among the chiefeest were Philip Duke of Bourgongne, Amedee Duke of Sauoy, Peter Duke of Britanie, with his brother the Earle of Richmond. Diuers instruments vnder that great engine of England: but all these motions were to ruine France, and to build their greatness vpon her ruines.

The Bourgignon (who had a great hand in the State) was most interested and most opposite to Charles, being apparently the author of his fathers murder. Yet Philip (a iudicious Prince) so hated him, whom necessity commanded him to hate in this accident, as if hee should loue him in time, nor wedding himselfe absolutely to the English: yet did hee so worke for him in shew, as making himselfe in effect the stronger, hee might counterpoise him, if necessity required, and strike the last stroke for him to whom the French should incline. Reason likewise taught him, that the people would respect the lawfull heire of the Crowne, louing their Prince naturally, and in the end would rectifie the Stranger, as an vnlawfull tenant, who made himselfe daily insupportable by his imperious carriage. Amedee Duke of Sauoy being on the Stage, and farr from blows, kept the stakes, and entertained Charles, as if he should be an assured mediator in these quarrels, to end them with more advantage than any Christian Prince, and so hee nourished this diuision, by a strict intelligence which hee had from the Bourgignon. As for the humour of the two Brethren of Britanie, the course of the History will soon shew it.

Thus Charles charged by many enemies, had few faithfull and confident friends, and in that golden age, so small meanes to entertaine his friends, as hee could hardly supply the ordinary charges of his traine, selling and ingaging peace after peace of his inheritance. So as he had nothing more assured then the equity of his cause, and his resolution in this great necessity. He had yet some good friends remaining in Scotland, whom he bought dearly, aduancing them to the greatest dignities of the Realme: for hee made Charles

Steward

A Steward Earle of Boucquan his Constable, and James Earle Douglas Marshall of France: and to honor the Scottish mens faith, hee gaue them the guard of his person, an institution which continues vnto this day. He had likewise some friends in Spaine and Italy, who succoured him in due time, according to their meanes. We haue shewed what Provinces followed the party of our Charles, amongst the which Languedoc was a principal. The importance of this country did much aduance his affaires. This reason moued both the Bourgignon and the Sauoiard against this Province. The instruments fit for this enterprise, were Iohn of Chalons, Prince of Orange, and the Lord of Roch-baron, a Nobleman of Velay, one of the 22 diocesses of Languedoc. The first by the commodity of his neighbourhood did win Nismes, Pont saint Esprit, Aiguemortes, and all the rest of bafe Languedoc, vnto Beziers, except the castell of Pezenas, the tower of Villeneuve by Auignon, and the castell of Egaliers, now wholly ruined, neere vnto Vcz. This losse was somewhat repaired by the fidelity of the inhabitants. Aiguemortes set vp their Ensigne of liberty, by the direction of the Baron of Vauuerbe, and kils the garison of Bourgignons, which the Prince of Orange had placed there. To this day they shew a great vessell of Stone, wherein they did slay the Bourgignons. The example of this strong and important Citie, awaked the rest, and euen vpon the approach of the Earle of Foix (who came with a goodly army) all the townes yielded vnto him except Nismes and Pont S. Esprit, townes of great importance in that country, the one being the head of that Seneschauce, the other a passage vpon the Rofne towards Dauphine. But as the liberty of time made the seruant presume about the Master, so it chanced, that the Earle of Foix, (having tasted the sweet of command, and transported with the common humour of men, seeking to make their profit of the common confusions of France) detained the reuenues of Languedoc, by his absolute authoritie, imparting none to Charles, being exceeding poore in this confused time. This necessitie was accompanied with a cruell warre, stirred vp in Velay, by the Lord of Roch-baron, a partisan to the Dukes of Sauoy, and Bourgongne, who furnished him both with men and money for this rebellion: for it was rather a horrible theeuery then a warre. These two occasions drew Charles into Languedoc, to confirm his authority, and his voyage succeeded according to his intent: for he chased the Prince of Orange out of Nismes and Pont Saint Esprit, he pacified the troubles of Velay, & put the Earle of Foix from his government, giuing the place to Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, a Prince of the blood, to the great content of all the people. Having thus happily provided for his affaires, he takes the way of Velay, to returne into France: being arriued at Espaly, (a castle belonging to the bishop of Puy) he is aduertised of his fathers death, after Henry the fifth his Competitor. Hee falls presently to reares and mourning, yet hee buries not his affaires in care. His Councell aduiseeth him to change his blacke robes into scarlet, to set vp the banner of France in his name, and to proclaime himselfe King, for the first fruits of his coronation: the which being performed at Puy, to the peoples great ioy, Charles goes to Poitiers, where he caused himselfe to be crowned King, and received the homage and oithes of the officers of the Crowne, Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen that were about him, with such pompe as the strictness of time would permit. Then he entituled himselfe King of France, and made shew of more authority and greater pompe. But on the other side, the duke of Bedford began to bandy more strongly against him. Henry the sixth, his pupill, a yong infant, was in England. He caused him likewise to be crowned King, till that seuen yeares after he should be solemnly installed at Paris, in the yeare, 1430. He set his name vpon the money of France, making a new stamp, but without any other change, then of his name.

So that hereafter two Kings, two factions, two armies shall contend for this goodly Crowne. The heire being the weaker shall fight against a strong pretender. Law fauours the one, and force the other: but the protector of this estate will giue a fauorable doome for the weaker, that the honour of so memorable a preservation of this Monarchy, apparently drawne out of the graue, may be giuen to him, who rules the deluge of our confusions, by his miraculous providence. Scarce had Charles received the first fruits of his royall authority, when as the dukes of Bedford and Bourgongne, his capital enemies, assembled at Amiens, to crosse his new dignity in the breeding. There shall be seuen yeeres of exceeding bad time, but after this sharp winter, there will come a goodly spring, when as all seemed lost: and in the end, Summer shall follow with a plentiful harvest of rest to this this Realme, whereof the lawfull heire shall remaine in quiet possession, and the pre- tender expelled with losse of euill that which he might haue ciuilly inioyed.

In this Assembly at Amiens, great plots are laid against Charles, whose ruine was their foueraigne end. All is done at the charge of the English. Peter duke of Britany and Arthur Earle of Richmont his brother, are there present. Amedee duke of Sauoy, sends his Ambassadors, vnder another colour, but he calls the stone and hides his arme. The dukes of Bedford, Britany and Sauoy, make a defensue and offensiue league against Charles. The foueraignty of the crowne should remaine to the English: the commodities to the dukes. They set the scale of marriages to this alliance. John duke of Bedford maries with Ann the sister of Philip duke of Bourgongne, and Marguerit his other sister takes Arthur the Earle of Richmont. Then they seeke the fruits of this alliance with the preiudice of Charles. Euery man takes his quarter, to torment him on all sides. The Bourguignon undertakes Picardy, where he settles John of Luxembourg, to expell the Dauphinois out of some places which they held there. Henry of Lancaster Earle of Salisbury, went into Champagne and Bry, to cense the Country about Paris, and to bridle Orleans. The Earle of Warwicke undertooke Guienne, to make warre against those townes that held the Dauphins party. Lewis Prince of Orange had charge to arme in Languedoc and Dauphine. Behold a great storme rising against the lawfull heire of this crowne.

Amidst all these difficulties, Charles must needs be in great perplexitie: but I read with ioy, that he whom God had chosen to restore this Estate, was not amazed, nor daunted, but hauing commonly in his mouth this Oracle, We must haue God and reason on our side, hee hath recourse vnto God, and salles courageously to worke. He flies to Rochel, to assure it vnder his obedience. Being in the towne, there happens a notable accident, as he was in counsell, a part of the chamber funke, and James of Bourbon with diuers others were slaine in this ruine. The King was hurt. From this danger, he passeth on to the chiefe of his affaires. He sends into Scotland, Milan, and Castile, to summon his friends to succour him, who speedily will send him notable aides. He provides for all the passages vnder his obedience. He assures himselfe of Languedoc, from whence he drew his chiefe helps by the Earle of Clermont: from Dauphine, by the Lord of Gaucourt: from Lions, Lyonnois, Foret, Beauculois and Masconois, by Imbert of Groslee, Senechal of Lions: from Gascogne, and other countries of Guienne, where he was acknowledged by the Vicount Narbone, and the Master of Orual. He sends James of Harcourt into Picardy, accompanied with Pothon the Xaintrailles, or Saint Treille, & Stephen Vignoles, called la Hire, the flower of his captains. And likewise the Bourguignon sent thither the greatest part of his forces. Ambrose de Lore goes into Maine and Perche, Pregence of Coigny, into Champagne. The Earle of Dunois (a bastard of the house of Orleans) keeps Orleans. The townes lying vpon the Riuer of Loire, about and beneath Orleans, were vnder the obedience of the French, La Charite, Gyan, Iargeau, Meung, Baugency, Blois, Amboise, Tours, Saumur, diuers small townes in Beaulieu, La Ferte of Gaules, lanuille Espernay, Pluuiers. And in the countries of Gastenois and Vrepolis, Montargis, Chastillon, Milly. Nearer vnto Paris, Mont-lehery. Orsay, Marcouilly (very strong places then, but now desolate) kept Paris in alarm.

Thus the cards were shuffled, but the English had the better part, keeping the great cities and the Kings purse, and (as the stronger) he begins the game, which had this issue for the remainder of that year. The English besiege and take Bazas, and the French win Meulan vpon Seine, with great slaughter of the English, but the duke of Bedford (loth to endure such a thorne in the sides of Paris) doth presently besiege it. Charles sends them succors, vnder the command of the Earle of Aumale, the Constable Boucquham & Tanneguy of Chastel. Too many commanders, to doe any great exploit. Icalousie of command bred such a confusion, as all these troopes marched in disorder, no man acknowledging but his priuate commander. Hereupon the English Army arriues, who had an easie conquest of those disorderd troopes, and then Meulan yeelds to the Duke of Bedford.

The sharpnesse of Winter could not temper the heape of these Warriours: and as the fortune of the Warre is variable, one winnes, another loseth, Ambrose de Lore, and John of Belay (thinking to take Fresnay le Conte) lost a notable troope of their men. The Lord of Fontaines hath his reuenge vpon the English, and defeats eight hundred of them at Neuville, and John of Luxembourg, a Bourguignon, defeats the Lords of Gamaches and Amant with their troopes. The Earle of Salisbury takes the townes of Verrus and Eprenay, and the strong places of Montaguillon and Osay neere vnto Paris: the composition is strange, the souldiers yeelding at the Regents discretion, are brought to Paris, bare-headed, halters about their necks, and swords at their breasts.

This miserable troope thus tyed, and led in triumph, passeth through Saint James street to goe to the Tournelles, where the Regent was lodged, and from thence to be drawne to the place of execution, if the Duchesse of Bedford (moued with the pity of a French woman, at so pittifull a spectacle) had not begged the liues of these poore condemned men. Thus that year passed, wherein Charles the sixth, and Henry the fifth died; but God to restore our Monarchy, began in the same yeare to lay a leuain against the attempts of Strangers, who sought to ruine it. Jaqueline of Bauaria, Countesse of Hainault and Holland the onely heire of those two states, had married with John D. of Brabant, who by a blind and ambitious avarice, gaue her selfe to Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, vncle to the King of England, and married with him, reiecting her lawfull husband. Her excuse was, that the Brabantin was her cousin germaine, but this shall be a meanes to dissolve that alliance for cunningly conioyned by the Dukes of Bedford and Bourgongne, who shall breake vpon this occasion. The yeare begins while that losses came by heapes vpon Charles as the current of an vnauoidable ruine: whatsoeuer he vnder-tooke, succeeded not.

James of Harcourt was Gouvernor of Picardy, placed there ouer some remainders of the shipwracke of that country, he surpriseth Dommartin in Ponthien from the Bourguignon, and spoiles the neighbour Abbeies, and the country. Hauing ruined these poore disarmed men, he is charged by Ralph Butler an English Captaine, loseth all his conquest, escapes hardly with his life, and sees Crotay taken before his face, the chiefe dungeon of his designs, Rue, Saint Valery, and in the end the goodly city of Abbeuille, sufficient to stay the English forces, if it had been guarded by good men. After these shameful losses he comes to Charles to excuse himselfe, he pardons him, but God made him soone pay the interest of his thefts, being the cause of his owne ruine.

Hauing no place of aboad, he retires to Parthenay, to his vncle, who entertained him courteously, but Harcourt not content with this kind vlage, would be master of the castle, his practice fell vpon his owne head, being slaine by the guards, suffering the punishment of his treachery: as he had done of his couetousnesse and cowardice. A lesson for bad seruants to their Princes, detestable either for their robberies, or for their treacherous cowardises, whom God paies in due season.

The entrance of this yeare was also infamous, in two shamefull losses, happened to two great captaines: to Ambrose of Lore, who loseth the castle of Tenny in the country of Maine, and to Oliuer of Magny beaten by the English, at the Bishops parkes neere Auranches, but from final accidents, we must come to great actions. Champagne was in no better case then Maine. The Earle of Salisbury made warre with all violence against Regent of Coigny, who defended the Kings party the best he could, but not able to beare so great a burthen, he flies to Charles, who sends him his Constable with forces, the which were imployed both in an other cause, & with other successe then he had designed: for behold the towne of Creuant in Bourgongne (situated vpon the riuer of Yonne, vpon the frontiers of Campagne) is surprisid by the bastard of Baume, for the King. The Constable flies thither, but too late, for la Baume, not able to take the castle, abandons the towne. In the meane time, the brute thereof drawes forces thither, from al parts, as a cupping glasse doth humours. The Dowager of Bourgongne (mother to Duke Philip) sends a goodly troope vnder the conduct of Toulangon Marshall of Bourgongne. The Duke of Bedford doth suddenly furnish a notable supply, for the respect he bare to the Duke of Bourgongne his brother-in-law: Charles fearing lest his Constable should miscarry, assembles what forces he can, with all speed, and sends them vnder the conduct of the Lord of Senerac Marshall of France, the Earle of Ventadour, the Lords of Fontaines, Velay, and Gamaches. The number was very equal, but the incomber fell vpon our army. And this was the occasion. The Constable hauing made his choise of a little hill, a place of aduantage, to attend his enemy, the English comes with a Conquering brauery, as hee that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: hee forceth our guard, placed vpon the bridge to keepe the passage. Hauing thus passed in view of our army, in patience seizeth seizeth on our men by this proud contempt, and they cry out to the Constable, who gal- led with despight for this affront, resolues to the combat. So all with one fury leaue the hill, march towards the English and offer him battell.

The Earle of Salisbury makes a stand, to temper the heat of our French, who durst not approach very neere, fearing the fury of their English arrowes. This first motion thus flackt, the Earle of Salisbury gives the signe to battell. Those of Creuant halfe mad, hauing beene some few daies besieged, issue forth, and charge on the one side. On the other side, the body of the English army, doth march with such violence against the Scots (which were in the first battaillon) as not able to withstand this storme, they open, & giue them entry against the French, who hauing fought resolutely, in the end they leaue the place to the victors. All are in rout. The Marshall of Senerac forgets his honor, and flies in this disorder. They account the losse about three thousand men. Of make, the Lords of Fontaines, Guitry and la Baulme, of Scottishmen, the Lord of Karados, nephew to the Constable, Thomas Seton, William Hamilton, with his son David and John Pillot, all worthy of the memory of France, seeing they died for her in the bed of honor.

There were many more taken prisoners then slaine, by the resolution of the captaines, who in this generall overthrow (rallying their troops) intrenched themselves, and fought for their liues with the English, and saued themselves honourably with their armes. The chiefe prisoners were the constable of Bouqhan, and the Earle of Ventadour. It is a thing worthy remembrance, that either of these two lost an eye in the battell: this was the 29 day of Iuly. The gaine of this victory to the Bourguignon, was, that Malcon, a towne of the French obedience, yielded vnto him without any force, but feare.

This continuance of so many losses, was exceeding grievous: but as God meant to cha- rize France, and not to ruine it; so he counterpeyted these great losses with some small gaine. These victorious troops returning without feare, all disordered, were defeated by the Earle of Aumale, sent by the King to preserve the rest of Champagne: eight hundred English were slaine. But this checke awaked the Earle of Salisbury, Gouvernor of Cham- pagne for the English, who hauing recovered new forces, goes to field to cleare the Country. He besiegeth and taketh the strong towne of Sedan, in the County of Verus, and then Rembouillet in Bry, and Neelle in Tartenois. Then the tide flowes for the French. The Bourguignon exceeding glad of the seizure of Malcon, (a town very important vpon Saone) commands Thoulangeon his Constable, to rid all that the enemy held thereabouts, and to leaue the trafficke free. La Buissiere a most strong castie betwixt Tournon and Malcon, did much annoy it. He resolues to take it by one meanes or other. But he did not foresee, that in seeking to take, he should be taken. He had some familiarity with the Captaine of the place. And trusting to the vsuall practices of those times, he did confidently hope to corrupt him with money. He sounds him, and findes it pregnable: they agree vpon the price, but he was ignorant of the Captaines meaning, to haue more then his money. A faithfull seruant to the King, and worthy to be named in this Register. The Captaine doth aduertise Imbert of Groflee, the Gouvernor of Lions, of this trafficke, who E wisely provides to take him.

Lewis of Cullant Admirall of France, was then happily at Lions, attending some horse for the King, from Philip Maria duke of Milan. The plot is laide to surpriseth this constable of Bourgongne, and the successe is answerable. Thoulangeon comes to Buissiere at the appointed houre, and brings with him men and money. He enters the Castle, with as many men as he held sufficient, and counts the money to the Captaine. He hauing left his troope in the field, behold the Lions issue forth their Ambuscado like Lions indeed, some seize vpon the castie gate, and assure the place, others charge his troope, which was easily defeated. The Constable with the chiefe that had followed him into the castie were taken, a conterchage which shall deliuer the Constable of Bouqhan and the Earle of Ventadour, after the battell of Cullant.

And almost at the same instant, Stephen of Vignoles, called la Hire, and Pothon of Xaintrailles, roused themselves. Vignoles surprized Compaigne, and Pothon, Han, vpon the riuier of Some. But this ioy lasted little, for John of Luxembourg, gouernour for the duke of Bourgongne, in Picardy, flies thither, besiegeth, and recouereth both the one & the other with a happy celerity. Pothon saues himselfe with much difficulty in Guise (being pursued by the Bourguignons, to their cost that were ill mounted.) taken prisoner.

A victory wisely, attempts other places: he takes Oyls, Broissy and other small townes of Tiralche, and in the end he besiegeth Guise, where John Proissy commanded for the King: Pothon (to annoy the besiegers) issues forth of Guise, but being too farre engaged in the fight, hee is taken prisoner, to make the siege of Guise the more easie, but Proissy doth his best indeuour to defend it. The towne belonged to René of Aniou, Duke of Bar, and brother to the King of Sicilia. Hee intreats the Duke of Bourgongne to leaue it him in peace, but it was in vaine. The siege is vehemently continued, so as in the end Guise falls into the Bourguignons hands, and so he remains master of all Picardy. And as if this storme had fallen vpon Charles from all parts, la Charite (a very important towne vpon the riuier of Loire) is surprized by Perrinet Graffer, for the Bourguignon: and so the terror of the war came into Berry, much troubling the quiet and commerce of the Court, for that the King most commonly was resident at Bourges, or at Meung.

The like mishap fell vpon La Hire at Vitry, the which he yeelds to the Duke of Bourgongne, by a composition very preiudiciall for the King and the Realme. And at the same time Beaumont vpon Oyle surprized by the French, was taken againe by the English with much blood and sacke. In like sort the fort of Saint Michels Mount, is besieged by the English, and well defended by the French, which caused the victory of Granelle, happily taken by the Baron of Colances from the English, as it were to coole the heat of our continuall feuer with some little water. In sooth the Estate of France was then most miserable. C There appeared nothing but a horrible face confusion, poverty, desolation, solitarieffesse and feare. The leane and bare labourers in the Country, did terrifie euen theeues themselves, who had nothing left them to spoil but the carcases of these poore miserable creatures, wandering vp and downe like Ghosts drawne out graues. The least farmes, and hamlets, were fortified by these robbers, English, Bourguignons, and French, euery one straining to doe his worst. There was no speech but of forts and contributions. At men of war were well agreed to spoile the countryman and the naked Merchant: euen the cattell accustomed to the larum bell (the signe of the enemies approach) would run home of themselves without any guide by this accustomed misery. This is the perfect description of those times, taken out of the lamentations of our Ancestors, set downe in the original. Who D seeth not here the perfect Image of our times, during the confusion of our vncinill Ciuill warres?

But amidst this horrible calamity, God did comfort both the King and Realme: for about the end of the yeere, he gaue Charles a goodly sonne by Queene Mary his wife, a happy gage for the establishing of this Realme, whereof he shalbe a peaceable King. He was borne at Bourges, and there honorable baptized in Saint Stephens church, and was named Lewis, King of France after the decease of his father. Charles would haue John of Alençon a Prince of his blood, and then his trusty friend, to be his God-father. But alas! both by this God-father, and this God-sonne, shall grow a horrible confusion, euen when as Charles expected an end of all his troubles. Whereby we may learne, that there is nothing but E vanity in worldly affaires, remarkable for great men, in that which seemeth most firme in mans life.

This was the flux and reflux of this yeare. The beginning of the new yeare shewed a better countenance: but these small gleames of good hap, were soone ouercast by horrible losses, which seemed to giue the last wound to this Monarchy, and to alter the name, if God had not staid it with his mighty hand, in laying a foundation whereon he shall build the meanes to restore it to her ancient beauty, without any fliew of the industry or force of man, when as all things seemed desperate. But the prouidence of God creepes on insensibly by degrees to perfect his worke. The losse of the Scots was very great in the vnfortunate battaile of Cullant. To repaire this losse, Charles lends into Scotland Renauld of Chantre his chancellor and Archbisshop of Rheims, accompanied with the Earle Douglas, Marshall of France. And being reduced to a miserable want of mony, he engageth the Duchy of Tourain vnto him. A title which Douglas shal not long inioy. But whilst they make this leaue in Scotland, and shal returne to their troopes, let vs consider the humour of the French and English during this medly.

New supplies

Scotland.

As the successe of the English was happy, so their harts swelled with pride, and they exceeded dayly in Insolency, especially in great cities, where they braued it disdainfully, as treading the name of French-men vnder foot. This contempt bred an extreme discontent, even in the most senseless, to see themselves thus intreated, their Kings suppressed, and their Lawes abolished. There were not two years past of this new royalty, and yet dispirable. How farre say they, will this English Empire exceed, being augmented and fortified by the authority of many yeares? Shall it bee eyther to transport new Colonies beyond the seas, or to plant others here, and in the end to extinguish the name of the original French, to the end that no man shall dare to repine at the ruine of his Countrey, reduced into the power of strangers? These imaginations were generally in all mens mindes, but complaints in the mouthes of few, the which they whispered softly to their well assured friends: but the time was not yet come, although the blood (which cannot degenerate) shewed many signes of hearts discontented with this servitude, both at Paris, and especially at Rouen, where the English government was most heauy. One Michael Lallier was the beginner of this liberty, and was put to death at Paris, & a woman was burnt, worthy to live amidst the flames, & to shine in the goodly light of our History.

The Nobility of Picardy was much discontented with this new command. Tournay began first to stirre for the Kings seruice. So immouable is the French obedience to their Kings, and so sweet and pleasing is their command. It was a capitall crime to speake of the King of England, but as the lawfull King. Spies were set in all places to restrain the liberty of the French. These executions were threatnings of worse, if any should mutine. Yet the Nobility of Picardy was so wearied with the English and Bourguignon yoke, as they resolute to free themselves at what rate soeuer. The heads of this resolution were the Lords of Longueval, S. Simon, Mailly, Maucour, Recourt, Blondel, and many other Gentlemen which had followed the Bourguignons party. These are named. The Original should not conceal the rest, whom I could not specify without some Author. Behold the first fruits of the French liberty. These Ensigne-bearers assemble at Roy, they forsake themselves for the King against the English and Bourguignon, and take diuers townes in Picardy at a prefixed day. John of Luxembourg thunders against them that were suspected, and some he takes and hangs. At these terrors some drew backe and left this league: yet the greatest part remained constant, though with the apparent danger of their liues. These were the pure and true sparkles of the French fidelity to their King, but the day-spring was not yet come, which mounting to our horizon, should in the end shew forth the goodly light of liberty to all France.

The first motions put Charles in some good hope of a better estate: but beheld a new check which cooles his courage. At the same time that hee made his leauy in Scotland, the duke of Exeter prepared a great army in England to releue the duke of Bedford his brother, that he might haue means to continue the warres in France. There comes vnto him eight thousand archers, and eigheteen hundred men at armes. For the employing of these men he besiegeth Galardon, and taketh it at his first approach, and without the losse of an houre, hee plants himselfe before Yury, and at the same instant all his forces come to him, vnder the command of the Earle of Salisbury. The army being thus encreased, he pressed the siege. Girard of Palice held the towne for the King.

The due of Bedford summons him to yeeld it. Girard demands respite to aduertise the King. Charles was then at Tours, well accompanied both of his subiects and foraine friends: for after the defeat of Creuant, fore-seeing that the English would pursue the cause with more violence, he had provided men to oppose against them. The Marshall Douglas duke of Touraine by his new purchase, had brought him succours from Scotland. The Vicont of Narbonne a goodly troop from Languedoc, which was the flower of the whole army. The duke of Alençon, the Earles of Aumale, Ventador, Tonere, Douglas, Moiry, the Vicont of Narbonne, the Lordes of Faiette, Tournon, and other Noblemen of marke, with their followers, were ready to doe their best endeavour. So as he had eigheteen thousand fighting men. The rendezvous is in Perche, and they were shortly to march to Yury. The King stayes at Chasteaudun. The Constable of Boulogne sends to view the enemies countenance. The Scouts report the greatnesse of the English Army, and their diligence at the siege, who being discovered and pursued, hardly escape. They resolute then in stead of charging the English army, they should besiege Vernueil, (a towne obeying the English) eyther to take it, or to make a diuersion from Yury. The first succeeded, for our men approaching neer to Vernueil with a victorious countenance and bragge, as if the English army had bene defeated, Vernueil opens the gates with-without any question, and yeelds to the Kings seruice. But this shew of victory cost our Frenchmen deare, who had done better to succour Yury, then in losing it, to hazard their owne ruine, as it happened afterwards.

Girard of Palice, hauing long and in vaine expected succors, and doubled the prefixed time, he yeelds to the Duke of Bedford, who hauing now no other impediment, he resolute to fight with our army at his aduantage: for the effecting whereof, hee had the better means by their long stay. Hauing intelligence of the estate of our army, he resolute to draw them to battell, knowing how much it did import to ferd a victorious fouldier, against one whom he hath vsually beate. He therefore sends a Herald to dese them, giuing him charge to direct himselfe to the Duke of Touraine, a Scottish man Marshall of France. To whom he sayes, The Duke of Bedford my master commanded mee to tell you, that he comes to drinke with you. Douglas answers him: That he should be welcome, but hee must make some haste, for that dinner was ready. Upon this brauado they goe to Councell. The mischief was, the army had no head, hauing indeed too many. A multitude of commanders and commandements, is a plague to all good order, and especially in militarie discipline, which consists wholly in authority. Euery one had varied in his opinion. Some were of aduice to attend the enemy, others thought it fittest to take him at his word, without enduring of these brauadoes.

Thus their diuident opinions diuided the army, and those which in shew made the army, couerthrow it. Douglas and Narbonne. Douglas said, Seeing the army is well lodged, hauing a good towne to backe it, to what end should they runne rashly against a victorious enemy? The Narbonnois replies, To endure these brauadoes, were to take away the hearts of the French fouldiers, and to coole their courage without any reason: and what greater indignities might a vanquished man beare? The Duke of Alençon, and the Constable were of the first opinion, but the contention grew to great, as the Vicont said, That if the wisest had no mind to fight, he would goe and defend the honour of France with the hazard of his life. So being retired to his quarter, he commanded to found a march, notwithstanding the Duke of Alençon entreaty to stay and march together. On the other side, the Duke of Touraine, discontented at the Viconts choller, keepe backe the Scots. But necessity drew forth the whole army, one battallion after another. This disorder was the cause they could not choose a fit place of armes, nor dispose of their battallions. All were in grolle confusedly without any vanguard. The chiefe of the army were on foot. They place two wings, and to euery wing a thousand horse. The Italians had the right, and the French the left. In the fore-front of this battell they planted foure hundred Horse, to beginne the skirmish.

The Duke of Bedford had opportunity to dispose better of his armie, he makes a body all on foot, where he placeth his chiefe forces, and lodgeth there himselfe. In the front of this body he placeth great store of Archers, and euery Archer hath a stake stickt in the ground, to withstand the charge of the horse. Upon either wing he plants the choice of his most resolute Archers: behind, are his vnarmed people with the baggage, the horses being tyed close together, taile to taile, with two cords or withs: but for their guard hee left two thousand chosen Archers. In this order he attends the French, whom he discouers coming affare off, resolute to fight, with the countenance of Conquerors. They were long before they could set their troopes in order, and ranne a full gallop to their death. So as in hurle burlie and haste to fight, they were out of breath before they came to blowes. All the morning is spent in approaches, the two armies fronting one another: a little after noone, a signall is giuen to the battell: our aduenturers goe to the charge, to tie if they can force the grolle of the English army.

The foure hundred Italian Lances (led by Cameron with one eye) made the point, and at the first charge beat back the English Archers that were in the front. At the same instant, our two wings of horse charge the English army in flanke, seeking to breake their ranks. The fury of the fight was violence on either side: our men struing to enter into the body of the English foot, and the English labouring to withstand our men with a continual storme of arrowes. Then, behold our Lanciers, hauing forced one side of the battell, beginne to cry victorie, but the first ranks being forced, they are seconded by the rest without disorder: and with the like impression, the whole body of the English army raise a great cry, and aduance to the combat. Thus the two armies ioyne with a horrible confict, which continued about an houre, one fleshed against another with a cruel & bloody fury. And (saies the original) there were neuer seen two parties of so great power fight so long with out knowledge who were victors. But beheld a new change in our army, our French and Italian horse appointed to force the English battell, being valiantly repulled, fled, and leaues our footmen open to the English shot.

The battell of Vernueil.

Both the battells had continued long in fight, and that which had made it equal, was not onely the equality of their forces, but the counterpiece of horses, which serued honorably. But the English had a supply of 2000 Archers, referred at the taile of his Army to guard the baggage. The duke of Bedford seeing our foot naked of Lances, resolues to employ them. So as this fresh squadron, doubling a fearfull cry, fall violently vpon this wearied troope, and being halfe disordered, disperseth them. Then all are in a rout: some fly, others kill. The massacre was exceeding great in this first fury, kindled by the obstinacy of the fight. Yet after this first heat, the English accustomed to our blood, fell to take prisoners. Vernueil was the nearest retreat, but the gates were shut, fearing lest the English should enter pel mel, with them that fled, so as the ditch serued for a graue or prison to many. Thus the English had the victory, but they bought it full dearly, for they lost about fifteene hundred men, and our losse was farre greater. Our Historiours confesse five thousand, the English report fifteene thousand. Yet all was not lost, for Xaintrilles, and La Hire gathered together a good number of them that fled, and saued them in Mass the nearest place of retreat.

A brave retreat of Italians.

There happened a memorable thing in this rout. The Italian troope which had fled, being intrenched in a neere village, to fight for their liues, having a false aduertisement that our men had won the victory, they presently part, and come to the place of battell, being knowne, they are charged by the English, but their retreat was exceeding hardy, for in despite of their army they saued themselves. Being to passe a riuer at the end of certain hedges, by so narrow a passage as they could goe but one after another, these Lombards plant their cornets there, as the marke of their way, with 16 armed men to make stand, while the troope should passe. All escape this way without any other harme, due feare: So much order preuailes euen in disorder.

The Nobles saw that were slaine.

This ouerthrow chanced the 6 of August. The losse was the greater, for that it did aggrauate the former: many great personages were slaine. The Earle of Boughan constable of France, the Marshall Douglas (a short time Duke of Touraine) the Earles of Aumale, Harcourt, Ventadour, Tonerre, Moyry: the Lords of Grauille, Montenay, Combreff, Fontenay, Bruncel, Fumblert, Guirry, Peisy, Marhe, Rambels, Lindecay, Gamaches, Malestroit, Boyon, Remboniller, Harpedanc, la Treille, Fourchouinere, la Salle, Lappe, Rochebaron, la Tour, and many others in great numbers. The Vicount of Narbonne (a rash instrument of this misfortune) was taken by the Bourguignons, and presently hanged, for punishment, having assisted at the massacre of John D. of Bourgongne. The chiefe prisoners were, John of Bourbon Duke of Alenfon, and the bastard of this house, the Marshall Fayette, the Lord of Hormid, Peter Herisson, Lewis of Vaucourt, Roger Brouffes, Huon of S. Marke, James du Puy, and many others, from whom the English drew great summes of money. Vernueil (to augment this misfortune) was yeelded by Rambures, vpon an honorable composition, with their liues and baggage freed, except that which belonged to the army. The insolent English, spoiled the poore iouldiers, when as the Earle of Salisbury arriving, sue one of these treacherous wretches, causing these poore vanquished men to be conducted into Deny or Touraine in good safety. After this notable victory, the duke of Bedford having triumphed at Paris, managed this profitable accident: to our losse. Hee presently deliueres these victorious troopes (carying in their hearts and foreheads, the fortune of England) to the Earle of Salisbury, a wife and valiant captain of his army, who employed them with great successe, for he tooke from Ambrose de Lore (a brave and valiant captain) the forts of S. Sufanne, Mahuns, la Hines, la Forté-Benard, as the remainders of this shipwrack, and in the end he caried it to the towne of Mans, although the fidelity of the Inhabitants yeelded him their obedience more slowly, & with greater difficulty. The English insolencie increased daily & apparently, like the swelling of a riuer. Watches were set to observe all such as did but mutter for their liberty. The Lords of Maucourt and Rocomp were put to death, as guilty of high treason. The goods of such as were sent, were confiscate. In France it was a great crime to be a Frenchman.

The miserable estate of Charles in diuers sorts.

But as one mischief comes not alone, and griefe vpon griefe procures no health, these misfortunes which touched the members, had almost ruined the head: for this lamentable battell of Vernueil (which made all France to mourne) had almost thrust Charles into his graue. Besides these general losses, this poore Prince was surcharged with many difficulties: the incredible burthen of his povertie, and the reproches of his subiects, accusing him as the author of these banquerout losses, which chanced daily to his armies and townes. Thus he was abandoned both of himselfe and his subiects, his great and many afflictions having killed his courage, and lost his credit with the people. In this disgracefull necessity, there was no speech but of ingaging the reuenues of the Crowne to pay the Garisons of places, which else would bee lost. The Kings table failed daily: hee ate no more in publike, but sparingly in his chamber, attended on by his domestical seruants. The History notes, that as Pothon and la Hire came to him to Chasteaudun, to require succours, they found him at table with a rump of Mutton, and two Chickens: and yet in this extreme poverty of his, the great men got of all hands. The duke of Alenfon had Niore in Poitou, and the bastard of Orleans the County of Gyan, for many they said had been lent for the Kings seruice, who aowed all and payed all, for nothing. But that which was of harder digestion, was the continuall discontent of his subiects against him, as if (neglecting his affaires) he had abandoned himselfe to the loue of faire Agnes. A blot which doth yet blemish the name of Charles the seuenth, in the general conceit of the French nation, registred as a certain truth, by the writers of our time, which haue written of that reigne. As it is my course to search the Originals, and not to allege any new writer for an author, so haue I carefully noted what the ancients did observe. Alain Charretier the Kings Secretary sayes nothing, Monfret speaks, but vpon occasion in the end of this reigne.

And for as much (saith he) as the King did see her willingly, the common fame was, that he kept her dishonestly, for the vulgar is more enclined to speake ill then well. But the loue which the King did shew her, was for her pleasing behaviour and eloquent speech, and also for that she was of all faire creatures the fairest. The History of Saint Denis written by the Historiographer of France, doth cleerly excuse him, in these tearmes. La Chro- nicle, desiring to write the truth, haue duly informed my selfe, and without falsifying of the truth, doe find by Knights, Councillors, Physicians, Surgeons, and other domestical seruants, examined by oath, as appertained to my charge, to the end to free the people from scandall; that during five yeares that faire Agnes liued with the Queene, the King neuer frequented her but in great company, nor in the absence of the Queene: he neuer vied any lasciuious countenance vnto her, nor touched her beneath the chin. And after his sports, Charles retired himselfe vnto his lodging, and Agnes vnto hers. But he loued her for that she was pleasant and young, among the fairest, seeking all kind of delights to sweeten his thoughts and cares. These are his very words. But howeouer, this fear remains vpon Charles his face, that he neglected his affaires, losing both his time and iudgement with this woman, and in his gardens; the which blemished his reputation much, euen with his enemies, who held him for an idle person, and of small valour. But as this report made him contemptible, so the insolent behaviour of his Minions made him hateful, for that vnder his authority, these horse-leeches oppressed the people, and tooke all reward from such as had ventured their liues for the Kings seruice.

Thus this poore prince, surcharged with many difficulties, was so discouraged, as he had not any care to preferre himselfe by armes, but employed all his spirits to find some means of an accord at what price foeuer, with the Duke of Bourgongne and Britany. But hee was much deceiued, for they had all conspired his ruine, and euery one pretended a part in this confiscation. The Duke of Sauoy looked for a share, and Lewis of Chaalon Prince of Orange, was in hope to make himselfe great with the remainders of this spoile. But where the wisdom of man ended, there the providence of God began, who provided means for Charles, that which he could not foresee, neither by his industry nor authority, that the restoring of this Realme might bee knowne to proceed from the miraculous bounty of God, the Guardian of this Estate.

We haue shewed, with what care the duke of Bedford had built an vnion with the dukes of Bourgongne and Britany, to confirme the English affaires in France. Arthur of Britany Earle of Richmond, brother to the duke of Britany, began to make a breach in this alliance. He had married one of the Bourgongne sisters, and Bedford together, This Arthur was a Prince

The league with England taken.

Prince of good iudgement, who governed his brother wholly, and had a great interest in his brother in law of Bourgongne. He shall helpe much in the restoring of this Estate, uniting the hearts of Princes distracted from the King; but his foure complexions did much dissemper Charles, who shall pay dearly for the fruits of his seruice, as the course the History will declare. The Duke of Bedford being at Paris, mightily puffed with his victories, plaid the King: this insolent greatnesse, which made him odious to the French (although they durst not shew it) was likewise hatefull to his owne faction.

Bedford & Rich- mond brother to the duke of Britany are iarrs, being brothers in law.

Man hath alwaies the miserie that he seekes, and is the plotter of his owne misfortune. This pride bred a iarre betwixt him and the Earle of Richmond, and made a way to the general diuision of these confederate Princes, and re-union of the whole Realme. Richmond was come vnto him, to be employed in some honorable charge fit for his house and person, making great esteeme of his loue, whereof their alliance seemed an assured gage. But he found nothing but discontents. Arthur was of a French humour, nourished in the mildnesse of our King, bred vp in their armes, and had bene prisoner for them at the battell of Azincourt: the time only had with-drawne him from the King seruice, whom every man held lost. The pride of Bedford reuiued in him this first affection: so as not able longer to accord with the English, he resolues to seeke all meanes to recouer the Kings good grace and fauour, and to ingage his brother the Duke of Britanie.

Arthur of Britany leaves the English.

Thus he leaves the Duke of Bedford, and retires to his house with this discontent. There falls out a fit occasion to aduance this businesse, to the good liking of Richmond: For the office of Constable was void, by the death of the Earle of Boucquhan, slaine in the battell of Verneuill. Charles sleeps not at these newes; but as if he had attended some good opportunity, he presently sends a trusty Gentleman to the Earle of Richmond, to offer him his loue, and for a gage thereof, the dignity of the constable of France, with all aduantage that a King may honour his seruant with. This first summons Richmond tooke reasonably well: but he answered; that he could not doe any thing with-out his brother the Duke of Britanie: with whom hauing conferred, he would presently aduertise Charles of his resolution. But as the Kings vrgent necessity made him to reckon the minutes, so the tediousnes of the Britons answer made him to languish.

His Councell likewise allowed well of this league, the which shall proue more trouble to some vnto him, then honourable, and more preiudiciall then profitable vnto France. Charles (without attending any answer from Richmond) sends John Louet, President of Prouence, one of the chiefe fauourites then in credit: but he remembered not that he was in dislike with these Princes, so as Louet returned without any effect. Yet Charles (loosing this opportunity, and to giue the English any time to reconcile himselfe to their Britons, sends to him with all speed a very honourable Ambassage, which was Yoland Arragon, Queene of Sicile his mother in law, with Tanneguy of Chastell, being very acceptable to these two brethren. Their coming did greatly aduance this businesse. They prevailed so farre as the Duke of Britanie, and the Earle of Richmond his brother, were both ready to embrace the Kings friendship, and to doe him seruice, so as the Duke of Bourgongne would yeeld vnto it: and in the meane time (to draw this businesse to some good end) Richmond should goe and treat with his Maiesty, vpon good hostages for his safety. This condition was accepted by Charles; and to lose no time, the Lord of Albret and the bastard of Orleans, were sent vnto him for hostages, and the townes of Chinon, Loches, Lusignan, and Meung, were giuen him for assurance vntill the end of the Treaty, and ample passports made to goe and come with all liberty. This worke began this year in Nouember, and shall end the next year, with a notable successe.

But the Duke of Bourgongne embraced another notable occasion, which shall more preiudice the English then this occurred of Britany. Wee haue said that this league was laid in the year 1423, by the marriage of Iaquelin Countesse of Hainault, Holland and Zealand, a wife contended for by two husbands; the duke of Brabant, cousin germaine, and a deare friend to the duke of Bourgongne; and the duke of Gloucester brother to the duke of Bedford, and Vncle to Henry the sixth King of England; two great parties, which shall diuide the dukes of Bedford and Bourgongne; and shall be the meanes to reconcile the Bourgignon to Charles, and restore him to the obedience of this Crowne, expell the English out of France, and restore the Realme. But the prouidence of God, which goes insensibly by degrees about mans conceit, must be distinctly considered.

About

About the end of this year, Iaquelin of Hainault comes out of England with the duke of Gloucester her second husband, fortified with an army of six thousand English. Shee caused the Nobility and the Cities to renew their oathes, both to her and the Duke of Gloucester her lawfull husband. All the Nobility obeyes this commandement, except the Earle of Conuerfan, John of Lumont, Angilbert of Anghien, and all townes except Hals. The Duke of Bourgongne greatly affected this quarrell. The Duke of Bedford foreseeing the danger that might grow by the Bourgignons discontent, labours to suppress it in the breeding, and to that end he draws them to Paris with their friends, but in vaine. The one strives to enioy his Estates, and the other to hinder him. So as whilst the cause is disputed in the Court at Rome, the armies prepare on either side to end it by blood and spoile. The Gloucesterian begins, and the Bourgignon follows. So the end of this year is the beginning of a war of foure whole years, but it shall be ended in fauour of the Bourgignon. This new year shall be spent in the alterations of the Court and Britany.

The Earle of Richmond comes to Tours to Charles, as he had promised to the Queene of Sicilia, but not able to resolve any thing without the consent of the Duke of Bourgongne, (as we haue sayd) the King seeing it very necessary he should goe to him, doth send to him a very honorable Ambassage, James of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, a prince of his blood, the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Bishop of Puy. The end of their negotiation was double, that the duke of Bourgongne should like of the alliance betwixt the King and the Princes of Britany, and that he himselfe should be reconciled vnto him, to liue and continue good friends, as they were neere in blood. The first was fully concluded with the Bourgignons consent, the other was suspended. The causes are specified, for that Philip could not with honesty let slip the death of his father, whereof Charles was the author: this reconciliation could not be well effected, ynnlesse that Charles did chafe from him all such as had dipped their hands in this massacre, either as fauours or as executioners. They were specified by name, John Louet President of Prouence, Tanneguy of Chastell, William d'Anangour, John of Gyac, sonne to that Lady of Gyac, who perswaded John duke of Bourgongne to go to Charles at Monfreaux-saut-Yonne, where he was slain. But these were but colours, for notwithstanding their absence from Court, yet the Bourgignon seemed to be nothing enclined to the Kings seruice. In effect he stood watching the opportunity to effect his designs, and so entertained time, to keepe the stakes, as the whole course of the History will declare.

Charles employing all his friends and meanes, entreats Amedee duke of Sauoy to bee a mediator of this accord. In respect hereof he comes to Monucl in Bresse, but in truth this was but a shadow. They all sought to get from Charles, and so watched for opportunity. Yet the Bourgignon made all shewes of his seruice vowed to the King, and the establishment of France, which he lamented infinitely to be fallen into the hands of strangers. He spared no chiere nor entertainment for the Ambassadors, and for a gage of sincere loue, Philip giues his youngest sister Anne in mariage to the Earle of Clermont, but with an intent to winne a Prince of the blood neere the King. Thus the Bourgignon leuelled alwayes at this mark, and did nothing but with an intent to maintaine his greatness at what price soeuer.

In the meane time the meaner smart for the folly of great men. At the returne of these Ambassadors, the Court is in an vprore, Charles grieues to chafe away his seruants, which could not be done but in contempt of his authority. And yet the Ambassadors cried out that without it they should not effect any thing: and the more they stayed the execution, the more they hindered the Kings seruice. d'Anangour parted first with the good liking both of King and Court. Gyac made his peace, by the mediation of the Queene of Sicilia, who had all power in this action. The King was wonderfully discontented for the departure of Tanneguy of Chastell, whom he called father. A man beloued, and of amiable conditions. But there was no remedy. He had giuen the chiefe stroke to John of Bourgongne. So likewise he protested without any difficultie, to retire himselfe whither soeuer his master should command him.

He beseeched him to giue him an authenticall certificate, that it was not for any fact of his, but for the good of his seruice. He obaines it, and a promise withall that his offices should be continued him. Thus he retires to Beucaire in Languedoc, and the office of Prouost of Paris remained to him still, with the fee, and a good reputation with all men, to haue haue bene a good seruant to the King, and carefull of the publike good. Iohn Lommes president of Prouence, dispured his departure with some bitternesse and obstinacy. What inflicte is it (saith he) to condemne a man without hearing? What breach, to vse the Kings seruants thus, for an others pleasure? but not only the Bourguignon and the Britton hated him to the death, but also the Court and people did detest him. A man of a high minde, cunning, obdurate, reuengefull, cruell. Great men hated him, as crossing their affaires with the King, abusing his tractable disposition: and meane men, as the horse-leech and the sponge of the publike treasure, and a man without mercie. The Bourguignon hated him as the first motiue of his fathers murder; and the Britton, as hauing giuen counsel to the Earle of Ponthieure to take him prisoner at Cantouceaux. Hauing gotten great wealth, and impouerish ed the King and the Realme, he had matched his daughters in good houles. The one, with the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans, the other with the Lord of Ioyeuse. The respect of this alliance faued his life. He was safely conducted to Auignon, & from thence he retires into Prouence, without any other fame then to haue gouerned the King ill. His daughter of Ioyeuse died with thought, for her fathers disgrace. Gyac returns into grace more then before, hauing purchased the fauour of the Queene of Sicily: but he shall soone pay for these imaginations of happinesse, not onely succeeding the President in his misfortune, but also losing his life after an ignominious fort.

The Duke of Britannie comes to King Charles

These men thus chased away, the Constable of Richmont went for his brother Iohn duke of Britannie, who came to Charles to Saumur: he tooke the oath of fidelitie, offering him all seruice. The Bourguignon speaks not yet one word for the King; onely he forbears to make warre against him, hauing a plausible excuse, for his not sending any more men to the Duke of Bedford, being busied for the Brabantine, against the Gloucesterian, in the war of Hainault and Holland. So this accident bred some ease to Charles, but no release. During these confusions in Court, Mans was lost, and after it the rest of Mayne obeyed the Earle of Salisbury. But the Constable of Richmont, (being freed from those domestick crosses which might hinder his credit with the King) would make prooue of his valour, in arming the Brittons against the English. And as in the beginning all is good; at this first command all Britannie riseth, and runs to this war. But these troopes being raised, and not yet ioyned to frame the body of an army, beheld the Earle of Warwick marcheth suddenly with a goodly army, gathered out of all the garisons of Normandy, the inhabitants of Townes, and the Nobility of the country, with great speed, who besiegeth and taketh Pontorson, a towne vpon the confines of Normandy and Britannie, neere Saint Michaels Mount. This prickt forward the Constable, to whom this scorne belonged. After that Warwick was retired, hauing left a garison in his conquest, beheld the Constable comes to Pontorson with his Brittons, hee besiegeth it, beats, and takes it by force, making a great slaughter of the English.

The Constables ill success.

This successe gaue him courage to passe on: the towne of Saint James of Beuuerond much disquiet that country. He attempts it, hoping to be succoured with men and money from France: but hauing words alone without effects, his Brittons (being for the most part voluntaries) slip away daily, not withstanding any preuention of the Constables, who resolved, before this warlike multitude had abandoned him to make profit of his presence and to giue a generall assault. The neernes of Auranches (where the Earle of Suffolke with Scales, famous captaines among the English) remained with goodly troopes) gaue him occasion of feare, lest they should charge his men in the heat of the assault. To this end, he sends forth two thousand men out of the body of his army, to meete with these imagined English.

The Commanders hauing discovered euen to the gates of Auranches, and found nothing, they resolute to returne to the army, not giuing the Constable any other advertisement. The Brittons being at the assault, seeing those men come, suppose them to be English, and fearing to be coopt in hauing an enemy both before and behind, they resolute to leaue their ladders, and retire to their campe. Their retreat was somewhat difficult, by reason of a poole with a narrow caufey, which they had wonne with great labour and paine. The besieged seeing the Brittons forsake the wals, fally forth courageously after them, and recouer the quarter abandoned, where there was a point that flanked the poole, in the which they plant three score archers. There were eight or nine hundred Brittons shut vp betwixt the wals and the poole: so as from this recovered point, they might choofe them one after one. The rest of the English garison issuing forth the towne furiously, put these amazed Brittons to the sword, who are either gauled with English arrowes, like beasts in a toyle, or with a desperate courage leape into the poole. Thus lesse then 500 hundred men ouerthrowe about eight thousand. The campe was abandoned and spoiled, 18 ensignes lost, with the banner of Britannie: many prisoners were taken, after the English had bene wearied with killing. The principall that were slaine, were the Lords of Molac, Coisy, la Motte, and many captaines of marke. The artillery, engines, and all the rest of the munition remained for a pawne. This vnreasonable alarum, greatly troubled the Constable, who was now become all the hope of the French, as if he carried all France vpon his shoulders like another Atlas. To repaire this ridiculous disgrace, hee raiseth new forces in Britannie with all speed, hee ioynes vnto him the troopes of Ambrose of Lore to be assisted with his valour, and hauing giuen them their pay, he causeth them to march into Aniou, where he takes la Fleche, Galerande, Beaufort, Malicorne, and forreuiues the hearts of his men after so notable a losse, and kept his enemy in awe. From thence hee goes to Court, where there were other designs then to fight with the English. A man fitter to brane it in a Councell of State, then to dispute a battell or the siege of a towne. He came to Court to bee the author of many confusions during this yeare: and on the other side, his brother the Duke of Britany, before it passe, shall leaue the party of France, and reconcile himselfe vnto the English, that the honour of our deliuerance might be giuen to God, the guardian of this Monarchy, and not to these Princes of Britany, to whom Charles was too much affected, in buying their friendship so deare, being euen then vnprofitable, when as he had greatest need: yet in their season, all these instruments worke to restore our decayed estate. But these were the Constables good seruices. After this shameful disgrace, he seeks to couer his fault, exclaiming first against the King, as if hee had bene the cause of this infamous disorder happened at Saint James, and hauing too freely discovered his griefes vnto the King, he presumed to take Iohn of Malestroit Chancellor of Britany prisoner, as being particularly charged to sollicite the payment of such money as was appointed for this Britton Army. Charles was much offended with this presumption, & in despite of the Constable, caused Malestroit to be presently released, and sent into Sauoy. The Constable was greatly discontented with this proceeding, the which hee tooke as an affront done to his person, and resolves to bee reuenged. So great were the confusions of that age, as the seruant durst prescribe a Law to his master, and his counsell bandy against him to controll his will. Yea the Priaces of the blood (so great was the corruption of that wretched age) were the chiefe controllers of the Kings actions. Then was there nothing more miserable then France, who discontented with her King, nourished the ambition of many Kings. This iealous ambition did nothing cure the infirmities of our Estate. Charles found it lost, he could not raise it alone. To debase his authority was no meanes to cure the confusions of the Realme. And as there is nothing more troublesome then affliction, the French Nation being then extremely afflicted, did nothing amend their condition, in casting vpon the King the reproaches of their calamities.

He exclaims against the King.

A dangerous waywardnesse to make the King odious or contemptible.

This was to deprive themselves of their head, wherein consists the whole life of the body. An vnreasonable discontent. The whole body of the State was sicke, and this distastfuld people would haue their head found. A notable circumstance, for it is strange, that (after so many miseries) this domestick confusion had not bene the vtter ruine of the State. But let vs returne to our discourse. The Constable had great credit with the Counsell, whom in the beginning the King had greatly countenanced: but the priuate practices, and the generall discontent of great persons, had made him halfe a King, to crosse the Mignons whom all men hated. Great men hated them, as possessing the King, and the people detested them, as managing all things at their pleasure, to the preiudice of the common weale. There were two Mignons that did greatly vex them, Gyac and Camas of Beaulieu. They resolute by a generall consent to dispatch them.

The Princes, with the Lords of Albret and Tremouille (who had a great interest in the State,) where of the party. But the Constable must doe the execution. The matter concluded betwixt them, was thus executed: Gyac was taken in bed with his wife, carried to Dunle Roy, condemned and executed: that is, he was put into a sacke and cast into the riuer. The Constable performed this office, without any other forme of law, then his his bare command. Afterward Camus borne in Auvergne, as hee walked in the Kings lodging, was ventrally slaine, by a fouldier belonging to the Marshall of Bouffac. Charles vnderstood it, and in a manner, toucht the blood of his two domestick seruants, being wonderfully discontented: but the time (which did authorise these confusions) caused him to swallow this pill quietly. Tremouille married Gyacs widow, the heire of Lisle-Bouchart, and entred newly in credit with the King, giuing him to vnderstand that all was for his seruice, so as there was no more speech thereof: euery man shut both eyes and eares. But Tremouille shall haue his turne: he shall leaue some of his haire, and hardly faue the mould of his doubler. Thus the affaires of the Court ebbed and flowed, the which raised vp one, and cast downe another. In this deceitfull manner of life, there is nothing certaine but incertaintie, fauours being giuen not by desert, but most commonly by a blind appetite, which hath no other iudgement, but the apprehension of weake heads, diuiding the happinesse of a Courtiers life into quarters, this day to one, and to morrow to another. A goodly lesson for such as are fauoured in Court, not to bee transported with vaine hope, toyes to deceiue the indiscreet. The surest guards of prosperity, are integrity, wisdom, modesty and patience, to remember aduersity in prosperity, according to the precepts of the wife.

This was the good government of the Constable of Richmond, a bold practiser of these domestick confusions, whilst the Bourguignon plyed his businesse. Wee haue made mention of the suite of laqueine, Countesse of Hainault and Holland, for Humfrey Duke of Glocester, her pretended husband, against John Duke of Brabant, her lawfull husband, for so had Pope Martin pronounced it, in fauour of the Brabantin, but from law they goe to Armes. The Bourguignon supported the Brabantin. These Princes (hauing prepared their forces,) begin by writing. The Glocesterian accuseth the Bourguignon of couetousnesse and treachery. The Bourguignon giues him the lye: but from reproches they fall to Armes. The Bourguignon offers the Glocesterian to end the question by combat: and by that tryall to auoide the effusion of their fouldiers blood. The Glocesterian accepts it: all is prepared for the combat: but the Duke of Bedford interposeth his authority. To this end he calls the chiefe men of all estates to Paris, to quench this fire, and by common aduice decrees; That, that day should be disannulled, neither should it bee preiudiciall to either party. That is to say, All being well viewed and considered, there was no iust cause for either to call the other to this wilfull combat, from the which they could not depart, although it were accepted, without great preiudice to both their honors. In the meane time, neither the Popes authority, nor the Regents decree, by the generall aduice of the States, could preuaile, but all burst forth into open warre. The Bourguignon proued the stronger: so as the Glocesterian (leaving laqueine at Mons) posted into England for new Forces, but all was in vaine, the Bourguignon making his profit of this Princes absence, did easily effect his desire, hauing no opposite but a woman, dishonored for her infamous adulteries. He failes not to enter Hainault with a strong Army, and vseth all force to reduce this people to reason.

The Country seeing it selfe pressed by the Bourguignons forces, (neither hoping for, nor desiring any succours from England, and perswaded that laqueine supported a bad cause) resolute to obey the stronger. Hauing to that effect protested vnto their Lady what they thought fitting for their duty, they leaze on her person, and deliuer her into the hands of the Duke of Bourgogne. Philip receiues her honorably, and promisseth her all offices of friendship to comfort her. From Mons he causeth her to bee conducted with a goodly traine to Gand, by Loris of Chaalons, Prince of Orange, a braue Nobleman. The Gantois employ their means to honour her. This great liberty gaue her meanes to make an escape from this goodly cage: so as hauing practised some for her guide, she disguiseth herselfe in the habit of a man, and retires from Gand to Breda, where she doth assure the riuier of Garide, and doth sollicite the townes of Holland by her Agents. The Bourguignon (foreseeing by these beginnings a long continuance of trouble) flies thither with his Army. He enters the Country, as the first they all resist him, for the respect the subjects bare to their Lady. But as the inconueniences of warre increased daily, and that Philip did shew by publike writings and priuate practices, that whatsoeuer hee did, was to maintaine the right of the lawfull husband, many townes yielded vnto him. At this time John Duke of Brabant, the lawfull husband of laqueine, dyes in the Castle of Lencoure, hauing intituted Philip of Bourgogne his heire. The Cities seeing the Bourguignon supported both by force, and right, follow him by a common consent, as twice a Conqueror, and perswade their Lady not to appoynt her selfe obstinately against so reasonable a necessity. So without any other force, but the happy successe of the stronger, an accord was made betwixt Philip Duke of Bourgogne, and laqueine Countesse of Hainault and Holland, vpon these conditions: I hat laqueine doth acknowledge her Cousin, Philip Duke of Bourgogne, for the lawfull heire of her countries, and from thenceforth doth make him gouernor of Hainault, Holland and Zealand. All these estates should take their oath and doe homage of fealty vnto Philip. All fortresses should be deliuered into his hands, and the promisseth neuer to marrie without his consent. Thus Philip was honourably receiued throughout all these Estates, to the content of some & discontent of others, according to their diuers humours: but force controlled all. laqueine made a good shew, yet greatly discontented to see him her master. Such was the Tragi-comedy of this long suite, for the quiet of these Estates, and the greatnesse of the Duke of Bourgogne, who made his profit of all sides, for soone after William Earle of Namur, left him the Earledome of Namur, whereof he takes possession, to the great discontent of the Liegeois, as we shall see hereafter. This greatnesse of the Duke of Bourgogne bred iealousie in the Duke of Bedford, he being assisted by the Duke of Britanie his open enemy, and the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, whom he sees hourly to grow great in his authority.

Thus fearing more mischief to fall vnto him by that meane, he resolues to fortifie himselfe with new helpes, and to this end he goes into England, leauing the affaires of France in charge of the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, and Salisbury. His stay was not long, necessity pressed him. He obtains both men and money, fit remedies to preuent a storme. He returns into France with ten thousand men; and a notable some of money for their pay. For the good employment of these new forces, he resolues to besiege Montargis, a dangerous thorne, both for the neernesse to Paris, and the conuerse of the Bourguignon, who continued his designs, notwithstanding the still iealousie of these Princes. The charge of this siege was giuen to the Earles of Warwicke and Suffolke, with three thousand men: the rest were dispersed in Normandy, and in townes bordering vpon Picardy, for feare of the Bourguignon, in whom hee had no confidence. Montargis is besieged, and although the waters hindered their approach to the walles, yet with in few daies it was fiercely battered by the English, and valiantly defended by the French.

They cry out for succor, but the affaires in Court were wonderfully confused, (by the intestine iealousies of great men) that one gazed vpon another, yet no man stirred, although Charles continually cried, to armes. In the end they begin to march: & although the Constable had busied himselfe in this leaue, yet fearing the example of Saint James, he would not hazard himselfe in the leading thereof, pretending many excuses to faue himselfe from blows. For want of him, the charge was giuen to the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans, to William of Albert Lord of Oruall, to the Lords of Gaucourt, Guiry, Graulieu, Villars, la Hire, Gyles of Saint Simon, Gualter of Broffard, John Steward a Scot, and other valiant Captaines, who led fiftene or sixtene hundred fighting men. Their purpose was onely to victual the besieged, whilst the King raised new forces in the Countries of his obedience. The Constable remained at largeau attending the issue, which succeeded more happily then the designe of so slight a succour. The Earle of Dunois doth aduertise the besieged of his approach.

The riuier forced the English to make three lodgings, these within the towne had cunningly surprized the bridges vpon the riuier of Loing, and after the succours had fiercely recovered the Rendezvous, those within the towne stopped the course of the water so artificially, as the riuier ouerflows the bridges. At the same instant all the troopes charge the English: la Hire leading the first troope, chargeth the quarter where the Lord de la Poole, brother to the Earle of Suffolke commanded, and crying Montiege S. Denis, he fills all with confusion, killing, burning, and spoiling: de la Poole with much adoe saues himselfe with fourteen more in his brothers lodging in the Abbey without the towne, vpon the way to Nemours. The Earle of Dunois (whose Rendezvous was towards the Castle, hauing ioyned with the Townes-men (who were issued forth with great resolution) chargeth the body of their armie, the which he wholly defeated.

The slaughter was great, for so small troopes, for they numbered sixteen hundred: slaine vpon upon the place. In this charge the Earle of Suffolke, fauoured by the waters, gathers together all he can in his quarter, and recouers the hils, to make his retreat to Chasseau-Landon, and Nemours, places vnder the English command, and of necest retreat. The honor of this happy successe, was attributed to the Earle of Dunois, whereat the King receiued an incredible content, as a refreshing to this burning feuer, and the Constable Richmond a grieuous discontent, being absent: and so this year ended.

But the new year will then what fruits Britany yielded to France during her great necessities. This check at Montargis did somewhat coole the Duke of Bedfords heat, but the Constables ambition nothing at all; who hauing vndertaken to play the King with the King, sought to crosse all the humors of this Prince: he hated what he loued; disallowed what he allowed, and dispraised what he commended. After the violent death of Gyse (of whom we haue spoken) he had fauoured Tremouille, to plant him in the Kings good fauor. But as ambition hath neither faith nor honesty, Tremouille finding himselfe inward with the King, retains all fauour for himselfe, little esteeming both the Constable and the Princes. He did onely associate vnto him in credit, Prie and la Borde, men of small account, to vse them at his pleasure, ialousie mounts again vpon the Stage: the Princes, Constable and chiefe officers of the crowne, in stead of taking counsell to pursue the good successe of Montargis, they combine themselves together to worke their wils vpon Tremouille, and his Partisans, as they had done vpon Gyse. The plot was orderly laid. James of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, and Charles of Bourbon Earle of March, Princes of the blood, become heads of this league against Tremouille and his companions. The league is thus plotted, First, much as the King is governed by base people, to the contempt of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, and to the great oppression of the poore people, the confederates mean to punish these flatterers, abusing the Kings name and authority, and to approach neere vnto his Maestie, to gouern the affaires for the good of his seruite, and the ease of France. The execution must begin with the seizure of Tremouille, and continue with Prie and la Borde. The Constable should take Tremouille, and the Princes were to seize on the citie of Bopriges, where Prie and la Borde were in the great Towre, and so to punish them.

But this enterprise came to naught, for Tremouille hauing intelligence of this designe not only preferred himselfe, but hauing perswaded the King, that this complot was made against his own person and authority, it troubled Charles, as he came in person to Bourges, and preuented the Princes entry, and without any more disguizing he was strangely incensed against the Constable, as the author of these troubles and confusions, forbidding the cities to receiue him. The Constable notwithstanding smothered this disgrace, and to shew the deuotion he had to the Kings seruite, he goes to field, gathers together a goodly troope of Brittons, and puts himselfe into Pontorion, a towne abandoned: he fortifies it, and inans it with a good Garison, vnder the command of Monsieur de Rostrenan and Beaufort. This done, he dismisseth his Brittons. The Earle of Warwicke watched all occasions to surpris the towne, when as beheld these two gouernors minister a fit meanes: for (making a roade towards Auranches) they are both taken. Warwicke marcheth presently to the Wals of Pontorion with his army. The Constable sends Bertrand of Dinan, Marshall of Britany speedily with great succours. Yet the siege continues obstinately. New supplies are sent them by the Duke of Britanie, the which were cut in peeces. Pontorion after much paine comming to a parlee, in the end yeelds to the English, the besieged departing with bagge and baggage.

But this was not the end of this victory: the English army increased both in number and courage: by this happy successe, and threatens Britanie with fire and sword. They prepare to enter. John Duke of Britanie wearied with so many losses, and fearing worse, making no account of the succours of France, (to whom he was coldly affected) takes part with the Duke of Bedford, renouneeth all other alliances, promisth to acknowledge the King of England for King of France, and to take the oath of obedience, such as his predecessours were accustomed to doe to the Kings of France. Behold the great good which Britanie brought to our country in her extreamest afflictions, after so many hopes & imbracings. This year is painfull, shamefull, and confused, but the fore-runner of a worthy deliuerance. Take courage then my countrymen in the remainders of this tempest. We haue said that after that miserable battell of Veruicell, the towne of Mans yeelded to the English. The inhabitants not able to beare the imperious command of the English, resolute in the end

A to shake off that yoke: For the effecting whereof, they feaze vpon a gate, giuing intelligence thereof to the Lord of Oruall, brother to the Lord of Albret, who happily arries, takes the City, and cuts the English in peeces. The Earle of Suffolke was within the Castle. Talbot that renowned Captaine was at Alenton, he aduertiseth him of this surprize. Talbot prepares his succours with such silence, and flies thither with such speed, as hee arries at Mans the third day after the surprize. Our French-men transported with ioy for so noble a conquest, and fearing no enemy among so many enemies both politicke and discontented slept securely in their beds after the French manner, without feare or guard, when as Talbot (hauing entred the Citie by scaling) surpriseth them in their beds, killing them without resistance.

A notable example, both to imitate and to flye: to flye, that through carelesnes we suffer not our selues to be surprisid like swine; it is the very terme wherewith the History doth blemish this brutish sloath: to imitate, not to hold any thing impossible when as resolution doth accompany him that hath any notable attempt in hand. But this victory slayes not at Mans: the Earle of Suffolke with his braue Talbot, goes to field, they march to Laual (a towne of importance, vpon the confines of Aniou and Britany) they take it easily, by the onely terror of their victorious armes, encounter no enemy to withstand them. The whole Court was in confusion; the Princes of the blood, and our Constable shew not to make warre against the English, but against the Mignons. It was their proiect, as if the whole State depended vpon the Kings fauour, who lost daily to the generall discontent of all the French. So this year had nothing memorable, but that our warriors had lost both iudgement, courage, and force: that through their defects God might raise vpon me extraordinary meanes, for the deliuey of this monarchy, almost ruined. Our Captaines then did some exploits, taking Rochfort, Bertran-court, Lanul, Chasteau-neu, Puisse, Toury, Mompieau, Nogent le Rerrou, and Lude: but what toyces are these, in regard of the stately triumphs of the English?

That which was most admirable this year: amidst all these domesticall contentions, and all these ruines and desolations of the State (which might well haue quailed the best affected) those of the Citie of Tournay (after long contentions) in the end abandon both D English & Bourguignon, protestfing solemnly, not to acknowledge any other King then Charles the 7. sonne to Charles the first, as the true and lawfull King of France, and by consequence their lawfull Lord: yet they made a truce with the Bourguignon, being their neighbours, with the Kings good liking. In the meane time, the Duke of Bedford leaues what men and mony he can, both in France and England, for some great attempt, Charles hath intelligence from diuers parts, but what could he doe in so deepe despaire of his affaires, and in so visible an impossibility.

The famous Siege of Orleans.

ALL the cities on this side Loire, from the Ocean Sea were lost, with the whole countries of Normandy, Picardy, the Isle of France, Bry, and Champagne. He had nothing left but the townes lying vpon the riuier of Loire, from Gyon to Angers, for 1 Charles held for the Bourguignon. The chiefe was Orleans, this being wonne, what could hold out long for the French: Bourges could make small resistance, it the English had forced Orleans. The enemies of our State (who called Charles King of Bourges) threatened to take from him this small and languishing Royalty. Orleans then was the marke whereat the Duke of Bedford ayimed, who hauing wonne the Britton, it greatly fortified the English affaires in France. As for the Bourguignon, he had in a manner recovered the Estates of Holland, Hainault, Zeland, and Namur. And although ambition and couetousnes can neuer be restrained: yet these Princes (nothing friendly among themselves) but as common enemies to this Crowne, agreed well in this, to make their priuate profit by the ruine of our State. But man purpoken, and God disposeth: we shall soone see how much he becomes their vanities.

In this lamentable time, mans reason could not discern by what meanes Charles should resist so mighty enemies. But in the weaknesse of this Prince, I reade with ioy the words of the Originall, which saith, During the time that the English held their siege before the noble Citie of Orleans, King Charles was very weak, being abandoned by the greatest part of his Princes and other Noblemen, seeing that all things were opposite unto him: yet had he still a good trust and confidence in God. He was not deceived in this hope, as the sequell will shew. The charge of this siege at Orleans was given to the Earle of Salisbury, a wife and resolute Commander: having given good testimonies of his sufficiency: for the well managing of this siege, he refused to take in all the Forts neere to Orleans, that obeyed the French, and beginning with the weakest, parting from Paris, (taking his way through the Country of Chartres) he seized vpon all the small townes wherein our Capitaines had so much toyled but a few months before. Nogent le Rotrou, Puzos, Rochfort, Bertancourt, Janville, Toury, Mompiepeau, the Caille of Pluuiers, and la Ferte of Gaules, and approaching neere the Citie (both above and beneath) Meung, Baugency, and Jargeau.

Salisbury besiege Orleans.

In the end he plants himselfe before Orleans, the sixt of October, in the year 1428. A day to be observed, for that the 12 of May, the year following was the last fit of our disease, which changed the estate of our miserable Country, like vnto a pleasant spring after a long and sharpe Winter, when as a goodly summer crownes all our labours with abundance of peace and plenty. So this siege continued iust seven months. The brute of this great preparation did wonderfully disquiet both Court and Country, vnder the French obedience, in the weaknesse and confusions of the State. The King after the taking of la Chaire, was commonly resident at Poitiers, hee now retires to Chinon, to be neerer to Orleans. The townes willingly contribute men, money, and victuals. Many great personages flie to this siege, to defend the chiefe strength of our King and Kingdom. Lewis of Bourbon the sonne of Charles Earle of Clermont, the Earle of Dunois, bastard of Orleans, the Lords of Bouslac and Fayette, Marshals of France: John Steward Constable of Scotland, William of Albret Lord of Orual; the Lords of Thouars, Chaugny, Grauille and Chabannes. The Capitaines la Hire, Xaintrailles, Theobald of Valpergue, and John of Leflego, Lombards, with many other great personages. There were not any of the Prouinces of Dauphine and Languedoc: for that the Dukes of Bourgongne and Sauoy, at the same instant prepared a great army, by the meanes of Lewis of Chalons Prince of Orange, to invade those Countries being wholly in the Kings obedience. The Orleansois resolues to defend himselfe. Hee presently begs downe all that might accommodate the enemy, suburbs, houses of pleasure, wine-presses, yea, and the temples themselves.

Seventh.

Salisbury doth likewise wth great dexteritie and diligence to plant his siege, towards Beaulieu and the port Banniere, he builds a great Bastille, which hee calls Paris. Another at the port Renard which he names Rouen. Towards S. Laurence another, to the which he gaue the name of Windfore. At the port of Bourgongne he fortified a ruined Temple, called S. Loup, and neere vnto it another, named S. John the White. At the Portereau hee built a great fort vpon the ruines of the Angustines Church, calling it London: from the which he wonne the Towre vpon the bridge, and all with wonderfull speed. All the City is enuironed, having neither issue nor entry, but with fore fighting. And in these toyles they spend the rest of the year.

The first day of the new year, the English (for a new-years-gift to the city) bring their scaling-ladders courageously to the bulwarke at the port Renard, but they were valiantly repulsed by the defendants: the next day the Admiral of Cullant having passed the river of Loire at a ford (winter being very drie this year) visits them of the citie, and brings them diuers necessaries; vpon this return, he encounters some English troops which came straggling from forrage. He chargeth them, cuts them in peeces, and so retires without danger. Thus the month of January passeth without any other memorable exploit; but there hapned a strange accident the 20 of February following. The Duke of Bedford sent Lanten prouision to the Earle of Salisbury, with some munition of war, vnder the conduct of John Fastolfe and Simon Bowyer, with 1700 men for their guard. The Duke of Bourbon brought a goodly succour of foure thousand men to be besieged. He resolues to charge this English troope, having well viewed their numbers. It was likely the stronger should haue the victory, but the issue was contrary to the designe. For it chanced (as his men marched confidently, as it were to an assured victory, without any iudgement) the English seeing them in doubt how they should fight, either on foot or horse-back, and irresolute, in the end they resolute to charge the French: it falling out many times in this exercise, that he which begins, wins. To conclude, without any further aduice, the English embrace this occasion, charge our troopes, who were so surprised with this unexpected impression, as they presently giue way to the English Bow-men. All fye, some here, some there, without order, without command, and without courage, and few fight. Those that made head were slaine, the rest saue themselves within Orleans. There were fye or six hundred of our men slaine vpon the place. The English lost but one man called Brisfanteau. The chiefe of our side were the Lord of Orual, the Noble House of Albret, John Steward, Chasteaubrun, Montpel, Verdusant, Larigot, La Grene, Dinray, Pully, with better then an hundred Gentlemen.

This ouerthrow was called the Battell of Herings, for that they caryed them to the besiegers: the amazement was greater then the losse, for that the Earle of Clermont a prince of the blood, who should haue bene a ring-leader, full of resolution and valour in these extreme accidents, was so amazed with this losse, as he retired with his men, leauing the City to the bastard of Orleans, who resolues to attend the end of this siege, at what price soeuer. In this gallant resolution, he was virtuously seconded by the Lords of Guity, Gaudou, Grauille, Villars, La Hire, and Xaintrailles, lights of great hope in this cruell storme, and worthy of eternall memory, in that they despaired not of this monarchy, in so apparent despair. And that which is chiefly to be observed herein, the King (vnderstanding this retreat of the Earle of Clermont) said that he did see no meanes to saue the rest from

C Shipwrecke.

To increase this feare, the Duke of Bourgongne comes to Paris at the same instant with a troope of fixe hundred men armed richly appointed. Our Commanders (being full of resolution) were not only to encounter with the English, but with the confusion of times; the Kings misfortune, and (which was worst of all) the amazement of the men of warre who discouered plainly the disorder of the State. They were loth to cast the helme after the hatcher, but fought the most assured meanes to saue the City in this storme. They aduertise the King herof, who was so irresolute, as he referres all to their discretions; who resolute to deliuer the towne into the Duke of Bourgongnes hands, to keepe it for the Duke of Orleans, or the Duke of Angouleme his brother, being then prisoners in England, D with the Kings good liking. Fastolfe of Xaintrailles, and Peter of Orfon (wife and valiant men) goe to Paris to the Duke of Bedford, vpon his assurance. Hee heares them, and returns them presently, both for that hee distrusted the Duke of Bourgongne, and held the conquest assured. The Bourguignon was greatly discontented with Duke of Bedford for his refusal, whom after that time he neuer loued.

The Duke of Bedford dis-contentes the Bourguignon.

The English triumphed as victors, so as our Ambassadors could hardly saue themselves with their passport. Then the English (saith the Originally being in great prosperity, had no consideration that the wheele of Fortune hath power to turne daily. But the holy verity of the Church, which draws vs to the wise prouidence of God, cries, I haue said to fooles, Play not the fooles: and to the wicked, Lift not up your hornes, speake not with so great pride, for E greatness comes not from the East nor West, neither from the North: it is God that raiseth vp and casteth downe. He holds a cup of wine in his hand, he imparts it to eery one as he pleaseth.

Truly the pride of the English, who possessed a great part of this monarchy, being drunke with this good fortune, was now come to his height: there remained nothing but the hand of the soveraigne Iudge to suppress him; but he shall not long hold it.

O my Country! forget not the time of thy visitation. Reade in this true discourse the estate of thy predecessors. Remember their afflictions, behold their feare, see the image of that time wherein thou hast borne a part, and iudge if now onely thou beginnest to be afflicted.

In this extremity as the French were exceedingly distressed, so the English were transported with ioy, for their late victory; and reioycing with a new hope as if all were won, they cry to the besieged, Will you buy my sayre Herrings: at the same instant the townes-men issue forth along the river, the Earle of Salisbury stood at a window in the tower vpon the bridge beholding the skirmish, when as one of the Capitaines named Glacius, said vnto him, My Lord, behold here your Citie, here may you view it plainly. But behold a Cannon charged with stones was shot from the towne, which ayimed at the Earles head, strucke him and left him dead in the place. This unexpected blow (comming as it were from heauen) changed this exceeding ioy of the English into mourning, being a man of great valor, who by his carriage had wonne great credit among them, beloued and honored of all, for the mildnesse of his manners. So this losse troubled both the wits & affaires of the English army, the which had greatly disbanded, if the Earle of Suffolke, Talbot, John Fastolfe, and Scalus, famous Captaines, had not happily been there, to reuiue their spirits and courage, attending the Duke of Bedford's pleasure, who gaue the charge to Talbot, being the choise of their best men, and sending him new forces. So as the siege is continued with more vehemency then before, with great presumptions, that all would goe worke with the besieged.

In this occurrent, Charles knew not what to doe, to whom should he flee? his Princes forsake him. Orleanse being taken, whither should he retire? Bourges was ready to yeeld, and withall, the country adioyning. He had no whole Prouince vnder his obedience, but Languedoc and Dauphine. And at the same instant the Bourguignon and Sauoyard provide worke for him in those countries. The taking then of Orleanse (which in reason could be vnauoyable) was the ouerthrow of Charles and his estate. There was no winking that which was too apparent. That (considering the estate of his affaires in generall and of his Houle in particular, if Orleans should be lost) all the townes vpon the riuer of Loire, and in like sort the rest (already waivering) would abandon him.

Amiddest these fearefull considerations, what could the braue and Noble Commander within Orleanse doe, but plant their hopes in God and in themselves? A soveraigne remedie in extreme dangers. So (to purchase an honorable and profitable composition) they set a good face on it; giuing the English to vnderstand, that if they desired their liues, they should buy them dearly. France reduced to so great an extremity, and truly such, as men could doe no more, behold God raised vp an extraordinary meanes, the which meanes reason could not foresee, and much lesse provide. A meanes which reuiued the daunted spirits, changed the face of our affaires, and dismayed the enemies. And to conclude by miraculous meanes gaue a happy successe both to our King and Realme: and this was the occasion.

famous Maid.

A young Maiden named Jane of Arc (borne in a village vpon the Marches of Barre called Durham, neere to Vaucouleurs) of the age of eightene or twenty yeares, issued from base parents, her father was named James of Arc, and her mother Isabel, poore country folks, who had brought her vp to keepe their cattell, she said with great boldnesse, That shee had a reuelation, how to succour the King: how he might be able to chase the English from Orleanse, and after that to cause the King to be crowned at Rheims, and so put him fully and wholly in possession of his Realme.

After she had deliuered this to her father, mother, and their neighbours, she presumed to goe to the Lord of Baudricourt Prouost of Vaucouleurs, she boldly deliuered vnto him (after an extraordinary manner) all these great mysteries, as much wished for of all men, as not hoped for: especially coming from the mouth of a poore country maide, whom they might with more reason beleue to be possessed by some melancholy humour, then diuinely inspired, being the instrument of so many excellent remedies, in so desperat a situation, after the vaine striving of so great and famous personages. At the first he mocked her, and reproued her, but hauing heard her with more patience, and iudging by her temperate discourse and modest countenance, that she spake not idly, in the end he resolues to present her to the King for his discharge. So she arriues at Chinon the sixth day of May, attired like a man.

Toward the Virgin as a Carthusian nun.

She had a modest countenance, sweet, ciuill and resolute, her discourse was temperate, reasonable and retired, her actions cold, shewing great chastity. Hauing spoken to the King or Noblemen with whom she was to negotiate, she presently retired to her lodging with an old woman that guided her, without vanity, affectation, babling or courtly lightnesse. These are the manners which the Original attributes vnto her. The matter was found ridiculous both by the King and his Councell, yet must they make some trial. The King takes vpon him the habit of a countiman, to be disguised: this maide (being brought into the Chamber) goes directly to the King in this attire, salutes him with a modest countenance, as if she had bene bred vp in court all her life. They telling her that she was mistaken she assured them it was the King, although she had neuer scene him. She begins to deliuer vnto him this new charge, which (she sayes) she had receiued from the God of heauen so as she turned the eyes and minds of all men vpon her.

This

A This matter being referred to counsell, it was concluded, they should take the aduice of Diuines. They answer, that in desperate diseases, the prouidence of God doth commonly raise vp extraordinary remedies, and employes women, when as men grow faint-hearted: as in the afflictions of Israel, he hath mightily vied Deborah and Abigail: The one to teach the people, the other to kill a furious tyrant: and Iudith, which slew that great tyrant in the midst of his army. So as necessity, which made them to seeke all sorts of remedies, caused the King to try if this Maide spake truth, but without the hazard of any thing. This Joan (held for a Prophetesse by many) is reported by Gyraud, Seigneur of Hailian, and sundry other French Writers, and plainly said to haue been induced to this imposture by three Noblemen, who had incited her thereto, and layed that plot, only to encourage King Charles to fight, despairing of his estate.

She desires of the King, that she may be conducted to Orleanse, to beginne the worke which she said she had in charge. A sword remaining in Touraine, in a place called S. Katherine of Fierebois was brought vnto her, to be armed therewith. They gaue her armes and horse, with a sufficient troope to enter the citie. Lewis of Cullant, Admirall of France, and James of Rieux Marshall, had charge to accompany her with some viduals to the besieged, and to haue a care, that all should be wisely caryed without hazard. She prepares her colours, and being armed at all points, she went to take leaue of the King, with a grace worthy of a great Captaine: beseeching him to trust in God, in whose name shee spake.

C Thus she parts from Chinon the twelfth of April.

Now they reckoned the sixt month of the siege, the besieged cry out for hunger. This victualling provided at Blois, is conducted by the aboue-named Commanders, with great care, as well for feare of the English (who had their centinels in all places) as for the distrust they had of this new Commander. She marched in the fore-most rancke, betwixt the Admirall and the Marshall, carying the countenance of a very resolute personage. They arrive (with this provision) safely at Orleanse, the English making no shew of arming, although she passed before their forts, in view of the armie, yet had they scarce fixe hundred men in this supply.

The power of Gods prouidence is admirable in the hearts of men, making them to yeeld insensibly to what he hath decreed. This first exploit stirred vp the spirits of the French. Orleanse begins to reioyce at the sight of this Maide, attired like a man, standing vpon the point of yeelding. This first releefe was not sufficient for so great a multitude. They resolued to fetch more viduals, and to that end would returne to Blois. But before their departure the Maiden writes this letter following, to the chiefe of the English army, and sends it by a trumpet. I haue truly set it down out of the Original, in the same words and style, both for the reuerence of antiquitie, the noble courage of this virgin, and the truth and state of the subiect.

King of England, doe reason to the King of heauen, for his blood royall, yeeld vp to the King the keyes of all the good Cities which you haue forced. She is come from heauen to reclaim the blood royall, and is ready to make a peace, if you be ready to doe reason: yeeld therefore, and pay what you haue taken. King of England, I am the chiefe of this war, wherefore I encounter your men in France, I will chase them, will they or no. If they will obey, I will take them to mercie. The Virgin comes from the King of heauen, to drine you out of France. If you will not obey, she will cause so great a fire, as the like hath not bene these thousand yeares in France. And beleue certainly, that the King of heauen will send her and her good men at armes, more force then you can haue. Goe in Gods name into your country, be not obstinate, for you shall not hold France of the King of heauen, the Sonne of Saint Mary, but Charles shall enjoy it, the King and lawfull heyre, to whom God hath giuen it, he shall enter Paris with a goodly traine. You William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, John Lord Talbot, Thomas Lord Scalus, Lieutenants to the Duke of Bedford: and you Duke of Bedford, rearming your selfe Regent of the Realme of France, spare innocent blood, and leaue Orleanse in libertie. If you doe not reason to them you haue wronged, the French will doe the goodliest exploit that euer was done in Christendome: vnderstand these newes of God, and of the Virgin.

This letter (being deliuered to the Earle of Suffolke) was read with laughter. Charles and his Councell was scorned, as seeking remedies without reason, and transported with folly in following of these vanities. They now assure themselves of a speedy victory, seeing that Charles is vncertaine what to doe. The Trumpeter is imprisoned against the Law of Nations, ready to be burnt in the sight of the besieged: when as suddenly there was other worke prepared for them. A new supply of victuals is made at Blois, through the care of Renold of Chartres, Chancellor of France, & Archbishop of Rheims, a great personage in his time. The Virgin goes to field for the safe conducting thereof to Orleans, but with a greater troop then beforefor the fame of her actions, and of his new successe, had drawn together feuen or eight thousand men: like vnto a cheerefull spring, which causeth trees being dead in fliew, to sprout and spring againe. The Commanders were not greatly moued with these popular brutes, giuing but cold beleefe to the Virgins visions and promises, so as they passe another way for their greater safety. The Virgin lets them go, forbearing to speake any thing before their coming to Orleans: then she said, You hide your selues from me, as if I were ignorant of your intentions, but you must not doubt of the performance of that which God hath decreed. This was the 20 of April.

Orleans beleagured the second time by same.

Orleans being thus fortified both with men and victuals: the Earle of Dunois, and Patton of Sainttrilles, hold a Councell what was to be done: they call her, and intreat her to deliuer her opinion. My aduice is (saith she) that without any farther delay, we charge the English that besiege vs, for that (God being on our side) they cannot escape vs: but before we proceed, let euery man dispose of his confidence, and banish all lewd and naughty persons out of the Army. Although there were small hope or likelihood to vanquish a Conquerour, yet the Commanders resolute to accept and embrace her Councell as an Oracle from God.

The Earle of Dunois made choice of fiftene hundred strong and lusty men for the fight, meaning to begin with the fort at Bourgongne gate, called S. Loup. The virgin goes in the foremost rancke, with the chiefe Captaines of the Army. The souldiers encouraged by her presence, assaile this Fort furiously, being guarded by foure hundred English: neither arrowes, pikes, nor halberts, could stay the planting of their ladders. The Virgin enters the Fort first, crying, Montjoy, Saint Denis, the Fort is wonne. The English abandon their defences, and suffer themselves to be slaine by the French, who (seeing themselves Master of the Fort, and wearied with the execution) take many prisoners. The artillery, and munition being drawne forth, they set fire on the Fort. This chanced the fourth of May, a remarkable day, being the first fruits of the deliury of Orleans, and the generall restoring of this Realme.

Thus the Virgin returns into the Citie with her victorious souldiers. All the people followed her with cries of victory: she can hardly retire to her lodging: all the world runnes to see her, and to commend her, both men, women, and children: all cry out confusedly with a ioy mixt with teares: Blessed be the Virgin which comes to deliuer vs. On the other side, the English seeing their men carryed away, like chickens before the Eagle, and their Fort consumed as with fire from heauen) were greatly amazed, being in so great possibility to vanquish the French on euery side. Suffolke and Talbot make Orations to their men, to reuiue their spirits, daunted at this new and strange spectacle. But we must proceed, and not suffer the courage of the victorious souldiers to grow cold. The Virgin goes to counsell with the chiefe of the City, causing them to resolute to continue the next day, what they had so happily begunne.

The English grow amazed at the Virgins exploits.

At the breake of day, the virgins colours are carryed through the Citie: she resolues to passe the Riuer, and to take the Forts on the other side. She passeth happily betwixt the Fort of Saint Loup that was ruined, and the new Tower, where the furiously assailes and winnes the Fort called Saint John the White, and cuts all the Souldiers in peeces: from thence she marcheth to the Portreau, where the great Bastion of London was built, vpon the Angelsins Church. This place was valiantly disputed throughout the resolutions of both parties, but in the end it was forced. The victory was double, in vanquishing of the enemy, and in deliuiering of friends: for there were many French prisoners found therein. There now remained the Tournelles, and the Bastion vpon the Bridge, being the dungeon of their principall defence. The Virgin held this exploit sufficient for that dayes worke, leaving the rest vntill the morrow, to giue the souldiers breath. So the Fortresse being besieged, they prepare for the last assault.

The next day (being Saturday, the sixt of May) ended this dangerous siege, which had continued feuen moneths. The sharpest Thorne remained yet behind: the Tournelles adioyning

A adioyning to the Bridge, was kept by Glacidas (one of the most resolute Captaines among the English) hauing well encouraged his men to defend themselves, and to fight for their liues.

The skirmish begins at nine of the clocke in the morning, and the ladders are planted. A storme of English Arrowes, falls vpon our men with such violence as they recoile. How now (saith the Virgin) haue we begunn so well, to end so ill? let vs charge, they are our owne, seeing God is on our side. So euery one recovering his forces, flocks about the Virgin: the English double the storme, vpon the thickest of the troopes. The Virgin fighting in the foremost ranks, and encouraging her men to doe well, was thorow the arme with an arrow. She nothing amazed, takes the arrow in one hand, and her sword in the other. This is a sauer (sayes she) let vs go on, they cannot escape the hand of God. At this womans voyce, amidst the found of warre, the combat grows very hot. Our men greatly encouraged by this Virgin, runne head-long to the Bastion, and force a point thereof. Then fire and stones raigne so violently, as the English being amazed forsake their defences. Some are slaine vpon the place, some throw themselves down head-long, and flie to the Tower vpon the Bridge. In the end this braue Glacidas abandons this quarter, and retires into the base Court vpon the Bridge, and after him a great troope of his souldiers. The Bridge greatly shaken with Artillery, tryed by fire, and over-charged with the weight of this multitude, sinks into the water with a fearefull cry, carrying all this multitude with it.

Many English drowned at Orleans, the bridge breake; king.

Thus the riuer of Loire was a Sepulchre for Glacidas, and all his troope, alwayes accustomed to vanquish, but when they were vanquished. An example of mans vanity, who (drunke with their victories,) cannot conceiue that the rodde of the Iudge of this world may touch them. The English lost in these three dayes skirmishes, aboue eight thousand men, and we scarce a hundred, the which was Gods handy worke. If the ioy of Orleans were great, and the Virgins honour proclaimed in this happy successe, being proofes of her true fore-tellings; if her triumphs were double: when as passing through the Citie (hauing her arme honourably hurt) she was inuironed by the Earle of Dunois, Pothon of Xantrilles, and all the most famous Captaines: the perplexitie of Suffolke, Talbot and Scaler, was not lesse, force-seeing the vnauoidable course of their misfortune, if they should D obolitely defend the other Forts that were towards Beaulieu, although a good part of their army remained there. So they take counsell from danger to abandon all these Forts, to retire into some place of safety, and to aduertise the Duke of Bedford of their misfortunes.

Orleans freed from the English.

The same night they gather together with great silence, about nine thousand men, and take the way to Baugency. The Orleansois are watchfull, observing their departure, prepare to charge the enemy, but the Virgin would not consent thereunto. And in truth this remainder was appointed for other victories. The Inhabitants thus freed, issue early in the morning out of the Citie, they come to the Bastions, where hauing gathered together great store of armes, victuals and baggage, they cast these great monuments of the English labours vnto the ground. They giue solemne thanks vnto God, the Author of so miraculous a deliury; and to the end this singular benefit might be celebrated yearly, they erect a monument for this memorable successe, King Charles the seuenth armed, and Jane the Virgin likewise armed, both kneeling vpon their knees before a Crucifixe of bras, kept to this day vpon the Bridge amidst the furies of our late ciuill, or rather vnciuill warres. Truly thank-giuing for so excellent a good, is due to God onely, and this memory ought to be religiously consecrated to posterity, as the first fruits of the restoring of this Estate, then halfe dead through the force and might of Strangers.

To confirme this goodly victory, the Virgin parts well accompanied from Orleans, and goes to the King to Chinon, to yeeld him an account of her commission. It cannot be spoken with what ioy this Prince beheld her, and what credit she purchased by this miraculous successe. But, My Liege (saith she) this is but a beginning, we must finish the God of Heauen worke, causing you to be crowned at Rheims, and chasing your enemies out of your State. This is the commandment I haue receiued. And so by her aduice Charles assembles all his forces. The Constable of Richmond (who neuer durst shew himselfe after the quarrell with Tremouille) is now reconciled by the Virgins intercession, and hereafter shal do very good seruice to this Crowne. Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, is now wonderfully discontented, so haue retired himselfe from the battell of Herrings, hauing not honourably assisted assisted in these exploits, in the which he had held the first rancke. But Iohn of Bourbon, Duke of Alençon, arrived happily out of prison from England, (he had been taken at the battell of Vernueil) to be commander of these goodly troopes, which goe resolutely to take possession of the Cities of Champagne, being all then in the possession of the English. Men possit from all parts to this banquet. Their hearts being reuiued, their countenances change, and their affaires take a new forme. They then make projects, saying: But whilst the King prepares for his Coronation at Guyen, and to be nereest his chiefest affaires; let vs suppress these English which remaine, after that great defeat of Orleans; and let vs take from them those townes which are neere about. The Earle of Suffolke was at Largéau: the towne is besieged and taken, all the English are either slaine, or taken prisoners: one of the Earles brethren was slaine in the fight, another of them drowned, and he himselfe was taken vpon the Bridge as he was flying away. Méung was taken by Guy of Lauall, and seuen or eight hundred Englishmen slaine: Baugency yeelds by composition.

defeated at Patay,

The Duke of Bedford gathers together what forces he can, to preserve the rest of the townes from shipwracke, lending a troope of foure thousand men to fortifie them. Talbot with Thomas Ramseyne haue the charge. This troope was presently subiect to our victory, and when as they find that neither men nor townes can hold out for them, they seek to retire themselves: but they are encountered at Patay, a small village in Beaufic, where all are slaine or taken, yet our mens fury being past, many are spared, both in the fight, and in prison: that the English might haue a testimony of our mildnesse. The great Talbot is taken and brought to Charles, who vseth him with great respect. Iohn Falsoll flies shamefully, and is therefore degraded by the Duke of Bedford.

This chanced the twelfth of May. We had all the tokens of an absolute victory. The Commanders slaine or taken, the field wonne, an hundred and ten Ensignes brought to our Temples, their Artillery, munition, and all other habiliments of Warre, are leazed on: and moreover, the hearts of the King and the French were resolved to end the quarrell. Behold the first fruits: the harvest shall be gathered in time, as the Historie will shew by degrees. But let vs goe to Rheims, to Crowne Charles according to the Virgin appointment.

The Coronation of CHARLES the Seventh.

King Charles
erwed at Rheims,

BY this happy successe, the way was made to Rheims, although the Kings Council framed many difficulties to hinder this voyage, as superfluous, and almost impossible: for why, say they, should Charles be Crowned? The Law of State made him to be borne a King, and he was Crowned at Poictiers. But if (to please the people) it must of force be so, where is the meanes to effect this decree? Rheims and all the townes of Champagne, be in other mens possessions. Thus did many discourse. The Virgin answered, We must goe to Rheims to Crowne the King. It is true, the King is the lawfull heire, but his right is called in question by the English, this maske deceiues many, and makes them disobedient: As for the meanes, leaue that to the God of Heauen, hee will provide for it.

and Sauoyard, in Dauphine and Languedoc.

This aduice preuailed, as an Oracle: all things are prepared in readinesse for the Coronation. Charles retyres to Bourges for this intent, as if the preseruer of the Monarchy would mocke his enemies, who called him King of Bourges in iest: for shortly after hee parts from Bourges to be proclaimed King of France. But whilst he attends there, vntill that all things may be made fit for his journey to Rheims; behold an increase of good newes to crowne his late and happy victory against the English; That the Bourguignon and Sauoyard, who would haue leazed vpon Dauphine were defeated. The particular of this discourse is: The realme being set to sale to strangers, and that euery one sought to haue his part: the Dukes of Bourgogne and Sauoy had laid a plot to appropriate vnto themselves both Dauphine and Languedoc, with other Prouinces that obeyed Charles, vsing in this negotiation the helpe of Lewis of Chaalons Prince of Orange, a man of valor & credit, especially in those countries, by reason of his principality which lay neere vnto them. The diuision of this Merchandise was thus made betwixt them three. The Bourguignon had the Viennois, neere vnto Lions, and that which depended on Lions, whereon he had cast his eye, to make profit of that goodly Citie. Grisiuaudan with Grenoble & em

A euen to Romans, Ambrunois, Gapenfois, Brianfonsiois, and all the Countreies of the Mountains were the Sauoyards part.

The Orangeois (to enlarge his principality) had Valentinois, Dyois and the Baronies, where he held some land vnder the obedience of this Crowne. This portion was allotted to him for his paines. They all arme vpon this project, euen when as the English prestid Orleans must. The best houses of Bourgogne, and Sauoy, contribute to this warre, as to a fleet that goes to the East, or the West Indies: but they had not assured their venture in the Port, with an intent to haue all the profit. This league is made with great shew: the Duke of Sauoy sends five hundred Lances, vnder the command of the Lord of Vatembon, besides voluntaries, and three thousand foot. The Bourguignon (with his Mothers assistance) a thousand Lances. Many Noble men repaire thither, as to an assured gaine. There were leauied in his territories nine or ten thousand foot. The Prince of Orange assembles a goodly troope, as well of his subiects, as of his friends in Prouence, where he had a good portion and for his beginning, he seizeth vpon Enton, a towne vpon the Roine, a safe passage for Sauoy and Bourgogne: and Colombiers, a Castle of great importance neere vnto it. Having brought sixteene hundred men thither, he attends the troopes of Bourgogne, and Sauoy, which repaire vnto him daily. He puts forty men at armes into Colombiers for the guard of the place, and keeps the rest of the troopes about him with great security, fearing no enemy, in this generall amazement of the kings affaires: but the successe was contrary to this designe, for Raoul of Gaucourt, Gouverneur of Dauphine, resolves in this extremity, who (attending no succours from the King, being wisely engaged, and in great danger,) doth husband such forces as he could gather together within his government, from Lions and Viarez, Countreies that were vnder the French obedience. Imbert of Grosse, gouernour of Lions, and Marshall of Dauphine, Iohn de Lewis, Baron of la Voute, the Lords of Ioyeuse, Turnon and Crusol (great men in the Countrey of Viarez) did their best deuoir: the Nobility of Dauphine (renowned awayes for their fidelitie and valour) assisted as much as could be desired in so great a necessity. The Baron of Maubec is noted above the rest for his well deserting. Don Rodrigo de Villandras a Castilian was there with a goodly and valiant troope.

The Lord of Gaucourt resolves to charge the Prince of Orange with this troope, giuing him no leisure to assemble the body of this army, the which increased daily. So (without any further delay) he besiegeth Colombiers, and takes it by force, before the Orangeois had any intelligence of his approach. Having this good successe, hee would giue the ciemie no time to take breath, but desirous to make his profit of this happy beginning, hee parts suddenly with these resolute troopes to draw the Prince of Orange to fight: who was then parted from Enton, hauing intelligence onely of the siege, but not of the taking of Colombiers, beleeuing confidently, that the very brute of his forces would make our men to hide themselves: but hee was deceived. Hee had foure thousand men with him, and Gaucourt had about two thousand, yet (notwithstanding his small number) being nothing amazed, hee charged and defeats them. The neer nesse of Enton saues many. There were five hundred slaine vpon the place, and two hundred of the bravest souldiers taken prisoners. The Prince of Orange hauing recouered Enton, passeth the Roine in a Boate, and saues himselfe. The common report is that he passeth this violent streame on horse backe all armed. The people of that countrey doe beleue it from Father to Sonne, that this horse was kept and dyed at Orange, hauing a long time bene nourished there by the Princes commandement, acknowledging the seruice he had receiued of this Beast in his extreme necessity. Monfreslet saith, That he parted in great disorder, and was chased euen vnto Authun. Alain Charretier, Secretary to our King Charles, writes in expresse words, That hee passed the Roine at the Ferry of Enton. Hee fets downe that the booy was about a hundred thousand Crownes, besides many notable prisoners of Bourgogne and Sauoy, which came to be spoiled, thinking to doe the like to our Charles.

This defeat hapned the twentieth day of May, the same day that the English (which retired from Orleans) were defeated at Patay. To credit the work, against such as made their account alone without God, who seeking to rauish another mans goods vniuilly, lost their owne deseruedly. Thus God workes speedily, as may appeare by the course of so many happy exploits, liant one to another in this month of May, as a prediction of the restoring of

of the estate in this Realme. The Bourguignons and the Sauoirs designe being disappointed by this defeat, Gauconr resolves to haue this priuate reuenge of the Oranges, being the factor of this filthy trafficke. To conclude (without giuing him any respite) he passeth the Rhine with his victorious forces, and takes many places from him; the which he racks and burnes. But not ingaging himselfe farther in the Franch-Conte (where the of Chaalons haue many goodly places) he came to Oranges his chiefe towne, whereof he carries the name, as soueraigne Prince. He takes both towne and Castle, and all thare held in Dauphine vnder the Kings obedience: yet the Citizens of Orange (wonderfully affected to their Prince) within few moneths after chase the French out of the Castle, and become masters thereof, for the seruice of their prince, to whom they yeeld in. Such was the end of this enterprife, shamefull for the Authors, and shamefully prejudiciall for the intrinseque.

Amadee Duke of Sauoy (fallen from so visible a hope, to fith in a troubled water, and seeing on the other side the happy successe of Charles) he growes so much discontented, his whole discourse is to abandon the world, but hereafter we shall see his actions. As he came he returns in the mid-way, without effecting of any thing. Our Bourguignon stowes higher pitch, and had more then one designe in his head. But let vs now returne to our King to Bourges. The preparations for this Coronation were royall and very admirable. No great affliction, but aboue all it was beautified with great personages. There were Antoine of Bourbon Duke of Alançon, Charles of Bourbon Earle of Clermont, prince of the blood, who had faithfull y and profitably accompanied the King in his great aduentions, Arthur of Britan Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, Charles of Anjou, Duke to the King of Sicilia, and brother to the Queene.

The Earle of Dunois bastard of Orleans, Charles of Alfort Earle of Perdrac, a younger sonne of the noble house of Armagnac, the Lord of Cullant, Admirall of France, the Lord Maistrals of France, the Lords of Boufflac, Loheac, Rieux and Faictre. The Lords of Tremouille, Laval, Chaugny, Chaumont, Lamelan, d' Aulin, Serrant, Crusol, Saint Chaumont, and many others, with Tosbon, la Hire and the virgin, excellent peeces of this generation. Many could not come in time to this Solemnity: great troopes came posting from all parts, notwithstanding the danger of the enemy, which was great in diuers places. Such was the desire of the French to assist at this wished act, loyalty remaining in their breasts, as the seed doth in the bosome of the earth during winter. But Charles (before he parted from Bourges to Rheims) provided for the publike safety, lest the English should attempt any thing during this solemnity. He sends his Constable into Normandy, and the Earle of Perdrac into Guienne with some troopes, and reserves ten thousand men for his Coronation, as well to make his passage through townes that should resist, as to honour the Ceremony. A very doubtfull journey yet most happy.

Thus he begins his voyage: The first citie that was summoned by his commandement, was Auxerre: they excuse themselves by reason of the truce lately obtained by Tremouille in intercession. A presumption very prejudiciall in the example, euen now in this first trial of obedience, vpon this same of victory, whereof none could make any question without apparant danger. Euery man did see this error, but no man durst open his mouth, for that the King did countenance Tremouille, euen with the prejudice of his actions. So Charles entred not into Auxerre, he onely tooke their words, that at his returne they should do as the rest, and furnish the Kings army with viuals for their money. From Auxerre the King comes to S. Florentin, which yeelds without any question. Troies was the next: at the first they refused, like vnto Auxerre, through the practices of such as were of the English faction: but as Charles prepared for the siege, behold a notable change. The choice Citizens assembled themselves, assure the Citie, and giue the King to vnderstand, that they are ready to receiue his commandements, and without attending for any more from the King, a goodly company goes forth to meet him, and to offer him welcome. Charles then enters into Troies, to the vnspokeable ioy of all the people, being glad to see their Princes face, after so long captiuitie. Chaalons follows him, and all the rest of the townes, with great alacrity and willingnesse.

The chiefe combat must be at Rheims, the chiefe Rendezvous of this voyage. The Duke of Chastillon and Sauenze, with their Partizans of the English faction, did what they could to hinder the Kings entry. But the good Citizens preuaile, who being stronger then then the English faction,) could hardly keepe the people for tearing them in peeces, being loath to shed any blood. They agree and swear by common consent, to obey the King, and to that end send him the Keyes of Rheims. The way being thus made, and the Gates of Rheims open, hee goes thither with the beauty of his Court, and is receiued with the vnspokeable ioy of all the people, who come to meete him in great troopes, the fields, gates and streets found out; God save the King. Charles accompanied with his Princes and Officers, appeares like a goodly Sunne after a sharpe Winter. But in the greatest beauty of this triumph, Isabe the Virgin is beheld with admiration, and loden with popular blessings.

Two dayes being spent in the preparation of the Ceremony, Charles was anointed and crowned King the eight day of Iuly, in the year 1429, by Renald of Charrres, Archbishop of Rheims, Chanceller of France: a date to be obserued, being the beginning of great good to this realme. This was the seventh year after the law of State had called Charles to the Crowne, whereof he was heire, but the violence of strangers restrained and held most of the French from their obedience. So this Coronation was added to confirme the generall approbation of this lawful authority, not onely in their common beleefe, but in the tongues of the French, as the sequell will shew, that this solemne publication did greatly aduance the Kings affaires against his capital enemy.

But as the Sunne, rising higher in his Horizon, increaseth both in brightnesse and heate, so the beames of the French liberty were more apparant, and the subjects deuotion to their naturall Prince kindled daily, after the long and sharpe Winter of the English command. This was a reuiuing both to their hearts, State, and manners: the image of a golden age, after the horrible tempest of a long and mortall confusion. The French did straine to receiue their King, and the King to receiue them with a fatherly loue. The Kings commandements (generally proclaimed to liue modestly with-out oppression of the people) were freely executed, and the people made the best chere they could to so pleasing guests.

This act did greatly daunt the English, all the Prouinces taking a new resolution to submit themselves vnder the obedience of their naturall Prince, as the sequell of the History will shew. But before we ingage our selues in so long a discourse, order doth command vs to obserue the state of the Church and Empire, hauing past it ouer in silence, since the year 1364, towards the end of the raigne of Charles the fifth. Doubtlesse we were sufficiently troubled with our owne confusions, vnder the miserable daigne of Charles the sixth, imbarcking our selues in forraigne stormes. We are therefore briefly to note, according to our stile, what hath happened since fifty nine yeares, in these two great bodies.

We haue left the Empire in the hands of Charles the fourth, an excellent Prince, but exceeding more in law and valour, then in iustice and vertue: yet he vfed the Council of Barthol, an excellent Lawyer, hauing gouerned the publike affaires of Germany & Italy, twenty and fixe yeares, amidst many confusions, and in the end he purchased the Empire, with the prejudice of the Empire. His sonne Wenceslaus, whom hee had caused to be crowned King of Hungary, and Bohemia, at the age of two yeares, hauing bought the Empire for him, he caused him to be infatled, and liued two yeares after, dying in the year 1378, hauing left a wretched successor of so great and royall a dignity, deformed in minde and body, a foole, idle, voluptuous, and a coward; hauing no other care but to wallow in the most infamous vices and finnes of drunkennesse and whoredome; nor other minde, but to doe euill and mischief; as malicious and cruell, as without valour and vertue. So (concerning his affaires and businesse) he grew contemptible: in hating of his subjects, he grew so hatefull, as in the end, the Germans and Hungarians (being weary of such a soorne,) take him prisoner: and at last, after a painfull and shamefull patience (they hauing suffered him two and twenty yeares, and a huge masse of diuers and sundry confusions, which grew by his ill and wicked government) they deprime him of the Imperiall dignity, by a common consent. And yet to shew, they bare no malice to the house from whence he was descended, they choose in his place Jesse, Marquis of Brandenburg, and Bauaria, the sonne of John Henry, brother to Charles the fourth, and so cousin german to Wenceslaus, who liued in that state but fixe moneths, and had nothing of the Empire, but that he was buried with the Imperiall ornaments of that Country.

Then Rupert, Count Palatine, duke of Bauaria, & first Elector, was chosen Emperor, after much much controuersie and diffention, a man of small stature, but of great iudgement, vertuous, valiant, and louing the Common-weale. Hee laboured and tooke great paines to redresse the confusions of Italy, then exceedingly disordered, through the quarrells of Calisto Duke of Milan, the Venetians, Florentines, French, and Arragonois, vpon diuers and sundry occasions: but finding that what soeuer he could doe, he lost his labour (euen by the disloyalty of such as employed him) he suffered them to ruine and spoile one another, and retyred himselfe home, where after he had happily gouerned the Empire ten yeares) hee dyed in the year of our Lord 1410.

Sigismund King of Hungary and Bohemia, a Prince of happy memory, succeeded Aspert, by the generall consent of all the Germans, who loued and honoured his vertues: and although he fought against the Turke with ill successe, when as he borrowed forces of Charles the sixth (as I haue said) yer his losses did nothing blemish his reputation, nor his vertues, whereof he gaue great proofe in the gouernment of the Empire. But that which troubled him most, was the state of the Church, then plunged in tragical confusions, bred by the long and scandalous Schisme which diuidered it by peeces meales, through the diffention and controuersies of sundry Popes, which were chosen in diuers places, and that diuersly at one instant.

Order commands vs now to represent it, as carefully as the subject is of importance. I tremble to rip vp these shamefull and detestable wounds. I will endeavour to represent plainly and sincerely, following the steps of Platina, Nacler, and Theodore of Niem, who hauing remained in the Court of Rome, Secretary to diuers Popes, one after another, and managed the affaires from the beginning of the Schisme, neere vnto the end, ought to be held for an vntreprouable witness in that which hee hath seene. This Schisme continued fifty yeares: it banded all the Christians of Europe, diuided Kings and Princes, nourished their diuisions, bred and brought forth horrible scandalls, toucht their hearts, opened their mouthes and dispensed with their hands to a new faction, referred to our latter age. Sixe Popes seated in Rome one after another, had every one his opposit in Auignon, with the same name or title, and in the possession of the same authority. Three Popes at one instant in three severall places. Foure Councils were called to remedy these confusions, being generally detested of all men, both great and small, seeing the Popes (who had so long contended with the Emperours, vntill they had chased them out of Italy) contend now among themselves: and this was the cause of the Schisme.

Wee haue said, that the vnfortunate successe of the voluntary quarrell moued by Antiface the eighth, against King Philip the faire, ministred occasion to transport the Pontifical sea from Rome to Auignon, where hauing been vually resident 74 yeares, and the Pope chosen out of the French Nation, Gregory the tenth a Limosin, grew desirous to goe to Rome, and to transport his Colledge thither, consulting for the most part of French Cardinals. After his death, (being to choose a new Pope) the Clergy and people of Rome being vnitied, protest vnto the Colledge, that they will haue a Roman or an Italian, and no French man. If they doe it not willingly, they threaten force. The French are the stronger in the Conclau, being thirteene against foure. But what could they doe against the mutiny of a multitude armed with fury? To consiure this storme, the French and Italian Cardinals agree to name an Italian Pope, with whom the Pontifical dignity should be left in guard, vntill they might choose one by a free election of the whole Colledge.

They all consent to choose Bartholomew of Naples, Archbishop of Bary in Apulia, a learned man, graue, and modest. The reputation of his vertues made them proceed to confirme him in the election: so as all by a generall consent, (especially Pope de la Lune, and the Cardinal of Saint Agreue in Viarez) crowne and adore him, for a final conclusion of his Popedom assuring themselves that he would continue vertuous, as he had formerly begun vertuously. But honours change manners. Two dayes were scarce past after this ioleme reception, but this Bartholomew, (who shall now be Urban the sixth, in changing his degree and name) did also change his humors and manner of life. He which was accustomed to humble himselfe to all men, doth now braue all them which had newly raised him to this dignity. He threatens to keepe them vnder, and checks them with reproachfull words. Otho Duke of Brunfwick (husband to Jane Queene of Sicily and Naples,) comes to congratulate his election, and for a proofe of his great humilitie, (as Urban called for Vrine) Otho takes the Cup from his Taster, and kneeling

A before the Pope presents it vnto him. Urban takes it, leaving him on his knee with a frowning countenance, without speaking any thing. This insupportable arrogancy displeased the whole Colledge, but especially Queene Isabe, (holding this disgrace done to herselfe) and made Urban so odious, as they all resolute to depose him, and to choose another Pope: whereunto Jane doth promise her assistance. They all ioyntly resolute to retire themselves quietly out of Rome, into some place of liberty. So vnto colour to auoide the heat of Summer, they take their leaues to goe to Anagnia: where hauing sojourned some weeke, they goe to Fundy, a Citie in the Kingdome of Naples, a fit place to enjoy their liberties vnder the Queenes protection. Then began they to plant their battery against Urban. They set downe for the ground of their right, that the condition specified in the election of Urban, should be available to those that did choose him, to declare him incapable of the dignity whereof hee shewed himselfe vnworthy: and (to obserue all formalities) they cite Urban before them, and write vnto the other Italian Cardinals, that their meaning is to name an Italian: A meanes to draw them to increase their number.

Being assembled, they depose Urban by the pluralitie of voyces, and being to choose another, at the same instant they aduance Cardinal Rupert of the noble house of the Eagles of Geneva, and call him Clement the seventh. This bred a great alteration both at Rome & in Urban's minde: for Rome is presently abandoned, and Urban so amazed as he knows not what to do. Behold two Popes in one chaire, which is too little for them both, seeing the world will not suffice them: for in choosing Clement, they found no more clemency, then vrbanity and ciuill conseruation in Urban. Clement yeeling nothing to the wiles of his competitor: an ambitious man, wilfull, audacious, sumptuous and poore, hauing nothing rich but the heart, putt vp with the greameffe of his house. These two doe worthy exploits, especially Urban, whose name the people changed, and for Urban they called him Zurban: that is, a troubler of the world, to note his barbarous and fierce nature, Jouing troubles and confusion.

And that which made a way to this mischiefe, Kings and Princes (who should haue employed their authorities to quench this fire) were nothing affected therunto: for the Emperor Charles the fourth, died soone after the breeding of this Schisme, leaving an insufficient successor. France and England were too farre engaged to determine their own quarrels by the sword. As for the particular of France, during the imprisonment of John, the infirmity of Charles the sixth, and the halfe shipwracke of Charles the seventh, what helpe could the French bring to these confusions, being almost drowned in their owne? In the beginning Clement had all aduantages over Urban. The authority of the ordinary and ancient Colledge, Canonically chosen, followed by the Court of Rome, and the Castle Saint Angelo, by the which he might enter the City. All the French, the greatest part of the Italians, many Germans, all the Spaniards and English which were at Rome, repaired vnto him, and consequently all these Nations followed him. France, Spaine, England, with a part of Germany and Italy. There remained the Hungarians, and some Germans, who for feare of the affaires at Naples (not daring to trust themselves in Anagnia) were forced to continue in Rome, a leuaine which shall soone cause great diuisions. Urban as much daunted in aduersitie, as hee was putt vp in prosperitie, humbles himselfe to all men: hee weepes and deplores his misery, and craues aide of euery man, promising all fauour if they did helpe to restore him. There is neither Hungarian, German, nor Italian, which belong vnto the Court, but hee sues vnto him. By their aduice and direction, he flies to the Emperor Charles the fourth, and to Lewis King of Hungary, intreating them to be mediators to the Colledge of Cardinals, who were discontented with him. But Clement (growne ouer-proud with this first successe) gaue him meanes to repaire his estate. He hath a designe to surprize Rome by the Castle: but as Bernard Cazal, with a troope of Neapolitans would haue seized vpon one of Rome Gates, hee was valiantly repulled by the Inhabitants.

The Emperor Charles the fourth, and Lewis King of Hungary, sent their Ambassadors to Clement and to the Colledge of Cardinals, to treat an accord. Clement vseth them without clemency, he checks them, puts them in prison, and in the end sends them away with many indignities. This affront moued Charles and Lewis, to asby their meanes both Germany, Hungary, Poland, Denmarke, Sweden, Norway, and Prusse, were all affected affected to *Urban*s fashion. Charles was a spectator of this first Sceane, and dyed 3 months after, leaving upon the Stage dangerous Actors against Clement. Urban being thus fortified, grew high-minded, and for a mark of his authority, he creeds a new Colledge of sixe and twenty Cardinals, all created in one day, being Italians, Germans, Hungarians, Poles, and other Nations that favoured him, to haue a support of this authority in all parts. Clement works likewise, & to haue his reuenge, (for that he could not seize upon a gate of Rome) he resolved to send an army to field, to vex the Romans, and to force them to obedience: but the successe of this designe was not answerable to his desire, for hauing sent the Lord of Montjoux his Nephew with goodly troops furnished by Queene Iane, the Romans, led by Alberic of Barbiane, defeated this army, and tooke Montjoux prisoner, whom they beheaded, as a disturber of the publike quiet, and so they chase the French out of the Castle Saint Angelo.

Clement finding himselfe nothing safe at Fundy, meanes to retire to Naples, but the Neapolitans would not receive him, notwithstanding the Queenes persuasions: and so he passeth to Avignon, whither he brings the Pontificall sea, for the second time, as Clement the first had done at the first. It was in the year 1384 that the Popes second sea was planted in Avignon, sixe years after that Gregory had retired himselfe. Clement frustrated all hope of his return to Rome, faints not in these first difficulties, finding himselfe in a place of safety, where he might command at pleasure, being proud by nature, by reason of his great birth, and by his forces united in two great Kingdomes. So every one armes for a sharpe encounter, according to the forces they could raise. First, either of them provides his battery of excommunication. Clement the seventh cites Urban before him and his Colledge of Cardinals canonically chosen, with his Cardinals unlawfully elected by him who had been depofed from the charge which had been given him but to keepe; declaring all that he had done, or should doe, to be of no force. Urban, on the other side, counters Clement with the like excommunications. Hee declares him Antipope, a Schismaticke, and an Hereticke, and all them that should follow him, guilty of high-Treason, both against God and man. Their goods, honours, liues, bodies, and soules confiscate.

The cruelties of Popes.

This first point performed, they come to the effects. Clement makes search throughout all the Territories of his obedience, for those of *Urban*s faction, whom he imprisons, condemnes, and kills with sword, fire, and water: many are strangled, massacred, drowned and burnt with extreme cruelty. Urban shall doe no better, but he proceeds by degrees. Hee makes his peace with the Florentines, Perusins, Milanois and Geneuois: the Venetians only he could not win. The Emperor Charles the fourth being dead, he could not preuaile much with Wenceslaus, an unworthy Prince: but he made his profit of Lewis King of Hungary, a capital enemy to Joane Queene of Naples, the soweraine object of *Urban*s choller, whom he sought to ruine, as the sole motive of all his crosses. But amidst the disorders of these confusd passions, the diuers effects of Gods providence are remarkable, who draws light from darknesse, and order from disorder, in such sort, as it is most commonly unknowne to man, but always iust and admirable in his iust effects.

Urban proceeding against Joane Queene of Naples.

Urban (presuming that the force of Hungary would fortifie his proceedings) doth excommunicate Joane Queene of Naples, declares her incapable of the Crowne, & calls in Charles of Durazzo, of whom we haue made mention. But who sees not, that this belongs properly to the history of Naples, whereof we intreat accidentally, matters being tied together by a necessary union. In the end Joane lost both goods and life, through the power of Charles of Durazzo, who remained absolute master of the Realme of Naples, by the death of Lewis of Anjou, whom she had adopted, but Lewis thinking to reuenge her death, lost his owne life, and drew France into great mileries, whereof this vnseasonable adoption was the leuaine. Behold the end of the first Joane Queene of Naples, who shall be soone followed with a second Joane, to continue our voluntary languishing in Italy.

Pope Urban discontented against Charles
of Durazzo.

But the end of this Proserpina was the beginning of a second trouble, through the ambition of Urban, the which hauing no limits, transported his spleene against Charles of Durazzo, whom he had drawne out of Hungary. He is not satisfied that Charles should doe him homage, but he will haue some places in his absolute power, and that Charles should inuest his Nephew Battilo (a man of no estimation, hauing nothing rare in him but his extraordinary vices) in the principalltie of Capua, and the Duchy of Durazzo, seeking to get the same footing in the State, as he might dispossesse Charles at his pleasure.

DURAZZO, being loath to labour for another man, excuseth himselfe to Urban, who takes no excuses for payment, but cireth him before his Consistory, the meaning, that if hee appears not at the day prefixed, he will proceede against him by excommunication. Charles who feared more the losse of his new purchase, then the lightnings of Urban, makes him vnawares a prisoner, hauing placed many souldiers about him for his guard. Urban seeing himselfe braued by Charles, even within Naples, complaines of this affront, and by his sufferance, he retires to Nocera, from whence he sends excommunications against Charles, who laying aside all respect, opposeth a goodly army, and comes to besiege Urban with Ensignes displayed in Nocera. He sends a trumpet to aduertise him that he was come according to his assignment. In the meane time he takes information of *Urban*s abuses (being known and detested of all the world) and moreover he tryed the opinions of the Cardinals, to censure and depose Urban: who being aduertised herof, was so moued, as (not able to be reuenged of Charles), he imprisons 7 Cardinals (the most sufficient of his Colledge) without any other iust matter to charge them with, but that they were the learned, eldest and of greatest courage; and to make tryall of his forces, he sends his nephew Battilo against him with a troope, which this great Capaine suffered to be ouerthrowne, and himselfe to be taken. This successe daunted the courage of Urban, and enforced him to crauelease of Charles to retire himselfe: the which he easily obtained, by the intercession of the Seignurie of Genoa whither Urban pretended to goe. Departing from Nocera, he led with him these Cardinals prisoners, and delirous to be rid of them, hee caused one to be slaine upon the way, pretending that he was sicke, and abandoned his body: he caused five others to be sewed vp in sacks, and to be cast into the sea, as he passed to Genoa. Being there, he commanded three others to be apprehended (being zealous that they had intelligence with the rest) and in the presence of all the people, hee causeth them to be knockt on the head, and then he dries their bodies in an Oven, and preferred them in chests, the which he caused to be caried before him upon moles, when as he did ride: and for a mark what they were, hee set their red hats upon the chests. The originall notes this extraordinary cruelty in Pope Urban.

At this end Charles dies in Hungary, but *Urban*s spleene continues against his children. He had left two, Ladislaws & Joane, who by the vertuous protection of their mother Marguerit kept both themselves and their estate out of his hands. Urban sleeps neither day nor night, thirsting continually after their ruine. And for that he found by Charles, that the Hungarians feared not his spirituall lightning, he grounds his designs upon temporal armes: and knowing they are not to be raised without money, hee likes the meane to leauie a great masse. To this end he ordaines a Iubile, as a solemne feast for all Christendome, and to draw more people therunto, he sends new indulgences and pardons into all parts vnder his obedience. A deuice to get money, the people being peraued by his Buis that it was the onely meane to purchase Paradise, and to auoide the paines of Purgatory. He also challengeth the right of first fruits, which giues the first yeeres reuerenues of all benefices to the Pope, and so continues vnto this day.

But as he gathers together this money with a wonderfull greedinesse, behold hee falls from this moile and bruisteth himselfe. The worke of heauen, and wearable to his insolent ambition, who soaring too high, makes him fall low: dying when his hatred was greatest to ruine his enemies. He languished seuen and twenty dayes in the bed of death, dying by degrees, suffering the paines which hee caused his poore Cardinals to endure: not able with his death, to wipe out the immortall hate of his detestable life, disgraced by all Writers. Thus Urban the sixth, the first guidon of Schisme, dyed in the eleuenth yeare of his Popedom. In whose place Peter Thomace, named Boniface the ninth, is chosen Pope, successor to *Urban*s couetousnesse, as his life and death doth witnesse. Niem obserues a memorable act. Boniface lying at the point of death, some one (to comfort him) said that hee should doe well. A brutish custome, as if to speake of death to a sicke body, were to pronounce the sentence of a Iudge, to deliuer him into the executioners hands. I should doe well (saith he) if I had money, and yet he had full houses, hauing then but ten houres to liue. So he dyed the tenth yeare of his Popedom, not lamented to any, but he liued too long, and by his impudent couetousnesse opened the gate to all impunity of sinne.

Innocent the seventh, succeeded in the place of Boniface, no more innocent then the former, verifiying the beauty of their names by the bounty of their liues. A sworne enemy to the union of the Church, causing two Roman citizens to be put to death as seditious, for that they moved him therein, as Platina doth observe. He continued but two years: and into his place Angelo Carrier a Venecian, called Gregory the 12 was advanced: a subtil and dissembling man, coldly ambitious, and faintly holy, hauing no piety but in shew: so as for his crooked manners he was called Errorius for Gregorius, that is to say, a Deceiuer, drawing men into error with his goodly shew. All this was done at Rome by the Italians: in the meane time what doe our Popes at Auignon? Clement the 7 making profession of the same authority which the Pope did at Rome, was no better then the other, although the History notes not so many priuate acts of his excesses. In general, he was excellent in the beginning and cautious during all the time of his Popedom. He was exceedingly ambitious and wilfull, vnder colour of modesty and humility. Hee furnished him but two years. After the death of Clement the 7, they create a new Pope, to oppose against him at Rome, which was Peter de la Lune, a Spaniard borne, but hauing liued long at Montpellier to study the Law. A man of sound iudgement, learning, active, patient in shew, but in effect very ambitious, a dissembler, given to his owne will, and tyed to his profit: free from cruelty (whereof hee is not taxed) giuing free scope to couetousnesse. So greuous was the impudency of merchandize in the Church, (sayes Niem, and Platina) set to the ruin of all Christendome, that the authority of the keyes and Aposolike letters, were contemptible to the whole world. Truly as all diseases grow by degrees through lufes taken vnadvisedly, and bad humors which creepe insensibly into the body: euen so these miseries into the Church. All was set to sale, all sorts of benefices, especially Cardinals hats, were for them that would giue most. The reuenues, impropriations, and all things else, were sold to him that offered most: Sometimes one benefice was sold to many, and all their money fell into good hands, that had learned to receive and not to restore againe. The composition for all sorts of crimes, & whole townes were sold by the authority of the soueraigne Pastor. I write but a part of that which the Popes Secretaries haue let downe at large, and tremble to report the iudgement they make of these abominable confusions.

To conclude, all Christendome (tyred with these disorders committed by such a wicked authority to order) complained much to their Kings and Princes, who wishing a redresse, exhorted the Popes of both seas, Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth, to leaue their priuate quarrels, for the generall good of the Church. Benedict makes great shewes to desire it: That if he must needs yeeld, he is ready to leaue the dignitie wherein the Church had honoured him, yes, his owne life. (these are his very words) for the peace of Gods Church Gregory speaks more coldly, yet he promises the like: but when it came to performance, they were but shifts, delays, and other deuices to winne time, and to retain still their authority, which neither of them would leaue.

In the end, at the great instance of Kings and Princes, the Colledges of Rome and Auignon agree to meet at Pisa, to find some meanes to determine of this reproachfull confusion. Benedict yeelds: but Gregory opposeeth. Notwithstanding his refusal, all meet at Pisa. Thus all assembled (whither the Emperor, the Kings of France, England, Spaine, Scotland, Portugall, Hungary, Denmarke, Sweden, Pologne and Norway, send their Ambassadors, and the Churches of the East their Deputies) hauing debated the Controuersie depending betwixt Gregory and Benedict, they depose them both, as nourishing a Schisme in the Church, and refusing to obey the Councell, whereas neither they nor their Deputies had appeared. In their place they chosse Alexander the fifth a Candior, held to be learned and vertuous, but he dyed within the first yeere of his Popedom. So as the Colledge of Cardinals (retyring to Bologna) created John the 23 in his place.

But neither Gregory nor Benedict omitted any thing of their traine, scornning the decrees of the Councell. So as for one Pope, they had three, the one at Rimini, the other at Bologna, and the third at Auignon: and the last being worse then the first, shall giue a reasonable good cause of further inquiry to Christian Princes in another season, the which wee will attend by order of the History, will returne into France, to our Charles the seuenth, in the ioy of his Coronation, which was to him & to all his subjects a happy foretelling of the restoring of his realme, but this excellent worke was not so soon ended.

Wee must now see by what degrees Charles recovered the possession of the townes subdued by the English, and how he expelled them out of this realme. The second parcell is set downe by vs in the front of this discourse.

A

By what meanes and degrees, the townes subdued by the English, returned to the obedience of this Crowne, and how the English were chased out of this Realme.

From the year 1429 to 1454 after the ebbing and flowing of many actions, and the accord of the Duke of Bourgonne with Charles, long debated, and in the end obtained by the meanes of the Duke of Bourbon. Paris yeelds to the King. The other Cities and Provinces of this Realme, one after another, in diuers seasons, and by diuers occasions, returne to the King, as to their head: and expell the stranger, who held the State.

To the reduction of Paris are 7 yeares, to the full restoring of the Realme 18; and in all 25 yeares after his Coronation.

THIS happy beginning of the Kings affaires, seemed to bring with it a generall restoring of his whole Realme, by the absolute obedience of all Townes. 1 Provinces. But God which gouernes Nature by seasons, and giues not haruest when as they sow the seed, he doth likewise gouerne the society of mankind by degrees, that the force of mans industry, of it selfe, may appeare vaine and nothing, and not successefull but by his grace, without whom man can doe nothing. We haue hitherto seene into what distresse the preseruer of this Estate hath drawne both the King and Realme; but in the end his providence shall appeare no lesse admirable in prefering it.

The Duke of Bedford wonderfully discontented with his happy successe, resolues to stop the course, both by force and policy. To this end hee sends to England for succours both of men and money: he leaues all he can in France, and practiseth with the Duke of Bourgonne, who was held of both parties to haue power to strike the last stroke in this equality of affaires. So as finding himselfe fought vnto by them all, he entreaines them all, giuing Charles secretly to vnderstand, that hee was for him, and yet hee presently takes armes for the English. A man wholly addicted to his affaires, hauing no other object but his owne greatnesse, yet shall hee effect no wonders, being now so much sought vnto.

Charles parts from Rheims, to obserue his enemies way, he passeth by Soissons, Chateau, Thierry, Prouence, Couffy in Bry, and comes to Crespy in Valois, all these townes shake off the English yoke to obey him. Bedford was at Senlis, with an army of ten thousand men, from thence he writes Letters of defiance to Charles, as to the viurper of the Realme. He represents vnto him at large, the compassion he had of the poore French people, so long oppressed with warre, and doth challenge him to appoint a day and place, to end this long misery, either by a peace or battell. A part ill acted by a stranger, for who could beleue these protestations, in the mouth of a stranger, against the heire of the Crowne?

Charles answers him by effects, and offers himselfe to the combat: the English Army was before Senlis, being lodged in that renowned Temple of Victory, the ancient monument of the valour of Philip Augustus. The French Army was opposite against them without hedge or bush, in a large plaine. The King called a Councell, whether he should giue battell. The Virgin held opinion they should not hazard these happy beginnings vpon a doubtfull combat, being sufficient to stay the enemy, in shewing him the army, without striking. So as these two armies stood two daies together in battell, looking one vpon another without mouing, although many skirmishes seemed to offer occasion to draw them to a generall fight. In the end there was a repulsed charge of some fore-lorne hopes, Picards and French, but the battels stood firme. After this countenance Bedford takes his way to Paris, to auoide the alterations which the Kings approach and prosperitie might breed. Charles hauing receiued the obedience of Champagne, Senlis, Creil, Beauuois, Pont Saint Maxence, Choyli, Gournay, Remy, Neuville, Mognay, Chantilly, Saint Rains, & other places thereabouts, with the homages of the Signeuries of Montmorency and Mouy, hee marcheth towards Paris, vpon promise made by the Bourguignon, to be receiued by the Citizens. Being at Saint Denis, hee not onely finds Bedford in Armes without the City, but also the City well guarded by the inhabitants, so as the Virgin seeking to surprize Saint Honories ditch, had like to have bene taken, being for a wounded, and losing a goodly troope of her best and most resolute souldiers. The inconsiderate desire which Charles had to winne the loue of the Duke of Bourgogne, did much preiudice his affaires, for all Picardy held him in great esteeme, especially the great townes of Amiens, Abbeville, and Saint Quintin: but the respect he bare the Bourguignons, made him to neglect these occasions to his great hurt. Having therefore found this passage to be very perillous, he retires into Berry, and the duke of Bedford (freed from the feare of his forces) goes into Normandy, where the Constable Richmond had surprized Eureux, Aumale, Chasteaugailard, and Andely, places of importance in that Prouince.

The institution of the Golden Fleece.

But during these alterations, the duke of Bourgogne married with Isabel, daughter to the King of Portugall, adding this third wife to his two former deceased. The Duchesse of Bedford was at this marriage, not in regard of the feast, but for her husbands affaires. The Bourguignon conducts her to Paris with four thousand armed men, where he renews the League more strongly, (somewhat shaken through the affaires of Isabelle Countesse of Hainault) with his brother in law. There he made the order of the Golden Fleece; as if he had already conquered the Gardens of Hesperides, like a second Iason: but he determined to make violent warre against Charles the year following: and returning into Picardy, he tooke Gournay and Choisy, places lately subdued to the Crowne. Melun, Sens, and Villeneuve le Roy, gaue a happy beginning to this year, yielding to the Kings obedience, but the losse of the Virgin Isane, and the taking of Pothon, two of the greatest and most valiant heads of the Army, quailed all the ioy of these conquests. The Tragedie was thus acted.

The Virgin taken.

The Bourguignon hauing taken Choisy by force, hee buies Soissons of the Captaine that commanded: and to he marcheth against Champagne with his Army, with whom the Earles of Suffolke and Arondel ioyne, with two thousand men. The Virgin issues forth with a notable troope of the best souldiers, to charge the besiegers, who being too farre engaged in the fight alone, was taken by the Bastard of Vendome, and presently brought to the duke of Bourgogne. He reioyced much at this notable prize, as having conquered all Charles his good fortunes, and referres her as a triumph for the Duke of Bedford, whose proceedings we will now set downe.

Pothon taken and delivered.

Pothon was then taken vnadvisedly. The Archbishop of Rheims being Chancellor, with the Lords of Saint Seuer and Boufflaie, Marshals of France, being at Beauuais, he hold a yong shepheard comes vnto them, assuring them, that God had reuealed vnto him a meanes to take Rouen. They (taking the vanity of this foole for present payment) as if God had raised vp a new Oracle, in the declining of the other, by the surprize of the Virgin) arme inconsiderately, singing a triumph before the victory. The English (adversary of their departure and numbers) meet and surprize them, at Nully neere vnto Beauuais, when as they looked least for them, finding the like men newly dislodged, without order or feare, and ouercame them easily. Pothon struing to make head with a squadron of five hundred and twenty Lances, presteth too farre in among the enemies, as he is taken: and by Talbot himselfe, whom he had taken at the battell of Patay, and so well intreated, as Talbot made him a good requital, for hauing embraced him as a brother, hee honourably gaue him his liberty, and sent him in safety to Beauuais. Thus honesty and humanity reapes what it hath sowne. A good turne is neuer lost among men of honour. An example for such manage ames honourably, in whom there is nothing more vnworthy then cruelty, especially against the weakness of a prisoner. Cruelty is fitter for theues and Cannibals, whom they call Antrophophages, or eaters of men, but courtesie becomes good souldiers, who are likewise Conquerors, winning their hearts by courtesie, whose bodies they had conquered by force.

The Virgin brought to Rouen.

The Virgin Isane was not so well intreated by the duke of Bedford, who hauing bought her for ready money, of John of Luxembourge, as the best prisoner of the army, he caught her to be brought to Rouen, being resolved to put her to death. The honour of the law of armes, and the consequence which made all them guilty, which should hereafter be taken by the French, did contradict his will: but the vnuly passion of his deadly hatred conceived against this maiden (as hauing ruined his affaires in France) prevailed above reason. And hauing no colour to put her to death, as a prisoner of the warre, he resolves to

A make her a prisoner of Iustice: but the Magistrates would not heare of it. Vpon their refusal, he hath recourse to the Diuines. And as the Oracle Apollo spake, according vnto the money that was giuen, sometimes for Philip of Macedon, sometimes for the Athenians; so the Diuines (being pensioners to the English in this act) made their diuinity English.

Condemned for a heretic and burnt.

After they had grauely consulted and resolved on the matter: they declare Isane to be against kinde, hauing abused her sex, bearing the habit of a man, against the expresse word of God, a witch working by deuills, without the which she could not haue performed so many extraordinary deeds, nor obtained such a memorable successe, and so by consequence an Idolatresse, a schismatike and an heretike. This was decreed in the Vniuersity of Paris, with many hands to the condemnation. This conclusion (being carefully procured by the Duke of Bedford) was presented by him to Peter Cauchon Bishop of Beauuais, whom he requested to proceed speedily in the cause. The Bishop assembles the Deane and Chapter at Rouen, hee calls the Abbot of Fescamp thither with a new supply of Diuines for the execution of this Decree. There is nothing more easie then to doe euill. And although they were all possessed with English passions, yet could they not so soone resolve themselves against her; so as they were long in suspense, before they could condemne her, for she answered pertinently to all their accusations. In the end violence prevailed, she which (being muffled with the cloake of religion and iustice) condemned Isane (as guilty of the aboue named crimes) to perpetual prison: but in the end being deliuered by the Bishop to the secular power, the Duke of Bedford caused her to be burnt at Rouen, in the year 1431, the sixth of Iuly.

The siege of Compagne.

Thus she happily serued France one whole year, and was prisoner somewhat more, leauing a great griefe to those that liued then, to see her so intreated: and a memory of immortal praise to come, hauing bene so profitable and necessary an instrument, for the deliuey of our Country being almost ruined. But the wise prouidence of God had limited both her labours and her life. Hee would onely vie her in the beginning, to shew that Charles hath not bene the Author of the restoring of this Estate, but God himselfe, who would shame men by a maide, most worthy to be honoured by our posterity. I haue reported at once what was acted in two yeeres, being all of one subiect: not to breake off the order of my discourse in matters which follow after. And now I will return to Compagne besieged by the Bourguignon. As all the French were much amazed for the losse of Isane, so the English and Bourguignons were greatly incouraged to presse the siege of Compagne with greater heate. This important City (feared vpon the riuer of Oize, at the entry of Picardy) had greatly furthered the Bourguignon, who for this reason was resolved to haue it either by lone or force. He doth againe negotiate with Charles, assuring him of his loue. Charles (bewitched with the charmes of this Bourguignon) giues care to his new deuices, and (forgetting that hee had bene abused,) hee promiseth to deliuer Compagne into his hands. The Bourguignon accepts it: and the better to play his part, he draws his Portuguese to Noyon, being one of the cunningest women in the world, and most affected to her husband, as a gage of the loue he had promised to Charles, the which she should manage. The Lord of Flauay Governour of Compagne, had receiued severall commandements from the King to deliuer it, but he excuseth himselfe, desiring to haue a more ample warrant from the King. He shewes him the importance of the place, and the willfulness of the inhabitants, and so denying his Master honestly that which might bee preiudiciall vnto him, hee dischargeth the duty of a good seruant. Truly it is a good seruice to deny the Master when as he commands that is hurtfull vnto himselfe. This policy succeeding not for the Duke of Bourgogne, to surprize Compagne, he resolves to haue it by force: Bedford sends the Earle of Huntington with a thousand English Archers to fortifie this siege. John of Luxembourge (who was there for the Bourguignon) builds great forts to keepe them from succors, and for a reuerent he doth fortifie the Abbeies of Venete and Royaulieu. The Inhabitants were in great extremity, yet were they resolute to endure all, vnder their wife and faithfull governour, rather then to fall into the hands of strangers, whose gripes they had formerly felt. If they were fiercely besieged by the English & Bourguignons, so were they as well succoured by the French, vnder the happy command of the Earle of Vendome governour of Beauuais, & the Marshall of Boufflaie, who (hauing valiantly forced the first bastions) enter the towne, and hauing virtualled it they issue forth, with great resolution, so as they take all the other forts, to their enemies great losse. So Huntington and Luxembourg retire with disgrace, leaving not onely that Country free, but their victuals, artillery, munition and habilliments of warre in their lodgings of Venete and Royaulieu, saving themselves with some difficulty, at Pont l'Esque, through the fauour of Noyon. The Bourguignon was so amazed, as he retired into Arthois, hauing as bad successe by force as by policy.

Our French forces being masters of the field, they recouer all the Bourguignons conquests. Choyfly, Gournay, Bertueil, Garmigny, Rellons, Pont Remy, Pont Saint Maxence, Longueil, Saint Mary, la Boyssiere, Ireligny, Vernueil, and other places, where he had gathered together all the corne and cattell of the Country, the which was restored to the poore people, to their great content. The Bourguignons pride thus taken downe (after so many victorious hopes) was a principall part of this victory. But he resolves to take his revenge of this affront. Being come to Arras, hee gathers together all the forces he can, and from thence he goes to Peronne, to attend the body of his army. His intent was to recouer what hee had lost in this last warre of Compeigne, meaning to beginne Garmigny, which did greatly annoy all that Country. Hee finds a troope of 600 men before vnder the conduct of Thomas Tirrel an Englishman. Girard of Brimeu gouernour of Rozeauents this troope with a hundred of his men. In this order they goe to the siege of Garmigny as to a marriage: but Porbon (who had his spies in all places, and had put himselfe into Garmigny, at the brute of this siege) slept not. Hauing therefore first to discouer the enemies countenance, hee learns that these Picards (being neere to bechoire) did hunt after haire, (whereof there are great store in those parts,) and that the troope was wholly in disorder, running vp and downe with great cries. Porbon embraced this occasion suddenly, and hauing drawne his men to field, hee surpriseth these haunnes, being disperfed and out of breath, hee defeats them, kills them, and in the end cries, that they should take the run aways. The Commander is taken, with most of their best men. Anthony of Vienne and the Lord of Hailly (being greatly lamented by the Bourguignon) were first led to Garmigny, and then to Compiegne in great triumph.

The newes hereof did greatly trouble the Bourguignon, especially when as the Earle of Vendosme went with the French army to braue him at the gates of Roze, offering him battell. He made shew to accept thereof, but hauing called a Councell, he framed a reasonable excuse, that his souldiers were not willing he should fight in the end of the year. With these affronts the year ends: and with the death of a sonne which hee had by his new spouse, whom he loued dearly, his spirits were so oppressed with sorrow for this losse, as this Prince (being too passionate) had speeches vnworthy the grauity of his person, and the greatnesse of his blood, weeping and wishing for death. Doubtlesse it comes out that heeuen which is too much puffed vp in prosperity, is easily daunted in adversity. A goodly lesson for great men (who cannot learne but by great examples) that their greatnesse doth not free them from the common condition of mankind: that they are men and must die like men. O man! whatsoeuer thou best, behold good remedies against these extremities of fortune: neither to be drunke with prosperity, nor drowned in adversity. These few succeeding years hauing nothing memorable, but an entry to the obedience of the City of Paris, which shall giue example to all the rest of the Realme. The weaknesse of parties was necessary for the making of an accord. The Duke of Bourgongne might do much, but his infinite desires had transported him beyond the clouds, without some checke. These small disgraces did greatly blemish his credit with the Duke of Bedford, who expected more from him then hee found by the effects: but that which made a breach in their loues was the sudden death of Anne Duchesse of Bedford, sister to Philip Duke of Bourgongne, the gage of their cold friendship, which till then was very necessary, but after her decease it was but superficiall, although in this occurrent their league was not apparently broken. The one weepes for his wife, and the other for his sister. The beginning of this year was noised by the taking of Montargis from the French, through the notable treason of a woman, who gaue entrance to the English, and who presently reaped the fruits of her treachery. But let vs attend the year following, where we shall see a meruailous change in this miserable towne. At the same time, in recompence of Montargis, Chartres returnes to the Kings obedience. The meanes is worthy obsequation, being put in practice in our times in many places. A carter liuing at Char-

res had a brother resident in Court with a Treasurer. The familiarity this carter had to goe and come into the towne, made him both desirous, and to lay the plot of so memorable an enterprise. Neere vnto the gate there was an old ruined house, in the which there was a great vaulte filled vp with rubbish: here they lodge a hundred men: on the other side they conuay a thousand men, secretly in the night, into a house neere vnto the towne. The carter comes at the breake of day with his cart vnto the port, where his ouerthrowes it of purpose, saying that a wheele was split. While the guard labours to helpe him, shee amoueth issues forth out of these ruines, and surpriseth the port, and the next second they with such speed, as the City is won. This had beene done without any effusion of blood, if the bishop had not animated the inhabitants to fight against their King, where he himselfe was slaine with some of the Citizens. About this time, René Duke of Barre brother to Lewis Duke of Anjou, and King of Sicilia, (who shall make himselfe famous in the following reigne) receiued a great checke. Hee had a notable quarrell against the Earle of Vaudemont, pretending the Earldome: from words they goe to blowes; René fortifies himselfe with the forces of France: Vaudemont with those of Bourgongne. René being farre stronger in shew, besiegeth the towne of Vaudemont, and when as the Earle, with the helpe of his friends, would haue raised the siege, René draws him to fight, defying him, and promising to himselfe an assured victory. But God (the foueraine Iudge of these factions) gaue it to the Earle, and René remained prisoner in the hands of the D. of Bourgongne, to whom hee payed a great ranfome. In the end, by the dukes meanes yielding him his liberty, this quarrell was ended, marrying the eldest son of René with the daughter of the Earle of Vaudemont. But let vs reserve the rest to the following reigne.

About the end of this yeare, a solemnity was done in Paris, which carried more shew then substance. We haue said before, how that Henry the sixth King of England, had been crowned King of France, when as our Charles was crowned at Poitiers, after the decease of his father. Henry was but two yeares old, and came not out of England, vntill that Charles had beene solemnly crowned at Rheims, to the great ioy of all the French; but when as the Duke of Bedford found, how much this authentick publication advanced the affaires of Charles, hee caused Henry to be brought into France, and to be crowned at Paris, with an extraordinary Maiesty, to our countenance Charles his Coronation, by a greater shew of pompe. But the blood of France cannot diffemble: no man was moued thereat, no more then to see a Tragedy acted vpon a Stage. This yeare is very barren of all memorable exploits, but that this silence noted an entrance to an accord (both parties being weary of pleading) yet with great slacknesse, as we see in diseases which come suddenly, and passe away slowly: we must therefore crosse this rough way before we come to Paris. Montargis taken by the English as we haue said, was now recouered by the French, but after a diuers manner; for the English lost the towne by the Castle, and the French by the Castle by the towne, yet were they three months in winning of the Castle. Hauing taken all, they lost all by the same meanes that made them so much to gape after the castle, which was the want of money. This shameful losse grieved many of the greatest in Court, and bred a new trouble by this occasion.

Tremouille was yet in great credit with the King, hauing by this meanes a great hand in the State: they accused him to haue heaped vp great treasure, to the preiudice of such as daily employed their liues for the Kings seruice. The greater men resolute to take Tremouille prisoner, and to punish him like vnto Giar, and others before mentioned. The King was at his Castell at Chinon: Tremouille follows him as his shadow; but it chanced, as he was in his chamber, the Lords of Bruell, Coytiuy and Ferard, followed with forty armed men, enter and take him, not one of a hundred of that fort could escape; but fixe thousand Crownes saued his life, hoping to returne againe into credit. The Constable of Richmond grows into greater fauour then before. Thus misfortune is good for something. Bedford puffed vp with the successe of Montargis, takes Milly in Gassenois: but hauing besieged Lagny in Brye, he was repulsed: at the same time, John of Luxembourg (of the Bourguignon faction) is dispossessed of Ligny in Barrois, by the Lady of Comery. A disgrace which shall draw the Bourguignon to a composition so much desired, together with the happy successe of the French, in the Country of Arthois, the taking of St. Valerien in Pontieu, and the generall wauering of the chiefe towne in Picardy, tired with these confusions, being to great, as no man was assured of his person, of what party hee;

if hee were the weaker. The Cardes were so shuffled, as an English man would become French, to take a Bourguignon, and a French man become English, or a Bourguignon to take a Frenchman. These vniking trecheries were vsual, especially at Amiens, Abbeville, and throughout all Picardy, where the warres had bene most licentious. Which outrage hath bene reuined in our miserable age, through the cruelty of these wretched warres, which causeth men to make shipwracke both of faith and honour.

This yeare had a plausible beginning, but without any great effect. The Councell of Pisa being assembled (as we haue said) to redresse the confusion of Antipopes, and to reduce the Church (diuided by this schisme) vnto vnion, sends the Cardinal of Auxerre vnto the Kings of France and England, to exhort them vnto peace. Charles protested that he desired nothing more; the English said the like. They assemble to this end at Auxerre in great troops, but at their first meeting, all this treaty was broken off, for both the one and the other, stood vpon the quality of King of France, being the fundamentall point of all their quarrell. The Duke of Bedford spake more proudly then Charles himselfe, as if the law of State (which maintained this Monarchy) had been made in England, and it should become firme land; and France changed to this Isle of Albion or of Britany: of such force error euen in matters of State, when as passion ouer-rules the light of reason. So as they all depart without any effect: They only conclude a truce, for the great want of the poore people, who could suffer no more. But this truce was a pit-fall for many, trusting the countenance of this courteous warre, which making profession to meane nothing, is more to be feared when it smiles, then when it frowaes.

John Duke of
in England.

We haue said, that John Duke of Bourbon was taken prisoner in the battell of Azincourt, whom they could neuer redeeme at any rate. This yeare he died in England, and his sonne Charles succeeded him. He had to wife the sister of the Duke of Bourgongne, but they fall to words for their rights, and so to warre. Charles takes from Philip Grancy, Aulion, Percepertuis, Mucy, l'Euefque, Chaumont, and other places: The Bourguignon had his reuenge, and besiegeeth Belleuille in Beauuillois, belonging vnto Charles. Mary Duchesse of Berry, labours to reconcile these Princes, and drawes them to a peace, the which shall soone be a meane of a generall accord betwixt the Bourguignon and France, by the mediation of the Duke of Bourbon, a profitable instrument of so good a worke. This occasion not prevented, was seconded by another, for the Duke of Bedford, after the death of his wife (being sister to the Duke of Bourgongne) marries with Jaquelin the daughter of Peter of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Pol, who was no friend to the Bourguignon: and moreover the youth and beauty of this new spouse, had so bewitched Bedford, as hee was easily drawne from Philip, whose loue he entertained with great difficulty, yet in respect of the generall cause they made a good shew, and had met at St. Omer to that effect, but this interview encreased their discontentes.

Bedford marries
againe.

In the meane time, the truce (being ill obserued on either side) is conuerted into a languishing war. Bedford makes war in the Country of Mayen by Scales and Willowby, two renowned Captaines, which besiege S. Celerin. Charles succours it by the Lord of Bueil, who hauing lodged some troopes at Viuin, (a village of small account) made it famous by a notable peece of seruice. Scales aduerted of these troopes lodged in this hamlet, hasts thither, surprizeth them, and cuts them in peeces: but the Lord of Bueil had his reuenge: for falling vpon the Conquerours, who returned in disorder, hee puts them to rout. Charlier notes it for a notable seruice, that forty lances overthrow a thousand five hundred men, which were slaine, or taken prisoners: of such force is disorder and amazement in warre. The siege of Saint Celerin being thus raised, to the great disgrace of the English, Bedford much grieved for this affront, sends the Earle of Arondel thither with new forces. It was at the same time when as Charles went into Dauphine: the fame of this notable victory, holding mens minds in suspense, so as Arondel takes Saint Celerin by force, and from thence he marcheth to Silley le Guil-laume. The Gouernour fearing to want succours, treats with Arondel; That if by a prefixed day, the French were not the stronger, at a certaine Elme neere vnto the place, hee would then yield vp the Towne, and for assurance thereof giues him hostages. The Court was troubled at this summons: all post thither, fearing to continue their shame with losse, Princes and Officers of the Crowne, the Duke of Alenfon and Aniou, the Constable of Richmont, the Marshalls of Boufflac, Rieux, and Retz: the Lords of Loheac, Grauille, and Bueil, with

A his good fortune. Being all come to the Elme at the day appointed, they summon the Earle of Arondel to deliuer vp his hostages and to fight with them, but hee yields vp his hostages and leaues the siege. The halt of the omitted voyage makes our men to post presently to Court. Arondel returns to the siege of Silley, and not able to take it, he surprizeth Beaumont le Vicont, but pressed with sicknesse hee retires to Mans, a Towne then vnder their obedience.

The voyage of Dauphine was performed. Charles comes to Vienne passing through Auvergne. The reason of this progresse was to settle matters in Dauphine, Lionois, and Languedoc, which Countries had serued him faithfully and profitably in his greatest afflictions. All the chiefe of those Countries attend him, and hold their Estates by his commandement. The ioy both of Charles and his subiects was exceeding great after so long and dangerous a storme. Charles did gladly embrace his ancient seruants, the Earle of Foix, Gaucourt, and Groslee, with the Nobility of Vauarez and Dauphine, who had giuen him so great testimonies of their faith and valour. All men were confirmed in their governments, no man was denyed of what he demanded, which giues them courage to doe their best endeavors in his seruice. The Statcs grant the King a notable sum of money for the maintenance of his warres.

We haue obserued the humor of Amedee duke of Sauoy, who during the doubtfulnesse of the French affaires, had caried a watchfull eye, to make his profit by their confusion. C Being well informed, that Charles loued him not, he fortifies himselfe by alliances. Hee had giuen his eldest daughter to Lewis of Aniou King of Sicily, and now hee marries his Sonne Lewis Earle of Geneva with Anne the daughter of John of Lusignan King of Cyprus, from whence the title of the Realme of Cipres comes to the House of Sauoy. This marriage was honored with the presence of the duke of Bourgongne, the Earle of Neuers, and the Prince of Orange. These were good cautions for Amedee against Charles: but we shall soone see that he will find another expedient against all euent. As a tree in the fappe sheweth that the spring is neer, so diuers popular accidents chancing this yeare, foretold what should happen. There were 60000 men in arme against the English in Vexin-Norman, and in Caux 20000. Charles doth carefully embrace those occasions, and encouraging them both by letters and messages, he sends them notable Commanders, the Duke of Alenfon with the Lords of Loire and Bueil, braue and valiant captaines. But as a tree that sprouts forth the fauour of a warme season, is stayed by a sharpe wind, so all these popular braueries were soone danted, and this stream was soone turned. The townes that were mutined yeeld to the English force, but they keepe their hearts for their King, vnill they may shake off the English yoke.

The French

against the English.

But the wise prouidence of God, who governs the work for the restoring of this estate, raised vp meanes which all the humane policy of Charles or of his Councell could not foresee, who had laboured by all meanes to win the Bourguignons loue. Hee harboured in his heart a resolute discontent against the English: to whom he imputed the cause of all E his crosses and disgraces. The Liegeios crosse him many waies in the possession of Namur newly fallen vnto him. Antwerp and Arras are discontented, and ready to rise against him. The English (in his opinion) is the author and fauourer of these discontents, and it may be did all he could to molest him, what shew soeuer he made. But howsoeuer it were, the Bourguignon (meaning to make an open breach with him) compounds all quarrels with this discontented people, intending to make a firme peace with Charles. So the yeare 1434 passeth without any great alteration.

This yeare 1435 shall be more happy for the French then the former. Charles besiegeth Gerberoy by Pothon and la Hire. The English come to succour it, led by the Earle of Arondel, being a thousand against lesse then five hundred. Our men therefore resolute to retire to Beauuais, but they must account with the stronger. There is but one meane of safety, to hope for no helpe. So these braue warriours resolute to fight, and are victors: for the English troopes are defeated: eleven or eight hundred slaine vpon the place, and all the rest prisoners. The Earle of Arondel (being grievously wounded) dies at Beauuais, a braue and resolute Captaine, dying in the bed of honour. This was the beginning of the yeare: the winter was very sharpe, but it daunted not the courage of our warriours. The Earle of Dunois (a bastard of Orleans) was the ring-leader in many exploits: hee causeth Saint Denis to be surprized by Captaine Degenulle, and he follows

if hee were the weaker. The Cardes were so shuffled, as an English man would become a French, to take a Bourguignon, and a French man become English, or a Bourguignon to take a Frenchman. These vnkind trecheries were vsuall, especially at Amiens, Abbeville, and throughout all Picardy, where the warres had bene most licentious. Which outrage hath bene reuiued in our miserable age, through the cruelty of these wretched warres, which causeth men to make shipwracke both of faith and honour.

This yeare had a plausible beginning, but without any great effect. The Councell of Pisa being assembled, (as we haue said) to redresse the confusion of Antipopes, and to reduce the Church (diuided by this schisme) vnto vnion, sends the Cardinal of Auxerre vnto the Kings of France and England, to exhort them vnto peace. Charles protested that he desired nothing more; the English said the like. They assemble to this end at Auxerre in great troops, but at their first meeting, all this treaty was broken off, for both the one and the other, stood vpon the quality of King of France, being the fundamentall point of all their quarrell. The duke of Bedford spake more proudly then Charles himselfe, as if the law of State (which maintained this Monarchy) had been made in England, an Island become firme land; and France changed to this Isle of Albion or of Britany: of such force error euen in matters of State, when as passion ouer-rules the light of reason. So as they all depart without any effect: They only conclude a truce, for the great want of the poore people, who could suffer no more. But this truce was a pit-fall for many, trusting the countenance of this courteous warre, which making profession to meane nothing, is more to be feared when it smiles, then when it frowaes.

John Duke of
in England.

We haue said, that John Duke of Bourbon was taken prisoner in the battell of Azincourt, whom they could neuer redeeme at any rate. This yeare he died in England, and his sonne Charles succeeds him. He had to wife the sister of the Duke of Bourgongne, and they fall to words for their rights, and so to warre. Charles takes from Philip Grancy, Auailon, Pereperuis, Mucy, Veneque, Chaumont, and other places: The Bourguignon had his reuenge, and besiegeth Belleuile in Beauuetois, belonging vnto Charles. Mary Duchesse of Berry labours to reconcile these Princes, and draws them to a peace, the which shall soone be a meane of a general accord betwixt the Bourguignon and France, by the mediation of the Duke of Bourbon, a profitable instrument of so good a worke. This occasion not prevented, was seconded by another, for the Duke of Bedford, after the death of his wife (being sister to the Duke of Bourgongne) maries with Jaquelin the daughter of Peter of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Pol, who was no friend to the Bourguignon: and moreover the youth and beauty of this new spouse, had so bewitched Bedford, as hee was easily drawne from Philip, whose loue he entertained with great difficulty, yet in respect of the generall cause they made a good shew, and had met at St. Omer to that effect, but this interview encreased their discontents.

Bedford maries
againe.

In the meane time, the truce (being ill obserued on either side) is conuerted into a languishing war. Bedford makes war in the Country of Mayen by Scales and Willoughby, two renowned Captaines, which besiege S. Celerin. Charles succours it by the Lord of Bucil, who having lodged some troopes at Viuin, (a village of small accompt) made it famous by a notable peece of seruice. Scales aduerted of these troopes lodged in this hamlet, hasts thither, surpriseth them, and cuts them in peeces: but the Lord of Bucil had his reuenge: for falling vpon the Conquerours, who returned in disorder, hee puts them to rout. Chastier notes it for a notable seruice, that forty lances overthrow a thousand five hundred men, which were slaine, or taken prisoners: of such force is disorder and amazement in warre. The siege of Saint Celerin being thus raised, to the great disgrace of the English, Bedford much grieved for this affront, sends the Earle of Arondel thither with new forces. It was at the same time when as Charles went into Dauphine: the fame of this notable victory, holding mens minds in suspence, so as Arondel takes Saint Celerin by force, and from thence he marcheth to Silley le Guil laume. The Gouernour fearing to want succours, treats with Arondel: That if by a prefixed day, the French were not the stronger, at a certaine Elme neere vnto the place, hee would then yield vp the Towne, and for assurance thereof giues him hostages. The Court was troubled at this summons: all post thither, fearing to continue their shame with losse, Princes and Officers of the Crowne, the Duke of Alenfon and Aniou, the Constable of Richmont, the Marshalls of Boufflac, Ricux, and Retz: the Lords of Loheac, Grauille, and Bucil, with his his good fortune. Being all come to the Elme at the day appointed, they summon the Earle of Arondel to deliuer vp his hostages and to fight with them; but he yields vp his hostages and leaues the siege. The halt of the omitted voyage makes our men to post presently to Court. Arondel returnes to the siege of Silley, and not able to take it, he surpriseth Beaumont le Vicont, but pressed with sicknesse hee retires to Mans, a Towne then vnder their obedience.

The voyage of Dauphine was performed. Charles comes to Vienne passing through Auvergne. The reason of this progresse was to settle matters in Dauphine, Lionois, and Languedoc, which Countries had serued him faithfully and profitably in his greatest afflictions. All the chiefe of those Countries attend him, and hold their Estates by his commandement. The ioy both of Charles and his subiects was exceeding great after so long and dangerous a storme. Charles did gladly embrace his ancient seruants, the Earle of Foix, Gaucourt, and Groslee, with the Nobility of Vauarez and Dauphine, who had giuen him so great testimonies of their faith and valour. All men were confirmed in their governments, no man was denyed of what he demanded, which giues them courage to doe their best endeavors in his seruice. The Statcs grant the King a notable sum of money for the maintenance of his warres.

King Charles
makes a progress into Dauph in and Languedoc.

We haue obserued the humor of Amadee duke of Sauoy, who during the doubtfullnesse of the French affaires, had caried a watchfull eye, to make his profit by their confusion. Being well informed, that Charles loued him not, he fortifies himselfe by alliances. Hee had giuen his eldest daughter to Lewis of Aniou King of Sicily, and now hee maries his Sonne Lewis Earle of Geneva with Anne the daughter of John of Lusignan King of Cyprus, from whence the title of the Realme of Cipres comes to the House of Sauoy. This marriage was honored with the presence of the duke of Bourgongne, the Earle of Neuers, and the Prince of Orange. These were good cautions for Amadee against Charles: but we shall soone see that he will find another expedient against all euent. As a tree in the fappe sheweth that the spring is neere, so diuers popular accidents chancing this yeare, foretold what should happen. There were 60000 men in arme against the English in Vexin-Norman, and in Caux 20000. well accompanied to keepe it. In going along he takes Houdan, and then hee fortifies St. Denis with men and victuals, and leaues the Marshall of Rieux to gouerne it. And for that he would lose no time, he employes his troopes to take some places thereabouts, as Pont Saint Maxence, Orville and Meulan. The English had fortified Saint Ouy, to keepe the Country in alarme: Occasions are offered of daily skirmishes, and daily the English are beaten. But the long stay of this little army, and this thorne of St. Denis stirred vp the people of Paris, who loth to be so restrained, prepare a great power to force St. Denis at what place soeuer. The Marshall of Rieux, loth to engage himselfe (being in all thew the weaker) retires honourably to Meulan, without any losse. The English beat downe the defences of S Denis, being a common retreat to all men, without any more labour, either to keepe it or to recouer it.

The accord of Philip Duke of Bourgongne with Charles the Seuenth the French King.

IN the end behold an agreement made with Charles, so much expected, so vnprofitably sought after, and now freely offered by the duke of Bourgongne. The deputies of the Councell presse both French, English and Bourguignon, to end all quarrels, by some good composition. The City of Arras is allowed of by them all to treat in. The Assembly was great: from the Pope and the Councell of Pisa there came the Cardinals of Saint Croix and Cipres, with twelve bishops: for the French King there was the duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, the Earle of Vendosme, the Archbishop of Rheims Chancellor of France, the Lords of Harcourt, Valpergue, la Fayette, Saint Pierre, du Chastell, du Bois, Chastillon, du Fay, de Railly, Rommet, Curselles, and Cambrai first President of the Parliament at Paris, with many wise and learned men, as John Tudart, Blesier, John Charetier, Peter Clotel, Adam le Queux, John Taise, and la Muir. For the King of England, the Cardinals of York, and Winchester, the Earle of Suffolk, the Bishop of Saint Davids, John Ratcliffe keeper of the great Seale, the Lord of Haverford, Ralph the Wise, the Official of Canterbury, and some Doctors of Diuinity. For Philip duke of Bourgongne, there came the duke of Geldres, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishop of Cambrai, the Earle of Vermandour, the Bishop of Leege, the Earles of Vandemont, Neuers, Salines, Saint Pol, and Ligny, besides the Deputies of many of his best Townes. The pompe was great, both on the deuote behalfe, and of the duke of Bourgongne, who intertained them with all the honour and good cheare that might be wished. But leauing these circumstances, I make haste to the principall subiect. The Kings of France and England began the treaty. The fundamentall question was, to whom the Crowne of France belonged? The English did challenge it, both for that hee was issued from a daughter of France, as also by the Grant of Charles the first who did institute Henry the first and his Successours, Heires of the Crowne, and had disinherited Charles the seuenth, whom hee tearmed an Vturer. The Deputies for Charles answered, that they ought not to call in question the ground of the Estate, which cannot stand firme without that lawfull Heire to whom the Law appoints: and therefore without proving of that which was apparent of it selfe, they came to offers for the ending of all controuersies, That if the King of England would both disclaime the title of King of France, and yield vp the Countries held by him in diuers parts of the realme, he should enioy the duchies of Guicenne and Normandy, doing homage for them vnto the Kings of France as his Soueraigne, and with those conditions which his Ancestors, Kings of England, had formerly enioied them. They stood vpon their different tearmes: their authority was limited, and possession putt vp the English. But sometimes hee refuseth that after sues. He that striueth to haue all, most commonly loseth all. One moiety in effect had more auailed the English, then all in imagination, who in the end shall find, that the Soueraigne Iudge, the preseruer of the law, and of States, giues and takes away, appoints and disappoints, according to his good and wise will: and that there is no force, nor wise dome but his. The matter was soone ended betwix the Kings of France and England: seeing right could do no good, the sword must preuaile.

Thus the Ambassadors of England, returne without any effect: those of France stay to treat with the duke of Bourgongne and his deputies, amongst the which hee himselfe

A was the chiefe, as well for his owne interest, as for his iudgement in affaires. A man exceeding cunning, who could embrace all occasions to make his profit by another, as the discourse of his life hath made manifest. But to what end serues all this mortar, and so great workmanship, to frame a building which shall bee ruined vnder his sonne, and shall bury him in the ruines thereof? It is a foolish reason which thou callest reason, hauing no ground of reason, and doest not hearken to the voice of heauen. O fools! all thy riches shall be taken from thee this night. Man walks in a shadow, he toyes in vaine, to make his name immortal in the grave, he hunts with infinite labour and takes nothing. As for Charles, he sought to retire the Bourguignon from all league and alliance with the King of England, and taking from him all occasions of discontent, so to engage him by great gifts and honours, as he should resolve to follow his faction, as the most profitable, knowing that his owne private interest, was the chiefe end of his designs. Matters were caried in this according to the humour of that age, the disposition of the Court, and for the honour of Charles, who must aske the Duke of Bourgongne pardon, hauing caused his father to be slaine against his faith. But was it not true? must not the crime be confessed by him that was culpable? Charles therefore resolves to send him a blanke, and the accord doth testifie that the Bourguignon filled it with so many vnreasonable conditions, as it is strange for great a Monarch should stoop so much to his subiect and vassall, but necessity hath no law.

C A president for great men, not to attempt any thing against reason, lest they be constrained to repaire it with reason, and yet to know that it is an amendment of a fault to yield to necessity for the good of the State, being a great thrift to lose for gaine. The originall sets downe at large all the conditions of this Treaty: who so please may read them in Monfrellet, and in the history of S. Denis. The summe is, that the massacre committed on the person of John duke of Bourgongne at Montcreau-saut-yonne, is sufficiently repaired by confession and ceremonies. Great summes of present money with goodly Siegneuries are giuen to the Duke of Bourgongne: so many assurances for him and his, as a great volume is full of these scrupulous conditions.

The Duke of Bourgongne promises more simple, that hee should declare himselfe a friend to Charles the seuenth King of France, and enemy to his enemies: that he should renounce all alliance and friendship with the King of England, and promise both his person, and all his means to expell him out of France. The performance was according to promise: Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Arthur of Britany, Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, in the name of Charles the seuenth, aske pardon of the Duke of Bourgongne, for the death of his father, and the Duke pardoned him for the loss of God. The Cardinals (in the Popes name and the Councels) absolve the Duke from the oath which he had made vnto the English: and either part sweares to maintaine the accord in that which did concerne him. So the peace was published with great solemnity, to the incredible content of all men. The King, the Duke of Bourgongne, and the whole Realme reioyced exceedingly, onely John of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Pol, would not bee therein comprehended, he shall suffer for it, and his House after him. This was the 24 of September, in the year 1435. A famous day for those things which happened in this reigne, whereof this accord gaue the first occasion. The marriage of Charles sonne to the Duke of Bourgongne, with Katherine of France, daughter to our Charles, was concluded to seale this accord. From this peace sprung a more violent warre against the English. The Duke of Bourgongne sends backe all his contracts to the Duke of Bedford, and hauing shewed him the iust reasons which had moued him to embrace the Kings amity, being his kinsman and Lord, hee renounceth the alliance of England, with a watchword, that every one should looke to himselfe. Euery man sharpens his sword, and seoures his Armes, to recouer that by force, which they could not obtaine by reason. The first fruits of this accord began to grow ripe euen in the heart of winter, for Corbeil yields presently to the King, with Brie, Comte Robert and the Castle of Bois de Vincennes. The Bourguignon employes all his friends and intelligences at Paris, hee vtieth all his instruments, meaning to set them to worke the year following: All Normandy begins to reuolt, Deepe, Fescan, Montier-Villiers, Hassen, Tancarville, Bec-Crespin, Gomusseule, Loges, Villemont, Grausille, Longueville, Neufville, Lambreville, Charles-Mesnil, St. Germaine, Fontaines, Preaux, and Blainville, obey the the King willingly, chasing away the English, and receiting the French for their safety, all which was acted in two dates. What more to finish this worke, God takes away one of the chiefe causes, and one of the principal instruments of the misery, which had so long afflicted this Estate. We haue seene what part Isabel of Bawaria played in this Tragedy, we haue fought her after the death of her poore husband, and could not find her, for in ruth she was ciuilly dead. Bedford fearing the spirit of this Medea, seekes not onely to stay her hands, but to keepe her eyes from the managing of affaires. And for that (he had deuoured the treasure of the Realme, he constraines her to keepe a diet. Hee doth therefore sequester her to the house of Saint Pol, where she liued vntill the end of this yeare in great povertry, no more assisted by the Bourguignon then by the English. Being dead, they caused her body to be put into a small boate, and so transported by the riuer of Seine to Saint Denis, where she was buried without any pompe, like to a common person. A light put out, whose fauour doth yet offend posterity.

In this yeare also died John of England, that great Duke of Bedford, called Regent of France, who hath noted many blacke pages in this volume, and so much terrified our Ancestors. Having seene the former accord, and felt so sudden effects in Normandy, fearing the rest would follow, he drowned himselfe in sorrow, & knowing no means to auoid this storme, he dies at Rouen the 15 of December, leaving to King Henry the sixth, a bottom very hard to vntwist, and to his young wife (being sister to the Earle of St. Pol) a cause of mourning, the which continued not long, for the married loon after against the will of her parents, with an English Aduenturer of small account giuing cause to laugh at her, being but little pitied. Charles being thus discharged of a heauy burthen by this accord, hath more liberty to follow his honest delight. He goes to Lions, visits Dauphine, and staves in Languedoc, a Prouince which he loues about all the rest, having found it most deuoted to his seruice. Montpellier was his abode, a place very pleasantly seated; but taking this time of recreation, he had left good Lieutenants in France, who shall soone send him newes of their exploits.

*The City of Paris yields to the King, and expels
the English.*

The English vanquished at Saint Denis.

THE Bourguignon prepares to annoy the English, whilest that the Constables makes way for the reduction of Paris. His intent was (parting from Pontoise) to put himselfe into S. Denis, a towne halfe dis-mantled; but Thomas of Beaumont Captain of the Bastile (having intelligence of this designe) preuented the Constable, and entred into S. Denis with a notable troope of souldiers. Richmont notwithstanding approacheth neere to S. Denis: the Centinell hauing giuen warning of his approach, Beaumont issues forth to the bridge, vpon the little riuer which is towards Pierre-site, where he met with the fore-runners, who hauing drawne him forth, ingage him in the battell, the which was led by the Constable, marching from the valley of Montmorency. This English troope was easily vanquished, most of them were cut in peeces, and the rest taken, hardly any one of them escapes, to carry newes to Paris. Thomas of Beaumont is slaine among the rest vpon the place. The Constable makes vse of this good successe: hee presently marcheth with his victorious army to Paris, which stood amazed at these approaching forces, wanting a Regent, who was lately deceased; and such as were left to command, were more fit to handle an oare, then to gouerne the helme. Now was the time for good French-men to shew themselves, whereof there were many in the City. The Bourguignon faction being now become the Kings seruants, embrace this occasion, and hauing consulted together, they resolute to shake off the English yoke, the which they had too long endured.

The Duke of Bourgongne was then at Bruges, but he had left the Lord of Lisle Adam to deal with his partisans at Paris. It is the same whom he had formerly imployed against Charles and his father John, in the murder of the Kings seruants. He had great credit with the Parisians, of whom Michael Lailler was the chiefe Tribune. He discouers by him the peoples affections, being resolute to submit themselves to the King: of whom they craue only a generall abolition of what was past. This gentle demand being brought to Pontoise to the Constable, and easily granted, all prepare for the effects. That quarter neere the Halles gaue the first signe of the French liberty at Paris, by the meanes of the Curate

A of Saint Eustace: and all Saint Honories street ioyes in this hardy resolution. In the meane time the Vniuersity beyond the bridge doth the like. Lewis of Luxembourg, Bishop of Therouenne Chancellor for the English, the Bishops of Lisieux and Meaux, the Lord Willowby, with others deuoted to the English, aduertised of these mutinies in diuers parts of the City, fearing some sedition, retire toward Saint Anthonies gate, hauing carried all their best furniture into the Bastile, and forsake the houses adioyning. All being thus prepared at Paris, the Constable of Richmont, guided by Lisle-Adam, parts from Pontoise, and comes to Saint Denis in the night, where hauing rested some houres, hee marcheth early in the morning, accompanied with the Earle of Dunois, (a bastard of the house of Orleans) the Lords of Suze and Bueil, with a great company of resolute souldiers: approaching neere the City, Lisle-Adam with a choise troope goes before St. Iagues gate, the appointed place for the Rendezuous, where he finds all in a readinesse, so as Lailler hauing planted ladders for him at the lowest part of the wall, he mounts with his troop. Being entred the city, the people of that quarter (who were assembled for his coming) begin to cry, A peace, a peace, God saue the King, and the D. of Bourgongne. Lisle-Adam being ioyned to the chiefe of the City, goes directly to the gate, the which was set open by the captaine of that quarter, and the Constable, who was before it with his troopes, entred in good order. Then the people redoubled their cries. They all stand at a gaze, being aduertised of this entry, and exceeding glad to see themselves ready to recouer their ancient liberty; they prepare to march where they should be commanded to expell the English. All run to the Bastile. The Tournelles are presently seized on, and all approaches vnto the Bastile are soone won. Such as were within, at the first made some shew of defence, but as all things were prepared to force them, they demand a parlee, and agree to depart with their liues and baggage. They are conducted about the towne beneath the Loure, to imbarke vpon the riuer of Siene, and so to passe to Rouen. Then could not wel haue passed through the city. The people aduertised hereof run to the wals, and cry out with great shoutes, bayting the English like dogs, whom a little before they had feared and honoured as their masters. This hapned the 27 of February, in the yeare 1436. Thus Paris returns to the obedience of this Crowne, hauing passed seuentene yeares vnder the government of the English: which made the fatherly command of their King more pleasing vnto them, and them more willing to obey him, hauing tasted the imperious command of a stranger.

The Constable
is receiued into Paris.

Charles aduertised of this happy successe, parts from Montpellier, and returnes slowly by Auvergne, to giue the Parisians time to prepare for his entry, the which was performed with great pompe, fixe months after the reduction of the City, but with so extraordinary an affection of the people, as drinking after a great thirst. All the townes within the Realme had followed this example, if Charles had embraced this goodly occasion, all being drawne vnto their duty by a naturall instinct. He was of a mild spirit, playable to all winds, flying toyle, but patient when he had vnderaken it. We haue hitherto seene him constant enough in his afflictions, although the weight of blowes so often doubled, had made him senselesse, so as hee bare his crosses with lesse feeling, as a mortified member doth the razor or a corasue: but prosperity had so reuiued his spirit, as he recovered himselfe and returned to his owne disposition. He wanted authority to command well, and iudgement to make choice of his seruants, for he often embraced and rewarded vnecessary men, and put backe such as were profitable.

The Kings entry into Paris.

This proceeding discontented such as (seruing him faithfully) did see themselves contemned. These discontents gaue them liberty to speake, and doe things, which offended the King, experience reaching, that these tractable humors are as soone moued as pleased; and about all, are suspitious and cholerike: for impressions creeping into these weak spirits, makes them to fall into another extremity of vnmeasured passion. We haue seene the like in the life of Lewis the Gentle, but we shall not find the like exceffe in our Charles: yet shall we see that by the like indiscreete facility hee disordered his owne affaires, discontented his blood, grieved many of his seruants, filled his life with languishing in the prosperity of his affaires, to cast him headlong (in the midst of his greatest triumphs) into the gulfe of a fearefull graue: what we are to represent in this discourse, shall bee the Commentary of this truth.

As soone as the Spring appears, the Duke of Bourgongnes army goes to field to besiege Calais, it consisted for the most part of the communities of his estates. He easily engaged them in this warre, both by his authority and the shew of profit, to haue a towne so convenient for trafficke. This army had scarce continued in field ten daies, but they took homeward to their houses, shops, and fields: besides, the English wrought them vnder hand, and sent a great supply to defend Calais. This humor did so possesse this armed multitude, as the Bourguignon had no power to hold them. All passe away like to a violent streame, and this his designe came to nothing, although he chased in vaine, like vnto the Persian that threatened the tempest, and whipt the Sea. So all enterprizes succeeded nor. The Duke of Bourgogne being thus retired, the English hath his reuenge of his affront, and spoiles the marches of Boulogne, and Grauelins, to the great losse of the Country. The Lord of Croy fought to make head against the English, being followed by a goodly troope: but hee was defeated, and saues himselfe with difficulty in Ardes. The Flemings stirre at this losse, and march vnder the Duke of Bourgognes command, but they returne with shame: for Calais was referred for another season. Wee haue said that Charles had a sonne named Lewis, borne in the midst of his greatest crosses, the first year of his reign; in the year 1433. Being thirteene yeares old, hee married him to Marguerite Stuart the only daughter of James King of Scotland, a Princess of excellent vertues, and a gage of the faithful seruice which Scotland did to this Crowne in her greatest dangers, who suuiued not much this felicity of France. Charles was desirous to returne to Montpellier: where hauing called an Assembly of that Province, he heard many complaints of the outrages his souldiers had committed, running vp and downe the Country in great disorder. The best souldiers were guilty of these inuencions for want of pay. Rodrigo de Villandras an Aragonois, (who had faithfully seruied the King) was in disgrace, and banished with his troope, but being toynd with Pothin Galcony, and hauing taken some places from the English, hee made his peace with Charles. This confusion was not alone in one Country, but generally disperfed throughout the Realme. A troope of 2000 horse led by Anthony of Chabannes, Blanchefort, Guader of Bron, Floquet and other renowned Captaines, parting from Normandy, passe through the Countries of Vincou, and Pontthieu, by Dorlens, Oruille, Bray, Cappy, Lions in Sauters, and enter into Cambrey, from thence they lodge at Solames towards Hainault with infinit spoile, eating and ranfoming all after a hostile manner. John of Croy the Bailiffe of Hainault sent troopes against them, but they were defeated: they were called the flauers or fleas.

In the end through Charles his many commands, they come into Champagne, where hauing remained some time, they were employed to take Chasteau Landon, Charny, and Nemours, and from thence they were led to Monfieu faut Yonne, where there was maruelous siege, being well assailed and well defended: but in the end the Towne was taken by force, and the Cattle by composition. Charles was at Bray, and the Dauphin commanded at this siege. Hee made faite warres with the English, who thanking him before the King his father, yielded him these first fruits of his authority in the view of the whole army, who honoured him afterwards as the Sonne rising, whence grew the jealousies we shall hereafter speake of. The Mignons of Court which were then in quart, gaue a great occasion: Christopher of Harcourt Lord of Chaumont, and Martin Gouge Bishop of Clermont, men that had no good in them but to doe ill. The Duke of Bourgogne had much trouble this year: the English had sowed great diuisions in his chiefest Cities. Bruges stirred vp strange mutinies against him, whereas he was in danger of his life: Lips-Adam chiefe Captaine of his Guard is slaine. A popular man whom wee haue seene to command the Parisians twice, once against the King, and another time for the King, he presumed in like sort to gouerne them of Bruges, but they reare him in peeces, as the Gantois had in former times massacred Artenille their Tribune.

A multitude is a dangerous thorne, which cannot bee handled without pricking. Gant followed the example of Bruges, but in the end all was pacified, with the losse of the most seditious, to the content of the same people, who deuoure him they did adore. After these seditions, Philip returnes to warre, he besiegeth Croy (a place very important for the free trafficke of his Countries) but after great paines and charge, it proved all in vaine.

A grauitie. But (amidst the generally) shall I omit this particular obseruation, profitable for the example? That great Captaine La Hire passing neere vnto Clermont (a towne then subject to the English) was there honourably received by the Lord of Anemont Gouernour of the towne, and (for that he trusted La Hire much) he suffered him to enter with his men into the rauenin to eat a banquet. La Hire embracing this occasion, makes him his prisoner, and takes the place. Anemont had his reuenge in time, by means of the Lord of Mouy: he enters Beauuais, where La Hire was Gouernour, goes vnto him to the Tenist Court, takes him and leades him away prisoner in view of all the Inhabitantes, and makes him to yield both his ranfome and Clermont againe, notwithstanding Charles his letters to the Bourguignon: but in the end they are good friends. This discourtesie is alway requited with the like, leauing a long repentance for him that is the author of the iniury, how braue and cunning sooner he be; God punishing iniquity in due season, when as men thinke least of it, and by meanes least apparant. The warres had wonderfully vnpeopled France, but this scourge was not sufficient. The whole country lying waste, (not able to be tillied by reason of the daily incurfions and ordinary spoiles of both parties) there is a great famine. That which was usually worth but five pence, was sold for five shillings and six pence, or more. The people being famished, sought bread where they might find it, being forced from their houses by raging hunger, they disperse themselves in the fields and townes: in the one to find some fruit among the trees, and in the bushes, to haue some hearbs or rootes: in the other to get some morrell of bread, or some garbage, to fill the panch with any thing they could meet withall. So their bodies filled with bad meats, were likewise infected with bad humours, falling into diuers languishing diseases. In the end all turned to a plague, so horrible, as all these poore creatures famished and weakened with diseases, were like vnto dry wood in a great flame. Thus one plague bred another, and that miserable plant of Vwarre, brought forth two branches of misery to our wretched country, famine and pestilence. These afflictions disperfed throughout the Realme, rained chiefly at Paris, the solemne Rendezvous of this languishing people. There was nothing to be seene but lamentable troopes of people pale and leane, of all sexes and ages, either running in the fields, or vp and downe the streets, or laid vpon dung hills, or dead in the market places, a most horrible spectacle to behold.

There dyed threecore thousand persons in Paris. All the principall men abandoned the Citie, except Adam of Cambray the first President, Ambrose of Lore the Prouost of Paris, and the President of the Accounts, whom God preferred in this contagion, to eternize their commendable memories for euer, hauing secured the publike in necessitie; without whose couragious resolution the Citie had easily fallen into the hands of the English, who watched for all occasions, and made daily incurfions from Mantie euen vnto the gates. The Champian country being abandoned, Wolves left the Forests without feare, & hauing made their prey vpon the remainder of this miserable people, they came to the gates of towres, and euen into the streets. This horrible spectacle hath bene seene at Paris, in the Theater of the world, in the most populous Citie of all others. So one misery drew on another, and these afflictions continued two whole yeares, vnto the year 1439, whilst the contention of Anti-popes increased the fire of Schismes in Christendome, as we shall heere in due place.

Amade or Amé Duke of Sauoy caried himselfe as we haue said, during the calamities of France: in the end of this year he shall shew a strange alteration of humor, to the great amazement of all the world, for being in his Castle of Thonnon, (a towne seated vpon the Lake Leman) he retires with a small traine to Ripaille, where he had an Abbey of Monkes of Saint Maurice, and hauing imparted his desire but to two of his most confident seruants, (hauing bound them to keepe him faithful company) he takes vpon him the habit of these Monkes, that is, A gray frocke, a long cloake, a gray hood, a short cornet, and a red bonet vnder his hood, but vpon his gray frocke he wear a great girde of gold, and vpon his cloake a crosse of gold. Hauing thus changed his habit, his meaning was not to change his degree, nor to leaue the world, but vnder the colour of this habit, his intent was to aspire higher, as the course of his life will shew. Being now retired to Ripaille, he calls a parliament, and shewes them his intention in this new course of life; That being weary of the world, where there was nothing but toyle and trouble, hee would sequester himselfe, to dedicate his life wholly to the seruice of God: But to the end he might provide for the government of his estate, he declares his eldest son Prince of Piedmont, and Charles his youngest, Earle of Geneva, & he himselfe remains Duke of Sauoy, although he had vowed himselfe to the Order of Saint Maurice, and without altering of any thing he reserves to himselfe the sole and souveraine authority of all his estates. Having thus published his intent, he retires with his Monkes to Ripaille, into one quarter of the lodging the which he had built apart, accompanied with twenty of his favourites in Monks attire: but not living like unto that profession, for leaving them their water and roots, he qualified this solitary life with the best cheer he could get from Chambery or Turin. This year is likewise memorable by the death of three great Princesses: of Katherine Queene of England sister to Charles the seventh, the mournfull leuaine of our long miseries: of the old Queene, daughter to the King of Navarre, Mother to the Princes of Britanie, the Duke and Constable: and of the old Countesse of Armagnac, daughter to the Duke of Berry, and Mother to the Duke of Sauoy, the Earle of Armagnac, and the Earle of March. All dyed almost in one day, having scene the strange tragedies of France acted during their liues and vpon their children; and in their ends, seeing no end of miseries. As the fury of fighting grew cold, so the warre was turned into trafficke. There was no towne but the Gouernor kept it for him that would giue most: and Charles had it more expedient to haue a towne or place for money, then to besiege it with great charge, to the oppression of his subjects, and with a doubtfull euent. Montargis had cost either party much money to take it and to recover it againe: Charles buyes it of France of Surienne an Arragonois vnder the English pay, for ten thousand Crownes. He bought Dreux (the which he could neuer yet obtaine) for eightene thousand Crownes of William Bronillart of Beaufe, a filthy trafficker, worthy of that confused time, but vnworthy of all good order and all royall authority. The which being laid open vnto Charles, he resolves to vie an honourable force, and to spend more money to get more honour. Sole besieger Meaux and takes it victoriously, these were the first fruits of this new year. In the month of May, Charles the onely sonne of Philip Duke of Bourgogne comes to Tours, where King Charles was resident, and takes Katherine of France his daughter to wife, according to the Treaty of Arras.

Having conducted her through his Fathers Countries to Saint Omer (where the Duke attended him) he solemnized the marriage with exceeding great pompe, the which did nothing increase the loue of these Princes allyed, nor the happinesse of the marriage, the which was of small continuance, and lesse loue betwixt the parties, as the course of the history wil shew. In the meane time the Bourguignon hath still two things to his bowe: Although he had renounced the alliance of England, yet had he not left all his intelligences, the necessity of their neighbourhood giuing them still occasions to conferre together. And as he was alwayes watchfull of his profit, so had he a good gage in England to settle his affaires, in retiring Lewis Duke of Orleans out of pylon, being taken at the battell of Azincourt. He caused Charles to entertaine a treaty for a tuce with the English: the first grounds were laide by the Duchesse his wife, a cunning Princeesse and carefull of her husbands good. The Cardinal of Winchester comes to Grauelin to that effect, yet this was but to lay the first foundation of the work which shall be finished in due season. Wesley made mention of John of Luxembourg, who would not be comprehended in the treaty of Arras. Philip made great shew to be displeased with him, and Luxembourg likewise to be his enemy, causing his men to be slaine with great violence. Philip treats with him vpon complaint of them that were wronged, and all is pacified. The cleere sighted did easily find that this was the Bourguignons policie, who seemed to be in choller against him to gratifie Charles, being much displeased with Luxembourg, who played the petty king with his Master, but he shall not cary it long, for he dyed soone after, and the Bourguignon lost the whip he held ready for all euents, and the children of Luxembourg stood in need of the Kings fauour. But now the Bourguignon flies to another practice. He desired implicitly to be master of Calais, and seeing that force could not prevail, hee meanes to trie policy. Some of his subjects perswaded him that in breaking a Dike, they should let in the sea, and to drowne the towne and country about, whereby they should force them to obedience. He beleues this imagination, and employes much paine and cost to effect it. But this fancie of a flood, vanished away like vnto the Flemish army at the first siege, whereof we haue scene the fruitlesse issue. So this fantastical flood proued ridiculous. But the Duke to

A shew that he had done some-thing, caused the bridge of Milay to be beaten downe, and some small Dikes, which onely watered the Country.

The beginning of this year laide the foundation of great matters for the restoring of out estate, the which doth draw on daily by meanes not fore-seene, and without the wisdom or care of Charles, who was chiefly interessed. After the reduction of Paris, all the townes in general were resolved to free themselves by force, if the King had bene to affected, but finding his minde inclining rather to peace, they beseech him to finde some meanes to compound with the English, & not to languish longer in the ordinary offes of a lingering and preiudicial warre. The Duches of Bourgogne for her husbands priuate interest, layes the first stone, treating for the deliuey of Lewis Duke of Orleans, as wee haue said. This first act was seconded by the request which the Prouinces of the realme made vnto the King, the which ministred occasion vnto Charles to call a generall Parliament at Orleans, whither not onely all the Citizens sent their Deputies, according to the custome, but all the Noblemen which came not in person sent their Agents: for the subject was to treat of a generall peace, and if it might not be effected, to let some order for the men of warre, for the ease of the poore people, who could endure no more. The King was there in person accompanied with these Noblemen, the Earles of March, Bourbon, Vendosme, and Richmond Constable, and the Archbishop of Rheims being Chancellor of France. The Agents of the Duke of Orleans, of the Duke of Bourgogne, and of the Earle of Armagnac assisted, with the deputies of Paris, Languedoc, Dauphine, Guienne and other Prouinces subiect to the French. The Chancellor (a wise and eloquent man) did set downe at large the miseries of warre, and the inestimable good of peace: but what better Commentary then the feeling of our-past miseries, and the visible demonstration of our present calamities? It was decreed that in regard of a generall peace they should make all necessary pursuit with speed. As for the ordering of men of warre, they should presently take some course to auoid confusion hereafter. The Lord Chancellor and the first Presidant were chosen to negotiate this treaty with the English, through the meanes and fauour of the Duke of Bourgogne, as hauing laide the foundation: and presently a decree was made for the government of souldiers both of horse and foot, and to discharge the army of hangers on, the which did but incommber, to the great oppression of the poore people. This was the institution of the Franke-archers. The first day of May was appointed by the common consent of both Kings to meet at Saint Omer, but the King of England was aduised by the Duke of Yorke his Vncle (who had succeeded the Duke of Bedford in all his authority, although the name of Regent was not giuen him since the Kings Coronation) that he should stand vpon tearmes, as hauing no need of peace, but onely moued with compassion of the poore people, and therefore he failed in the assignation. But there fell out an vnexpected occasion to Charles, which not onely brake off the course of this businesse and all others, but had well-neere plunged France into greater misery then before. The King was gone to Angiers, where hee had

E intelligence of the taking of Saint Susanne, for his seruice, one of the most important places of the Country of Maine, and of his losse at the siege of Auranches, which was ill attempted and succeeded worse: when as stranger newes made him lo'e the pleasure of this gaine, and forget the bitterness of his losse. He was growne wonderfull wayward and suspicious, inclining visibly into two extremities: being too familiar with some of his domestical seruants, and too seuer to his Princes and chiefe Officers: either hee should not haue married his eldest sonne Lewis, Dauphin of Viennois so soone, or else hee should not haue vsed him like a childe. But Charles over-look him with a sower countenance, as if he had been vnder the rod. All this was done of purpose, practised by his secret Councillors to keepe great men from attempting against him vnder the name of this young Prince, to the preiudice of his royall authority: but what hee feared chanced. The Earle of March a Prince of the blood, had the charge of the young Dauphin, a Prince whom Charles trusted, being both wife and temperate: Lewis of Bourbon Duke of Alençon, Godfather to Lewis was not so familiar with Charles as he was accustomed.

The Duke of Bourbon was not altogether in so bad tearmes, yet was he not so great in the Kings fauour as he desired, grieving that such base men should haue countenance. These two Princes must lead the dance: if their desigae had succeeded, many would haue joynd; but now they would be lookers-on onely. At this time the Princes had men fit to execute their designe, the Lords of Chaumont, Bauciquart and Prye, with many aduenturers, theues, and such like. Tremouille hauing some notice of this plot, offers him selfe vnto them and is entertained: a matter as wisely performed by them, as rashly done of him. The proiect of these discentented Princes was, to settle the Dauphin, the hereafter all things might be done by his authority, being ruled by the aduice of the Princes of the blood, and so in effect they would haue King Charles gouerned by his sonne.

For the execution hereof, they first feize vpon the Dauphin, who was an assistant himselfe, to be freed from the Earle of March his gouernor. He was lodged in the Castle of Loches in Touraine, gouerned with great respect, who seeing of age, married, and of a kindly disposition, gaue him great liberty: he might goe abroad at his pleasure, where he found the bastard of Bourbon, Anthony of Chabanes, with other Capitaines aduencurers, who conducted him honourably into Bourbonnois. The same day the duke of Alençon feized vpon Niort, and by his commandement John de la Roche tooke Saint Maxen. The duke of Bourbon hauing the Dauphin in his power (a Prince full of youthfull courage) hee caused him to write to the Nobility of Auvergne, and to the duke of Bourgogne praying them to aide him in his designes, which was to haue more liberty to gouerne matters of state hereafter, for the better satisfiing of men of honour, whom he desired (to his great griefe) kept backe by certain flatterers which possessed the King his father, to the great prejudice of the whole realme. These newes being brought to Charles, he presently sent to the duke of Bourbon to returne him his sonne, and to the duke of Alençon to deliuer his townes of Niort and Saint Maxen; and to them both to come and yeeld an account of their innovations: who fusing by their answers that they excused themselves and sought delays, he resolves to come to the effects, and to suppress this mischief in the breeding. He was well serued at this time.

The duke of Bourgogne lets the Dauphin vnderstand, that all his meanes are at his commandement, so as it be not against his father, but he aduised him to goe vnto him, and not to aggravate one error with another, being most certaine that the thorefter errors are the best. He aduised the dukes of Bourbon and Alençon not to attempt a thing of ill fame, whereby they should get neither honour nor profit; and to free themselves freely vnto the most honest excuses they could deuise. The Nobility of Auvergne protest vnto the Dauphin by the Lord of Dampmartin, that in all things that were in their power they would doe him seruice, except against the King his father. The Inhabitants of Saint Maxen (seeing the Castle seized on by la Roche) assemblé and intrench themselves in the gates and towers of the towne, and aduertise the King thereof, offering to doe as it should please him to command. The King was at Poitiers. This aduertisement was brought him as he dined: whereupon he presently dispatcheth his Admirable of Coigny and the Lord of Varrenne, Seneshall of Poitou, to these good subiects of Saint Maxen, and the next day he follows himselfe. The Castle was presently besieged, battered, and forced, and the heads of such as were taken, paid for la Roche folly, who escaped in the night, vnder colour that he would seeke counsell and succour. Mont-richard being taken by the Princes at the same time, obeyed the King. The Earle of Dunois a bastard of the house of Orleans, who was of their faction, leaues them presently, and follows the King. This was the end of this year, and shall soone be the end of this shurly-burly, ill attempted and worse executed. The Princes had seduced many townes in Auvergne, notwithstanding their first protestation; but for that it belonged to the duke of Bourbon, it could not be, but many of his subiects and private seruants must make some shew of obedience, especially in the Dauphins presence, and at his intreaty. Charles resolves to march thither with all speed. He had eight hundred men at armes, and two thousand archers, and had provided for their lodgings as they marched without offence to any. And for that it was likely the English would make his profit of our domestick confusions (seeing the Princes of the blood presume to attempt against the head of their house, and to set the sonne against the Father) Charles prevented it with such dexterity, as all the frontiers against the English were very well fortified. Hee had intelligence also that the men of warre being generally discontented for their pay, and grieved that the King to exclaim against their disorders, vpon his subiects complaints, would be easily drawne to the league: He therefore sent for them whom he might most suspect, and ingaged them in his seruice, the Vice

A of Loumeigne, the bastard of Faix and Halezard, valiant Capitaines, and well-beloued of the aduentering souldiers. This done, hee sends Perbon, Floques, and Arsoy with his roopes; and follows himselfe without any stay, being accompanied with the Earle of March, the bastard of Orleans, the Constable of France, and many Noblemen with a well ordered traine.

The Townes of Chambon and Euon being fortified by the Princes, were easily taken by Perbon. They were in danger of their liues through their resistance; but by the Constables meanes their peace was made for sixe hundred crownes of gold, which then made a hundred markes of silver. These places being reduced to obedience, Charles came to Ebrulle, which yielded; from thence he went to Aignepersé, and Curset, the which likewise obeyed, notwithstanding the perswasion of the Princes. Charles rested and was taken at the first assault: the spoile was great; the troops remaine there fiftene dayes; whilst that Charles takes Escurels, with five or sixe other Forts fauouring the discontented Princes. The duke of Bourbon was at Saint Porcain; where hee had ingaged the Dauphin to feize vpon the townes of Auvergne. Tremouille was there also, who had brought an hundred lances to the Princes, with a thousand vaile hopes of his great meanes; but hearing that the King approached, (being armed with right and force) they aske counsell of their wounded consciences, which aduised them to flie into Bourgogne. So parting from Saint Porcain, they come to Moulins; and from thence they take the way of Saint Desir to passe into Bourgogne; but hauing intelligence that they could passe no further; and that the duke of Bourgogne had preuened them, they returne attainted to Moulins, finding their affaires to succeed but ill. Clermont and Montferri could neuer be drawne from the Kings seruice, notwithstanding all the perswasions of the Princes, Rions followed their faction and was soone reduced to the Kings obedience. Charles being ariued at Clermont calls an assembly of the Estates of Auvergne, seeing the importance of this action by the Bishop of Clermont. The whole country is presently at the Kings deuotion, offering freely to imploy their bodies and goods for his seruice.

But not relieing mildnesse with his force, Charles thought it good that the Earle of Eu should treat with the Princes, who in the end resolve to attend vpon the King at Clermont. The Dauphin remained at Moulins; and the dukes of Bourbon and Alençon vnderooke the voyage vnder his Maiesties safe conduct; they caried with them Tremouille, Chamont and Pry, whereof Charles being aduertised, he sent to countermand them, not meaning these three should be comprehended in the passport. The Princes hauing spoken with the King, and drawne matters to some good accord, they promise to bring the Dauphin to Clermont, and to pacifie all by this interview, but this young prince did disdain the refusal his father had made of his three seruants, as he protested he would not goe vnto him, but would rather hazard all. This humour made him to faile in the assignation; and Charles was retolued to vie force. He theretofore sends his Vant-guard, which besiegeth and takes Vichy, Curset, and Varrennes obey presently without contradiction. Saint An must be forced; but in the end it obeys. So doth Rouen, Chartier, Pécier, and all the places of Rouannois. This successe did mollifie the hearts both of the Dauphin and princes, to draw them vnto reason: so as hauing (by the mediation of the Earle of Eu) perswaded the King to like of their coming, they went to Curset. Charles was very milde to his sonne, and at the first gaue him good entertainment, but when hee saw this young man fully bent to haue Tremouille, Chamont, and Pry (his good and faithful servants) receiued into fauour, and boldly to say vnto him, That he must else returne, being ingaged in his word and honour: he said roughly to him, Lewis, the gates are open, and if they be not big enough, I will cause fixetwene or twenty fadomes of the wall to be beaten down, in passe where you please: you are my sonne, you cannot tye your selfe to any without my leave, but if you will goe, you may depart: for by the helpe of God, we shall find some of our blood, which shall helpe us better to maintaine our honour; then you haue yett done. So the accord was made without comprehending of these three. The Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon sweare to serue the king, and yeeld vp Loches, Corbeil, Bois de Vincennes, Saucerre, Sancerres, Brié, Conre-robert, and other places which they held: The Dauphin remanins with his father, who changeth all his traine, except his Confessor and Cooke. But all this is but counterite, you shall soone see other broiles. This phrensie of state bred in the Kings Kings house against the King himselfe, was by our Ancestors called the Praguerie. Nine months of this year being spent in these garboiles, Charles returns to Tours, to provide for the raising of the siege of Harfleur, where the Earle of Somerset had laine long; but it was in vaine, for the towne was taken in the end, after a long and painefull constancy of the Inhabitants, who could not be relieved in time by reason of these home-bred troubles: and yet there was a second mischiefe; the Lord of Gaucourt gouernor of Dauphin (a worthy seruant to the King) returning from the siege, and causing some of his baggage (which was scattered from the troope) to retire, he was surprized by a company of English, and led prisoner to Rouen, to the great griefe of Charles who loved him, having giuen good testimonies of his loyalty in his greatest extremities.

But in exchange Charles takes Conches and Louviers, (townes of importance in Normandy) from thence he came into Champagne, to suppress a part of these adventuring theuees, who had surprized some places in this Prouince, Musse l' Euefque, Montagu, and others. The Kings army (led by the Constable) takes them, and razed them by the Kings command, pardoning most of these treacherous Capitaines, among which were the bastards of Vergy and the Lord of Commercy: but hee caused Alexander bastard to John Duke of Orleans to be drowned, a notable theefe, who (having following the discontented Princes) had spoken unworthily of his Master. This execution of Iustice is memorable vpon one of so high a birth, being followed the same year with the exemplary death of Gylo de Rais Marshall of France, issued from a great and famous house, who being found guilty of Negromancy and Sorcery, was condemned by the Court of Parliament of Britany, and burnt at Nantes with some of his seruants, culpable of the same crimes. Hee was honoured for his valour, but neither his armes nor his blood could stay the hand of Divine Iustice, meritoriously executed by this iust decree of the Magistrate. Private actions worthy to be registred in the history, to shew that the greatest cannot flee the hand of God, after they haue long abused his patience. But the treaty of peace betwixt France and England, being discontinued about a year, was againe renewed by the industry of the Dukes of Bourgongne a Portuguese, but most affected to the quiet of the Realme, and a very sufficient woman, who had great credit with her husband. She follows it so wisely, as in the end the two Kings sent their Ambassadors to Calais. On Charles his behalfe were the Archbishops of Rheims and Norbon, and the Earle of Dunois bastard of Orleans. For Henry King of England, the Cardinall of Yorke, and the duke of Exeter, who brought with them Charles duke of Orleans, being so long kept prisoner in England.

This poore prince (after the languishing of so long a prison) was exceeding glad to see some means to returne to his house, having felt the ayre on this side the sea, and imbraced the Earle of Dunois, one of the branches of his house, who had so faithfully serued him in his afflictions: but he grieved to see himselfe presently caryed backe into England, for that they could not agree vpon the fundamentall points, the English being resolute not to leaue one foot of that which they held in France. And although the King were content they should freely enjoy what they possessed, so as they held it as they had done in times past of the Crowne of France by homage: yet would they not yield in any sort, being loth to relinquish their pretended souerainty. But hee refused which afterwards doth sue. At this time they were enforced to crye with this resolution, that without infringing any thing of the treaty begun, euery one should goe home, and consider of his affaires, to assemble againe when need should require: the which either part desired. And this is all could be done for the generall. They proceeded farther for the duke of Orleans: but as in these trafficks such as hold the possession doe commonly use policy, the stronger giuing law to the weaker, so in so precious a matter as life, the English must be sued vnto, making no hast to deliuer him, for that they drew great profit yearly for the pension of this great Prince. Moreover, Charles had no great care of his deliuey: for that some malicious spirits had searsoned him with some bad impression against this poore Prince, perswading him, that his long imprisonment was not without some mystery, and that it hatched some mischiefe against the King and his estate. The which being miserable for a great person, gaue all men a iust cause of compassion. But notwithstanding all these difficulties, yet must this prince (one of the goodliest plants of this Crowne) be now deliuered, to leaue a successor for the realme of France: and God, who would honour his race with the Crowne, had prepared an admirable meanes for his deli-

A uery, by his helpe, from whom in reason he might least hope, euen when his owne friends had abandoned him.

A notable example for all men in many respects: a prison of five and twenty yeares, was a great affliction to a prince borne to command, and yet captiue to another. The losse of all his goods gaue him a sufficient occasion to resolve to perpetual misery, and to leaue it for an inheritance to his posterity. In the end, (lander, a most cruell sting to a generous minde, which hath honour for his assured treasure, had been able to suppress him. But God, who gouernes the rood wisely, giues him liberty, goods and honour in due season: in despite of this deuillish enuy, which seeking to afflict the afflicted, and controuling aduersitie as well as prosperity, is then corrected when it seeks to correct another: but God doth neuer send helpe too late.

Philip having resolved to doe this good turne for the Duke of Orleans, and to withdraw him out of prison, compounds for his ranfome with the King of England, for three hundred thousand crownes. He giues his word for it, and payes it, and so Charles Duke of Orleans being honorably conducted, comes first to Calais, where the money being paid, he comes free to Granelou to the Duke of Bourgongne his deliuerer, who receiued him with all the shewes of loue he could desire. He was taken at Azincourt, in the year 1415, and was deliuered in 1440, the 25 of Nouember, by the means of his son that had slaine his father, and had done all he could to ruine his house. Being come to Philip, (having thanked him for this good office, and protested to hold him for his father) he swears a perpetual league with him, the which is confirmed by the marriage of Mary of Cleues the neece of Philip with the Duke, and then he wears to the treaty of Arras, except the Article of the murder committed on the person of John Duke of Bourgongne, whereof hee was innocent: and for confirmation of this solemne league, he takes the order of the golden fleece, from the hands of Philip, and is admitted into the number of his Knights. Besides two great enemies are become great friends by so memorable an occasion.

The Duke of Bourgongne had his private considerations for the safety and quiet of his house. He sees himselfe raised to greatness: But as it is no lesse vertue to keep then to get, and that his blood, profit, dutie, and necessity commanded him to hold firme for the French party, as the greatest and most assured for the good of his affaires: so likewise he considered that he should need some trusty friend nere the King, on whom he might confidently relye. And what greater personage then the Duke of Orleans the first Prince of the blood? And what greater bond then to free him from captivity? necessity also forcing him thereunto, for it was very apparant that this Prince being freed from prison, had the like action against Philip, that Philip had against the King: for although Philip had not slaine his father, yet was he sonne to the murderer, and the quartell must needs be hereditary in these great houses, where discontents and wrongs goe from father to sonne: being also likely that the King discontented to haue beene forced by his subject to aske him forgiveness in the view of all Europe, would maintaine the right of his blood, in a Prince that had neuer wronged him, against his reconciled enemy, whose friendship he had so dearly bought: wherein he noted well the Kings humour, being suspicious, jealous, and impatient of any new authority, which (being able to oppose it selfe) he would neuer faile to crosse in all occasions. Philip wisely fore-seeing all these difficulties preuented them, in assuring himselfe of the Duke of Orleans loue, vpon so good consideration, suppressing thereby all doubt of danger, which he might hereafter feare. Herein we see a notable example, that we must neuer despair in the greatest crosses of this life, that quartels must be mortal, and whereas they die, friendship must be immortall. That the best meanes to vanquish an enemy is to doe him all the good we can.

The honour of this good worke was not attributed to the duke of Bourgongne alone; but to the Duchesse his wife, who won as great credit in drawing her husband to this reconciliation, as her predecessor did dishonour, by the incensing of her husband against the house of Orleans, whence grew that infamy which polluted these two houses with two tragical murders. The viues honor is to pacifie quarrels betwixt the kinsmen & Allies of the house wherinto she is matched, and contrariwise it is an impertinent ialousie to sow dissention among kinsmen. God also blest the mediation of this worthy Princeesse in the marriage of Mary of Cleues, Neece to her husband, with the Duke of Orleans, by whom hee had Lewis the twelfth, which shall be King of France; and two daughters, the Kings house against the King himselfe, was by our Ancestors called the Praguery. Nine months of this year being spent in these garboiles, Charles returns to Tours, to provide for the raising of the siege of Harfieu, where the Earle of Somerset had laie long: but it was in vaine, for the towne was taken in the end, after a long and painefull constancy of the Inhabitants, who could not be relieved in time by reason of these home-bred troubles: and yet there was a second mischiefe, the Lord of Gaucourt gouernor of Dauphin (a worthy seruant to the King) returning from the siege, and causing some of his baggage (which was scattered from the troope) to retyre, he was surprized by a company of English, and led prisoner to Rouen, to the great griefe of Charles who loued him, hauing giuen good testimonies of his loyalty in his greatest extremities.

But in exchange Charles takes Conches and Louiers, (townes of importance in Normandy) from thence he came into Champaigne, to suppress a part of these aduenturing theues, who had surprized some places in this Prouince, Muffe l' Euesque, Montagu, and others. The Kings army (led by the Constable) takes them, and razed them by the Kings command, pardoning most of these theuifh Captaines, among which were the bastard of Vergy and the Lord of Commercy: but hee caused Alexander bassard to John Duke of Orleans to be drowned, a notable theefe, who (hauing following the discontented Princes) had spoken vnworthily of his Master. This execution of Iustice is memorable vpon one of so high a birth, being followed the same year with the exemplary death of Gyles de Rais, Marshall of France, issued from a great and famous house, who being found guilty of Negromancy and Sorcery, was condemned by the Court of Parliament of Britany, and burnt at Nantes with some of his seruants, culpable of the same crimes. Hee was honoured for his valour, but neither his armes nor his blood could stay the hand of Diuine Iustice, meritoriously executed by this iust decree of the Magistrate. Private actions worthy to be registred in the history, to shew that the greatest cannot flee the hand of God, after they haue long abused his patience. But the treaty of peace betwixt France and England, being discontinued aboue a year, was againe reuiued by the industry of the Duchesse of Bourgongne a Portugesse, but much affected to the quiet of the Realme, and a very sufficient woman, who had great credit with her husband. She follows it so wisely, as in the end the two Kings sent their Ambassadors to G. Jais. On Charles his behaile were the D. Archbishops of Rheims and Norbon, and the Earle of Dunois bassard of Orleans. For Henry King of England, the Cardinall of Yorke, and the duke of Exeter, who brought with them Charles duke of Orleans, being so long kept prisoner in England.

This poore prince, after the languishing of so long a prison, was exceeding glad to see some meanes to returne to his house, hauing felt the ayre on this side the sea, and imbraced the Earle of Dunois, one of the branches of his house, who had so faithfully serued him in his afflictions: but hee grieved to see himselfe presently caryed backe into England, for that they could not agree vpon the fundamentall points, the English being resolute not to leaue one foot of that which they held in France. And although the King were content they should freely enioy what they possessed, so as they held it as they had done in times past of the Crowne of France by homage: yet would they not yeeld in any sort, being loth to relinquish their pretended soveraignty. But hee refused which afterwards doth sue. At this time they were enforced to retyre with this resolution, that without infringing any thing of the treaty begun, every one should goe home, and consider of his affaires, to assemble againe when need should require: the which either part desired. And this is all could bee done for the generall. They proceeded farther for the duke of Orleans: but as in these trafficks such as hold the possession doe commonly vie policy, the stronger giuing law to the weaker, so in so precious a matter as life, the English must be sued vnto, making no halt to deliuer him, for that they drew great profit yearly for the pension of this great Prince. Moreouer, Charles had no great care of his deliuey: for that some malicious spirits had seasoned him with some bad impression against this poore Prince, perswading him, that his long imprisonment was not without some mystery, and that it hatched some mischiefe against the King and his estate. The which being miserable in so great a person, gaue all men a iust cause of compassion. This yeare shall be full of Warre, and successefull for Charles; yet in the end it shall minister occasion to enter into the former treaty of peace, which having begun the yeare before, and little advanced, shall be ended in the following yeares; after another manner then the English expected. Charles (seeing that the King of England by his cold delays, fought not onely to make his conditions better (being fought vnto) but also to draw him into some inconuenience, he resolues to armes.

le siege of Pontoise.

The English had taken Creil vpon Oize, and could not be dispossessed of Pontoise, a towne of importance for the necessitie of Paris. The King resolues to take them both. The Admirall of Coitiuy besieged Creil, and forceth it in the Kings presence. Thus the way is made to Pontoise where the siege was memorable, being well assailed and well defended, but in the end it was taken by Charles for the good of France. He lodgeth at the Abbey of Maubuisson, accompanied with his sonne the Dauphin of Viennois, Charles of Anjou, the Earle of Clermont, the Constable of France, the Marshalls of Lohéac and Soignie, Lewis of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Paul and of Pigney, who brought vnto the King a goodly troop of men from the duke of Bourgongne, with them of the City of Tournay, who sent a gallant squadron of their citizens. Thus vnto brought both French & Bourgongnons vnder the same Ensignes, against the common enemy of France. There were also the Earles of Eu, Albret & Vaudemont, the Vidame of Chartres, the Lords of Chastillon, Tancarville, Joigny, Mornell in Bry, Bueil, Mouy, la Tour, Angell, Longueval, Moyencourt, Suzé, Chabannes, Flauay, Saint Symon, Mailly, Penefac, Blanchefort, & those braue Captaines, La Hire, Porbon and Flequey, with an infinite company of the Nobility, who added their valour to the number of the souldiers which they had brought vnto the King. The City of Paris sent a goodly troupe, so as Charles had twelue thousand fighting men. At the first approach the Bastion vpon the Bridge next to Maubuisson was taken by La Hire, on the other side against the Abbey of Saint Martin, they make a bridge with a great Bastion, where they lodge three thousand Archers, yet the towne was not so straightly besieged, but Talbot sent in both men and victuals.

The Duke of York goes with an army to relieve Pon-toise.

Whilst that Charles stood discontented with this error, behold a greater brauado, for the Duke of Yorke (Lieutenant general for Henry K. of England) comes to Cency & Hocouville, places very neere to Pontoise, with a goodly army of 8000 men, & sends his Heralds vnto Charles to offer him battell. Charles (who by the aduice of his counsell would not commit this successefull beginning of his affaires to the hazard of a battell) returns them with no other answer, but that he should haue his belly full sooner then he liked. The riuer of Oize was betwixt both armies. Charles resolues to keepe the passages from Pontoise to Beaumont; and the duke of Yorke to passe the riuer in despite of the French, and to this end he caused many small boats of leather, wood & cords to be brought, with other stuffe fit to make bridges. The bridge of Beaumont was guarded by the French, but the English passe at an Abbey beneath the bridge, and with such danger in their artificiall boats, as ten resolute men might haue stayed a great army, but the silence of the night so fauored their passage, as a great part of the English army was past before our Sentinels had discovered them. Then was there no remedy but to aduertise the King of the enemies passage.

Charles retires from Pontoise.

The duke of Yorke (hauing thus happily passed the riuer, and rested his souldiers that night (marcheth in goodly order towards Charles, meaning to charge him: Charles takes counsell of his feare covered with this resolution, not to hazard a general battell, but he was likely to haue fallen into another inconuenience, for without attending of the enemy, he puts all the weightiest of his carriages into the fort of Saint Martin, vnder the guard of Charles of Anjou, and the Admirall of Coitiuy with two thousand men, and with them La Hire, Roubaix, Esouteville, with other resolute Captaines: and so leauing his lodging of Maubuisson he retires to Poissy. The duke of Yorke takes vp his lodging at Maubuisson, being abandoned, and makes a shew to attempt the fort of Saint Martin, but hauing tryed it in vaine, he takes his way to Poissy, & lodgeth before the towne in view of the King and his army. There were some skirmishes without any great successe, Charles continuing his resolution to hazard nothing, and Yorke his proiect to victuall and saue Pontoise. So the English retires to Mante, to send refreshings from thence to the besieged; but this great brauado came to nothing. The beginning was dishonourable for the King, but the

A end was both happy and honourable. Being retired to Saint Denis, and hauing sent the Constable vnto Paris, he resolues to send to Pontoise, and to winne it or to die. The reason was, that this his retreat or rather flight was so infamously spoken of by the greatest in Court, and so odious to the Parisians, (who had defraid a great part of the charge at this siege) as it was to be feared they would make some mutiny against him, if the successe were not good. His spies did likewise assure him that the Princes of his blood (especially since the returne of the Duke of Orleans) were resolved to make some extraordinary assembly, and to admonish him touching the government. It chanced then that the Earles of S. Pol and Vaudemont (notable partisans of the Duke of Bourgongne) left the King, when he had most need of succours, and they of Tournay were of the same party. He had the Dauphin with him, whom he caused to watch diligently both day and night. But how could he doubt that these tricks came not out of the Bourgongnons budget? Choller banished feare, so as being resolved to repaire this error, and to prevent his enemies practices, he runnes to Pontoise (for he was but ten dayes away) and giuing the Duke of Yorke no leasure to releue the besieged, he resolues to take it by force. This indignation succeeded happily. He caused three assaults to be giuen on three parts, and at the first he wonne our Ladies Church which is without the towne, whereby he might greatly annoy the besieged. He tooke this quarter for himselfe, accompanied with the Earles of Marche, Albret and Tancarville. The Dauphin was at the Port Fische ioyning to the riuer of Oize, C with the Earle of Maine, the Admirall and the great master of the Crossbowes. On the other side of the Battery was the Constable, the Marshall of Lohéac, the Lords of Mouy, Tournay, Suzé, Serran, Sanzay and the Vidame of Chartres.

Pontoise taken
by assault.

The Cannon being planted of all sides, and a reasonable breach made, the French enter furiously, and the King with the first (of such force is resolution in a great Prince,) to animate a whole army, as the head giues life to the whole body. The English were consumed like to straw in the fire, and five hundred were slaine at this entry, and foure hundred taken prisoners. The Inhabitants were spared (by the careful command of Charles) who acknowledging the happinesse of this victory to come from God, goes to giue him thanks, offering him the first fruits of this victory: for without doubt if he had failed, his enemies D were ready to conspire against him.

He calls together all the Princes, Noblemen and Captaines of the army, hee thanks them for the good and faithfull seruice they had done him in this notable occasion. Hee makes the Lord of Jalongs Marshall of France, and many Knights. He called for him that first entered the breach, commends his valour, and rewards him with an honourable pension. But why hath the History concealed this honest mans name, his reward had bene immortal? Such was the issue of the siege of Pontoise, remarkable for many circumstances, but then very considerable for the Kings affaires, who had an honourable reuenge of the English brauado. But as one good hap follows another when it pleaseth God, so Charles received many good aduertisements at the same instant.

E The English drew together many garisons in the country of Maine, from Mans, Fresnoy and Mahinne la lulez, and had sacked Saint Denis in Anjou. The French which were in Sable, Laval and Saint Sufance, led by the Lord of Bueil, meet them laden with spoyle, and very ioyfull, they charge them, defeat and kill them, leauing foure hundred vpon the place. Peter of Breze issues out of Conches and surpriseth the English at Beaumont le Roger: sleeping without feare, he awakes them with the sword, kills them & takes the towne. John Flequey doth likewise about the same time take Eureux (a towne of very great importance in Normandy) the meanes is memorable, a fisherman makes a hole in the wal, whereby he enters in the night, and becomes master of the towne. But in exchange they receiue a checke. The Captaines and souldiers which had taken many prisoners in Pontoise, had compounded with an English Captain for their ransom, who had taken the debt vpon him. The prisoners were kept at Cornille, a Castle neere vnto Chartres. While they expected money, this Mediator hauing free liberty to go and come, obserues all the passages as well, as he soone finds meanes to pay all these ransomes, for one morning he surpriseth the place, frees the prisoners, and takes all them that had them in guard.

The Parisians honour Charles at his returne, whom they were ready to deuour, if the successe of Pontoise had not bin good. The duke of Bourgongne sends his wife vnto him for many respects, who returned with no great satisfaction: and Charles duke of Orleans

(who had not yet seene him since his returne from prison) comes vnto him with a good Army: the King receiues him very graciously, and allowed well the excuses of his long delay, and to crosse the Duke of Bourgonne, he giues his cousin of Orleans towards the payment of his ransom, a hundred and fifty thousand franks: a very great some in those dayes, the which was not giuen for nothing in so great a necessitie of the Kings affaires. Louis of Luxembourg and the widow of John of Luxembourg, partisans to the Bourgonne, doe homage to Charles, and yeeld the towne of Marle vnto him: these be fruits no doubt of the victory at Pontoise. In the meane time the Princes assemblèd at Neuers, the Dukes of Bourgonne, Bourbon and Alençon, with the Earle of Vendosme. The Duke of Britany sent his Ambassador, not able to come himselfe, for that he was not yet in the Kings good fauour.

There were for the most part priuate discontents, tending to euery mans priuate interest. As not to be maintained in their degrees, to be called to Councells, respected in their aduices, honoured in their charges, payed their pensions, and eased in their lands. But the zeale of the publike good shadowed all with a shew of iustice, peace, order, and releefe of the people: that it was fit the King should proceed more speedily in the treaty of peace with the English, the which had been too coldly followed. That he should supply his Parliaments with good and sufficient men, and thereby provide for the offices and not for the persons, that by their faultfull deligeance suites might be shortned, and speedy iustice administered without delay, or respect of either of the parties. That he should provide for the ease of the subiect overcharged, rule the Countreys, prevent robberies, ransoms, and extorsions, the which were daily committed vnder too apparent an excuse, that the iusticiary was not payed. That he should giue honours without respect of force-paied dignities, and declare all his subiects capable of offices and dignities indifferently, not remembring what was past. That he should haue a competent number of grane men in his great Councell worthy of that charge, and not to commit the government of the affaires of the Realme to two or three, as had beene done in former times. These are the chiefe points of their demands, drawne word by word out of the Originall.

Charles was nothing pleased with these assemblies, made both in his absence and without his priuie, whereby many inconueniences must ensue, all being done without his authority. But being taught by his owne experience, he digested this kind of affront quietly. Doing both to alter any thing at such a season, when as he had no need of new enemies: and hauing either excused what had beene done, or contemned euery priuate person, he proceeded to the principall, which was the establishment of the affaires of the Realme. The disorders of men of warre were insupportable, the which must be reformed, but that which troubled the King was the siege of Tartas, remarkable by this circumstance.

Tartas is a towne in Gasconie belonging to the house of Albret. This towne was besieged by Capitall de Buch, a great Noblesman of that country, and of the English faction. It was concluded for the extreme necessitie of the country, that there should be a surrende of armes, and liberie of free traffike in that Prouince, vntill Midwinter following, vpon condition that if the King did not succour the towne by that day, it should yeeld to the English, or else the French should remaine in free possession without any controuersie. And for assurance of this treaty, the eldest sonne of the Lord of Albret should remaine in hostage. The matter was of great weight, being not only a question of the losse of a place of great importance, but of the Kings reputation, who leaving his subiects, was in danger to be abandoned by them, and so to lose all Gasconie, where the English had gotten many partisans. Charles providing carefully for his affaires, giues two blowes with one stone, whereby he strooke both the thewes and the English. He armed with exceeding speed, hauing drawne together foure thousand horse, eight thousand archers, & eight thousand other foot. An infinite number of great personages, and voluntary Noblemen posted to this iourney, as to a solemne assignation whereon depended the quiet and honour of France. The Dauphin did accompany him in this voyage, Charles of Anjou Earle of Maine, the Constable of Richmond, the Earles of March, Eu, Castrès, Foix and Lomaigne the eldest son of the Lord of Armagnac: the Lords of Albret, Gaure, Cominge, Estrac, Tartas, Tancrède, & Montgazon the eldest son to the Earle of Boulongne & Auvergne, and Philip of Culant Admirall of France, with an infinite number of gallant Nobility. Thus Charles parting from Paris, comes first to Saumur, whither John Duke of Britany sent his Ambassadors, to offer him homage and men. Siame, to haue so often left him in

A all his extremities, would not suffer him to see the King, although the Constable was a good mediator for him. He restored to the King the forts of Effats and Pallua which annoyed all the country of Poictou, and Charles gaue them in guard to the Constable: from thence he passed into Poictou, and provides that Mameil, and Saint Hermine should no more trouble the people: he then comes into Xaintonge, which had bene much troubled by the Lord of Pons, who humbled himselfe vnto the King, promising to liue in peace. Taillebourg was taken by force, and the thewes punished. Breteuc was taken and razed. Thus Charles spent this year against theues who had surprised some townes. The next year was happily employed against the English our open enemies, making a great breach in Gascony and thereabouts, where the English had gotten deepest footing, by the ancient and lawfull possession of his Ancestors. In the end by this breach the whole Prouince remained his, but the prouidence of God impairs his blessings by degrees. Hauing thus pacified Poictou and Xaintonge, he comes to Limoges, and so to Tholouza, which was the Rendezvous of all his troopes. Being arriued, he giues notice to them of Tartas, that they should continue firme, and that they should be releued by the prefixed day: but as he labours on the one side to settle his affaires, so the English on the other side seeke to ouerthrow them.

Behold Talbot comes out of England into Normandy with two thousand men, and the Duke of Yorke hauing leued men in the country it selfe, & places of their obedience, goes to field with foure thousand men. With these forces he thinks to take all that Charles held in that Prouince, where he had left the Earle of Dunois and the Vidame of Chartres for the guard of those place: but this enterprise had small successe. Talbot besieges Conches, and at the same instant the Earle of Dunois Galarodon a place holding for the English, to cause a diuision. Talbot hauing taken Conches, the Earle leaves Galarodon, hauing no reason to hazard his small troope against so great forces, and puts them into Garison, making a defenseless warre, attending the successe of Tartas. Talbot fearing that Galarodon should be surprized by the French, doth raze it, and this was all.

Levs now returne to Tholouza, to conduct Charles from thence to Tartas, for there lieth the weight of his affaires. Assignation is giuen, it must be held. To conclude, the King comes at the appointed time, with a goodly & mighty army: the condition is performed, he demands his hostages, and the effect of the accord. So young Albret is deliuered, Tartas continues vnder his obedience, the day honourably kept, and all the Prouince in quier. Tartas thus victoriously assured, Charles resolves both to husband the occasion with his forces, and to proceed farther. Saint Seuer was held by Thomas Ramessen with a hundred men at armes, and foure hundred Crosbowes, and fortified what might be in those dayes. Charles takes it by force, slew the greatest part of the English, and takes the Commander prisoner. Acqs hauing endured a siege of fixe weekes is yeilded by composition. The Earle of Foix was with the King, and employed both his person, men, and meanes to doe him seruice: but the impatiency of the French thrust them vpon his country, where they committed many infolencies. The Bearnois discontented with the French, assembles his forces and chargeth them as enemies; but they had their reuenge, for they fell vpon this ill-armed multitude, and slue seven hundred, to the great griefe of Charles, fearing that this escape might alter his affaires: but the Earles discretion couered this exccesse, and Charles continued his course. Agen held for him, from whence he summons Toncins, Marmande and Port Saint Mary which yeeld him obedience. Reole being obstinate, was besieged, and assailed with difficulty, but in the end it was taken.

The sharpe Winter hindring the course of the riuier of Garonne, for the victualing of the army, made the siege long and difficult, and gaue the English meanes to recouer S. Seuer and Acqs, not very well guarded: but the Earle of Foix winnes Saint Seuer againe, and the Earle of Lomaigne Acqs. A great number of the Nobility of the country (forced to make a good shew during the English command) submit themselves to the King, as the Lords of Poiuols, Raufan, Roquetaillade & Pelegreue. Thus Charles hauing made the Lord of Coitivy, Senechal of Guienne, gouernor of that conquered country, he makes his return into France. Being at Montauban he lost those two great captains so famous in his reign, Patton and la Hire, more rich in vertue and honour then in substance: yet Patton was master of the Kings horse, and his son was Marshall. La Hire left for his chiefe wealth the immortall memory of his loyalty and valour, the which he happily employed in the

(who had not yet seen him since his returne from prison) comes vnto him with a good Army to traine: the King receiues him very graciously, and allowed well the excuses of his long delay, and to crosse the Duke of Bourgogne, he giues his cousin of Orleans towards the payment of his ransom, a hundred and fifty thousand franks: a very great some in those dayes, which was not giuen for nothing in so great a necessitie of the Kings affaires. Lewis of Luxembourg and the widow of John of Luxembourg, partisans to the Bourguignon, doe homage to Charles, and yeeld the towne of Marle vnto him: thefe be fruits no doubt of the victory at Pontoise. In the meane time the Princes assemblé at Neuers, the Dukes of Bourgogne, Bourbon and Alençon, with the Earle of Vendosme. The Duke of Britany sent his Ambassador, not able to come himselfe, for that he was not yet in the Kings good fauour.

There were for the most part priuate discontents, tending to enery mans priuate interest. As not to be maintained in their degrees, to be called to Councels, respected in their aduices, honoured in their charges, payed their pensions, and eased in their lands. But the zeale of the publicke good shadowed all with a shew of iustice, peace, order, and releefe of the people. As it was fit the King should proceed more speedily in the treaty of peace with the English, the which had been too coldly followed. That he should supply his Parliaments with good and sufficient men, and thereby provide for the offices and not for the persons, that by their faith, full discharge of iustice might be shortned, and speedy iustice administered without delay, or respect of either of the parties. That he should provide for the safe of the subject overcharged, rule the soldiers, prevent robberies, transomings, and extorsions, the which were daily committed vnder too apparent an excuse, that the soldier was not payed. That he should giue honours without respect of fore-past demerits, and declare all his subjects capable of offices and dignities indifferently, not remembring what was past. That he should haue a competent number of graces men in his great Councell worthy of that charge, and not to commit the government of the affaires of the Realme to two or three, as had beene done in former times. These are the chiefe points of their demands, drawne word by word out of the Originall.

Charles was nothing pleased with these assemblies, made both in his absence and without his priuaty, whereby many inconueniences must ensue, all being done without his authority. But being taught by his owne experience, he digested this kind of assault quietly being loth to alter any thing at such a season, when as he had no need of new enemies: and hauing either excused what had beene done, or contemned euery priuate person, he proceeded to the principall, which was the establishment of the affaires of the Realme. The disorders of men of warre were insupportable, the which must be reformed, but that which troubled the King was the siege of Tartas, remarkable by this circumstance.

Tartas is a towne in Gasconie belonging to the house of Albrer. This towne was besieged by Capitail de buch, a great Nobleman of that country, and of the English faction. It was concluded for the extreme necessitie of the country, that there should be a success of armes, and libertie of free trafficke in that Prouince, vntill Midsummer following, vpon condition that if the King did not succour the towne by that day, it should yeeld to the English, or else the French should remaine in free possession without any controuersie. And for assurance of this treaty, the eldest sone of the Lord of Albrer should remaine in hostage. The matter was of great weight, being not only a question of the losse of a place of great importance, but of the Kings reputation, who leaving his subjects, was in danger to be abandoned by them, and so to lose all Gasconie, where the English had gotten many partisans. Charles providing carefully for his affaires, giues two blowes with one stone, wherewith he strooke both the thecues and the English. He armed with exceeding speed, hauing drawne together foure thousand horle, eight thousand archers, & eight thousand other foot. An infinite number of great personages, and voluntary Noblemen posted to this iourney, as to a tolemaie assignation whereon depended the quiet and honour of France. The Dauphin did accompany him in this voyage, Charles of Anion Earle of Maine, the Constable of Richmond, the Earles of March, Eu, Caltres, Foix and Lomaigne the eldest son of the Lord of Armagnac: the Lords of Albrer, Gaure, Cominge, Estrac, Tartas, Lacourville, & Montgaulon the eldest son to the Earle of Boulougne & Auvergne, and Philip of Culant Admirall of France, with an infinite number of gallant Nobility. Thus Charles parting from Paris, comes first to Saumur, whither John Duke of Britan sent his Ambassadors, to offer him homage and men. Shame, to haue so often left him in

All his extremities, would not suffer him to see the King, although the Constable was a good mediator for him. He restored to the King the forts of Essars and Pallia which remained all the country of Poitou, and Charles gaue them in guard to the Constable: from thence he passed into Poitou, and provides that Marcel, and Saint Martin, should no more trouble the people: he then comes into Xaintonge, which had beene much troubled by the Lord of Pons, who humbled himselfe vnto the King, promising to liue in peace. Taillebourg was taken by force, and the thecues punished. Breués was taken and razed. Thus Charles spent this yeare against thecues who had surprised some townes. The next yeare was happily imployed against the English our open enemies, making a great breach in Gascony and thereabouts, where the English had gotten deepest footing, by the ancient and lawfull possession of his Ancestors. In the end by this breach the whole Prouince remained his, but the prouidence of God impartis his blessings by degrees. Hauing thus pacified Poitou and Xaintonge, he comes to Limoges, and so to Tholouza, which was the Rendezvous of all his troopes. Being arrived, he giues notice to them of Tartas, that they should continue firme, and that they should be releued by the prefixed day: but as he labours on the one side to settle his affaires, so the English on the other side seeke to ouerthrow them.

Behold Talbot comes out of England into Normandy with two thousand men, and the Duke of Yorke hauing leued men in the country itselfe, & places of their obedience, goes to field with foure thousand men. With these forces he thinks to take all that Charles held in that Prouince, where he had left the Earle of Dunois and the Viscount of Chartres for the guard of those place: but this enterprise had small success. Talbot besieges Conches, and at the same instant the Earle of Dunois Galaridon a place holding for the English, to cause a diversion. Talbot hauing taken Conches, the Earle leaves Galaridon, hauing no reason to hazard his small troope against so great forces, and puts them into Garison, making a defenseless warre, attending the success of Tartas. Talbot fearing that Galaridon should be surprized by the French, doth raze it, and this was all.

Leaving now returne to Tholouza, to conduct Charles from thence to Tartas, for there lieth the weight of his affaires. Assignation is giuen, it must be held. To conclude, the King comes at the appointed time, with a goodly & mighty army: the condition is performed, he demands his hostages, and the effect of the accord. So young Albrer is deliuered, Tartas continues vnder his obedience, the day honourably kept, and all the Prouince in quiet. Charles thus victoriously assured, Charles resolves both to husband the occasion with his forces, and to proceed farther. Saint Seuer was held by Thomas Ramseyn with a hundred men at armes, and foureteen hundred Crosbowes, and fortified what might be in those dayes. Charles takes it by force, slew the greatest part of the English, and takes the Commander prisoner. Acqs hauing endured a siege of fixe weekes is yielded by composition. The Earle of Foix was with the King, and imployed both his person, men, and meanes to doe him seruice: but the impatience of the French thrust them vpon his country, where they committed many infolenicies. The Bernois discontented with the French, assemble his forces and charge them as enemies; but they had their reuenge, for they fell vpon this ill-armed multitude, and slue seven hundred, to the great griefe of Charles, learing that this escape might alter his affaires: but the Earles discretion covered this exccesse, and Charles continued his course. Agen held for him, from thence he lumons Toncins, Marmande and Port Saint Mary which yeeld him obedience. Reole being oblatinate, was besieged, and assailed with difficulty, but in the end it was taken.

The sharpe Winter (hindring the course of the riuer of Garonne, for the victualing of the army) made the siege long and difficult, and gaue the English meanes to reconer Saint Seuer and Acqs, not very well guarded: but the Earle of Foix winnes Saint Seuer againe, and the Earle of Lomaigne Acqs. A great number of the Nobility of the country (forced to make a good shew during the English command) submit themselves to the King, as the Lords of Puiois, Raufan, Roquetaillade & Pelugne. Thus Charles hauing made the Lord of Coitivy, Seneschal of Gaienne, gouernor of that conquered country, he makes his return into France. Being at Montauban he lost those two great captains so famous in his reigne, Polbon and la Hire, more rich in vertue and honour then in substance: yet Polbon was master of the Kings horle, and his son was Marshall. La Hire left for his chiefe wealth the immortal memory of his loyalty and valour, the which he happily imployed in the greatest necessity of this Crowne. Names in truth most worthy to be consecrated to the perpetual memory of posterity, for a president to such as manage armes, and makefo great profession of honour. And with what title were these most honoured, for their vertues or for their Castles? A happy exchange, to change perishing gold, which oftentimes makes him hatefull that loues it, with the pleasing smell of immortal praise. And vnproueable ambition amidst the reproches of this golden age, which loucheth gold more then honour.

So Montauban was a tombe for their bodies, and the whole world the Epitaph of their praises. At that instant and in the same place, Charles ended the controuersie of the Earldome of Cominges. Isane daughter to the Earle of Cominge and Boulogne (married at the first to Iohn duke of Berry, sonne to King Iohn,) was after his decease married to Mathew Earle of Castel-bon, of the house of Foix. She had one daughter by this Mathew, but for that there was no good agreement betwixt them, she makes a Will to bridle her husband, that by vertue of the authority of a father, he should not enjoy her liuing, instituting King Charles the seueneth her heire, in case her daughter died without lawfull heires. In disdaine of this Testament, Mathew much younger then she, and who had not taken her but for her crownes, kept her prisoner, an aged woman of fourescore yeares.

The daughter of Isane of Cominges being dead, the Earldome belonged vnto the King as lawfull heire, by the donation of Isane the lawfull heire. So Charles was bound by a double bond to defend the gray heires of this old woman, against the insolvency of her cruell husband, who finding himselfe supported by the fauour of the Earle of Foix and Armaignac his cousin (having already seized vpon some townes of Cominges, and playing the petty King, during the confusion of times and the neighborhood of the English, thought all things to be lawfull. The King adiournes them both to appeare at Tholousa (whereas then he established a Parliament for all the Countreies of Languedoc, Foix, Cominge, Gaure, Quercy, Armaignac, Elitrac, Lomaigne, Magnac, Bigorre and Rouergue) Mathew deliuered Isane his wife into the Kings hands, and it was decreed by the Court of Parliament (the which they note to be the first of this solemne assembly) that Isane should liue in free liberty out of Mathewes power, and should enioy the moiety of the reuenues of Cominge, & the rest should go into the Kings cofers. The Earle of Foix & Armaignac yielded vp the townes of Cominges which he had vsurped, and was adiourned vnto Paris, to yeeld an account of many rebellions whereof he was accused, especially for that he set in his titles, Bernard by the grace of God, Earle, &c. A marke fit for souerainity, the which appertains not to Seigneuries subiect to this Crowne.

Thus Charles remembers lawes in the heate of warre, but it requires another Comissioner to execute this decree by force of armes, after the death of Isane, who being conducted to Poitiers, liued not long in this liberty. Charles being returned to Poitiers about the month of March, resolues to employ his sonne Lewis, both to fashion him to affaires, and to draw him from such as would seduce him. He gues him the gouernment of those countries which lie betwixt the riuers of Suze and Seine. For the well employing of this new authoritie, there were two goodly occasions presented one vpon another. Deepe was reduced to the Kings obedience, this was a great annoyance to Rouen: for the freeing whereof the duke of Yorke doth beseege it, raising forts to keepe them from all reliefe. This siege had continued nine months, very tedious to the besieged, when as behold the Dauphin accompanied with the Earles of Dunois, and Saint Pol, and the Lord of Gaucourt, assailes these forts and forceth them, kills three hundred English, and many Normans, either by the sword or water, and so frees Deepe.

This occasion was followed by another, which chanced in a manner at the same instant. Isane Countesse of Cominges dies at Poitiers, loone after she had tasted the aire of liberty, and the good cheere which Charles made her. Vpon the report of her death Bernard Earle of Armaignac seizeth vpon the townes of Cominges, Duret, Lile in Dodon, Samathan and Lombres, and preparing to warre, he leaues troopes in Arragon, by Salezard a Captaine of that country, causing Iohn of Lescun a bastard of Armaignac to invade the Kings territories. This excheit might haue proued very preiudiciall, when as Charles sends Lewis his sonne into Languedoc, with a thousand horse, to quench this mischiefe in the breeding. Being arriued at Rouergue, all yeelds vnto him. Euery thing is opposit to the Earle of Armaignac, The Earles of Perdicac and la Marche, the chief supporters of his insolvency,

A insolvency, leaue him in the plaine field. Salezard doth likewise abandon him: of such force is a royall master against a bad cause.

The Earle of Armaignac (seeing himselfe thus abandoned) shuts himselfe into Lisle-Jordan, to dispute his pretensions with more aduantage, but he thrusts himselfe into the toyle, for he was taken by Lewis, and led prisoner to Carcassone. These happy exploits did greatly recommend the Dauphins iudgment and valour, whom all men held worthy of a great command. Charles having commended him for so well doing, would haue sent him backe against the Earle of Somerfet, who had raised a great army on the frontiers of Normandy & Britany, the which was like vnto a fire of straw, for hauing taken la Guiche by force, hee left it as soone for money, and so retired with his army without any other exploit. The heat of the English grew more temperate touching the chiefe points of their affaires. They stood vpon tearmes in the two first fruitlesse assemblies made for peace: but now they seeke the King. The Earle of Suffolke writes vnto him that he hath commendement from the King his Master, not onely to renew the treaty of peace discontinued, but also to finde meanes to marry him in France, hee receives a fauourable answer from Charles, and vnder his safe-conduct comes to him to Tours. Charles continued still in an humour to loue peace, and to seeke it, but the Earle of Suffolke, and the Lord Rosse had no charge but to treat of a generall truce, the which they concluded for a yeare and a halfe: but this shall bee a goodly occasion to send home the English. After a shower comes a sun-shine, and euen experience teacheth, that after a great rain comes a long drought. Now we shall see nothing but truces, one after another, mariages and alliances, during foure yeares, which is a preparatiue to a ciuill peace for about a hundred yeares.

This truce being made, they must now seeke warres elsewhere, so fruitfull is our vanity of change, so as we cannot liue without suffering or doing harme to others: when as they treated of this truce, it was demanded by the Ambassadors of both Kings what their men of warre should doe? This truce (say they) will be more chargeable vnto vs then warre, for they must liue: They haue not bene accustomed to worke, and yet they will make good cheere, neither can the poore people endure any more. Moreover, if they haue no worke, they will fight with themselves: wee must therefore calme this storme, and send them to such as loue vs not.

This was the cause of the war in Suifferland, whereof Lewis was generall, leading both French and English vnder the same ensignes. Mathew Gouches was Colonell of the English forces, for the King of England, vnder the Dauphins command. Hee entred with his army into the territory of Basil, and the Country of Elsas, betwixt Basil and Strasbourg, one of the goodliest and most fertill Prouinces of Germany, they terrified Metz, tooke Montbeliard, and filled all those Countreies with feare and combustion. The mortuities of this extraordinary enterprize, may well bee observed by that which I haue said: but these causes were farre fetcht, and not to be imbraced by two Kings, who but euen now tormented one another, especially by Charles who hauing suffered so many crosses, should haue horror to cause others to feele the like without constraint, yet he found a pin for all these holes. Charles would haue his sonne take Montbeliard, to be reuenged of the Gouernor, for the wrong he had done him, spoiling his Country as farre as Langres in his greatest necessity. He assailed the Suisses (and namely them of Basil) being fauourers of Eugenius against Felix his competitor, that is to say, against that Amedee D. of Sauioy, who had so crossed him in his affaires, whom he could neuer loue what shew foucer he made in policy. And for that Germany, and that quarter neuer vnto Suifferland supported Felix against Eugenius, he therefore hated them. And to gratifie René King of Sicilia, who had a priuate quarrell against the City of Metz, he turned his forces against it. But what meaning foucer Charles had herein, hee imbraced this voluntary war with an incredible affection, as if it had bene to defend the heart of his Realme. He himselfe came to Elspinal, and hauing sent his army before to Metz, hee continued the siege nine months, vntill the Citizens had paid 200000 Crownes for the charges of the warre, and acquitted King René of 100000 Florins of gold, which they had lent him in his necessity. Lewis the Dauphin parting from Montbeliard ruines Portenrue, in disdaine of the Bishop, a great solicitor against Eugenius, and from thence he enters into the territories of Basil with this goodly and flourishing army, tyed together with so many seuerall strings, hee

And with what title were these most honoured, for their vertues or for their Castles? A happy exchange, to change perishing gold, which oftentimes makes him hatefull that loves it, with the pleasing smell of immortal praise. And vnsupprovable ambition amidst the reproches of this golden age, which loucht gold more then honour.

So Montauban was a torable for their bodies, and the whole world the Epitaph of their praises. At that instant and in the same place, Charles ended the controuersie of the Earle dome of Cominges, Isane daughter to the Earle of Cominge and Boulogne (married at the first to John duke of Berry, sonne to King John,) was after his decease married to Matthew Earle of Castelbon, of the house of Foix. She had one daughter by this Matthew, but (for that there was no good agreement betwixt them, she makes a will to bribe her husband) that by vertue of the authority of a father, he should not enjoy her living, insinuating King Charles the seventh her heire, in case her daughter died without lawfull heires. In disdaine of this Testament, Matthew much younger then she, and who had not taken her but for her crownes, kept her prisoner, an aged woman of fourscore yeares.

The daughter of Isane of Cominges being dead, the Earle dome belonged vnto the King as lawfull heire, by the donation of Isane the lawfull heire. So Charles was bound by a double bond to defend the gray heires of this old woman, against the insolvency of her cruel husband, who finding himselfe supported by the fauour of the Earle of Foix and Armagnac his cousin (having already seized vpon some townes of Cominges, and playing the petty King, during the confusion of times and the neighborhood of the English, thought all things to be lawfull. hee incouraged 4000 Sniffes, being resolute to defend their Country. The greatest part of them were cut in pieces, but they sold their lives deere, for the Germane Historicks report, that we lost about 5000 men, although we had the victory.

The Emperor Frederick the third, (a Prince which otherwise loved peace) vpon the complaints of the Cities lying alongst the Rhine, caused them to arme: so his Lewis returned into Lorraine learning to be too far engaged in an enemies Country, whom he had incensed against reason: yet Frederick sent his Ambassadors to Charles, to renew their ancient alliances. So this cloud of people eaters passed, falling vpon diuers quarters like a shower of hail in a field of ripe corne, leauing nothing memoriable but a notable example of rashnesse, making a warre which was neither necessary nor iust, assisting quiet and peaceable people without any occasion. Whilest that France and England made Switzerland to weede, Henry the first King of England, married with Marguerite of Aniou, daughter to Rene Duke of Aniou, and of Lorraine, and King of Sicilie and Naples. The Earle of Suffolk fetcht her from Nancy, where Charles was resident, whilest that his army assisted these poore people. He leasted and conducted this Princess as his owne daughter, even with teares of ioy: but this ioy was suddenly conuerted into heauinesse, by the death of the Dauphins with his daughter in law, whom he loued dectoly for her vertues, which made her amiable to all France. She was one of the chieftest in this great solemnity, from the which she went to the bed of death: her death was the sepulcher of her Mother, the widow of James King of Scots, who was come to see her: and whilest her funeralls were making, her sisters came from Scotland to attend on her, nay rather to descend with her into the graue, if the humanity of Charles had not reuied them, giuing them honest meanes to maintain their estates in France. Thus passeth the Ocean of this miserable life, in the which there is more cause of mourning then of ioy, both in great and small. The marriage likewise of England, wherein were so great theues of ioy, shall end with a lamentable Tragedy, as we shall see hereafter. The truce was so pleasing to both Realmes, that before it was expired, the Kings of France and England renewe it for five yeares more, in hope of a perfect peace, promising by their feuerall writings published generally, to meet together within like months in some conuenient place, to continue this peace so generally desired of all their subjects. And to confirme the assurance of their promises, the English deliuer Mans to Charles, with all that he held in the Countie of Mayen: but all is put into the hands of King Rene his father in law. Francis Duke of Britany doth homage to the King for the Duchy of Britanie and the Earldome of Montfort. This was at Chinon: but some months after there chanced a tragicall disaster in that house. Francis suspecting that Cythes his brother would deale treacherously with him, by the too familiar correspondence he had with the English, caused him to be put in prison, by the Councill and care of Charles who had sent him 400 lances, vnder the command of the Admirall Cutney. But they dealt worse with him, causing him to die in prison for hunger. The history of Britanie describes this accident very plausibly, but it is true that Cythes dyed being prisoner with his brother Peter, who suruiued him not long after, having a great remorse for this tragicke accident. In the rest of this yeare, and the three following, there is nothing memoriable, but the pursuits which Charles made for the re-union of the Church. But not to breake off the course of our history, which is properly to treat of that which concerns our estate, we referre it for a more conuenient place. A worke in truth notoriouly of a great Monarch, but of a peaceable time, that in the peace of the state, we may see the peace of the Church. The souldiers insolency was nothing abated by this voyage of Germany. They reurne more fierce then before against the poore labourer. Charles made new orders to restrain them, causing them to be deducely obserued: but the overweening violence of the English increased dayly, not onely by the negligence, but by the command of such as had the charge. The Duke of York being called home into England, the Duke of Somerset succeeded him, a proud man, who thinking to do better then the rest, did absolutely ruine the English affaires in France. Hee dispensed with his souldiers in all their villanies, and kept them ready to breake the truce, vpon any profitable occasion. In the meane time the souldiers ordinary practice was to stand in Sentinell, to surprize some good house in the Country, being ill guarded: to rob it, spoile it, and carry away the prisoners by unknowne waies. To this end they had their spies, their guides, and their retreats. The fields were full of robberies, by men disguised in strange and fearful habits,

A habits, being masked when they espyed their prey: and therefore they called them counterfeit faces. But to draw men into danger, they marched like pallengers, expecting the commodity to surprize them. There is heard nothing but complaints of violence. All the pursuits which were made to repaire the breaches of truce, did but increase the paine and charges of the interestted.

But of these small disorders committed by the souldiers, there grew so great an inconvenience, as in the end it filled vp the measure against the English, being hurt & detected of all the French for their pride and insolency. Pougues a Towne of Britany vpon the confines of Normandy, then very rich and populous, being without guard vnder the assurance of the truce, was easily surprized by Francis of Surienne, called the Arragonois, a Knight of the order of the Garter, and a great Captaine vpon the marches of France, obeying the English. The towne being surprized by him, (being accompanied with fixe or seuen hundred souldiers) suffered all the miseries that might be. They kill, spoile and sacke, rauth women, rob Churches, take prisoners, and from thence they run into Britany, and fill all full of feare and combustion. The Bilton appeales to the King, and doth complaint to Henry King of England, and to the Duke of Somerset his Lieutenant in France: they presse them to repaite so notable a breach, else they would seeke a meanes of reuenge. But they receive nothing but words, disowned by mouth, and aduowed in effect: for Somerset causeth Saint James of Beueron to be fortified, contrary to the treaty. Charles receiuing these bare answers from England, sees which way the chance would fall, and that the game would not passe without blowes, yet he restrained his men with great modesty, holding it for a maxime, that he must vse no force: But when as moderate remedies can take no place with men not capable of reason; then to oppose force against the inuiolent passion of his enemy. I read with ioy in the Originall, that Charles contained himselfe, and was forced to this last waite, To haue God on his side, and the wrong on his enemies. To conclude, this moderate proceeding did so iustifie the good cause of Charles, as it was continued with a happy euent: not onely to abate the pride of the English, but to expell them out of the whole Realme: as the iust iudgement of God purged their arrogancy in this attempt, by the breach of publike faith: the vndoubted ruine of humane society, which hath no certaine foundation, but in perfect faith. Here endeth the yeare, but the controuersie shall begin more hotly by iust armes, accompanied with a victorious sentence, the which the Iudge of the world shall pronounce against the pretender of this Estate.

Normandy reduced to the Kings obedience.

THE Duke of Britany first interestted by the English, began first to resist him: but Charles is drawne to force by constraint. The Ambassadors of France and England, were assembled at Louiers, to redresse the breach at Pougues, when as behold Pont de l'Arche (a towne vpon the river of Seine, foure leagues from Rouen) is surprized by the Lord of Brez, for the Duke of Britany. This troubled Somerset, who presently sends to make complaint vnto the assembly. Charles makes him answer, that it is a requital: but if he will render vp Pougues, and the goods that were stolne, valued at sixtene hundred thousand Crownes, hee should haue Pont de l'Arche againe. The which being disdainfully refused by Somerset, Charles protests by his Ambassadors in open assembly, That if warre followed (which God forbid) the fault should not be his, causing an authentick act to be taken by certaine Apostolicke and Imperiall Notaries, for his discharge and iustification. Seeing therefore that this mild course was scorned by his stout enemy, hee relucet to haue his reuenge by force of armes. To this end hee combines with Francis Duke of Britany, to make warre against the English their common enemy, vpon condition the Briton should not treat with him without his leaue. A very needfull restraint, hauing often failed, as wee haue seene. All prepare to warre, in euery place where the English had any footing in Gascony, in Normandy, and in all other parts where there was any remainder of their ancient Conquests.

Guienne shall begin the game: but it shall end in Normandy, to make perfect the French obedience, whereof it offers these first fruits to Charles in the beginning of this yeare, as to their lawfull King. Cognac was surprized for him by Yerdan a Gascon, but the manner was notable. Montot an English Captaine was gouernour of the place: A he was absent when the towne was taken. Verdun keeps the gates carefully, that no intelligence might be giuen vnto him, so as he comes to the gates without knowledge of any thing, but hee found some which added him vnto their prize, being taken prisoner, whereas before he was a gouernour. The same day Saint Maigrin was taken by Alliac likewise a Gasccon. The newes of Cognac and Saint Maigrin were scarce brought to Charles, when as the Lord of Mouy giues him intelligence, that he had taken Gerberond, and the Bailiffe of Eureux Couches, with great slaughter of the English. Complaints are presently made by the English, Talbot is the messenger: Charles lets them know that they are in the fault, seeing they began first: yet hee offers to yeeld all that had bene taken by his commandement, according to the law of reprisals, so as they would deliuer what they had taken, and suffer his friends and allies to liue in peace. Talbot answering, that he had no such charge, Charles lets him vnderstand, that hee would redresse it by lawfull force: that he did vnwillingly enter into war, yet would he soone shew the English, that his mildnesse had a sting: and so he goes to field with a goodly army. There were three chiefe dens for theues, the Rendezuous of all the English robberies in those parts, Verneuil, Manne, and Loigny. Verneuil (an infamous place for our deteat) was first taken: a Millar gaue them entry by a hole in the towne wall, by the which the water did run to his mill ioyning to the wall. The towne began, and the castle followed: a strong tower diided from the cast held out some daies, but it yeelded when as Charles arriued. Manne C yeelded in view of the army. Loigny was surprized by Scalado, but the English intrenched in the safe Court, fought it out resolutely, and lost both liues and goods. Vernon a towne vpon Seine yeelded of it selfe, by the voluntary obedience of the inhabitants. Ponteaudumer was forced by the Earles of Eu and Saint Pol, where as many English men were lost. But Lizieux by the graue aduice of their Bishop yeelds voluntary obedience, and auoides the miseries of the vanquished. Louiers did the like, and Gourmay was sold by an English captaine that held it. Eiffay was taken by a gentle stratagem of the Duke of Alanson. The Captaine accompanied with the souldiers of his garison, was gone for to fish a poole, while he seeks for fish he is taken himselfe, and his Lieutenant deliuiers vp the castle to the Kings seruice. Felcampes is taken by the Abbot, having intelligence with the Monkes: and at the same instant a ship arriues out of England, being ignorant of this losse: the French suffer them to land and take them all prisoners. Harcourt makes shew to resist, but yeelds by composition after the siege of eight daies. The army marcheth against Neuf-chastell of Nicourt, and takes the town by force, the castle yeelds by composition. The Earle of Clermont was desirous to recouer his chiefe house where of he carried the name: his subiects gaue him entry into the towne, and so by the towne he wins the castle. Saint Leo at the sight of the army demands and obtains a good composition, with all the neighbour Castles. Carenten yeelds after three daies, and Pont d'Oue is taken by assault: Confances and Gouray by composition. Alenfon freed it selfe from the English, and yeelds to the mild command of their good Prince the Duke of Alanson, who shewed his mercy euen to the English being vanquished, to whom he gaue both life and goods.

Rochequien was yeelded vp by the Captaine of the Castle, who of an English man becomes French, by the perswasions of his wife, who was a French woman. Chasteau-gillard a fort of importance vpon the riuier of Seine, endured a siege of fixe weekes, but the presence and good fortune of Charles, made him master of the place. Gisors, so famous for the English quarrels, was yeelded to the King by the Captaine, who likewise came to the Kings seruice, and in the end Valonges, a place of importance, the which heretofore shall come in question by a famous accident.

As the Kings Army made this progresse in Normandy, so it increased daily by these new conquests. René King of Sicily, and the Duke of Britany, arriue with goodly voluntary troops, and some townes newly reduced to the Kings obedience, with an infinit number of good souldiers: but aboue all, the Court was goodly, by the multitude of Noblemen, who went not onely to honour the Kings good fortune, but caried by an inward instinct of his right well gouerned, (as it were by a celestiall guide) did runne to an assured victory, and to the possession of an heires lawfull right. The Dukes of Bourbon, Alanson & Britany were there, with the Earles of Richmont Constable of France, of Mayen, Eu, Saint

A Saint Pol, Dunois, Caftres, Tancarville, and Dampmartin. The Duke of Lorraine, and John his brother, augmented the traine of King René. John Inuencel of Vrims, Baron of Treignell, and Chancellor of France was there, having succeeded Renauld of Chartres Archbishopp of Rheims, being lately deceased. The Lords of Culant, Bueil, Montgasccon, Blainville. Prefigny, Brion, Prally, la Bouffiere, Monter, Aigreuille, Malicornne, and Han, with an infinit number of the Nobility.

Charles resolved to embrace these goodly occasions, finding (by the obedience of so many Country townes) the way laid open to Rouen, the capital City of that Province: hee determines to besiege it, and all with one consent aime at this goodly marke, as the chiefe of the Kings affaires. But it chanced through the providence of God, that whereas there seemed greates difficulty, there it proved most easie, by the loyalty of the French, who cannot deny their Prince. The combat was ciuill, managed more by counsell than by force. The City was much at the Kings deuotion, yet were they kept in awe by the English forces, being masters of the strongest Forts within the City. The Duke of Somerfet was there present with authority. Talbot must imploy all his valour: but neither force, forts, authority, nor valour were of any force, for that God hauing determined to restore this estate by the means of Charles the seuenth, inclined both hands and hearts to his decree, the which no mortall man can preuent.

The King being at Pont l'Arche, had certaine intelligence from the best Citizens of Rouen, that the whole City was resolved to obey him: desiring onely to bee supported by his presence and forces: vpon this aduice hee causeth the Earle of Dunois to march, and to shew himselfe vnto the Citizens: who send a Herald to summon them to yeeld their obedience vnto the King, whom the English were like to haue torne in peeces. No Citizen dares shew himselfe vpon the walles: all is filled with enemies. The English had seized vpon the wals, so as no man within the towne durst approach. Having thus marched about the towne in good order, fearing no lesse the lightnesse of the peoples humour, then the Winter which approached (being then October) hee resolves to retire, Charles and his Councell distrust these popular humors, as not able to draw the City to yeeld he therefore thinks it best to lodge his army about it, and to seize vpon the passages of the Citizens chiefe houses, being the best means to draw them to reason. The which was speedily put in practice. The troopes were scarce lodged in their quarters, when as Charles lying at Pont l'Arche, had intelligence that his seruants had seized vpon two towers, by means whereof they had a quarter of the City. Whereupon the Earle of Dunois shewes himselfe presently with the army before the City, and diuides his troopes according to their quarters. The brute of those forces is great vpon their approach: they haue aduice to march, the which they doe resolutely, being set in order, full of generous resolution, as in the Kings presence. The Ladders are set to the wall, and they beginne to mount, all prepare to follow, forty of our men get vp the wall, when as the Lord Talbot arriues with three hundred desperate English, who hauing cut the Citizens in peeces, charge our men that were engaged, some they kill, the rest leape from the wals, and few recouer the place from whence they were mounted. The King holding the City wonne, comes to Darnetall, when as the Earle of Dunois returns to aduertise him of the hard successe of this popular brag, so as all held it for winde and smoake.

In the meane time the Citizens slept not, the little blood of some that were slaine for all the rest of the Citizens on fire, who resolved to vnmask themselves, and to speake plainly to the English. The whole City is incensed by means of the magistrates, euery man prepares his armes against these strangers. The Archbishopp of Rouen (a name which the historie owes to the truth and honor of the French loyalty) was a good seruant to the King, and had great credit with the Citizens: so as the whole City assembles with him, and by a common consent all resolve to returne to the Crown of France, as to their beginning: Somerfet and Talbot run thither with fifty men, but what is that against a multitude? The Archbishopp acquaints them with the Citizens resolution, who in their presence depute the Officiall to goe vnto the King.

The summe of his Ambassage was, that his Maiesty should grant vnto the Citizens of Rouen a generall abolition of all that was past, and leaue for the English, and all others of their humour to retire without danger, offering him their obedience as to their lawfull King: that he should come when he pleased, where he should finde the gates as open as their hearts. This resolution deliuered boldly in the presence of Somerfet and Talbot, amazed them much, their courages were danted. And what could their weake authority do against the whole body of a City, fortified with the Kings approach, his army, and his right? Thus the City of Rouen sends deputies vnto the King, and obtaine all they demand, who being returned with this good answer, all are satisfied but the English, who keepe the walles, towers, bridge, castle and palace: all this must be fought for. They prepare for force, the people doe the like, all the streets are filled with armed men to force the wals.

The Citizens send againe vnto the King, beseeching him to approach with his Army with all speed, to take absolute possession of his City of Rouen. Attending the Kings answer, the Citizens doe happily win the walls, the towers, and the gates: all that belongs to the City obeyes the King, the English with great difficulty recouer the bridge, Castle, and palace. But they enjoy not these forts long: for the Citizens besiege the bridge and win it, and now the army comes downe the hill. The Citizens at the sight thereof, God save the King, all brake out into ioy and triumph. The army enters the City, to the peoples exceeding ioy, attending the King. In the meane time St. Kathernes fort is besieged, and yeelded to the Earle of Dunois: Charles lodged there whilest the City is freed from strangers: the castle yeelds, the palace only remains: Somerfet and Talbot are there, they are men of action, who had wherewithall to fight for their liues: but how can they hold out, all being disposed to an accord?

Charles being wholly inclined to clemency, doth willingly see Somerfet and Talbot at St. Kathernes fort, who receiue a law from his victorious hands, yet would hee not admit them with conditions like vnto the Citizens: but he giues them leaue to retire with their liues and goods vpon these conditions, That they should leaue their prisoners and armourie, deliuer vp Arques, Caudebecq, Tancarville, Lille-bonne, Honne-fieu, and Montreuil, they should pay fifty thousand Crownes presently, and discharge their priuie debts in the City before they departed: for assurance whereof they should leaue Talm (the flower of all their men) with five other hostages such as the King should demand. So Talbot remains for a pledge. After ten daies (all articles agreed vpon being performed, except Honne-fieu) all the hostages haue leaue to depart, except Talbot, who staid vntill Honne-fieu is deliuered. But Talbot must haue more time to taste the bounty and demency of our King, and the French courtlesie. Thus Charles enters Rouen with great pompe, but the peoples ioy exceeded the statelinesse of his traine. Their shouts drew the Trumpeters and Clarons, all cry, God save the King. This poore people (greedy to see their Prince, after so long and cruell a seruitude) weepe for ioy, men and women, young and old, all run; many bon-fires are made, but the fire of publike deuotion burne more cleare. This was the tenth of Nouember in the year 1449, a notable date for so singular a deliuerance. There yet remained some townes in Normandy to conquer. Charles loath to lose any opportunity, or to giue the enemy any leasure to bethinke himselfe, would scarce allow of any time for the publike ioy and content of his good subiects, but goes presently to field with his army.

Honne-fieu would not obey the Duke of Somerfet, the which hee most deliuer vnto the treaty: there were fiftene hundred English, resolute to defend the place, but after fiftene daies siege they yeelded vpon honourable termes, their goods & liues being saved. Charles for an increase of the good cheare he had made vnto Talbot during his imprisonment, giues him his liberty without ranfome, with meanes to retire himselfe into England and great gifts; but hee shall make him no due requitall of this good and honourable entertainment. Fougères, the subiect of this last warre, and the chiefe cause of his good successe, returns to the obedience of the Crowne, through the valour of the Duke of Britany: and Bellem with the castle of Fresnay, by that of the duke of Alanson. As these things succeeded happily for our Charles, so all went crose in England. The Earle of Suffolke governed Henry the sixth quietly, being a young man, and of a weake spirit. As all the affaires of England depended vpon this Earle, so did the reproaches. The Duke of Somerfet (a Prince of the English blood) very ialous of his credit and reputation, and ashamed to bee blemished with these losses in France, laies the chiefe fault vpon Suffolke, and others that had the gouernment, and so incensed the people of London against them, as the Londoners transported with choller for so great a losse, meaning

A to punish the offenders, fall vpon the Bishop of Chichester, Lord Keeper of the priuy Scale, and kill him in a mutiny: they intend the like to Suffolke, it (by the fauour of some of his friends) he had not bene put into the tower of London, to yeeld an account of his actions. Henry (who loued him dearely) takes him forth, and sent him into France, for his better safety. But it chanced that Suffolke seeking to auoid one danger, fell into another, where hee made his last shipwracke: for being met by Somersets people, being his capitall enemy, he was taken and beheaded, his head and body were sent to London, and those cruell spoiles set vp to publike view, in places most frequented. In the meane time, all England troubled for the losse of Rouen, and the greatest part of the Prouince, B resolves to hazard all, to saue the rest of their conquests in France. They had yet in Normandy the Townes of Caen, Vire, Auranches, Saint Sauueur le Vicont, Falaise, Damfront, Cherebourg, with the strong places of Tombelaine and Briquebec, and a great part of Guienne. With this remainder the English imagine to recouer the possession of what they had lost. So Henry sends speedily foure thousand men, vnder the command of Thomas Tirl, one of his most renowned Captaines. Being landed at Cherebourg, without any losse of time, he besiegeth Valonges, a strong place and of importance. At the brute of these forces, all the English garisons assemble, to augment his army, and to fortifie the siege, so as being together, they make about eight thousand men. Our army was lodged in diuers places to refresh themselves since the siege of C Honnestun, the season being wonderfull moist in the thaw of the spring, when as newes came to Charles of the landing of the English, and the imminent danger of the besieged, the losse whereof were a foule blemish to his victory. To prevent this, he presently sends the Earle of Clermont with sixteene hundred lances, whereof the Earle of Castris, the Admirall of Raiz, the Seneshall of Poitou, and the Lords of Montgafcon, Courran, and Roubauc were the commanders. The English army was lodged at Fournigny, a village betwixt Carentan and Bayeux, in a place of aduantage, to keepe themselves free from such forces as they might doubt should bee sent from the King, being then in the Country. Mathew Gooch an old English Captaine, came vnto him with a thousand archers. The English being thus fortified, set their backs to a riuer, being flanked with diuers Orchards and Gardens, before them they make trenches to hinder their approach, and in this fort they attend the enemy.

The neareness of Charles made them to imagine our French to be more in number then they were; for this troope did not exceed sixe hundred fighting men, whereof an hundred only, commanded by Jessery of Courran, and Isachim of Rouault, charged the English vanguard, and hauing slaine three or foure hundred, put the rest of their army in disorder: yet the Earle of Clermont seeing the danger he was in with his troope, if the enemy had discovered his aduantage, hauing so great an army against his small forces, sends presently to Charles for speedy succours. By good hap as the messenger came vnto the King, the Constable of Richmont arriues from Britany, who marcheth presently, not giuing his E soldiers any leasure to breath, exhorting them to go courageously to an assured victory. His coming brake the stroke, and swayed the victory. He had 240 lances, and 800 Archers, and with him Tamies of Luxembourg, the Earle of Laual, and the Lord of Loheac Marshall of France, with the good fortune of Charles. He arriues euen when as the Earle of Clermont was far engaged in the fight, the English had taken two Culierins from him, and in despite had passed Saint Clements Ford, preparing to discharge these Culierins: when as behold the Constable comes with his troope with a victorious countenance, who at his first approach wins the bridge vpon the riuer. The English are amazed, especially when they see Mathew Gooch (who was somewhat retired from the body of their army to succour at all euents) take the way to Bayeux. The Constable makes his profit of F this sight, who without pursuing them, chargeth their dismayed troopes.

Thomas Tirl puts himselfe in defence with the fauour of the riuer, the orchards and gardens: but the Constable commands some of his horsemen to leaue their horres. The Earle of Clermont enuirones the enemy on the other side: the English being charged of all sides feeling the weight of their blowes, giue way, leaue their armes, and suffer themselves to be slaine, and taken to mercy. The courtlesie of the French spared many in this ouerthrow, there were more taken prisoners then were slaine. They buried in three pits 3774 carcasses, by the report of the Heralds, Priests, and good men that were there. This loffe did likewise burie all the conquests which the English had made in Normandy. A The Commanders of the army were prisoners, Tirel, Norbery, Orient, Kirqueby, Warberton, Angel, Alengour, Vaquier, Calleville, and a great number of English Nobility, armed with coats of armes: all are led to Charles with their ensignes. An honorable spoile to his triumph, but a perpetual ignominy both to the runners away that saved themselves, and to the cowards that were taken prisoners. This absolute victory cost France but eight men to the end they might do homage to the great God of armies and victories, who by this memorable overthrow made way for our restauration. I read with ioy the warrant of the Originall. And therefore wifely men doe say, that the cause of the French mens victory, and by his divine power the English were overcome. This victory was given vs from heauen, the 19 of April in the year 1450, and thanks were given vnto God throughout the realm. A solemn procession was made at Paris of 14000 yong children, from the age of seuen to ten years, carefully chosen out, to the great content of the people, going from S. Innocents to our Ladies Church. This notable victory of Fourmigny, did loone after cause the rest of Normandy to yeeld: Vire yeelds by composition, the which was granted to 4000 lazces, who might well haue contended for their liues.

Auranches stood the longer vpon teares, through the resolution of 500 voluntaries, but in the end they departed with their liues onely, and a white wand in their hands. The strong castle of Tombelaine guarded by a hundred English, yeelded two daies after. Bayeux resolves to fight it out, all prepare to armes. After the ordnance had made a great breach, and the myne ready to play, Charles fearing the sacke of his subiects, as well as of his enemies, would not suffer his men to attempt so dangerous a matter, and the souldiers on the other side cry out to be led vnto the breach. But in the end they march without command, and are twice repulsed, yet Matthew Gooch (being amazed at the fury of these desperate men) demands a parlee, the which is granted by Charles, but hee obtained life onely, and a white wand for euery souldier: to some gentlemen of make a horse, and to poore families some carts to carry them. A pitieous spectacle, to see 4000 women crying their children either in their armes or in their cradles, leauing all their goods and mouebles behinde them, and hardly carrying a poore clout for their greatest need. Somewere comes to him that spoiles, for he shall be spoiled: that makes another weeper, for he shall haue time to weep. Yet Charles caused this troope of nine hundred men being disarmed to be safely conducted with the rest to Cherbourg, a place which they had demanded for their retreat. Bayeux being thus yeelded, the kings army marcheth to St. Sauueur le Vicone, the which yeelds without battery. They had a good composition for the number of men of warre that were in it, being five or sixe hundred: they grant them their liues and goods, retiring to Cherbourg. Charles was loth to lose his men vnconstrained, for that there remained yet some places of strength.

The composition of Caen.

Caen (a goodly and populous City) was besieged with great preparation, but to what end should I consume time in the priuate report of assaults, seeing wee haste to the victory? A great peece of the wall being beaten downe, and our men burning with desire to runne to this honourable breach, Robert de Vere being Gouverneur, demands a parlee, hee held the Castle, (being one of the goodliest peeces in France) with foure thousand souldiers. So by the commandement of Charles, the Earle of Dunois yeelded them an honourable composition, to depart with bagge and baggage and their armes, except the Artillery: the prisoners were set at liberty, and all that the Citizens might owe vnto the English was discharged, to the benefit of the debtor. All depart the fift of Iuly and are conducted in safety according to the accord, and the King makes his entry two daies after.

Falaise is besieged in the meane time, and yeelds the one & twentieth of the same month. Fiftene hundred English of their best souldiers, obtained a good composition to depart with bagge and Baggage. Donfront guarded by fiftene hundred franke Archers yeelds vpon the like composition, the second of August following. Cherbourg (one of the strongest places of Europe in those daies) was the conclusion of that account, and the crowning of this happy worke. It was guarded by 2000 desperate aduenturers, who (wonderfully grieved with so many misfortunes) would be buried in the ashes of this last loffe: but Thomas Gamel Governor of the place preuailed more then their obstinate resolution, shewing that they had discharged their duties to their Country in being the last

A to fight. But nature swayd most with Gamel, for hauing his son prisoner with the King, he would not lose himselfe with his sonne. The accord was made absolute for his souldiers & his son, and vpon this accord he leaues the towne, and retires last into England, to admonish Henry to provide for Guien, where the whole burthen of the warre would fall. So the 12 of August in the year 1450, Normandy (one of the goodliest and richest Provinces belonging to this Crown) was reduced to the kings obedience, in a year and fixe daies, hauing remained in the possession of the English thirty yeares, and so kept by them, as it is a miraculous worke of God they were so easily dispossessed. But leauing Normandy, lets come to Guienne, to finish the restoring of this Estate.

Guienne returns to the Crowne of France.

Guienne had begun her last feats of Armes by the taking of Cognac and S. Maigrin, as we haue said, whereas the warre continued coldly during that of Normandy. But Charles after the happy conquest of this Province, bends all his forces to driue the English out of Guienne, the which hee had enioyed by a lawfull title above a hundred yeares. Charles assembles his great Councell with the chiefe of his Prouinces at Tours, for the performance of this voyage of Guienne, and to finde meanes how to maintaine his Army. This done, hee gives the gouernment of Normandy to his Constable, and settled Peter of Brezay at Rouen, for the well presteruing of that which he had happily gotten. And to bee the nearer to his affaires, hee resolves to remaine at Taillebourg for all occurrences. Hee had then a small army in Guienne, vnder the command of the Earle of Foix, who had not only kept the enemy in breath during the warres of Normandy, but also had won part of the Country, by the taking Mauleon in Sole, and Guisans.

The King of England had a lawfull title to Guienne.

Charles gives the command of the army to the Earle of Dunois and Longueville a baron of Orleans, but the Earles of Ponthieure and Perigord, haue another part, to molest the English in diuers quarters, yet these three armies shall make but one body vnder this Lieutenant generall to his Maister, when the necessity of his seruice shall ioyne them all in one. The Earle of Ponthieure did happily begin the conquest of Guienne, in taking of Bergerac, the which was well defended: and then Genfac, Saint Foy, and Montferand, and their dependances, by the terrour of his victorious armes. Our braue Gacons did not lesse on their side. About the same time Amanion d'Albret Lord of Orual was in garison at Tartas a towne of good presage, being the beginning of many blessings which God gaue vnto France. He had scarce fixe hundred men at armes, and some good footmen of the Country: but he was well accompanied with Tolence, Robin, and Epinasse, wise and valiant Captaines, and with his generous resolution, the hereditary ornament of his noble House. He shewed by the effects, that we must not number the men, but weigh their valour, for with this small troope hee prelumes to braue Bourdeaux euen at their gates, and gives a law vnto the Country of Medoc, making not onely the whole Country to contribute, but also to bring their commodities to Tartas. The Bourdelois (to free themselves, not onely from these brauadoes, but from their ordinary toyle and charge, thrust on by the authority and command of the English, who were then their superiours, leauy eight thousand men vnder their Maiors command. The Citizens promise themselves an assured victory, but this troope incounters them, defeats them, kills and take them prisoners. The neere retreat preferred many, but there remained two thousand vpon the place, and the victor led two thousand two hundred prisoners to Tartas, the which were taken like flares in a net, from whom hee drew great ranfomes, with the honour to haue vanquished a great multitude with few men. This only was memorable during that year.

Three French armies in Guienne.

The next shall bring vs in an absolute victory of all that held in Guienne for the English. Charles hauing given some respite to his Nobility and men of warre, appoints the fift day of May to the field. The army was very faire: the Earle of Dunois had the chiefe command, (as we haue said) the which did not hinder John Earle of Angoulesme (brother to the Duke of Orleans) from ioyning with the Army, with a goodly troope of the Nobility: as the Lords of Taillebourg, Pons, Roch-faucault, Rochecouart, and d'Albortere. Duke Charles his brother, was then in Italy for his preluate affaires, whence he shall retorne with another traine when hee shall be King.

Philip

Philip Duke of Bourgne was much troubled, in pacifying a mutiny of the Gantois, who molested him, when he had most need to succour France, in the conquest of the two Prouinces, whereof we now speake. To auoid tediousnesse in the priuate relating of all these sieges, the Kings army did first attempt Montguyon and takes it: then the Earle of Ponthieure arises with his troopes, and ioynes with the Earle of Dunois the Generall, and so the army (being increased both in men and courage) besiegerh Blaie, one of the goodliest fortresses of Guienne, a towne seated at the mouth of Dordonne, and enriched with a goodly haue of the sea, the which was well assailed and well defended, but in the end the towne is taken by force, and the castle by composition, although the Citizens of Bourdeaux laboured to releue it with a fleet of fine armed shippes.

Bourg was added to this victory of Charles, and in this amazement Liborne (being summoned to yeld vnto the King) obeyes without any contradiction. But their chiefe force was prepared against Fronfac: and in the meane time the Earle of Ponthieure besiegeth Castillon, a towne in Perigord, seated vpon Dordonne, (the which shall be famous in the warres of our time) and takes it by composition. Saint Million by their example yelds obedience. In the meane time all march to Fronfac, (a place renowned since Charles magne, and one of the strongest forts of Europe) being beleagured of all sides: as all prepare for some great force, they within demand a parlee. Their request was to haue a trespasse till Midsummer, if they were not succoured by that day, they would yeld the place, and submit themselves to the kings seruice, and employ all their means to draw Bourdeaux to obedience. These offers pleased the Princes and the Earle of Dunois being Generall. The day being come, no succours appeare, and so Fronfac is yelded vnto the King, to the incredible content of the whole Army, which expected great resistance from this invincible fort.

If the Earle of Dunois preuailed well on this side the river of Garonne, on the other side the Earles of Foix and of Armagnac failed in no point of their duties: hauing taken Rion, they ioynly besiege Acqs a towne of importance in that Country. These happy exploits performed in lesse then two monthes, did as much encourage the French as it did daunt the English, who could not keep the townes (which yet held for them) from seceding of the French, and much more in the champion Country hauing more liberty. So as the Nobility together with the townes, resolute to expell the rest of the English, that the King might be wholly obeyed. Onely Bourdeaux and Bayonne remayned: the most important townes of that Prouince, whether the whole force of this royall Army doth march, but the Citizens of Bourdeaux (loth to be forced) resolute to obey. Being thus affected, they treat and make a profitable accord, as it is set downe at large in the Original. Their freedoms and priuiledges were confirmed vnto them by Iohn Inuental of Vitis Chancellor of France, they brought their keys to the Earle of Dunois, (as Lieutenant generall to the King in his army) and receiued the French into their City with exceeding ioy, the first day of August, to the great griefe of the English, who see themselves expelled out of the whole Realme, but they shall yet make a new attempt.

The oath of fealty was authentically made to Charles the 7. both by the citizens of Bourdeaux, and by all the Estates of Burdelois as to their King and lawfull Prince, renouncing the English. The Nobility held vp their hands first in this oath, and namely, the Lords of Epipharre, Montferand, Duras, Rolan, Pucelos, Lanfac, Lifle, and Anglade, amongst the which how many proud peritured? The Archbishop also did take the same oath of homage and fealty to the King, with Gaston de Foix: onely Capitall de Buche would not take the oath for his person, but he submitted all his lands to the obedience of the Crowne, an error which shall be preiudiciall to the whole Prouince. Thus all Guienne was made subiect to the Kings obedience, except Bayonne: for the reduction of which towne (being needlesse to keepe together so great an army,) every Nobleman was commanded to returne to his house, and that the Earle of Dunois should continue there to employ the forces of the Country at this siege. So the Princes of the blood depart, accompanied with twenty thousand men, whom they dismiss euerie one into his Country. The Earle of Foix ioyned with the Earle of Dunois, and they besiege Bayonne: the siege was long, painfull, and dangerous: the which might haue bene more easie and speedy by means of the army which was ready. But in truth the niggard spends more then the bountifull man in euery degree: yet in the end Bayonne submits to the obedience of

A the Crowne vpon these conditions, That the townsmen of Bayonne should deliver Iohn of Beaumont their capitaine into the Kings hands, with their owne persons and their goods to be at the Kings will and discretion; and to repair their disobedience, and to purchase the Kings fauour, they should pay forty thousand crownes, whereof they are bound by the Earle of Foix, Generall of the army. This accord was confirmed by the entry of the said Earle into the towne, who took a solemne oath in the kings name. Charles tortures the inhabitants halfe their fine, and confirms halfe their priuiledges. The three Estates of the Country of Burdelois send their Deputies vnto the King, who was then at Taillebourg, to confirme their oaths, and homages already taken by his Chancellor: and the King likewise doth ratifie their priuiledges, and receiues them into fauour, so as Guienne seemed to bee reduced to the Kings obedience, to the incredible content of the whole Realme, and so this year ended with an vniuersall ioy.

But seven or eight monthes were scarce spent in this publike ioy. (such as the French might haue in euery corner of their Country, inioying peace, the which they had not tasted these hundred yeares, and which in outward appearance there was no hope to recover, the English and Bourguignons hauing taken such firme footing in all parts) when as beheld, a great surge which seemed to expose France to the mercy of a more horrible and dangerous storme. For Talbot comes to the gates of Bourdeaux, with goodly troopes of English, where he was receiued, and tooke the Seneshall of Guienne prisoner, being Gouernour of the towne, with Iohn de Foix Deputy Maier of Bourdeaux; and in a manner the same day, the Nobility which had giuen their faith vnto the King, (noted before by their speciall names) deliuered all the chiefe places of the Country to the English. Fronfac, Colceures, Castillon, Chasseau-neuf in Medoc, Cadillac, Langon, Saint Macaire, Liborne, and Saint Million. And after Talbot (who came but to discover) there arriued the next day in safety, foure thousand fighting men from England with fourescore shippes laden with meale and salt meates, to victuall the Towne. The amazement of this losse was as great, as the ioy had bene of gaine. Charles was then at Tours: the Earle of Clermont (sonne to Charles Duke of Bourbon) was gouernour of Guienne. He commands him to haue a care to the preservation of the rest of Guienne, and presently hee sends sixe hundred men at armes, vnder the command of three Marshals of France, and the Lords of Orual and Rouhault, who were then nere the King, and sends for the rest of his forces with all speed. But whilst that all prepare to repair this losse, may wee not examine the motiue of this great and sudden change? Some new Writers accuse the ill vsage of the French to this people newly conquered, which made them to wish for the English, being more mild and temperate Lords: others blamed the negligence of our French, vsfit to keepe that which they had so valiantly gotten. But who is he that can find this first cause truly noted, hearing the whole History speake and representing the discontent of the French nation against the government of the English? And why did the King dismisshis army, but to ease his people, euen with the prejudice of his owne affaires?

As for our negligence in keeping of that which we haue gotten with much paine, it is too well known by memorable examples: but seeing the affection of the people of Burdelois had been confirmed by many proofes, in this voluntary obedience, to what end had it serued to put them in fetters, as a people vanquished by armes, and force them to obedience? But to find out the causes, we must examine the effects: L'Esparre, Montferand, Duras, Anglade, Rolan, and other specified in the Register of the oath, will be found straight waies resolted in these places. Capitall de Buche protested openly, that he was not the Kings seruant, so as hee might without reproach cary armes against him for the King of England his master: He might remaine peaceably within the Country, inioying his houses, being vnder the Kings protection, and so make his trafficke for the English at his pleasure. Iohn King of Nauarre an Arragonois both by birth and humor, was an enemy to Charles for two respects, as hauing married the heire of Nauarre, and with that marriage the quarrels & hatred of that Charles which was Grand-father to his wife, who had so much troubled the reignes of Iohn and Charles the 5. and as an Arragonois, by reason of the quarrels of Naples, against the house of Aniou. These were two instruments to moue many mens mindes. It could not otherwise bee, but the authority and command of two hundred yeares, had purchased England many seruants, and such as had alwaies held the English party against France, and were not reclaimed to the Kings obedience but by force, could a not beleue that they had any such part in the Kings fauour, hauing brought nothing to his seruice but necessity and constraint. These men being wonne, doe animate, or rather force the people, making themselves the strongest, in places where there were no guardes, whereof they were not only wearied, but plunged in the trust and assurance of a profound peace. Who seeth not then, but this made the way more easie for these disloyall traitors, to surprize those townes which they had deliuered to the English? but from whence fouer the mischief came, this was the remedy.

Talbot was the Kings prisoner; as we haue said, at the taking of Rouen; Charles had shewed him all the fauour a man might hope for of so great a Monarch: he gaue him his libertie without ranfome, and had honoured him with goodly presents: yet he is become head of the English army, which were effected eight thousand fighting men, and marcheth directly against the Kings army, which made hast to recouer what had been lost, and to preferue what remained. Castillon was become English. The Earle of Ponthieure, with the Admirall and Marshalls of France, besiege it, attending the King, who came posting to quench this fire. Talbot makes haste from Bourdeaux with the choicest of his men, bearing an assured victory in his conceit, being ignorant that he went to seek death. At the first charge our men begin to wauer vpon the braucariuall of Talbot, but they gather themselves together againe, with great resolution, to stay the course of this streame. Talbot on the other side, encourageth his men as going to a banquet, and not to a battell, he beates out the heads of pipes of Wine, to make his men drinke, himselfe being drunke with presumption, and making his Souldiers drunke with the vaine hope of victory; being mounted vpon a little Nagge, but followed by sixe or seuen thousand men, they come to fight. The combat was fierce, but the English are repulsed, scattered, and ouerthrowne. There were two thousand slaine vpon the place, and amongst the rest, Talbot was ouerthrowne from his horse and slaine; with his Sonne. The Earle of Candall (sonne to Capitul de Buche,) Montferand and Anglade are taken prisoners: Elsparre escapes for another time. In the end Castillon yeelds at discretion. Saint Million and Liborne returne to the Kings obedience, to the great content of the inhabitants, being surprized to their griefe. Charles did also warrant them from all losse in this repulse. Cadillac, Langon, Villandras, and Saint Maquaire, shake off the English yoke at one instant, and open their gates with their hearts. The Kings army goes from thence to Bourdeaux, being full of Englishmen, but fuller of feare, seeing the English loth to buy it so deare as Talbot had done: so as they suffer the French to wander at their pleasure vp & downe the Countrey of Medoc. This victory was due to the presence of Charles, who being arrived at Frontac, (the which was held a place inuincible by force) it yeelds as vanquished. The English haue their liues granted them, with a white wand, through the bounty of Charles. He doth not to treat the resolted French, for the captaine of Cadillac being taken, is beheaded for an exemplary punishment.

From thence he comes to Bourdeaux, (the which was the chiefe place of his affaires) but the multitude that came vnto his seruice was admirable, they came from all parts (knowing that the King was present), so willingly doe the French obey their Prince. There were 4000 English remaining in the towne, and as many of their faction, being drawne together from diuers parts of the Countrey: the siege continued two months, Charles had built vp Bulwarke to stop the entry, and to encounter the English defences; but there were no memorable assaults. The sicknesse which increased in the kings army, hastened the composition for the City, the which he might haue forced, but that he desired to spare the blood of his subiects. The composition was thus made: That all the English should passe into England with their goods: that the Citizens of Bourdeaux should be all in the Kings protection, taking a new oath, neuer to rebell against him their Soueraigne Lord.

And for that some of the Countrey, and of the City of Bourdeaux, had drawne in the King of England, contrary to their oath, the King (pardoning the greatest number) should cholewenty at his pleasure, to banish them out of the Realme, their goods remaining forfeited to the Crowne: of this number were Capitul de Buche, and Candall his sonne, Durvas, Anglade, Rosan and Elsparre, who in the end lost his head, being found guilty of a true treason, a year after this pardon. A lity with teares, and receiue a great garison to prevent all surprises: they build two strong Castles to that end: one towards the Sea, called Castell Trompette, another towards the maine, named Castell du Ha. The Earle of Clermont, gouernour of Guienne, remaines in the City, to settle the Kings authoritie. Charles caried this true commendation in the recouery of his losse, to haue doubled his army by the good order which he caused to be carefully obserued, and by his victory, in vanquishing his enemies, not only by force, but by clemency, and his subiects by loue and mildnesse. So as both the treachery of these disloyall, and the rashnesse of his enemies with their new attempts, were pates due to this victory, so much the more admirable, for that he doth vanquish, when as hee seemed vanquished: he wins, when as in shew he was lost: and forced as it were to warre for the desire he had of peace, he reaped the fruit both of warre and peace, in fighting valiantly, and vying the victory modestly, to the eternall memory of posterity.

Charles returns from Bourdeaux to Tours, hauing happily finished his doubtfull action. But oh the inconstancy of this world! England which had so much troubled vs, takes occasion to trouble it selfe, for the losses which they supposed to haue made of that which they had taken from vs: and as affection is wayward and often blinde, so it sowes dissention vpon strange subiects. The Dukes of Yorke, Somerset, and Gloucester, accuse one another, and make factions within the Realme. Richard Duke of Yorke (being a branch of the blood royall) pretended the Crowne to belong more iustly vnto him, then vnto Henry, the sixt then reigning; but contemned, by reason of his great losses, and of his natural defects. Somerset being fauoured by the King (as the ring-leader of his faction) was pursued by Yorke, and so cunningly, as the Londoners (hating him as the cause of all the losses in France) put him in prison; but in the end hee was freed by the Kings authority.

Troubles in England.

This dissention burst out into open warre, vnder the names of two factions, Lancaster, from whence King Henry was descended, and they wore the red Rose for a mark; and Clarence from whence the Duke of Yorke took the beginning, bearing the white Rose for a distinction. This ranchor of parties hath bathed all England with the blood of her subiects: two yeares shall not passe after the losse, but Somerset shall die in a battell, and King Henry the sixt (who had caried himselfe as King of France) shall be prisoner: and where as he fought to ioyne the Crowne of France to that of England, he shall lose that of England, both for him and his: teaching vs that we must neuer thinke to doe harme to another, but we shall receiue our share againe, and not to despaire in our greatest afflictions. The beginning of this raigne did represent vnto vs a ruined Realme, and this end restores it to her first beauty. Thus was this Realme restored; from the which the English were quite expelled, except from Calais, and the heyre recouered the possession of his right, the which his successors enioy vnto this day.

The meanes of this singular deliuerance, is worthy to be obserued, vnder the conduct of the first mouer, the which the wise acknowledge to be in the prouidence of God, the Soueraigne of Soueraignes, and the preferuer of States, whereby he maintains the society of Mankind. Truly in the course of these ordinary meanes which we seeke after, Charles holds the first place, being both capable of counsell, and full of resolution to put in execution. Hee was assisted by great personages in the gouernment of his affaires: And for the warres, he was furnished with two Constables, which trusted him faithfully, the Earle of Boucquan in his aduersity, and the Earle of Richmond in his prosperity: of two Chancellors, worthy men, & fit for the time: Renald of Chartres Archbishop of Rheims, and Iohn Tournai of Vrsins, Baron of Treignel, the one for the beginning, the other for the end of his affaires: And for Warriours, hee had as resolute and happy Commanders, as might be found in any Raigne, of whom he had great need. But from all this wee must attend vnto the soueraigne cause, who hath shewed vs the rod, and cast it into the fire, when as it pleased him: that by the example of our Ancestors, we may more perfectly obserue the causes and remedies of our difficulties.

Now we draw neere vnto the end of this raigne: but before we conclude, we must obserue the estate of the Church, and finish the discourse of the Schisme, whereof we haue shewed the beginning and proceeding. We haue made relation of this inexcusable confusion, vntill the Councell of Pisa, which (supposing to reforme the scandalous disorders of two Popes being enemies, Gregory and Benedict) advanced a third, which was Iohn the

Constance.

23. so as at one time there were three Popes; Iohn at Bologna; Gregory at Remin (not able A to be resident at Rome) and Benedict at Auignon. This multiplicity of Popes bred disorder, to the great scandall and preiudice of all Christians. So as Sigismund (not able to cure this infirmity of the minde, by force) resolved to haue recourse vnto the authority of the Church: and to that end hee passed through France, England, Spaine and Italy, perswading all Kings, Princes, and Potentates, to hold a Councell at Constance, whither the Emperours of Constantinople and Trepiſonde, with the Churches of Greece sent their Ambassadors, and all Christian Nations assisted, to the end this Councell might be oecumenicall and vniuersall. In this Councell, Iohn the 23 (being accused and found guilty of grievous crimes) was first deposed and then imprisoned: Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth, were likewise deprived, and Otho Colonne a Roman Gentleman, was chosen Pope by the Councell, and called Martin the fifth. This decree of the Councell, was accompanied with great and generall complaints, by reason of the compact estate of the Church, which had exceeded farre in some places. Saint Bernard had begun in France, as doth appeare by diuers places of his writings, and by bookes written vpon this subiect. But many of his disciples had followed him in great numbers, Gabriel de Roquetaillade, Thomas Conest, and Nicholas Clemangis had filled all France with these complaints. But in England Iohn Wiclif, and in Bohemia Iohn Hus had perswaded men with greater vehemency: for Bohemia was ready to disclaime the Popes authority. Iohn Hus teaching them not onely to leaue the abuse of manners, but the doctrine it selfe: as is contained at large in the acts of the Councell of Constance. It shall be sufficient to quote them, my stile not permitting me to let them downe at large. The Reader thus carefull to see the grounds of this Controuersie, may goe vnto the Originall, and I will obserue the effect according vnto the duty of the History. Wiclifs doctrine was condemned. Iohn Hus and Ierome of Prague came to Constance, (hauing a passport from the Emperor Sigismund and the Councell,) but they were condemned and burnt as Heretics. Hus in the Bohemian tongue signifies a Goose. Iohn Hus when as the Iudges had pronounced this sentence that he should be burnt, he said vnto them: I appeal from you vnto the foueraigne Iudge and preserver of all truth, who a hundred yeares hence, shall visit me of my ashes a Goose which shall not suffer himselfe to be roasted. So as Iohn Hus was burnt in the yeare 1417, and Martin Lusher began to shew himselfe in the yeare 1517.

There were great complaints against the abuses of the Church, made by Peter d'Alain a Cardinall, and Iohn Gerson Chancellor of the Vniuersity of Paris, and Deputy of the French Church. The Colledge of Sorbon had giuen him great instructions vpon this subiect, but nothing was effected. They only make the Pragmaticall Sanction, to suppress the Popes authority. Gerson returning from Basil dyed for griefe at Lions. But this Councell did not end those two difficulties for the which it had beene called: for Petrus de Luna, called Benedict the thirteenth, being deposed by the Councell, and retired into Arragon, had so incensed Alphonſus King of Arragon, as he supported him with all violence against Martin the new Pope. And the Bohemians were so moued with the death of these two personages (whom they reuerenced) as they tooke armes vnder the Command of Zizka a very famous Captaine, and did much annoy the Emperor Sigismund. Petrus de Luna, called Benedict the thirteenth, held his Court apart, dying at Laniſcole a Towne in Arragon, as Martin did at Rome; but this humour brought him to his graue.

The Bohemians

After his death the Colledge made choice of Giles Munion, who was called Clement the seauenth, Martin dyes in the other seat, and his Colledge doth chooſe a Venetian of the family of Condelme, and calls him Eugenius the fourth, who finds the meanes to cause the Antipope Clement the seauenth to relinquish. But the Bohemian action was of more difficulty, for they spake boldly, being in armes: and Sigismund the Emperor prest to haue audience for them, hauing received great reproaches, for that (to please the Pope) he had violated the publicke faith, and suffered the breach of his passport. These causes made Martin the fifth to call a Councell at Basil, whether the Bohemians had free liberty to come: but the Emperour gaue them hostages for their surety, trusting his word no more, the which he had broken in the death of their Countrymen. There were likewise many more besides the Bohemians which desired some redresse for these visible confusions: so as it was there freely disputed of the necessity to reforme the Church, being first to begin

A first with the Pope, and not to suffer the fore-passed disorders, to the great scandall of all Christians: and that (to auoid a future inconuenience, by the generall discontent of all men) it was reasonable he should submit himselfe to the censure of the Councell, whereunto he was subiect.

As the Fathers of the Councell, with a generall consent had thus concluded, and had drawne articles, that the authority of the Councell was above the Pope: Eugenius foreseeing the preiudiciall consequence of this Decree, reuokes the Councell assembled at Basil, for certain great considerations, which (said he) proceeded from the holy Ghost, and transported it to Bologna, to the exceeding discontent both of the Fathers and the Emperour. B They resolve to oppose themselves against this brauado of Eugenius, and to withstand him by the like authority of the Church, whereby he sought to ruine them. By the authority of the generall Councell lawfully assembled, they giue him an assignation to appeare before them; and in case hee disobeyes they declare him degraded and excommunicate. Eugenius (to calme this storme) makes shew to yeeld vnto this Decree, and promitteth to obey, yet seeking meanes vnderhand to crosse them, relying vpon Charles the tenth, who followed his party. It chanced also (as Eugenius desired) that the Emperor Sigismund (who was the chief opposer to his designs) dyed during these disorders: yet the Councell of Basil was not dissolued, but was resolute to continue firme. Albert of Austria is chosen Emperour after Sigismund, and succeeds him both in his desire to continue the Councell at Basil, and in the Imperiall dignity.

uons the Pope
to appeare.

Matters grew then more violent, our Charles the seuenth being both to yeeld in any thing to the Emperour, hauing made a generall truce with the King of England, as we haue said, the English likewise holding with Eugenius sends his sonne Lewis nere vnto Basil, with an army compounded of French & English vniited, to nourish this notable diuision, the issue whereof was as we haue said. The Councell of Basil incensed by these bitter and violent courses practised by Eugenius, in the end they resolve to degrade him, and in his place they chooſe this Amedee Duke of Sauoy (of whom we haue spoken in diuers places) hauing made himselfe a Monk, of purpose to bee chosen Pope, amongst so many which aspired to this dignity, and was called Felix. But this cured not the disease: for at this new election of a Duke of Sauoy to the Pontificall dignity, all Kings, Princes and Potentates were moued (France, England, Italy and Spaine) at so strange a proceeding, and disauow Felix. In the meane time the Colledge of Cardinals at Rome, chooſe Thomas Strada Pope, and name him Nicholas the fifth, a man commended in histories, fit to suppress this Schisme, and to reduce the Church to vniion, being wise, modest, learned and quiet: all Kings and Christian Princes allowed of him by a generall consent. Felix was supported by the Germans, for Albert fauoured him, but he dies soone. Frederick the third succeeding in the Empire, a wife and a modest Prince, who (not to contradict the Germanes at first) followed their humour in fauouring of Amedee: but in the end ouer-ruled by a generall consent of all Christendome, he vseth his authoritie with Amedee, to make him renounce his Popedom. Our Charles doth likewise interpose his authority, and sends Iohn Iurnal of Vrsins his Chancellor vnto him, being well accompanied, who findes him at Lozanna, where he had made his pontificall seat with a stately colledge of Cardinals. He feared the King more then any man liuing, whom in his conscience he had moued to a iust dislike of him, when as he made a good shew, and yet betrayed him in his greatest afflictions (crosses which wound euen the very heart of a generous minde.) Moreover, Charles was both strong and neare at hand, to controule him, if he should continue obstinate. Felix stands vpon termes: but in the end, (when as the Kings Ambassadors spake vnto him of force) he grew more myld, and treated this businesse by the Kings authority, protesting that for his loue he did willingly resigne his right. Thus all obey Nicholas: and Amedee had a Cardinals hat with the title of Saint Sabine, and was Legate ouer his Countries, and of some part of Germany. This was the end of that feuer which so much tormented all Christendome: the reigne of Charles being honoured with this blessing of God, to haue been a solemne Theater both of the restoring of the Realme, and the reunion of the Church.

But alas, during these cruell confusions of the western Church, the Christians of the East (who endured much) were now vterly ruined. We left them in very poore estate vnder the reigne of Charles the sixth, in the yeare 1396. In fifty yeares (during the scandall of this miserable Schisme, and the willfull warres of France and England) there happened a greater greater alteration. Our Kings and Princes had laboured long in vaine to recover the ho-ly land, consuming an infinite number of men and money, and prevailing nothing. But Constantinople, the head of the Easterne Empire, remained still in state, with Greece, Macedonia, Thessaly, and a part of Natolia, whereof Trepiſonde was the chiefe of that Empire. In this weaknesse which drew neere to a totall ruine, the Christians vanity was so great as to make two Empires, the one in Europe, and the other in Asia, and then either Empire being divided into diuers parcels, held by sundry Despotes or souveraigne Lords, that among so many Masters there should be none at all. These confusions did bring in, fortifie, and wholly fettle the Turkes, who were the horrible instruments of Mahomet, and enemies to all Christendome. I enter not into the particular discourse of this Easterne History: it belongs not to my Subject. I onely observe the continuance of time, to shew the estate of the Church, and the Empire, with our Monarchy.

After our French had abandoned (as we haue said) this imaginary Empire of the East, the Paleologues seized thereon, and gouerned it diuersly, according to their passions: Michael, Andronicus, Iohn and Mannuel, hauing brought vpon the stage, both in diuers occurrences and with diuers successes, the most horrible Tragedies which impiety could deuise: to the great dishonour of the Christian name: in the end Constantine Paleologus giues the last acquaintance of the ancient possession of the Empire, to make a new bond in fauour of the Turkes, that his name might be answerable to his miseries. Wee haue shewed what a breach Batatzet had made in Hungary, making so great a slaughter of the French, when as he tooke Iohn Duke of Bourgogne prisoner. This beginning of a victory had in few proceeded farther and ruined Constantinople, the which he besieged, but that God (who would suffer the Christians to breath for their amendment) suppressed this Tyrant by another Tyrant: for Batatzet being taken by Tamberlane, did then suffer for his cruelty, but he left the conquest of the great Cite to his posterity, at such time as the wise and iust providence of God had decreed it: the which was fifty yeares after: for the battell wherein Batatzet was vanquished, after he had ouerthrowne our Christians, was giuen in the yeare 1395, and Constantinople was taken the yeare 1453, the 9 of May, by Mahomet thesecond, Grand-child to Batatzet, a fit instrument to punish the impiety, cruelty, and all other kindes of execrable dissolution which then reigned among the Christians, and euen among those which had the chiefe command.

This Mahomet was the sonne of Amurath, borne of a Christian, the Daughter of the Despote of Scruia, & instructed by his Mother in the Christian Religion, to be the more fit to chastise the Christians, who (confessing God in their mowthes and denying him in their deeds, could not be ruined by a fitter instrument and more answerable to the crime whereof they were guilty, then a Tyrant Atheist, who hauing tasted the true Religion, had spued it out, hauing no Religion, & mocking at all that carried the name of Religion. This Mahomet (seeking to fettle his Empire as the eldest of his house, being loath to haue any companion) caused his two brethren to be slaine, Turfin and Calepin: the one he drowned in a bason, the other he caused to be strangled. Hauing murdered his two brethren by two of his Balthas, Moyſes and Haly, hee puts these murderers to death for his brethrens blood, shedding their blood who had beene the instruments of their murders. Hauing thus settled his Empire by these solemnities, hee applies all his wit to ruine the Christians, being diuided of themselves by strange factions, and as it were inuited him to their ruine. He seisseth vpon the Empire by degrees, being called in by the Christians to decide their quarrels, and fortifying the weaker of purpose against the stronger. A politicke man, painfull, active and imperious, getting authority by his fearefull tyranny. Being seized vpon the Countrey, hauing incombred the Christians affaires, and diuided their mindes by sundry intelligences, it was easie for him to besiege Constantinople; for who should succour it? The greatest enemies the Christians had within the Countrey, were the Christians themselves. The Ridologues (with the Churches of the East) had had recourse to the Pope, Emperour and King of France, and by their fauour to the Councils of Pisa, Constance and Basill, one after another: but they returned with nothing but winde, despaire and mockery. Thus Mahomet (well assured of his enemies estate) besieged Constantinople, the which was now but the shadow of the Empire, a great mass of building, reſtifying, that the beauty of the Empire was decayed. The Emperour Constantine Paleologus (who resigned his authority vnto Mahomet) had onely a few succours

the Turkes.

A from Genoa and Venice. Mahomet had two hundred and fifty ships of warre, and two hundred thousand fighting men: amongst the which the most warlike were leauied in those Countreys which made profession of the Christian Religion. The besieged seeing their estate desperate, fought to sell their liues dearly. But what could they doe? their walls being battered downe by the horrible thunder of the Turkish artillery, their port forced by their armed ships, and they themselves oppressed by so infinite a multitude. So as a general assault being giuen, Constantinople is taken by force. The City thus forced on the one side: as Constantine and many of his troope fought to saue themselves by a gate that was free, they were furiously pursued by the victorious Turkes, and the port being stopp by the multitude, many were smothered, among the which Constantine was found dead.

The Turke incensed for the losse of so many of his men, glutted himself with the slaughter of the poore Inhabitants of Constantinople, killing all indifferently, without respect of age or sexe, young and old, women and maidens, with such exceeding cruelty, as no man can write it without terror, nor read it without teares. When wee shall see before our eyes this goodly Countrey of the East, this Capitall Cite of the Empire, where the voyce of the Gospell had founded in the sacred mowthes of so many holy personages, and famous Doctors of the Church, which haue leued happily in their times, to become now the dungeon of impiety, the fountaine of error, the rendezvous of all barbarisme and iniquitie: where Mahomet raiseth himselfe above the Kings of the earth, and threatens Christendome proudly, hauing an Empire not onely fashioned, but also fortified with the force and power of so many Kingdomes. But alas! what speake we of Constantinople the last of our losses in the East? When we begin by Ierusalem, the chiefe Rendezvous of the Elders of the house of God, from whence the Gospell flowed, where the holy mouth of the Sonne of God and of his Apostles haue founded out: when we continue by Iury, a Land which hath long nourished the true Church, and beene the guard of the doctrine of health: when we crosse ouer this great Countrey of Asia, and from thence passe into those goodly Prouinces of Europe, Greece, Macedonia and the neighbour Nations: when cast our eyes beyond the Sea, and behold from our windowes the heavens, vnder which Africke lyes, heretofore replenished with so many goodly Churches, and enriched with so many excellent Doctors, and yet all these great and large Countreys are at this day the receptacles of Mahomet, where he vomits forth his blasphemies, and spoyles the miserable remainders of the poore Christian Church: where hee takes the Tide of sonnes and daughters to giue them to Molue, forcing them to leaue the truth: where hee hath ouerthrowne all liberty, to plant his absolute tyranny, banished all learning and euery thing that may put man in mind that he is a man.

What may wee say in comparing our felues with them? are wee better then so many that haue liued in those desolate places, making profession of the same Christian religion, and the same hope of eternall life? Are our Prouinces stronger, more fertile and richer then theirs, and our Townes stronger and better peopled? O Christians! if he be wise that takes warning by another, how much should these examples serue vs? The same way which the capitall enemy of the Church hath made to Mahomet to inuett him in the Empire of the East, is it not open by our common diffentions? A miserable date: the end of the warres betwixt France and England was the confirmation of the Ottomans at Constantinople; and the beginning of many miseries to many Nations, as we shall see in the following Reignes.

But as misery is good for something, nay rather as the prouidence of God is admirable, who can draw light from darkenesse: by the ruines of the Easterne Churches, those of the West haue beene enriched. The ignorance of all Learning was very great throughout all the Westerne Prouinces, since the rule of the Gothes. The knowledge of Learning and Sciences being banished out of the East by the Turke, came into the West, so as by a singular miracle, the West is now become East, this goodly Lampe hauing lightened the Prouinces, to bee a Herbinger to the Gospell. But the planting of the Muses is due to the Reigne of Francis the first, as well King of the Muses as of the French. The shipwracke of Constantinople did cast these great personages into Italy, the which haue giuen a beginning of solide and perfect knowledge to our Nations, Emanuel Chrysoloras an Athenian, George Trapezondæ or of Trebizonde, Theodorus Gaza a Macedonian, Ierolme istofus Spartiate, Gregory Tiphernas, John Argypyle of Constantinople, Laonicus Char. A condit an Athenian, Marcus Masurus a Candior, and John Lascaris. These haue begun, but our men haue so followed, as they haue fūrmounted them in the knowledge of those goodly professions.

Almost about the same time the Art of Printing had his beginning. Some attribute it to the year 1440, to John Gutttemberg borne at Strausbourg, others to John Faust at Mayence, in the year 1452. Doubtlesse it is an excellent inuention to increafe knowledge, although the vanity and malice of men makes it oftentimes their baude, to the preiudice of the truth and all good manners. But hauing wandred ouer for many strange Countries, Let vs returne to France, from whence hauing expelled the English, and restored this Monarchy to her ancient beauty, by the means of our Charles, we must now see the last act of his raigne and life.

*The last Act of the Raigne and life of CHARLES the seauenth, contained in viewed the affaires of France by the eyes of another. As for the effect, hee reports that which all the world knew: that James Cœur was accused to haue robbed the King, and (to make his great trafficke in the Levant more free) to haue had intelligence with the Turke, and to haue afflicted them both with armes and counsell. These were capital crimes, and yet hee escaped for a fine of two hundred thousand Crownes, and banishment: and thereupon the Lady of Mortaign was punished, as hauing wrongfully accused him. Yet I find that more likely which the Seigneurs of Lodun and Saint Pons, Gentleman of Viuauez, dying very old, affirmed to haue heard, the one of his Uncle, the other of his Grand-father, both household seruants to the Dauphin, that the very cause why James Cœur was thus intreated, was for that he was too familiar with Lewis, as one of the instruments of his youthful pleasures. Let euery man beleue what he thinks most probable, whilst we finish this processe. The Duke of Alanfon was prisoner at Loches, whilst that Charles toiled himselfe to punish the Earle of Armaignac, and to recouer the Dauphin his sonne. They would haue forced this Prince to haue answered before the Constable of France, and the foure Marshalls: the which he refused, challenging the priuiledges of the Princes of the blood. So Charles (after that he had caused him to languish about a yeare in prison) sends for all the Princes of the blood royal, the Peeres of France, and the officers of the Crowne, to meet first at Montargis, and then at Vendosme. Hee sends this charge especially to Philip Duke of Bourgogne, who preparing a great army to assit there, was countermanded & so by his example, not any of the Princes, & but very few of the Peeres, were present at this arraignment. But the King (meaning to proceed at what price soeuer,) names certain Noblemen that should supply their places that were absent in this action, that nothing might want of all necessary solemnities to iustifie the condemnation. To conclude, according to the forme set downe in this processe, John duke of Alanfon was found guilty of high treason, praftising to bring the English into the realme, the ancient enemy of this Crowne: witnesses are produced, letters auerred, and the confession of the accused: what more? Sentence was iudicially given, that he should lose his head, & forfeit all his goods, all being at the Kings good pleasure: the which neither President nor Councillor durst contradict: et Charles gives him his life, condemning him to perpetual prison, and his goods to his wife and children, where he continued but 10. years, for Lewis being King, he freed him from prison, & restored him to his dignity.

It is a hard law, when force is ioyned to a Kings command. Howsoever it were, the cleere sighted did iudge, that the Kings iudicisie was the true cause of the condemnation of this poore Prince, who had alwayes serued the King faithfully, and the King had loued him about all the Princes of his blood honoring him so much as to make him his Gossp, carrying his eldest sonne Lewis to the Font. This his familiarity with his Godson, and the credit the Dauphin gaue vnto his counsels, was held to be a dangerous testimony against him. Were it then iustly or vniustly that this Prince was thus intreated; who seeth not here a great proofe of the inconsistency of this world? of great friends they become capital enemies: neither blood, nor the gages of loue in so holy a thing as the badge of our Christianity, can subdue the violence of passion, the which hath no restraint; yea, even that which should be of most force to vnite loue, hath most power to breed and increase ieaiousities. A notable president in two great personages. Passion makes these two great Princes prisoners, borne of one blood, the one a King, the other capable of a Kingdom. The one is prisoner at Loches with his guard, the other at Vendosme or at Tours, in the greatnesse of his Court. This is the difference, the one endures paine forceably, the other voluntarily. But he that commits a sinne, is hee not a slave to sinne?

After this condemnation, Charles seemed alwayes grieved both in minde and countenance, the ieaiousie which he thought to quench, in suppressing him whom hee suspected, & so increased, as in the end it was the cause of his death. Hee suruiued little about two yeares after this Tragedy, the which happened the tenth day of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1458, and the King dyed the two and twentieth day of July, in the yeare 1461, which time was vnto him a languishing prison, or rather a pining death. Doubtesse he that serues God doth reigne, and he that serues vice is but a slave: the Crownes and keepers of kings haue no exception in this. The quiet of a good conscience is true liberty: And who can haue a good conscience, but in doing well? How farre better and more honourable

A honourable had it beene for Charles, to haue beene beloued and respected by his sonne Lewis, who being growne great, and hauing giuen many testimonies of his iudgement and valour, might well haue caled him in his greatest affaires, as Robert did Hugh Capet, being associate in the same reigne, to be honoured and serued by the Princes of the blood, especially of this his trusty friend, who had giuen him so many proofes of his loyalty in his greatest affaires, and receiued likewise from him such firme gages of his loue, and to reape the fruits of this so much desired peace, the which he had purchased for all his subiects. But if he afflicts others, he hath a good share himselfe. He makes his sonne to sit, and to beg his bread in a strange Country: he causeth a poore Prince of his blood to languish in prison: and he himselfe feelles in his soule a continuall torment of griefe, a fire of chollet and a torture of ieaiousie, trusting no man, but liuing in continuall feare; and was this man at rest? A strange torment, he hath brought peace to all men, and cannot inioy it selfe, hee hath bread and cannot eate it.

But what read I in the Originall of the manners of our Charles? This King Charles (saith Montfretel) after his reconciliation with Philip of Bourgogne, was of a good life and deport, but when he had recovered his realme, he changed his manners and polluted his life, in maintaining dishonest women in his Court, leaving the company of a good and loyal wife, suffering more honour and reuerence to be done to those women, by the greatest of his Court, then to the Queene: they being more richly attyred then the Queene herselfe, the which was an ill president in such a person: yet he governed his Realme very nobly and wisely, and was indued with godly vertues, maintaining iustice throughout his whole Realme. Montfretel and the History of Saint Denis, excuse the loue of faire Agnes, and here they accuse Charles. My duty is to quote euery part faithfully in this my Inuentory, in the which there is nothing of mine owne but the bare report, whereby it appears, that vertues are mixt with vices: and that it is more easie to beare aduersitie then prosperitie. Let the example of Dauid be confronted with this: Wine causeth drunkennesse, and water tempers. Sometimes age is more wake and imperfect then youth, to the end the whole honour of any good age is in man, may be ascribed to God, who is the Author thereof. Joy and griefe, ieaousie and loue, be they not contrary affections: and yet behold they are both in one subiect, D distracting him diuersly. Inconstant nature of man! who is a slave to sinne, by the meanes of sinne, which receiues the motions of diuers winds, from North, South, East and West, both fowre and sweet.

It will be now time after all this, to shew the end of our Charles: but wee may not omit some notable things which chanced in this season, during the ebbing and flowing of these seuen variable yeares. Lewis the Dauphine was resident at Geneppe in Brabant, and married with the daughter of Sauoy, by whom he had a sonne. The Duke of Sauoy with his wife (who was daughter to the King of Cyprus) came to visit Charles, and to pacifie him, with hope that he should soone see his sonne, with this new gage of loue, but all this did but ease and not cure Charles his infirmity. We haue said before, that Henry the 6. King of England, was put in prison by the Duke of Yorke, who pretended the Crowne to appertaine vnto him by a iust title then vnto Henry. He makes an accord with the Duke of Yorke, to free himselfe from this captiuitie, that Henry should inioy the Crowne during his life, but after his decease it should come to the Duke of Yorke, and to his Heires after him: and so the Prince of Wales, sonne to King Henry, should be excluded from the succession of England. By this accord Henry was released, but Henry his wife (daughter to King Rene of Sicilia) shewes her selfe more resolute then her husband, who (hauing provided for her affaires) disauowes this accord, as preiudiciall to her son, & against the lawes, which allow of no forced contract made by a prisoner: and so she armes to maintain her sonnes lawful heire of the Crowne. The Duke of Yorke likewise leaues an army to frustrate the Queenes designs. At that time the Queene did win both the victory, and the heads of the Duke of Yorke, of his second sonne, and of the Earle of Salisbury his chiefe partizan, whom she tooke prisoners in the battell, and caused to be beheaded, but she shall haue her turne.

In the meane time these troubles ministred an occasion vnto Charles to attempt against the English: although (transported with these home-bred discontentes) he had a troublesome enemy within himselfe, without seeking one beyond the seas. This was done by the counsell and aduice of the Constable of Richmont, who fearing the Kings humour, and loth to deale in these discontentes, laboured to diuert him, giuing him a better subiect to exercise his spirit. It was also happy for the Constable, that hee was farre off, being likely that ieaousie would haue brought him first in question, whom Charles loued not much, for the crosses he had receiued by him in the beginning. The cause which had drawne Richmond from Court, was honourable for him: for by the death of Peter Duke of Britany his Nephew, he was called to the Duchy. Being Duke he would not leaue the Office of Constable, notwithstanding all the intreaties of his subiects, being desirous to honour that charge in his age, the which had honoured him in his youth, although he enjoyed the Dukedome but three yeares, dying with the good opinion of all France, hauing satisfied it much, both with his counsell and valour.

Interprie: gainst hagland,

This aduice to attempt against England, giuen by the Constable, was executed by the Normans, vnder the command of Peter of Brezay, Seneschall of Normandy, accompanied with a good number of the Nobility of Normandy, and fower thousand fighting men: these might doe some great exploit in a Country diuided and troubled: but God hath appointed the limits of Kingdomes; and that great ditch of the Sea is sufficient to dissiuall these two Monarchies, who haue enough to content them without attempting, gainst their neighbour. To conclude, this army lands in England, and takes Sandwich, the which they presently spoile and leaue, and so returne to Honnefleu, from whence they imbarqued, carying away store of prisoners and spoyle. Their speedy returne was chiefly to saue their liues and goods, which had bene in great danger, if they had ingaged themselves farther, for any rich spoyle.

A strange death: is the accident of ioy.

Charles was intreated by Ladislaus King of Hungary, sonne to that great Iohn Huniade, one of the strongest Champions against the Turke) to grant him Magdalene his daughter to wife, the which he did. As he prepared for this voyage, & a stately traine for his daughter, which might equal or surmount the Ambassage sent from Ladislaus, newes comes of the death of Ladislaus, (a young man of twenty yeares of age, and of a generous hope) being poisoned at Prague: whose death was the cause of many miseries, as we shall hereafter hear. Their ioy in France was changed to mourning, and the Wedding to a Funeral, to the great griefe of Charles. But to put him in mind of necessary causes, amidst these voluntary afflictions; It chanced that the Mother of Joane the Virgin (to purge the blot of infamy in the death of daughter, being condemned as a Sorceresse by the Bishop of Beauvais, to please the English) obtains a reuocation of this sentence from the Pope, & Charles confirms it, causing it be solemnly published to the content of all French-men, to whom the remembrance of this generous spirit shall be for ever pleasing.

death of Charles.

In the meane time, this ieaousie which was seld in the heart of Charles, is fed by the daily whisperings of his household flatterers. And now behold a strange accident: A Captaine (in whom he had great confidence) assures him that they meant to poison him: he beleeues it, and plants this apprehension so firmly in his minde, as he resolves neither to eate nor drinke, not knowing whom to trust. He continued obstinately for seuen dayes in this strange resolution, the which in the end brought him to his graue: for being obnoxious in this humour (not to eate, notwithstanding all the perswasions of his Physicians and seruants,) the passages were so shrunke, as when he would haue eaten, it was then too late: and feeling his forces to decay, he provided for his last Will, and dyed the two and twentieth day of Iuly at Meun vpon Yeure in Berry, in the yeare 1461, hauing liued nine and fifty yeares, and reigned nine and thirte, leauing two sonnes, Lewis and Charles: the first (that reigne after his father, and the second (that be the cause of new troubles in France, but not such as haue reigned vnder our Charles the seuenth.

His disposition.

A Prince who hath as much advanced the French Monarchy, as any King that euer commanded: for finding the Realme returned, he hath restored it: his Predecessors had planted the English in the bowels of the Estate; he expelled them, bringing in a gentle peace after an intestine war of 100 yeares. A friend to Iustice, good order, and the people, resolute in great affaires, capable of counsell, wise, courageous, happy in the execution of good counsels, and happy in seruants that haue faithfully serued him to the end of the worke of restauration, whereunto God had appointed him. But these great and heroic vertues were blemished by some vices, which were more visible in his prosperity, then in his aduersity: for affliction restrained him, but his happy successe putt him vp, and gaue scope to his humors; making him suspicious and amorous, to the prejudice of his affaires, and

A and dishonour of his person. On the one side, vngouerned loue to strange women, making him to forget the lawfull loue of his wife, and to lose both time and iudgement, whereby he blemished his reputation, both with subiects and strangers. On the other side, presumption of his good successe, made him vnpleasing vnto his best seruants; yea, euen to his house, and in the end it brought him to his graue, after a most feareful & tragick manner, leauing in his vertues, an example to be followed, and in his vices to be auoyded, with a visible prooffe in his happy successe, That God vseth weake instruments, to the end that he might be knowne to be the Author of the good worke they haue in hand, that his grace seeming strong in their weaknesse, the homage and honour of all good might bee giuen to him: for whoseuer glories, let him glory in the Lord.

tious.

Charles had no sooner closed his eyes, but poits fly to Geneppe in Brabant vnto Lewis, to aduertise him of his death. The originall notes it for exceeding speed, that through the diligence of Charles of Aniou, Lewis was aduertised of the death of his father, the very same day hee dyed. This post was speedy, yet slow in regard of the desire Lewis had to returne into France, and to take possession of this goodly Crowne, which attended him.

LEWIS the eleuenth,

The 55 French King.

As it not then likely, that this so happy a Catastrophe of the latter reigne of Charles, should haue purchased Lewis as happy and peacefull a Crowne, as his Fathers had bene painfull and full of crosses? But the heires of worldly possessions (which we call the goods of Fortune, and of the body) doe not alwayes inherit the same humours and complexions of their predecessors. Charles was of a courteous disposition, affa-

The disposition of Lewis the 11.

D, ble, a friend to Iustice, and capable of Counsell: hee leaues Lewis his eldest sonne, a Prince in truth, humble in words and shew, wise in aduersitie, painfull, a free entertainer of men of merit, curious to know all men, of a good capacity, perfect in iudgement, and very continent. But these vertues were blemished with many vices: ill-tongued, reuengefull, cruell, full of fraud, dissembling, distrustfull, variable, a friend to base people, and an enemy to great persons, yet willing to repaire the wrongs hee had done to many. But let vs impute this alteration to the multitude of his forraigne and home-bred foes, who had greatly altered the good seeds which nature had planted in him. That which plunged him into a labyrinth of troubles and afflictions during all the course of his life, was, that at his first comming to the Crowne, hee discountenanced most of the Princes & Noblemen, whom Charles had fauoured, preferring mean men to their places, changed (in a manner) all the ancient Officers of the Crowne, and cashiered and discharged the old Companies of men at armes, whereby such as hated him, did tax him as an enemy to all valour and vertue. Lewis the Daulphine at the age of eleuen yeares, was rashly ingaged by some Noblemen and others of the Realme, in the Warre called the Praguerie, against his father, who speedily suppressed it by his resolution, as wee haue seene. Being come to the age of man, hee married with Marguerit Daughter to the King of Scots: and as hee fell rashly in loue, so hee reaped nothing but repentance.

His wiares:

After her death (not able to beare the vnpleasing waywardnesse of his father) hee retires into Daulphine, and takes to his second wife, Charlotte daughter to the Duke of Sauoy, by whom he had Ioachim, who dyed young, Anne married to Peter of Bourbon, Joane the wife of Lewis Duke of Orleans, and after King of France, the twelfth of that name, Charles his successor, and Francis who dyed likewise in his infancy. In the end Charles going to suppress the practices of his sonne in Daulphine, and the neighbor-Provinces, Lewis abandons the Country, and retires to Philip Duke of Bourgogne, at whose charge he was entertained fixe yeares.

Charles being deceased, Philip of Bourgogne (to perfect this good office of Hospitalitie to Lewis,) accompanied with Charles Earle of Charolois his sonne, James of Bourgogne Earle of Estampes, Adolfe Duke of Cleues, the Lord of Rautelin his brother, nephewes to the said Philip, the Earles of Nassau and St. Pol, and with many other Noblemen of the Netherlands, conducted him into France, with foure thousand horse well appointed, chosen among a hundred thousand fighting men, the which Philip had leauied vpon a brute that some Noblemen of the Country would aduance Charles the younger brother of Lewis to the Crowne. John Duke of Bourbon (the Duke of Orleans as well for his old age, as for that he mourned for King Charles decesse, came not from Paris) Peter and James of Bourbon brethren, the Earles of Eu, Vendosme, Dunois, Granpre, Philip of Sauoy, with the greatest part of the Princes, Noblemen and Officers of the Crowne, goe to meet him, and conduct him to Rheims, where he is solemnly anointed and crowned by John Inuall of Vrsins Archbishop of that place, assisted by the Cardinall of Constance, the Patriarke of Antioch, the Popes Legat, 4 Archbishops, 17 Bishops, and 8 Abbots, the 15 of August, 1461, being about 33 yeares of age. Two dayes after, Philip did him homage for his Duchy of Bourgogne, as Peere and Deane of the Peeres of France: for the Earldome of Flanders as a Peere of France, and for the Countie of Artois and all other lands hee held of the Crowne. Then made hee a sumptuous and flately entry into Paris, with very ioyfull acclamations of the people, as you may see at large in the Originalls.

After many sports, Tourneyes and publike feasts, Philip taking leaue of the King, exhorts him to lay aside all hatred and spleene conceiued against some of his fathers ancient seruants, from whom he should draw as many good seruices, as they had giuen testimonies of their loyalties to their lawfull Master: to liue in loue and vnitie with the Countie Charles, and to aduance him according to the degree he held within the Realme. Lewis was no sooner installed, but the Inhabitants of Rheims minister an occasion to employ the first fruits of his forces. About Saint Remy the Collectors of imposts were slaine, and their contracts burnt in open street. The King treads thither many fouldiers disguised like Merchants and labourers, who entering secretly, and at diuers gates, become the stronger and are presently followed by some troopes led by the Lord of Mouy, who seize vpon the towne, takes 80 or 100 of the most culpable, puts them to death & suppresseth the mutiny. About the end of the yeare Lewis made a progresse into Touraine, where the Earle of Charolois coming from the pilgrimage of Saint Claude, did visit him, and the King (in reward of the kindeesse he had receiued from Philip) giues him the government of Normandy, with 36000 franks yearly pension: for the non payment whereof there will soone grow great dissensions and ciuill warres. In sooth the words of a Prince should be held for Oracles, neither should he belesse iudicious then constant in his promise. The Duke of Alencon was set at liberty, whom Charles the seuenth had restrained. But oh the vanity of man! we shall see him hereafter a prisoner, and condemned vnder his authority, who now giues him both life and liberty. Then the King gaue to his brother the Dukedome of Berry for his portion, and assigned the Queene his Mothers dowry (which he shall not long enjoy it, but dies in the yeare 1463,) in the Country of Xaintonge, with the towne and government of Rochell, Chinon, Pezenas, and other places. Then he went in Pilgrimage to Saint Sauueur of Redon in Britany, where the Duke did homage for the said Duchy, the Countie of Montfort, & other places which he held of the Crowne. But deuotion did not so much draw Lewis into Britany, as a desire to discover the Dukes affection, his Country, and Forces, whom hee held in ielousie, the which shall easily draw the Duke into the vnion of the malecontents, as we shall see; which will fall out happily for him, to disappoint the King of the prey he hunted after in Britany.

Lewis in the meane time, carelesse of Philips aduice, not able well to indure the sight of his fathers spies (whom hee accused as the motiues of his disgrace) changeth the gouernours of Prouinces, and most of the Officers both for Iustice and warre: he placeth new; being chosen out of those that had beene companions of his fortune, the which (to aggravate) they called a banishment, imputing it to them that were displaced. Moreover, he prohibited all Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen, the sport of Hawking and Hunting, vnder great and odious punishments, no further then hee should permit: a second firebrand of the following combustions. Now the King of Arragon (seeking to reduce his

A his rebellious subiects of Barzellona to their duties by force) ingageth the Countie of Rouffillon to Lewis, for three hundred thousand Crownes, whereof hee receiued fifty thousand presently, being followed with a goodly and mighty Army, to succour the said King, vnder the command of James of Armaignac Duke of Nemours. Henry King of Castill, complains by his Ambassadors of these succours giuen to his aduersary, which was a breach of the League betwixt France and Castill. The King (as well to end this quarrell, as that which Blanch the only daughter and heire of the King of Nauarre wife to the said King of Arragon, had with the King of Castill, by reason of some places in Nauarre) goes to Bourdeaux, and there concludes the marriage of Magdalene of France his siter, with Casbon the eldest sonne to the Earle of Foix, and presumptiue heire of Nauarre, who lay hurt at Libourne with a Lance at a Tournay, whereof he dyed, leaving a sonne and a daughter: Francis Phabius his successor, (who reigned but one yeare) and Katherine who succeeded him, and was married to John of Albret: when he goes to Bayonne, where the King of Castill comes vnto him, and ends all controuersies. A dangerous and fatall enteriuew: for these two great Princes, the most strictly allied of all Christendome, of ancient time from King to King, from Realme to Realme, and man to man, bound by great curses to maintaine this necessary league, the which neuer yet had any breach, they now conceiued a contempt and disdain one of another. The French of the Castilians sumptuousnesse and pride, in their words, countenance, and apparel: The Castilians of the plainnesse of the French attire, for Lewis had short garments, and of bad fuffe, the which the Spanish nation did impute to miserableness, wherewith he was neuer blemished. So as from that day, these Kings did neuer loue; but both nations conceiued such a mutual hatred one against another, as they haue left it hereditary to their posterity: and we haue felt the bitterness of this old leuaine in our late and more then vaciuall tumult. So perillous shall the enteriuew bee of our Lewis with Charles of Bourgogne (who shall hereafter come often in place) at Peronne, as we shall see.

Lewis being returned to Paris, as by the purchase of Rouffillon hee had fortified his Realme towards Spaine, so desired he to assure it on the other side, redeeming the towne lying vpon Somme, the which had beene ingaged by the treaty of Arras, to Philip duke of Bourgogne, for foure hundred and fifty thousand Crownes, with this condition, that the King should maintaine all the Officers aduanced by the Duke in the said townes: a promise without performance, for after the oath taken to serue him against all persons, at the first he tooke away the government of Amiens, of Arras, and of Dourlans from Sautenise: that of Mortaigne from Hantbourdin a bastard of Bourgogne: and the Bayliwick of Amiens from the Lord of Creueceur (whose lands he did confiscate soon after) aduancing to these offices Lannoy the Nephew of Croy, whereby he did greatly discontent the Duke, and the Earle of Charolois his sonne more, who in despite of the said redemption, did afterwards chase away the Lord of Croy, with his whole family, and confiscate their goods, they being the meanes thereof. Being retired into France, Lewis gaue him the Countie of Guennes, with the office of Lord Steward of his house. A discontent which shall hasten the Charolois to arme against our France. Moreover Lewis, to tye the Pope vnto him, (by the meanes of John Balue Bishop of Arras, (who since was made Cardinall, in recompence of so good a seruice done to the Court of Rome) sends Godfrey Bishop of Albi Cardinall of Abbeuille vnto him, to renounce all rights of the pragmaticall Sanction. So doing the Pope promised to send a Legate into France, that should giue all benefices, to the end that all the money which should be raised thereby might remaine within the Realme, and bee no more transported to Rome. But the Pope being seized of the charter of the said Sanction, made no accompt to performe his promise: and to please the Romans, he caused it to bee dragged through the streets. So as Lewis being thus deceiued, did forbid to cary any more money to Rome, nor to bring any Bulls from thence.

He made Sforza Duke of Milan his vassall, giuing him Saouonne which the French held, (a heauy motiue of lamentable warres, which followed) and receiued his homage. But whilest he labours to purchase friends abroad, hee procures himselfe intensibly mighty enemies at home, the Princes and Noblemen to whom the first places in Court, and offices of the Crowne did appertaine, seeing themselves with great indignity supplanted by these musthromes growne vp in one night, and put from the Kings fauour, they found one another

another, both by mouth, writings, and by diuers messengers: being assured of their mutual loves, they open their minds, discover their conceptions, and conclude, To defend and maintaine their dignities. For (say they) to what end doe wee suffer the indignities and braueries of these new vpstarts? we should shew want of courage not to apprehend the wrong the King doth vs. Wee haue armies, men, friends and money to force him to reason, seeing we are debarr'd his presence by these base people that possesse him. The chiefs were Charles Duke of Berry the Kings brother, John Duke of Bourbon who had married Charlotte the Kings sister, Francis Duke of Britany, John Earle of Dunois, bastard brother to Lewis Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Nemours, the Earle of Armaignac, and the Lord of Albrct. The Duke of Berry was easily drawne into this league, discontented to haue no better portion then Berry. The Duke of Bourbon had not yet received his marriage money. The Britton could not digest foure hard conditions, the which Lewis (hauing an army ready in case he refused) required of him: That he should no more incite himselfe, By the grace of God Duke of Britany; That he should coine no more money without his permission: That from thenceforth the King should leaue taxes and subsidies in Britany, and not the Duke: And that all that were beneficed within the Dukedome, should acknowledge him immediately for Patron and Souereigne. Priviledges which till then had bene alwaies expressly referred to all the Dukes his Predecessors, in the homages they did to the Crowne. The Earle of Dunois had alwaies benee the chief of the Army, and Lieutenant General to Charles the seventh, and now is deprived of all his Offices and dignities by Lewis his sonne. So euery one pretended diuers causes of complaint.

Charles of Berry must cary the bable, a yong Prince and credulous, an age which doth easily make men bold and rash, for they would vse him as the reuenging instrument of their passions. But where is the meanes to draw him from Court without ialousie? Behold an occasion is offered. After that Lewis had visited the townes of Picardy lately redeemed, hauing crossed Normandy and Touraine, hee passeth to Poitiers, leading Charles his brother with him. Lewis going one day to his deuotion, John of Rommille, Tannequy of Chastell (Nephew to that Tannequy that was charged for the death of the Duke of Bourgongne) agents for the Britton in this action, vnder colour to cary Charles Duke of Berry to the hunting, they lead him into Britany. Tannequy was discontented, for that hauing disbursed fifty thousand Francks at the funerals of Charles the seventh, in the absence of Lewis, he had neither recompence, nor any thanks of the King, and was not satisfied for the space of ten years. There remained nothing but to bee assured of Philip Duke of Bourgongne, who euen then had great cause of discontent: for during the partialities of England, betwixt the houses of Lancaster and Yorke, Lewis supported Henry against Edward (he being of Lancaster and this of Yorke) for that Henry had married the daughter of Rene King of Sicilia, and by consequence was neere kinsman to Lewis. In fauour therefore of this Queene, he makes a proclamation in the territories of the Duke of Bourgongne, forbidding them to aide or assist Edward, terming himselfe King of England. And for a greater disgrace, King Lewis would impose a custome vpon the salt in the Duchy of Bourgongne.

The Bourgignon oppoeth: he protests that Edward King of England is his ally, and that he could not deny him succors being required. As for the custome he shews forth the ancient priuiledges of Bourgongne, and intreats the King to forbear in the execution of this charge. Behold a sharpe touch, which might easily open the Dukes eares, to hearken to these malecontents: yet would he not enter, but suffers the Earle his sonne to vse all his meanes for this effect, being discontented for the government of Normandy taken from him, and his pension not payed; for the redeeming the Townes vpon Somme, and the aduancement of Croy in France. And although the passing and repassing of the Agents and factors of these Princes were very secretly performed by men disguised like religious men, pilgrims and beggers, yet could they not worke so secretly, but the King had intelligence, that the Britton had sent to practise the loue and league of the King of England, and that by John of Rommille, Vice-chancellor of Britany, he had made a strict alliance with the Earle of Charolois, a violent and valiant Prince. Thus the King sends the bastard of Rubempré, a Capitaine, to surprize such as he should find passing out of Britany into England, or from the Bourgignon to the Britton. This bastard

Ambassadors from Lewis and Philip.

Philip answer to the Ambassadors.

The wars of Common-wealth.

CONCE

A lands at la Haye in Holland, he enters the towne (with three in his company) where then the Earle was resident. Being examined of his quality, and of the cause of his landing, he makes some difficulty to discover himselfe. He is put in prison, as a pirate, sent (said they) by Lewis to surprize the Earle treacherously, and so to preuaile more easily with the Duke his father. This brute was dispersed through the Country, which made the King odious. At the first report of these newes, Philip being at Hedin, dislodgeth without taking his leave, although hee had promised not to depart without speaking againe to the King. Lewis (aduertised of the bastards detention, sends the Earle of Eu, the Chancellor Morvillers, and the Archbishop of Narbonne to Lille: they accuse his sonne of treachery and infidelity, for that hee had made a league with the duke of Britany, a friend and confederate with the English: he complains of the restraint of Rubempré his servant: and demands amends for words giuen out against the Kings honour: that the prisoner should be enlarged, and for expiation of the crime, that the authors of this slander should be deliuered into the Kings hands (especially Olivier de la Marche, one of the chiefs in the Dukes Court) to be exemplarily punished. The Chancellor who deliuered the speech, being but a blunt man, made it as bitter as hee could, and omitted nothing that might make the fact odious and criminall (for the which hee shall in time and place, be disauowed by the King and lose his office) adding moreover, that he could not conceale the cause of the Earles discontent, if it were not for the pension and government which the King had giuen him, and since taken away.

Philip answers, that Rubempré being charged with many crimes, was iustly taken, and in a County where Lewis had no right. If the informations did acquit him, he would send him to the King. That la Marche was of the County, and therefore the King nor hee had his competent iudge: yet if hee had done or said any thing against the honor of his Maestie, he would punish him to his liking. Morvillers insists, vrging that Philip should not deny the King, and that he should command his sonne, not to entertaine any bad conceit of his Maestie, nor beleue the slanders imposed vpon Rubempré. The duke replies: That till then hee had neuer denied the King any thing: and contrariwise the King had failed of his promise, in that contrary to their transaction he had fortified the Townes redeemed, with great garisons, the which hee should haue inioined during his life; taking an oath of the Nobility, to cary armes indifferently against all hee should command. That if his sonne were ialous and distrustfull, hee tooke it of his mother, who had often suspected him to goe to other Ladies: and not from him, who suspected no man. The Earle of Charolois toucht with the Chancellors speech, would haue taken the defence of his honor and the Duke of Britany: but Philip tearing left choller should transport him beyond reason, commands him to prepare for the next day. The night brings Counsell. The Earle hauing considered well of his plea, answers very respectfully: yet he maintains, that the proceffe of Rubempré would then, that his imprisonment was both iust and duly made. That hee had made an alliance and strict league with the Duke of Britany, being brothers in armes, but their affociation did nothing preiudice the Kings seruice, nor the good of his Realme, but rather their common forces should bee alwaies ready for the preferuation of his Crowne and the publicke good. As for the losse of his government & pension (whereof he had neuer receiued but one quarter) he was nothing displeased: that as for any wealth and honours, the fauour of the Duke his Lord and Father did suffice him.

Thus the Ambassadors returne nothing to Lewis, but threats from the Earle, who charged the Archbishop of Narbonne particularly with this speech: That within one yeare he would make the King repent the iniurious words hee had caused his Chancellor to giue him, in the presence of the Duke his father. And hauing speedily assembled a great Army out of Artois, Hainault, Boullon, Flanders, Holland, & Brabant, consisting of foure thousand men at armes, and eight or nine thousand Archers, vnder the ensignes of Lewis of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Paul, and afterwards Constable of France, the Lord of Rancelin brother to the duke of Cleues, Anthony bastard of Bourgongne, Hantibourdin bastard-brother to the Earle of Saint Pol, Contai and Lalain valiant and wise Knights, with many other Noblemen and Gentlemen, and great store of Artillery and carriages, hee enters into Picardy as Lieutenant General to the duke of Berry, taking armes to releue (sayes hee) the people surcharged with taxes and subsidies, and to recover their ancient freedoms and liberties; to restore the Nobility to their honours and ancient dignities, and to give vnto the Clergy their rights and preheminences. In truth these were goodly shewes, able to perswade the credulous, and to supplant the affections of the simple.

For the first fruits of his forces, he takes Nefle (a little Castle neere vnto Noyon, in the which there was a garison) Roy, Montdidier, Beaulieu, and Pont Saint Maxence; then having passed the rivers of Somme and Oise, hee comes with little spoile of the Country, to Saint Denis, where all the confederates should meet, but they failed of their appointment. Having presented himselfe before Paris, and skirmished at the gates with some losse to the inhabitants, supported only by the companies of men at Armes of Charles of Melun, Bayliffe of Sens, of the Marshall Joachim Rouault, and the Lord of Nantouillet, afterwards great Master: he seized vpon Saint Cloud, where his army passed the Seine, to draw towards Estamps, and to ioyne with his confederates, whom the Kings army stayed in their march. In the meane time the Duke of Bourbon seized vpon the Kings reuenues and treasure, and of the chiefe Officers, from whom hee might draw any money. Then did Anthony of Chabannes Earle of Dampmartin escape out of the Bastile at Paris, whom Lewis held prisoner, for that he had made warre against him in Dauphine, by the command of Charles the seuenth, vntill he had provided such caution as he demanded for the performance of the condition, for the which hee had giuen him his life. That he should passe the remainder of his life an Exile at Rhodes. Who going through Gastoins, tooke and spoiled the Castles of Saint Forgeau, and Saint Maurice, and caried away the Captaine prisoner, which was Jessy the sonne of James Caury: hee seized vpon Saint Pourcain, and being aduertised that the King sent to besiege him by the Bayliffes of Sens and Melun, he retired himselfe to the Duke of Bourbon. This flight did suddenly draw the King vpon the Duke. The places of Bourbonois were in a manner all taken and assured: but having intelligence that the Duke of Nemours, with the Earles of Albert and Armaignac did march, and that succours came to the Duke of Bourbon out of Bourgongne, leaued by the Earle of Beaulieu and the Cardinal of Bourbon, brethren to the said Duke (the which were of more shew then profit) he willingly hearkens to an accord with these Princes, wrought by his sister being wife to the Duke of Bourbon, that they should beare armes for the King, and labour to win their confederates vnto him. A convention ill obserued, by means whereof Lewis had caused the siege of Rion in Auergne to be raised, the which was at their deuotion: this done, he goes towards Angers, to try if by mildnesse and good meanes he might reclaim his brother being in Britany. Not able to effect it, and hearing the Earle of Charolois approached with great expedition to Paris, he leaues Rene King of Sicily and duke of Aniou, and Charles Earle of Mayen his Vncles by the mother side vpon the frontiers of Britany, to hinder these great forces from ioyning with the Bourguignons. And lest the Parisians (abused with this goodly shew of the common-weale) should receive them, he being so farre from them, he caused his Vncles to aduance, who dislodging alwaies before the Britton, did greatly annoy him for want of victuals, and hindreth his march, and he himselfe posts to Orleans with speed, and from thence to Chastres vnder Montchery, with no intent to fight vntill hee had visited Paris, and gathered a greater power, but necessity forsooth him. The Earle of Charolois hearing of the Kings approach, marcheth towards him with the bastard of Bourbon, commanding the rereward to ioyne with the Earle of Saint Pol, who led the forward, and takes his place of battell in the plaine of Montlecherie, where they appeare at the break of day the 27 of Iuly. Having discovered the Kings army led by the Lord of Brezay great Seneshall of Normandy, he commands all his archers and the greatest part of his men at armes to leaue their horses, and euery man to plant a stake before him in the foremost ranks to withstand the fury of the horser; behind he compasseth himselfe in with his cariages, and on the flanke he fortifies himselfe with a forest adioyning, hauing reloed to fight on foot in a place of aduantage for the foot, before that all Lewis his troops were ioyned. Lewis had about 2200 well appointed Lances, besides the Nobility of Dauphine, and some great Gentlemen of Sauoy and Bresse, a great number of Archers, and other men of war, but not equal to the Bourguignon. God, who disposeth of battels, would now chastise our King, but not to his ruine.

A French army could not descend into the valley of Torsou, but by small troopes: for when as the forward appeared, they were not about 400 Lances, yet hee giue respite to them that were farthest off to set forward, whilst the two armies spend the time in light skirmishes and Cannon shot. Having past some foure houres, the Earle aduertised that the Parisians (being sent for by the King) might come & compass him in behind, he aduanceth first: our forward doth likewise march, but he bears them backe vnto the village, and (to dislodge them from thence) hee fires certaine houses, so as the wind driues the flame and smoake into our archers faces, who did likewise fight on foot: he forsooth them abandon the place and to recover their horses. The Bourguignons likewise mount and gallop after our runnawies, but they had recovered a long and large ditch which they found by chance in the field with a strong quick-set hedge, behind the which they breasted, whilst the enemy laboured in the pursuit: but issuing at either end in troope vpon the Bourguignons, they charge them so resolutely, as they turne their backs, ouerthrowing their own archers in the flight: some recover their cariages, and some the Forest: amongst others the Earle of Saint Paul and his brethren, the Lords of Raucourt, Haplaincourt, d'Aimeries, d'Inchy, Rabodonges, and many others. The Nobility of Dauphine, Sauoy and Bresse had the chiefe honour of this defeat. The archers thus broken, they remained at the mercy of the French. But being pestred with the baggage, some Bourguignons rallied together, turne their carts, compass them in, and beat them downe with great beetles of lead. And to increase the losse, the Earle of Charolois fighting on the right hand towards the Castle, had an easie victory ouer our men, chasing them backe about a thousand paces. But having intelligence that they were ioyned againe, and that if he passed but two arrow shoos farther he should be taken, he returned suddenly, and encounters an amazed troope of footmen flying in the village. He chargeth them, but no man turnes head, sauing onely one fouldier who strucke him on the brest with a borse-speare, but the foot man lost his life with some few others, who could not in time recover the gardens and orchards. As hee passed against the Castle, hee met by chance with a troope of men at armes, which saved themselves from the rout at the cariages: one of them in the charge giues him a dangerous wound in the throat with his sword, by reason of this beuer that was false. Jessy of Saint Belain, called La Hire, Bayliffe of Chaumont, and Gilbert of Grassay knew him, they presse him to yeeld and not to be slaine: but behold the sonne of a Physician of Paris, called John Cadet (the history in truth owes his name for so worthy an act) being big and mightie of body, mounted on a horse of the same proportion, rushes through them, and diuides them that held him. Then happily arriues the Bastard of Bourgongne, and the Earles guard, by means whereof the French reuere themselves to their ditch, where they had beene in the morning. During the which, a false brute of the Kings death had almost ouerthrowne all: for euery one began to faint. The Earle of Mayen, the Admirall of Montauban, and the Lord of Barde embracing this common belief, fly with all the rereward. Lewis aduertised of this amazement, takes off his helmet, shewes himselfe to his souldiers, and so assures them that he is aliae. On the other side, the Bourguignon rallies his men dispersed and wearied, ready to fly if they had beene charged. At the same instant the Count St. Paul, goes to the field and gathers together vnder his ensigne about eight hundred men at armes, and but few foot.

Behold, the two armies standing in battell one against another, mutually discharged their Cannon. The night approacheth which ended the battell: an encounter, where the notable flying on either side did wonderfully moderate the fury of the fight. The which being thus ended, the Drunk was conducted by the Scots to the Castle of Montlecherie, hauing neither eaten nor drunk all that day, and then he retires to Corbeil. The Earle keeps the field, spoile the dead, and therefore holds himselfe a Conquerour. Amongst the Kings men were knowne Jessy of Saint Belain, the great Steward of Normandy, Captaine Flequeux Bayliffe of Eureux, with many Gentlemen, to the number of foure hundred horse and but few footmen. Of Bourguignons, the Lords of Lalain, Hames, Oigny, Varenne, and almost all the Earles archers: Haplaincourt, Aimeries, Inchy and many others were taken flying, and brought prisoners to Paris: of foot-men there were more slaine, then of the Kings part. All which were esteemed by some, at two thousand of both sides: others held them three thousand sixe hundred: but all affirme constantly, that there were more Bourguignons then French, although Lewis lost more horsemen.

A famous battell for running away.

In truth, the firme resolution, the constant labour, the dangerous hazards, manfully passed by the King, were sufficient motives to encourage his men to honour: and if hee had bene well and courageously followed, notwithstanding his small number, and want of artillery, the Earle of Charolois souldiers had digged their graues at Montlehrie. Three daies after the battell, the Earle of Charolois being aduertised that his confederates approached, went to receiue them at Elstamps. The Dukes of Berry and Britany, the Earles of Dunois and Dampmartin, the Lords of Loheac Marshall of France, of Buell, Chaumont and Charles of Amboise his son, all disgraced by Lewis, and put from their offices, although they had well serued the King his father. They brought with them (with the History) eight hundred good men at armes, most Brittaines, who had newly left the companies, euery one pretending some discontent. Of Archers and other men of warre resolute and well appointed, fixe thousand on horse-backe, all of the Britton charge, who assured (by some men at armes that fled) of the Kings death, promiseing him much good in conceit, in case the Duke of Berry come to the Crowne. And if at that instant they would haue giuen him credit, they should haue suppressed the Bourguignons, or at the least diminished them, verifying, That there is small loyalty, and lesse piety in men of warre.

Charles Duke of Berry having the citation of London.

On the other side, the Duke of Berry came to loath these broyles: for in open Council, hauing viewed seven or eight hundred hurt men wandring vp and down the towne he said: How much more glad would I haue bene, if this warre had neuer begun, then to part chase my selfe riches and honour with the price of much blood. A speech worthy of a milde Prince and not bloody: but ill digested by the Bourguignon, supposing that Charles would easily make his peace vpon the least motion made by Lewis. And to assure himselfe as well without as within the Realme, he sends William of Cluny (afterwards Bishop of Poitiers) to Edward King of England, although hee had alwaies supported the house of Lancaster, from whence he was issued by his mother, against that of Yorke. Hauing refreshed their troopes they all dislodge from Elstamps, and take the way to Saint Martin of Larcham, and Moret in Gallinois, and hauing an intent to passe riuer of Seine, the Earle employes many coopers to make pipes, hauing brought great store of stouffes for that purpose, whereon a bridge was made (for want of conuenient boates) through the fauour of the Cannon, which the Earle had planted in an Island in the midst of the riuer.

There ioynes with them John Duke of Calabria the onely sonne of Rene King of Sicily, the Prince of Orange, Thibault of Neuf chasteil Marshall of Bourgogne, and Montagu his brother, the Marquis of Rotelin, the Lords of Argueil and Thoulangeon, and with others, leading nine hundred men at armes, of the Duchy, and County of Bourgogne: Six score men at armes barded Italians commanded by Galeas and Campo-basso, four hundred Germane Crosse-bowes sent by the Count Palatine, and five hundred Swisles (the which were the first that came to our warres, a fatall and lamentable alliance for the Bourguignon, as we shall see in his place) of other footmen very few. All this great torrent of an hundred thousand men, enuiron Paris, they seize vpon Saint Maur, Pont Charenton, Conflans, Saint Denis, and other places thereabouts, they tyre the inhabitants with continuall skirmishes, euen at their gates: and shake their affections by practises and deuices. The Duke of Berry writes to the Clergy, to the Court of Parliament, to the Vniuersitie (which then was in great credit in Paris) and to the Bourgesies to euery one a part, shewing them that all these forces tend not but to the peoples ease and profit: and requires them to depute men of iudgement and learning, to vnderstand more at large the causes of this great assembly.

Ten Deputies heare their complaints, being led by William Chartier Bishop of Paris, they report it to the Council of the City, who answers: That the City shall bee free for the Princes to enter into at their pleasure, they and theirs abstaining from violence and paying their expences. Surely this would haue bene a conquest of the City of Paris: But the great Master of Nantouillet, the Marshall Touchim, and other Capitaines take view of their Forces, and by this means retaine the Parisians, who changing their mindes, are fully confirmed by the arrivall of John of Rohan, Lord of Montauban Admirall of France, with great troopes of men. O light and inconstant people! how safe is it to moue thy affections, and to make thee in an instant to applaud that party which

A which euen now thou didst abhorre. But let vs leaue them in this good humour, and see what remedy the King had for these gaboyles, attending the succours the Duke of Milan sent him.

Lewis being (after the battell) retired from Corbeil to Paris, flatters the peoples humors, treats popularly with them, erects a priuy Councell of fixe Councellers of the Court, fixe Doctors of the Vniuersity, and fixe Bourgesies, to gouerne his affaires, according to their aduice and direction: he leaues 600 Lances in Paris, vnder the command of the bastard of Armaignac, Earle of Cominge, Master of Gilles, of Saint Simon, Bayliffe of Senlis, la Barde, Craon, Charles of Mares, and Charles of Melun his Lieutenant in the said towne. Then he goes into Normandy, to assemble all the Nobility and men of war he could: from whence he sent the Earle of Eu to haue the command of the war and of the City, followed with two hundred Archers well in order. The Earle being ariued, he sends the Lord of Rambure to the Leaguers, offering to bee a mediator for their contents vnto his Maiesty, but it was without effect.

The King hauing intelligence of the confederates trafficke with the Parisians, knowing that this people doth easily change their affections with the successe: and foreseeing that this baite of the Commonweale, would soone bewitch them, displeased also that the Bishop had without his knowledge treated of an accord, hee hastens his returne, accompanied with the Earles of Mayen and Pondichieure, and the forces of Normandy. And for the first fruits of loue to his subjects, hee confirmed all the priuiledges they enjoyed in his fathers life: hee abolished all new impositions, and retained none but the ancient and ordinary farmes of Merchandise that is sold by great: then did hee punish, either with banishment or death, such as had yielded to the reception of the heads of the League into the City. Hee doth sharply blame the Bishop, (at the insligation of the Cardinal of Alsie) to haue bene a dealer in his absence for his enemies, with an inconstant and ill-advised people: and hauing provided for the fury of the City, hee prepares to offend and defend. The Bourguignon likewise vseth all force, making great and daily skirmishes with the Parisians, sometimes chasing and sometimes chased. And hereupon comes new supplies to the Leaguers, the Dukes of Bourbon and Nemours, the Earle of Armaignac, and the Lord of Albrer (notwithstanding the former treaty) with about fixe thousand men.

Means to pacifie a people that want.

On the other side, the King received from Francis Sforze Duke of Milan, fixe hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, commanded by Galeas his eldest sonne, with this Councell of State: That to diuide this company, he should yeeld to all conditions, and onely preserve his men. An aduice which Lewis shal cunningly put in practice speedily. These Milanais were employed in Bourbonnois, vntill newes of the peace shall come. The Earle thus fortified, offers battell, but the King would not hazard any thing, desiring to disperse this mistie cloud without effusion of blood. And to annoy them of Conflans and Charenton, he sends foure thousand francke-archers, and about foure hundred pioneers, supported by the Nobility of Normandy, and some men at armes, who plant their clues vpon the riuers side, right against Conflans, at the English port, where they make a large and a long trench vnto the City, with a Bulwarke of wood and earth, whereon they plant many peeces of artillery, which at the first drues the duke of Calabria out of Charenton, with great losse of his men, and an extreame terror to the Earle of Charolois, who lodged at Conflans in a house belonging to his father. Two Cannon forth passed through his chamber being at dinner, and sue his Trumpeter, carrying a dish to his table. This amazement makes him goe downe with speed: he fortifies his lodging, pierceth the walles, and plants a cannon for a counter-battery.

A politician aduices.

But they must dislodge these francke-archers, and preuent the losse they receiued from the other side of the water. For the effecting of this, hee obtains a truce for two dayes, in which time he made a bridge of boats. The bridge almost finished, the francke-archers leaue their trenches, carry away their artillery, and retire to the suburbs into the Carthusians cloister. A part of the Bourguignons army passeth the water: they enter the suburbs of Saint Marceau, and skirmish, but with little losse on either side. Hereupon our Capitaines resolute to assaile the enemy in diuers parts. A page sent by night giues them intelligence. At the breake of day some horsemen charge home to the artillery and kill a Canoniere. This was in shew the effect of the pages aduertisement. All armes they make barricadoes and stand firme. The Artillery thunders: the Kings answers them. They send forth two hundred horse to discover: who see a troope issuing forth the City to learne the cause of this tumult, and moreover a great number of Lances in conceit and to they report that all are come forth in battell, but the day breaking they prove but shillies. So this alarme turnes to laughter. In the meane time they treat of peace, but the demands of the confederates were excessive. The Duke of Berry demands Normandy for his portion.

An encounter between the command.

The Earle of Charolois, the towne of Somme lately redeemed. For the better effecting hereof, the two Commanders conclude of an interuiew. The King mounts vp the water right against the Bourguignons army, accompanied with the Lords of Montauban Admiral, Nantouillet, du Lau, and few others. The Earles of Charolois and S. Pol, come to receive him. He then offers to giue his brother the Prouinces of Bry & Champaigne, excepting Meaux, Melun, and Montereau, the which he would not accept. Hee grants the Charolois his desire, dit auowes Moruilliers in certaine speeches, wherein he faith, he had exceeded his charge: & for the Earles sake he promiset to giue the office of Constable to the Earle of S. Pol. These entercoures of either side proue fatall for the King: for besides that the Princes do daily tuborne more of his men then he can draw from them: behold, Pontoise is deliuered to the Britton by Sorbier, commanding there vnder the Marshall Teaching; and to finish to notable treachery, hee marcheth towards Meulan to the same intent: but the inhabitants being aduertised, he returns without effect. There growes another vpror in Paris: the souldiers want insolently, that the citizens goods are at their free disposition: that they will take the keyes of their houses from them, and for a need will pull the chaines out of their streets. Hereupon the Prouost of Merchants calls the Capitaines of the quarters, and chiefe of the City to Councell: hee commands them in the night to make fires at all the corners of the streets, and to watch in armes, euery man in his quarter. The people stand vpon their guard, ready to attempt some great action. The King himselfe goes the round, he finds the gate of the Bastile towards the fields open, and the artillery cloyed. But oh the prouidence of God! misfortune is good for something. These vnexpected fires disappoint the conspirators practices, they hinder the approach & entry of the enemy, and saue the City. Moreover, Gisors is beleagred, and the garrison abandons it. But that which imports more, the widow of the great Senechal of Br. (gouerned by the bishop of Bayeux) then resident at Rouen, with some other Partisans, giues John Duke of Bourbon entry into the Castle, and so into the City. The City desiring long to haue a Duke remaining in the Country, contents to this change, and sweares to the said Duke, for the Duke of Berry. In a manner, all the Townes and Castles of the Prouince follow the example of their capitall City.

The peace of Conflans, and the condition.

O strange chance! The Bourguignons army was now reduced to extreame necessity of victuals and money, so as all the Noblemen dreamed only of a retreat. And yet (an admirable thing) the price of victuals was not risen in the City. So many stormes caused Lewis to demand a second interuiew, before that the yielding vp of Rouen should bee known to the Earle. He grants the Duchy of Normandy to his brother: restores the towne vpon Somme to the Earle: to the Britton his County of Montfort, with promise to de-fay his charges: he giues the office of Constable to the Earle of S. Pol: he promiset vnto John Duke of Calabria, men and money to recouer his Realme of Naples; to pay what had bene promised for the marriage of his sister to the Duke of Bourbon, with the execution of other clauses contained in the contract: to restore vnto all others their goods, offices, and dignities, which they had enioyed vnder his father Charles. He grants vnto the Princes, that not any one should bee bound to come in person at his summons, but should discharge their homage and duties, in sending such forces as they were bound to furnish at need. To conclude, all the publike good is turned to priuate interest. The Earle of Charolois accepts these conditions so willingly, as discoursing with the King, the vehement desire he had to see the execution of this treaty, carries him into the trench of the bulwarke of Francke-archers, by the which they entered the City. They Bourguignons hauing lost him, cry out that he was stayed. The chiefe assemblie together, they tremble, they condemne their Earle of rashnesse, alleging the inconuenience happened to his grandfather at Montereau, in the presence of Charles the seuench, and they begin to talke of their safety: but as they walked into the field on horsebacke, behold they discover about

1466

A about fifty of the Kings horse, conducting the Earle to his quarter. So euery one reuiued his spirits, and ioyfully commend the Kings loyalty.

Two dayes after the treaty of peace was read, and sworn on either side, at Bois de Vincennes; Charles the Kings brother did homage for the Duchie of Normandy: the Earle of Charolois for the Townes and land in Picardy; and likewise the rest that had hostages to doe. The Earle of Saint Paul took his oath for the office of Constable: the rest for the most part receiue their goods and houses. So the Duke of Normandy was conducted to Rouen by the Duke of Britany. The Earle of Charolois took his way to Amiens, and receiued homage of the inhabitants, as also of other places that were restored vnto him by the peace. Then he entered into the Country of Liege, which had rebelled of late daies against his father, vpon the first brute of the ouerthrow of the Earle his sonne at Montchery, without attending the truth. Hee pacified the Country, and returned into Brabant. This was called the peace of Conflans, which was but counterfeit, the 28 of October 1465; the which the Bourguignon had not so easily yielded vnto, he had receiued sooner that refreshing of men and money, which Philip sent him by the Lord of Sauerze.

It was an act of great import, for Lewis to disperse these Princes so cunningly: hee did well fore-see that the Charolois being far from them, and busied in his owne Countries, would hardly returne in the winter season. Moreover, he knew well the meanes (as he was an excellent plotter of factions) how to diuide the Dukes of Normandy and Britany. And in truth they were scarce arriued in their new Duchie, but all the Noblemen, Gentlemen and Capitaines, expected some preferment from Charles duke of Normandy, so greatly aduanced by this peace; and moreover, the Duke of Britany, who had bene farthest engaged in the charge, was little amended by the treaty: they all by a generall discontent shew a notable subiect of distrust of their new Duke: so as there is spread abroad a still rumor, That the Brittons would cary Charles into Britany. Vpon this brute, the Dukes seruants and the inhabitants troope together, they bunne by heapes to Saint Katharines Mount (where Charles remained yet, attending the preparatiues of his entry) they leade him into the City, without any other assistance, but the Clergie in their ornaments. The Duke of Britany, fearing the mutiny of this people, retires vnto his Country: and in his way hee takes some Townes in Normandy, wherein hee leaue diuers garisons.

Lewis sees vpon
his brother.

Lewis embraceth this occasion; and vpon this diuision marcheth against his brother, treats with the Duke of Britany at Argenton, to winne him from the alliance of the Duke of Normandy: hee takes from him (by the Duke of Bourbon newly reconciled) Eureux, Vernon, Louiers, Pont de Larche, and other places: and by Charles of Melun, Gyfors, Gournay, Chailly: and consequently all base Normandy. Caen held with some other places, being in the hands of Lefant, a trusty seruant to both the Dukes. Charles abandoned by all men, and set vpon by so mighty an army, resolues to retire into Flanders, and seeks to the Earle of Charolois, whom this diuision did much grieue: for he desired about all things to see a Duke in Normandy, the which should greatly weaken the King. But the time was vnseasonable, being buified against the Liegeois. Yet for a prooff of his good happe, he labours to put some troopes (gathered vp in Picardy) into Depee: but Lewis prevents him, and compounds with the Gouernor. Hereupon the two Dukes reconcile themselves, considering (but too late) that as their disention had already ruined the one, so might it easily ouerthrow the other: according to the saying, That by concord small things increase, but by discord great are ouerthrowne. In truth it is a hard matter for great men to entertaine friendship long: and for the State it is necessary to haue one oueraigne head ouer all, who by his iudgment, wiledome, and credit, may retaine the subiects in obedience.

The Dukes of Normandy and Britany are reconciled.

So the Duke of Normandy begs helpe of the Britton, being poore, overcome, and abandoned now in his aduersity, of all them that during his prosperity had grounded the anchor of their hope vpon his fortunes, and had newly made their peace with the King. The Duke of Britany receiues him, and in his fauour sends an Ambassage to the King: giuing him to vnderstand, that for the honour of his blood, and respect of his Maiestie, hee had receiued him; seeing him a fugitiue, and vnprovided of necessary meanes to entertaine his estate. Thereupon Lewis makes answer, that he could not dismember

1467

Normandy, the goodliest flower of his Diadem, from the Crowne of France, whose demesnes are inalienable. The Duke replies: That to give a portion to his brother, grounded in part of the successefull right, was an alienation of long time received in Price, seeing that many held it euen then by the same title. But they commonly say, it is in vaine to preach to them that care not to doe well. Lewis could not yeld to the pretence ment of his brother: and the Brittons Ambassadors returned with no other answer, but a bare confession, that it was reasonable to giue him some portion, and that he would consider of the quantity thereof.

Roman returns to Lewis

Thus Roman (wanting their Duke some few daies) yelds the King obedience with small adoe: who suddenly causeth many to be executed of his brother Charles his faction. The Lord of Esternay, taken by Charles of Melun, great Master, in a Friars weed, accompanied with an Augustine, was beheaded: yet some write that both were drowned in the river of Vre. The King offended with the entertainment which the Duke of Britany had giuen to his brother, and aduertised that John Duke of Calabris was dead beyond the mountaines, he calls home the troopes he had giuen him, to haue the greater forces to faile the Britton, for receiuing of his enemies, and practising intelligences within his Realme. And euen then the D. of Alençon promised to giue the duke passage through his Country, if he would enter into Normandy. Moreover, so many Ambassadors from the King to the Duke and Earle of Charolois, and from them to the King; from the Earle to the dukes, & from them to the Earle, were but to discover their humors, and vnder color of faith, to withdraw mens affections. So the duke of Britany, not able to perswade the King to realon, enters into Normandy, takes Caen, Bayeux, and Auranches: he burns Meruille and some other places, whilst that the King assembles the forces of Aniou, Poit Clou, and Normandy: and the Earle of Charolois resolves to succour his confederates, hauing suppress them of Liege and Gant. And for that our Lewis had been so confusedly incombred amidst the compassions of those people, let vs leaue France, to learn briefly the cause, the proceeding, and the end of these warres.

The Liegeois, hereditary and capital enemies to the house of Bourgongne, (seeing all tend to open warre betwixt the King and the Earle of Charolois) seeke the kings friendship & alliance, and they obtaine it, upon condition to enter presently into the countries of Hainault and Namur, belonging to the Duke of Bourgongne, with all acts of hostility: the King promising vnder his seale, to succour them with two hundred men at armes, (euery one hauing three horses at the least) and not to treat any accord or peace with the Duke without their content, and to comprehend them in it: putt vp with this fauour and imagined succours, they send a Herald to Philip being at Bruxels, with letters, desiring the Earle his sonne with fire and sword, and thereon demand an answer.

The Duke hauing read these letters, deliuered them vnto the Herald, willing him to carry them to his sonne. So he returns to Liege, but hee is presently sent backe with other letters, desiring the Duke himselfe and all his allies. And suddenly they breake into the dukes Country, they spoile, raiue, burne, and omit no outrage that one enemy may doe to another. Philip assembles the forces of his Country, and sends for the dukes of Cleues and Gueldres, the Earles of Nassau and Horne, the Marquis of Rothelin, and others that were neighbours to Liege. But this multitude finding the King to faile them of his promise, and that they were not able to resist so great forces, they thrust themselves vp within the walles of Liege. Then at the first and false newes of the ouerthrow of the Earle of Charolois at Montcheric, (as the passions of a disordered mind doe easily make man to beleue what hee wisheth) they take a subiect of new folly. Those of Dinan especially (a people of Liege, proud and arrogant to haue at sundry times endured seuenteen sieges of Emperours and Kings, yet neuer conquered) make a picture very like to the Earle of Charolois, and attired with his Armes, they carry it in troope neere to Bouvines in the Country of Namur: they set vp a high gybbet in the sight of the Citizens, and there they hang this Image, crying with open throat; See there the sonne of your Duke, that false traitor the Earle of Charolois, whom the French King hath, or will cause to be hanged, as you see here. Hee termed himselfe the sonne of your Duke, hee lyed: he was a villaine bastard, changed in his infancy with the sonne of the Lord of Hainberghe, our Bishop. Did hee thinke to ruine the Noble house of France? From these and such like insolent speeches, they come to deeds, armed against the subiects of Philip, with fire and sword,

A the instruments of their horrible outrages. This was not all, the father must receiue the like disgrace by his picture, the which they carried to the dung-hill before Bouvines, and setting it vpon a peece of wood; See here (say they) the fat of the great Toads your Duke. Those of Bouvines exhort these mad men to performe the duties of good subiects to the Duke, before that matters grew more bitter. But the bearer of this good and wholesome counsell, returned without his head: they send an innocent child, with the like Letters, hoping his tender age would moue some respect, and mollifie these cruell and vnnatural minds, but in despite of the Duke and of their neighbours, they killed him most barbarously, and tare him in peeces.

B Insolent people! which haue not yet learned, That there is no vice wherof God doth more often shew his iudgements, then vpon pride. The great wealth thou hast gathered during thy long felicity, hath it so furiously transported thee beyond the boilds of obedience: and to what end is thy great wealth, but to draw thee headlong to thy ruine? Philip takes his reuenge by the defeat of foure thousand Liegeois, fortified within Montencat, a village five leagues from Liege. The Earle of Nassau did this exploit, but the Duke would be present in person with the Earle his sonne, at the taking and vtter desolation of Dinand. He besiegeth it with aboute twenty thousand horse, beside foot, which were in great numbers, takes it, and destroyes it, and draggeth eight hundred prisoners chained together, to be drowned in the Meuze before Bouvines: an expiation for the tyrannicall indignities they had endured by the Dinandois. Those of Liege did for this time escape the like fortune, but it was deferred. And behold another cause of indignation, which they procure to themselves. Lewis Bishop of Liege by resignation, and admitted to the dignity by the intercession and fauour of Duke Philip to the Pope, begins to preferre the most confident and trusty seruants of the said Philip, to all offices and dignities within the towne. The people are grieved therat, they mutiny and expell the Bishop. This reuolt against their spiritual and temporall Lord, procures the Popes Excommunication against them. Philip after the destruction of Dinand turnes head against them: but terrified with so sharpe a punishment, they fly to the Earle of Charolois, who is a means for their peace and pardon, paying five hundred thousand Florins of the Rhin in six yeares, and three hundred hostages for a securitie of their deeds and promises, specified by the Bishop. Thus this people restored to fauour with their Prince, and reconciled to their Bishop, were abolished of the Excommunication by Omniphilus a Romane Citizen and Bishop of Troyes.

Whilst that Philip budbues the Liegeois, Lewis employes his whole study to ruine the house of Britany, and to consume a truce with the English, who threatened France with a new descent during our diuisions, and hee practise the Bourguignon by all means. And to presse him to renounce his brother Charles and the Duke of Britany, hee takes the Liegeois into his protection against their Duke, in case hee shall hereafter wrong them: the which he doth signifie vnto him by the Constable of Saint Paul, and the Cardinal Balue, offering notwithstanding to renounce their alliance, if hee will likewise abandon his brother and the Briton. This brauado proceeds to effects. He sends them 400 Lances of his Odnances, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Dampmartin, the Lords of Salezart, Conyhem and Vignolles, with 6000 Archers. The Earle of Saint Paul, (but without the Kings authority) led them some troopes speedily leaued vpon the frontiers of Picardy. The first act of his Tragedy, which in the end shall make him leaue his head at the Greue in Paris But it was now time for Philip to leaue the troubles of this world, to enioy an assured and euermlasting rest in heauen.

This inconstant and mutinous people, supposing by the decease of their Lord, to be at libertie, they breake out, go to field, recouer all the townes, chase away the garions placed by the deceased Duke: spoile and sacke the places they take by force, without any care of their ingaged hostages, who were all ready to bee sacrificed by Charles the new Duke of Bourgongne, to requite the madde intolencies of their Countrymen, yet hee referres the reuenge for a more famous memory. Hee parts from Louvain in armes, and well accompanied, and goes to besiege Santroin. The Liegeois (to raise the siege) issue forth with thirty thousand men, some five hundred horse, and great store of Artillery. The Duke turnes head againe, chargeth them, and ouercomes them, hee kills about nine thousand: the approaching night faues the rest. Presently after this charge, the Duke (pust vp with this good successe) speakes bigge, hee writes vnto the Countable like a Rodmont, answerable to the speeches hee had with him at Louvain: That hee beseeched the King for his sake to attempt nothing vpon the State of Britany, aduertising him of the memorable battell which hee had wonne. After the which Saintren yeelds vpon conditions, and the tenth man is chosen out at the Dukes pleasure, and then beheded. Tongres was no better intreated: and these miserable wretches thus tithed, were for the most part of those hostages, which hee had freely sent home, vpon condition to imploy themselves to pacifie the seditious humours of their fellow Citizens.

In the end, as he turned all his forces against Liege, premeditating with himselfe of a lamentable and bloody reuenge, behold three hundred of their best Citizens come forth in their shurts, bare-headed and bare-legged, bringing the Keyes to the Duke. He enters the City by a great breach of twenty fadome, beaten downe in the wall, disarms the inhabitants, take from them their artillery which remained, razeth all the Towers & town-walles, and chargeth them with heauier imposts then euer his father had done. A worke of heauen which quencheth the fire of sedition, which began to flame at Gand: a stirring people, and second to the Liegeois in inconstancy: of whom it is commonly said: That they loue the sonne of their Prince, but not the Prince himselfe. So the Gantois bring vnto him on foot as farre as Bruxelles, the seventy and two banners of the occupatours, which hee had granted them at his entry, with all the priuiledges and letters they had simulatiously wrested from him.

Charles sent the said Banners to Bologne la grasse, to accompany those which his Father had in like sort taken from them: he disannulled their priuiledge of the law, whereby the people had right of fixe and twenty Sheriffes of the towne, to chooseth eury year two and twenty, & the Prince but foure: hee condemned them in thirty thousand Florins to himselfe, and fixe thousand to his officers and followers: All other townes compounded for money, and then he made his entry armed into Gand. Thither came Ambassadors to him from Lewis, labouring to draw him to consent to the warres which he pretended to make in Britany: the which notable to obtaine the Winter was spent in sending one to another: and Summer being come, Lewis enters the said Duchy, with an army of 5000 men: and at his first arrival hee takes Chantilly, and Ancenis, and after some other military exploits, hee forceth both his brother and the Duke of Britany, to accept such conditions as he would preferre vnto them: That they should renounce all alliances, and especially that of the Duke of Bourgogne: That his brother Charles, lately Duke of Normandy, should haue twelue thousand Franckes a year rent, for his portion, issuing out of some lands which should cary the title of a Dukedome or County, and threescore thousand Francks for his pension; but there is much difference betwene promise and performance.

In the meane time Charles of Bourgogne, at the instance of his allies, was already aduanced to Peronne. Then had Pope Innocent the second sent a Legate into France, for there E nunciation of the Pragmaticke Sanction, made by Lewis at his comming to the Crowne. The Patents are read in the Chasteler without contradiction. Balue comes to the Palace the first of October, to haue them in like sort published: But Master John of St. Romain, the Kings Proctor generall, opposeth himselfe directly against the execution thereof, notwithstanding the iniurious threats of the said Cardinall: Replying (saith the Originall) that he had rather lose both his office, and all his wealth, then to doe a thing against his conscience, to the hurt of the Realme, and preiudice of the Kings dignity. In the end, the Rector of the Vniuersity, (for then they maintayned by faithfull obedience their ancient authority) and the Deputies thereof, goe to the Legate: they appeale from him, and the effect of the said Letters to the holy Councell, the like they doe in all other places where need required. They protest the like at the Chasteler, and depart not before their opposition be registred.

Hereupon the King sends the said Legate and Cardinall with John Ladrieche Treasurer of France, to the Duke of Bourgogne, to signifie vnto him the accord made with his brother and the Duke of Britany, and to treat of a peace with the said Duke of Bourgogne, but alwayes tending to diuide him from them: and (for a baite) he promisseth to giue him sixscore thousand Crownes of gold, the one halfe to be paid before hee disdoleth

A geth, for the charges of his leauie: and hoping to win him wholly to his will, he concludes of an interview at Peronne, by the meanes of the said Balue; and to this effect, the Duke writes him a letter with his owne hand, as a warrant to goe and come. And in the meane time, that Charles (busied at home) should no wayes hinder Lewis in the Warre hee pretended to make in Britany, (for he fill gaped after the conquest of that Province) he had sent againe vnderhand, to sollicite the Liegeois to a new sedition, wherunto they were too prompt for their owne good: they arme, and by stealth surpriseth Tongres, and cary their Bishop with many Chanoins (whom they hated to the death) prisoners to Liege. Yet some-what respecting the Legates presence, they were content to pull out the hearts of five or fixe of them, in sight of the Bishop, when an outrageous violence, hewing one of them into many peeces, the which with a brutish drifion they cast one at another like vnto Tennis Balls.

These two Princes liued in continuall distrust, and feared one another: for the safety of their persons at this meeting, they fortifie themselves with great forces. Lewis to free the Duke of all ialousie, comes ill accompanied, but he is followed by John Duke of Bourbon his brother in law, the Cardinall brother to the said Duke, the Constable of Saint Paul, the Cardinall Balue, (a man which dealt much in matters of warre and state) by Tanneguy of Chastel, newly receiued into fauour, and many other Commanders of troopes. Charles had sent for the army of Bourgogne, where there were many Noblemen, in former times ill intreated by the King: as Anthony Chasteaufort, Lord of Lau, who had escaped from Villon, a strong place in Auvergne, where Lewis kept him prisoner, vnder the guard of Charles of Melun, who (sauius his own head) imbrued three scaffolds with blood, with that of Charles of Loches: of Remouet, son to the wife of Charles at Tours: and of the Kings Proctor of Villon in Meux: Poncet de Ruiniere, of Vrfe (afterwards Master of the Kings Horse) three Princes of the house of Sauoy, that is to say, the Lord of Bresse, the Bishop of Geneva, and the Earle of Rhosmond, brethren, followed by many Gentlemen, Sauoyards and Bourguignons. The King seeing all these within the Towne, and the Army lodged thereabout, finds that he wrought politickely: but cunning is preuented by cunning. So the prouidence of God blinds man in his owne malice, and shadowes his eyes, to confound him in his fraudulent designs. And to increase his folly, he requires the Castle of Charles to lodge in: for that the greatest part of those that were last come, were ill affected vnto him. What then? an enemy that had a desire to crosse the policies of his aduersarie, would he refuse him this Cage, that sought to intangle himselfe in his owne snare? yet he perswades him to feare nothing. Let Princes learne not to commit themselves rashly to such assemblies, the very baits of deccits, collusions and periuities.

The newes of this second mutiny at Liege being reported vnto the Duke, he suddenly causeth the gates both of the towne and Castle to be shut, but vnder a cold pretext, That one had lost a male full of Jewels and money. Lewis seeing him selfe coopt vp, and many arches at the gate, being lodged moreouer right against a great Tower, whereas the Earle of Vermandois had once caused Charles the Simple his Predecessor to die, blame him not if hee feared. So (as an ancient said) Malice drinks the greatest part of her owne poison. They could not treat of a more important matter, then the life of a King of France and of his Estate. Charles doth first impart this busines to some of his Chamberlains & Groomes of his Chamber (amongst others to the Lord of Argenton, to whom the King since gaue this commendation, to haue beene a great helpe in this pacification of Peronne) who then tempered this spleen all they could. He holds a Councell the most part of the second day, and almost the whole night, hauiug all the desire in the world to doe the King a shrewd turne; who in the meane time practiseth with all vehemency such as hee thought might serue him: he vsurnished his most trusty seruants, being farre from his Treasure, commands to make distribution of fiftene thousand Crownes: (but the Commissary retayned a part as the King was since aduertised) he giues to some, and promisseth to others. In the end their resolution in counsell was, that Lewis his excuse should be admitted, who did sweare that hauiug sent his Ambassadors to Liege, euen when as the Duke did arme against France, the great affection he had to a final and vniuersall peace had so transported him, as he had forgotten to conteraund them. Thus promise being made to Charles of Bourgogne, to accompany him at his request in the voyage of Liege, and to giue vnto Charles his brother the Earledomes of Brie and Champaigne, (which the Bourguignons did, that at need they might haue more meanes to succour one another) the treaty of Arras and peace of Charenton were reconfirmed & tworne vpon the crosse which Charlemagne was wont to cary, called the crosse of victory.

Truly experience hath alwayes testified, that Princes do more wisely pacifie their quarrels by graue and trusty seruants, then by enteruiewes, from the which such as had neuer any matter to determine together, doe seldome part without mutuall dislikes and grakings, the seeds of diuisions and warre, the which may be long smothered, but at length it breakes forth. From henceforth you shall see vpon this stage a wretched people, panting yet with the Bastanadoes lately receiued: but not yet vanquished, and so much the more lamentable, for that their owne calamities cannot make them wise: who hauing obstinately rebelled against their naturall Prince, and indirectly embraced our Kings quarrell, run headlong to their totall ruine. Lewis was engaged by promise, and summoned to perform it. Besides the Scots of his guard, he sends for three hundred men at armes, hauing with him John Duke of Bourbon, Charles Cardinall of Bourbon and Archbishop of Lions, and the Earle of Beauieu brothers to the Bishop of Liege. A City then of the bignesse of Rouen, exceeding well peopled, seated in a mountaine Countrey, fertile, watered with the river of Meuze, which runs through it, but by the last yeares checke almost all dismantled, and greatly weakened of men, so as the Marshall of Bourgongne and the Lord of Himbercourt leading the forward and gaping after spoile, thought to haue entred at their first approach, before the King or Duke were arriued. John of Villette chiefe Tribune of these Liegeois, and other Captaines seeing them lodge confusedly in their suburbs, they issue resolutely by the old breaches, and kill about eight hundred men, amongst the which were a hundred men at armes: they hurt many, and amongst them the Prince of Orange. All the people were ready to make a general sally, but some Canonadoes shot into the great street kill very many, and keepe in the rest. The Tribune was hurt, and dyed within two dayes after, with some other Captaines; whilest the two Commanders arriued, and take their lodgings. Lewis in a great farme quarter of a league from Liege, Charles in the midst of the suburbs, where the King went to lodge the next day right against the Bourguignons lodging. This approach breeds a great distrust, for Charles doubted that Lewis would call himselfe into the towne, or practise something against him, or at the least haue himselfe before the taking of the towne. To be the better satisfied, the Duke doth lodge three hundred of his men at armes in a barn betwixt his lodging and the Kings, the better to obserue the Kings actions.

In the meane time, they make a good shew, and keepe good guard vntill the nine and twentieth of October, the eight day of the siege, when as Charles and all his men distance themselves to be the more ready the next day for the assault. During these eight dayes, the besieged gaue liberty to their Bishop to goe to the Duke and to offer him their towne and goods, desiring nothing but their liues. But he had resolved a sharpe reuenge, and retaynes the Bishop, not accepting of any offer. The Apostolike Legat had no more money credit with Charles, neither was he so happy as he expected. The Liegeois abandoned by the French despairing of all foraine succors, and of all grace with their Prince, behold a troope of fixe hundred choise men of the Country of Franchemont issue forth, hauing for their guides the Masters of those two lodgings where the Generals did lie. The party was well made, and the enterprise great, but ill managed; yet did they hardly faile in it. The guides should lead them secretly through the hollow rocks nere vnto these Princes lodgings, to surprisethem, kill them, or at the least to cary them away before their guards were in armes.

Moreover all the people should issue forth by the gate and breaches right againe the great street of the suburbs, and with their cries and fighting discomfort the whole army, or at the least tell their liues deare, in dying gloriously. They issue forth, kill the tentinels, and staid at a pavilion in the which the Duke of Alencon, and the Lord of Craon were lodged, where they slew some seruants with their halberds and partuizans; they charge euén vnto the grange, whereas the three hundred men at armes were in their first sleepe, the whole multitude runs thither, and troubles both Nations, some crying, God saue the King, others God saue the Duke of Bourgongne, and some also cry God saue the King, and kill, to slow diuision betwixt the French and Bourguignons.

The King and Duke in great danger of their liues.The miserable estate of two Princes.

A They awake, they arme and defend the entry. In the meane time succors come from all parts to the Duke, being charged by a squadron led by the master of the lodging. Hee is slaine first, and then all his company. The King is no lesse amazed, his host compasseth his house with another band. The Scots are about him, they first kill the host, and then his followers: and so the multitude recouers the towne in disorder. The two Princes talke together, and thanke God for their deliuey, and with a iust cause: for if these desperate men had neither lingred at the Pavillion nor at the grange, without doubt they had had these two Princes at their discretion: but God would reuerse ours, for the restoring of his estate and increase of his reuennues with the Bourguignons losse: and the Bourguignons for a more tragicke end. Our Lewis grew likewise pale with distrust, foreseeing that if Charles did not take this towne by assault, the burthen might light on him, and that he was in danger to be stayed and taken, being the weaker in the army. There was no hope of retyring, hee was too well guarded: and his honour likewise engaged. Thus he stood vpon thornes, yet resolute in shew, and alwayes an absolute dissembler. A miserable estate of these two Princes, who of late had so solemnly sworne a peace, and yet one could not assure himselfe of anothers faith. This desperate sally had amazed the dukes men, who (euén by the King aduice) would willingly haue delayed the assault for some dayes; but Charles, constant in his designe, lets Lewis vnderstand, that if hee pleased hee might retire to Namur vntill the towne were taken: as for himselfe hee would not part without seeing the issue the next morning: but Lewis was engaged in honour, who would neuer giue the least suspicion of cowardise; he therefore answers, that hee would take his part of the sport. The day being come, euery one repairs to his Colours, the signe is giuen by a field-piece and two shot of a serpentine, to the end the van-guard lodged on the other side should charge at the same instant. The trumpets and drummes sound, the companies approach, and all march resolutely. But when they thought to ioyne, they found no resistance. Their chiefe Commanders were dead, the most apparent being slipped out of the towne, some one way, some another; the common people were gone to dinner, thinking that Sunday would be a day of rest. So the whole army consisting of about forty thousand men, enter at both ends, and find the cloth layed: they kill at the first entrance two hundred, men, women, children, and religious indifferently: they ransack women, maids, and nunnas, spoile the City, and holy places: the Duke saues the great Church of Saint Lambert with great difficulty, the people flye quer the Meuze, and so saue themselves in the forest of Ardennes, and other places thereabouts; where (to increase their misery) some gentlemen (who till then had held their party) strip them, kill a number, and take the best prisoners, and by this treachery and pitious stratagem make their peace with the Duke. Many dyed of hunger, cold and sleepe: the History makes mention of a gentleman that had the palseie in one legge, and a page that had two fingers of one hand faine off. The wine was frozen in the pipes, and for three dayes was cut out with hatchets. And for the last act of this tragedy, the Duke doth place foure thousand men about the quarters of the City, to beate downe the bridge vpon the Meuze; to defend the houses of the Clergy about the great Church, & to preserve the other Churches from ruine, whilest that others set fire on the towne, quierthrow the walles and fill vp the ditches. Wrath and victory doe neuer forget any kinde of reuenge. And if wee shall beleeue some writers, there perished about fifty thousand soules in this warre, most cruell beyond all bounds of humanity. Learne O yee nations to containe your selues in the obedience of your Soueraignes; and not to imbarke your selues rashly in Princes quarrels: who retire themselves easily out of the mire where they leaue you engaged.

Liege is a presidēt vnto you wherein you may obtaine the iust iudgement of God; vpon a cruell rebellious people, enemy to all souerainty, both spirituall & temporall, of long time subiect to dayly rebellions, vntill their generall ruine. As we haue brought our Lewis to Liege, so let vs returne him into France. Charles exceeding proud with the happy successe of his designes, suffers himselfe to be sought vnto by mediators from the King for his departure: and afterwards hee himselfe moues him, as desiring to goe and cause their accord to be proclaimed and inregistred in his Court of Parliament at Paris (which else were of no moment) and the next yeere to meet in Bourgongne, and to feast one another mutually for a moneths space. Charles (hauing drawne a promise from the King, to confirme all he had sworne at Peronne yecds, but not without grudging, and hauing having accompanied him halfe a league, he cansteth him to be conducted to the frontiers, by the Lord of Cordes, and Murs great Bayliffe of Hainault. A pitious spectacle to see a Soueraigne reduced to that extremity, as to humble himselfe before this vaillie but we must haue patience for seuen yeares, and then shall we see a strange alteration of fortune: and yet seuen yeares after, another Catastrophe no lesse tragical in this House of Bourgongne: and the vniuing of the said Duchy to the Crowne of France.

After the Kings departure, Charles enters the Countrey of Franchemont: he kills, spoiles, burns and makes all de-late: then (glutted with reuenge) hee retires into Brabant, Lewis taking his leaue of the Duke, demaunded of him capitiouly, in case his brother, who was in Britany) would not accept the portion he had giuen him; how hee would aduise him to gouerne himselfe: and the Duke answered, that if he were content, it should please him whatsoever they did. This speech was cunningly contriued by the King: for having introuled the said vnion in the Court of Parliament, and proclaimed it throughout all the streetes of Paris: he offers Charles, Guieu, for Bre and Champagne, his brothers neigbour hood with the Bourguignon being suspected vnto him. Charles refusethe it, fearing to displease the Duke of Bourgongne, who by Ambassages and admonition exhorts him to change: for if happily the King should annoy him, he might daily haue succour from Bourgongne.

Charles was in all things gouerned by another, namely by Odet de Rye Lord of Lignu and afterward Earle of Cominges: Lewis subornes him, and by his means winnes Charles to accept of Guienne, as more pientfull and rich with mutual assurances to liue together, then they depart, Lewis into Touraine, and Charles into Guienne. The Duke of Bourgongne grieved with this exchange, employes the Cardinall Ealue, a turbulent and peticious member in a State, and taking pleasure (as they say commonly) to put his finger betwixt the barke and the tree. An unkind man. The trust which Lewis reposed in this man, was the means to procure him a Cardinall hat: and to that end the King had sent an ambassage to Pau the 2. & lends Fume also, one of his most trusty seruants, to persuade the Pope to desist from the refusal he had made thereof, being aduertised of many things that did displease him: at whose vrgent perswasion a Cardinall hat was granted him: yet behold he write to the Duke of Guienne in fauour of the Bourguignon: This change tended but to deueine, dividing him by this meanes from his friends and confederates: and by other messengers he aduertised the Bourguignon; that the peace concluded betwixt the two brethren was a bait to surpris him: the which the King desired only until his brother had custised his new Duchy, and set an order in his house. Let him therefore arme and begin first. These letters are surpris'd, with other instructions, so as the Cardinall is arrested, and caried prisoner to Montbazon, where he shall continue eleuen yeares. Lewis hauing this practised this peace with the Bourguignon, comprehended the Britton therein, and giuen the Duchie of Guienne to his brother Charles for his portion; he had now more so mighty enemies, against whom he should employ his forces: yet would he not dismis his troopes, for there came a new task in hand. To keepe them in practice, he sends part of them vnder the command of the Admirall bastard of Bourbon (for Montauban was dead) and the Earle of Dammartin, into Armagnac. He had bene one of the War of the common-wealth, and this enterprise did alwayes sticke in Lewis his stomack. At the first without any effusion of blood, they make him peaceable possessor of the Country, whercof they inuest his brother, and to the yeare ended.

But let vs see the first fruits of the following yeare. To be reuenged of Charles of Bourgongne, hee must haue some apparant colour. Lewis doth vnder-hand practise the townes lying vpon the riuier of Somme: animates the Nobilitie of the Countrey to complain in the Parliament at Paris of the difficulty they had to receiue iustice, and thereupon to require the Kings assistance and fauour. Moreover, they charged the Bourguignon, that he extended his limits farther then he ought by the treaty, and vnrped the Kings rights and prerogatiues, forcing some Lords, whose lands did hold directly of the King, to doe him homage and seruice against all men. Vpon colour of these complaints, Lewis assembles the Estates at Tours, in the month of March and April, (the which was all hee euer held: but he calls none but his most confident seruants, who would not contradict him in any thing. For a conclusion of the assembly, the Duke is summoned to appeare at the Parliament of Paris. Hee retains the Officer many dayes at Gant, and in the end sends him backe.

All as things were prepared to ruine the Duke of Bourgongne; behold there falls out another matter of some moment in this action. The Earle of Warwicke (hauing aboute all others supported the house of Yorke against that of Lancaster (had besides his patrimony enriched himselfe aboue fourescore thousand Crowns a yeare reuennue in rewards and Offices by Edward King of England, Competitor to Henry the 6, whom he kept prisoner at London; which Henry had for long ruled out of France. This his great credit draws ieaousie after it, too ordinary in soueraigne Princes, especially to the whom they haue raised vp; whereby the Earle falls into some disgrace with Edward. The Duke of Bourgongne, whom the Earles great authority, and the secret intelligences he had with our Lewis was wonderfull odious and suspect (for the Duke had married the sister of Edward, to fortifie himselfe against Lewis, not for any affection he bare to the house of Yorke, being by his mother issued out of the house of Lancaster) feeds this hatred of Edward against Warwicke, who finding himselfe forced to yeeld to the stronger, resolves to retire into France: hee leads with him Marguerit the wife of Henry, daughter to Rene King of Sicilia: the Prince of Wales sonne of the said Henry and Marguerit: the Duke of Clarence son in law to Warwicke, and brother to Edward, the Earle of Oxford; with their wiues and children, and many followers. In his passage he takes many ships from the Bourguignons subjects, and fels the booty in Normandy. And for a requiitall Charles catcheth all the French Merchants to be taken that were come to the faire at Antwerp: he complains to the Court of Parliament at Paris, of the reception the King had made of the Earle of Warwicke, threatening to fetch him wheresoeuer. But the arrogancy of his words was but the leuaine of his spleene.

Lewis giues such entertainment to the Earle of Warwicke, as hee might hope for: hee armes all the ships he can find in his fauour: by meanes wherof hee returns happily into England, and gathers together an infinite number of men, which ioyne with him from all parts: he marcheth against Edward, & forceth him to flee to his brother in law into Holland, being accompanied only with seuen or eight hundred men for his guard, without money, and without apparell, other then for Warre. Hee draws Henry out of prison, where he himselfe had formerly lodged him, and installs him againe in his royall State.

Edward (notwithstanding the presence of the Dukes of Gloucester and Somerset, sent by Henry) obtaines of the Duke of Bourgongne (but vnderhand and secretly, for that he would by no meanes incense Henry, whom all England now obeyed) succours of men, ships and money: he returns into the Realme, is receiued into London: he meets with the Earle of Warwicke, fights with him, and kills him, with his brother the Marquis Montagu, and cuts all his army in pieces. The Duke of Clarence (before the battell goest to his brother Edward, and with his owne hand slue (as some write) Henry, whom Edward had taken in London and led to this battell: this was in the yeare 1471 on Easter day. This happy victory is seconded by another no lesse famous. The Prince of Wales sonne to Henry, follows after, with whom the Dukes of Gloucester and Somerset had already ioyne, leading forty thousand men of his faction. Edward pufte vp with the prosperous successe of his first victory, marcheth towards him, fights with him, kills him, takes the Earle of Somerset prisoner, and the next day cuts off his head.

To conclude, Warwicke had conquered the Realme of England in eleuen dayes: and Edward recovered it in twenty, and remained in peaceable possession vnto his death. If the Earle had patiently attended the great forces which Prince Edward brought vnto him, who will not thinke but he had remained a conqueror? But he feared Somerset, whose father and brother he had put to death, and he must feele the effects of the diuine Oracle: He that hath shed mans blood, his blood shall be shed, for God hath made man after his owne image; and all those that haue taken the sword, shall perish by the sword. In the meane time whilst these stirres are in England, Charles the eight of that name, afterwards King of France, was borne vnto Lewis at the Castle of Amboise, a happy prop of an old decayed father. This birth catcheth the Princes hereafter to be left respected, and the King more feared and honoured, who hauing now an heyre to whom he might leaue the Crowne, bandies all his wits, to weaken his enemies, as well for his owne priuate regard, as to leaue the Realme whole and peaceable to his successor. Charles of Guienne liued, for shew, in good good amity with the King. Francis of Britany (although he had preferred the order of the Golden fleece before that of Saint Antibel, the which Lewis had offered vnto him) being loath to lose assured friends, to accept the friendship of a Prince in whom he could repose no confidence, yet he contained himself. Charles of Bourgogne were the garter openly, and molested the Kings subjects and friends. Moreover, Lewis had just cause to be grieved for the brauadoe done him at Peronne. The Nobility thrust him on, namely the Constable of Saint Paul, fore-seeing that the continuance of peace would be a great hindrance to his great Offices and pensions. He had a pay without checke for four hundred lances, of forty thousand frankes yearly, besides the fee for his Office, and allowance for many places where he commanded. Men shew most easily in a troubled warre. He offers the King to take Saint Quirin by meanes of the credit he had in the Country: most of his liuing lying thereabouts, and vaunts to haue great intelligence in the Low Countries.

The Duke of Guienne offers both his person and his meanes, with five hundred men at armes for this war, but it was the least of his desires, for he was corrupted with the insinuations of that age, in the which all great men sought to maintaine themselves with the ruine one of another. The Duke of Bourgogne takes the alarme, put the greatest forces he can to field, entertained with halfe their pay. Lewis suffers him to run on foure or five moneths, entreyning him with sundry Ambassages, to free him from all feare, so as troubled with that great charge in a season when as money was scant, he dislooses this army, and leaving his frontier townes vnfortified, retires into Holland. In the meane time Arthur of Longueval takes Saint Quirin, the Constable enters it with two hundred Lances, and takes an oath for the King. They practise Amiens: the Kings army comes before it, one part holds for the King, another for the Duke, who might haue assured it, if he had had sufficient forces ready to enter, but foure or five hundred horse (with the which he came posting) would not suffer him to hazard his person.

The Kings friends discouraging this king, double their courages and let in the Kings army. Abbeville meanes to follow, when as the Lord of Cordes enters for the Duke and assures the place. The Duke vnprovided of men, and doubting the intelligences which the Constable bragged of, retires with teare and speed to Arras, to hasten a leauy both of men and money. Thither (notwithstanding the promise which Charles of Guienne had made to the King) comes a secret messenger vnto him, with this aduice written and signed by the said Charles: Labour to content your subjects, and then take no care, for you shall find friends; but these were but iests. This letter makes the Duke breathe: he sends to the Constable, to let him vnderstand, that this warre was without desire or summons, intreating him, not to deale against him according to the rigor of his present forces. The proiect of the dukes of Guienne and Britany with the Constable, was to imbarke these two great Princes in mutual warre, in a season of aduantage for Lewis: that the Bourguignons necessity (being abandoned of his allies) might force him to giue his ouely daughter to the said Duke of Guienne: the which he had often promised, but without performance: whom (as Ovid nemaw did his Hippodamia) he promised to marry, and gaue her not to any.

So this Constable who tooke delight to nourish these Princes in feare and mutuall distrust, answers the Bourguignon: that the King had a strong and flourishing army, and great intelligences in his Counties, that he knew no better expedient to auoid this storm, then to accomplish that to the Duke of Guienne, which he had so often reiterated: which done, the Dukes of Guienne and Britany would declare themselves for him, and would succour him with their forces. But what shall the Constable get to entertaine these princes in distrust and ialousie one of another, either of them being too cunning to discover his policies? Within short time both of them (having ioyntly conspired against him) shall let his head to sale, and in the end plant it vpon a scaffold for a spectacle. The Briton writes to him in the like and more rigorous termes: suffering the Lord of Lescot to lead a hundred men at armes, Britains to the King. This proceeding caused Charles of Bourgogne to conceiue a great hatred in his heart against them all: but misfortune is good for something. It made them the more affected to the Kings seruice during this war, so as at this time the Bourguignons estate was in great danger, whereas by the said marriage he had wonderfully weakened the King: but man purpoiseth and God disposeth.

It is commonly said, this halfe the world knowes not how the other liues: and the ordinary

Lewis having put fourteene hundred men at armes, and foure thousand franke archers into Amiens, commanded by the Constable, and other chiefe Officers of the Crowne, assembles the body of his army at Beauvais, hauing with him the Duke of Guienne his brother, Nicholas Duke of Calabria, the eldest sonne of Iohn Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, the onely heire of the house of Anjou, and a great number of Nobility; whereby he recouers Roye, Montdidier, Abbeville and all the Country of Ponthieu. Charles passeth the river of Somme, takes Piquigny, plants himselfe betwixt Bapaumes and Amiens, and keeps the field about six weeks, with a firme resolution in shew, to fight with the King if he presented himselfe.

But blockt vp within his campe, and seeing himselfe (ready through want) to be forced to yeeld at the Kings will and discretion; his Maiesties army in Bourgogne (commanded by the Dauphin of Auvergne, sonne to the Earle of Montpensier, in the which were the Earle of Cominges, the Lords of Combronde and Charente, Master William Cousinot and others) hauing likewise vanquished all the enemies forces, Charles by a letter of his owne hand, humbles himselfe to the King: he is grieved that he had so wronged him for anothers pleasure, not being duly informed of all things.

Vertue finds some respect euen in an enemy. Lewis, who vnder a simple bait to recover the townes vpon Somme, had not so hotly kindled this quarrell, without the great intelligences wherewith the Constable had abused him, especially in the townes of Antwerpe, Bruges and Brussels: he grants a truce for one year. This was the fourth day of May. An vnreasonable truce for the Constable (who then serued his master, without dissembling) and other horse-leeches, whom neither troubles, oppression of the people, nor the redi-oues of affaires did any thing touch, but as pleasing to the Duke as the peace of Constans. So the King returns into Touraine, Charles out of France into Guienne, the Duke of Bourgogne into Hainault, where he assembles his Estates, and shewes the losse he had received, for that his men at armes were not so soone ready as the Kings, and giues order to be no more surprisid vnwares. Thus the Estate is pacified, but the Duke of Guienne was no sooner returned home, but there springs vp new feedes of diuision. Here comes the Earle of Armaignac into Louot, and restores him to full possession of the Lands which the King had confiscated. Lewis moued with this reconciliation, sends forces and takes the lands into his owne hand, disappoints the Earle, whom he knew to be a stirring and a factious man: and euen then he resolved to dispossesse his brother of the Duchie of Guienne, as he had done of that of Normandy.

The Duke fore-seeing this storme sends often to the Bourguignon, and vnder colour to seeke his daughter, labours to bind him more firmly vnto him by that alliance. The Bourguignon hauing his heart puffed vp with as great conceits, as his person was susceptible of, but exceeding the capacity of his sense, he fed him with hope: yet had he no such meaning, but preferred her, as a most pretious iewel to be courted by many, and to serue him at need, according to diuers occurrences, both of their persons and meanes. Neither would he haue so great a sonne in Law, as the onely brother of a King of France, whom he might not rule at his pleasure, neither could he digest the words and proceedings of the Duke of Britany and the Constable. The Constable would haue the Duke of Guien beholding vnto him for this marriage, the Briton repined he should haue the honour. The King comes to crosse it, and with reason, for this alliance had wonderfully fortified his brother, who (being ioyned with the Duke of Britany) had greatly crossed the Kings Estate and his Children. Moreover, the King of England did much disswade the effecting thereof: (said he to the Duke of Bourgogne) if the King of France comes to die without children, his brother succeeds to the Crowne, and this marriage vnto it so many Prouinces and Seigneuries, the estate of England were neere her ruine.

But to what end serue these affectionate and contrary pursuits? Alasse! some one thinks himselfe found, that carries death in his bosome. But hee that reigneth in beauen Palaces, laughs them to scorn: within few monethes our Charles of Guienne, leauing the world, shall leaue his loues. So it is, that their vehement soliciting, extorted some verball promise, confirmed by a letter, but he had great Coriuals, who all pretended to haue the best part in the pie: Nicholas Marquis of Pont, sonne to Iohn Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, Philip Duke of Sauoy, Ataximilian Duke of Austria, sonne to the Emperour Frederick. All these marched in equall rancke: but in the end Ataximilian shall be conquerour, yet not during the life of Charles of Bourgongne. This marriage gaue a goodly colour to these Mediators, but vnder the shadow thereof they treated of other matters. They must auoid this storme, ready to oppresse the Duke of Guienne. Behold therefore the publike Ambassadors, and priuate messengers of these three Dukes, are sentre, specifically one to another. The Lord of Vré and Pencet de la Riniere, Agents for Charles of Guienne. The Abbot of Begard, since Archbishop of Lion, is an instrument for the Britton to the Bourguignon, they take the King to haue praistised and suborned, what by friendship, and what by force, the Duke of Guiens seruants: to haue already defaced a place belonging to the Lord of Estillac, with many other things: shewing that the King would soone dispossesse his brother of Guienne, if he were not speedily preuented: that to this effect hee was armed, and ready to enter into Xaintonge. The Duke of Bourgongne sends often to the King touching these affaires. The King excuseth himselfe, and accuseth his brother, as hauing treated with the Earles of Armaignac and Foix, to his prejudice, seeking to enlarge his limits without his priuity, and to enter into factions with his enemies: yet he promitteth to suffer him to enjoy his portion peaceably.

This promise carries no credit, and workes lesse effect: the Dukes of Guienne and Britany insult: they presse the Bourguignon: yet that it may be done without the assistance of the English, the ancient and generall enemy of this Realme, seeing that all their common designs, tended but to the good and ease of the publike: that his assistance, with the great intelligence he had with many gouernours and Capitaines of places, did fortifie them sufficiently: pleasant people, to seeke with a bloody wound once againe to abide the common people with this baite of publike good, and to couer their priuate passions with so pleasant a shew. Charles of Bourgongne casts the stone and hides his arme, and the better to disguise his proceeding, he solicites the English secretly, to invade France on the one side, whilst that he seemed blind, and not to see it. But it was in vaine, the English had more willingly assisted the King, if this marriage had not allyed the 2 houses of France and Bourgongne. In the end, behold a number of Princes in great perplexity, the which is more lamentable, for that they shall trouble their heads with so many preiudiciall and extraungant conceptions: this confusion shall in few yeares oppresse them in a manner all, and Lewis (particularly fauoured of heauen) shall seruiue them and cary away their spoiles. They preuaile thus much, the Duke of Bourgongne (possessed with an earnest desire to recouer Amiens, Saint Quintin, and other townes vpon Somme) armes twelve hundred lances, three archers to a Lance, well armed, well mounted, and good leaders. What doth our Lewis? In truth hee had too good a iudgement to want foresight, and hee that thought to surpris shall bee surprisid. To diuert the Bourguignons leauy, he had often sent the Lord of Craon, and the Chancellor of Oriole, who (being very truist seruants) in the end conclude an absolute peace. The King yeelds to the Duke the foresaid townes, he abandons vnto him the Earles of Neuers and S. Paul Constable: the one (hauing serued the King loyally at Peron) had purchased the Dukes indignation, the other (hauing nourished hatred and distrust betwixt these two princes for his owne profit) had so vireconciledly echanged them from him, as they bandy ioynly to his destruction, & giues him all their lands, to incorporate them to his owne, if he could. The duke in exchange, forsakes the dukes of Guien & Britany, & their Seigneuries, to dispose at his pleasure, promising not to deale at all in the warres which Lewis pretended against them. A foule and dishonest traffike, made to the prejudice of so great personages.

The Duke signes and sweares this fraudulent and counterfeit peace. A blow able to amaze the Dukes of Guienne and Britany at the first hearing, to see themselves thus abandoned of their chiefe support. But he repaires it with an after-blow, and by letters of credit written with his owne hand, giues them aduice to continue their course: that his intent was only to recouer his townes vpon Somme: which done, he will beseech the King by speciall Ambassadors to desist from making warre against them, and vpon his refusal he will succour them with body and goods: that as the King at his pleasure had broken the treaties of Conflans and Peronne, so might hee infringe his promise and oath. As for the Earles of Neuers, and S. Paul the Constable, although he had a iust occasion to hate them,

A them, yet would he remit their iniuries, and suffer them to inioy their owne, and beseech the King to doe the like by the Dukes of Guienne and Britany, suffering euery one to lue in peace and safety, vnder the Articles respectiely accorded: if not, he would succour his allies.

Craon and Oriole had likewise sworne for the King, leading Simon of Quinchin (a gentleman bred vp in the Dukes house) to receiue the oath of his Maiestie. But from a new subject springs a new proiect. Behold newes are brought, that the Duke of Guienne is sicke, and without hope of recovery. Vpon this aduice, the king delays the oath, finds euasions, attending the course of his disease, and in the meane time doth speedily seize vpon many places of Xaintonge: he doth presse Rochel, the which (vpon these accidents of reconciliation and sicknesse) inclines to a composition: hee withdraws many of his brothers chiefe seruants, and resolues to signe this peace, as the sundry euent of his affaires should lead him: and in the meane space hee protracts time with the Bourguignon, during the which Charles Duke of Guienne dies at Bordeaux, the twelfth day of May, by the which Lewis recouers the Duchy without blowes; and moreover, retaines Amiens, and Saint Quintins.

O subtil wits! both deceiuers, but not of like industry: so our Lewis shall more easily auoid the snare. But oh death in generall! which by the dissolution of the body & soule, doth dissolve great designs: The Britains were ready to enter, building vpon great intelligences and practices within the realme: the which without doubt had much troubled the Scare. But oh vnreasonable death in particular! how sily shalt thou serue to shadow the sly and hatefull (yet well coloured) reproches of enemies, and the murmuring of the most respectiue? A death too much neglected, but by some affectionate seruants to the deceased duke, who discover, that Jourdain Faure, born at Die in Daulphine, great Almoner to the Duke, and Abbot of S. Iohn d'Angely, assisted by Henry de la Roche, one of the said Dukes Kirchin, had hastened his death by so violent a poison, as with a strange and lamentable contraction of his sinewes, his haire fell off, and teeth fell out before his death. The Lord of Leicaut retired himselfe into Britany, leading prisoners with him these cursed murderers, where the Abbot was found one morning stark dead in his Chamber with a Thunderclap. Haueing his face swollen, his body and visage black as a cole, & his tongue hanging halfe a foot out of his month. God doing that Iustice in the twinkling of an eye, which men delayed. Let vs confesse the truth, and without passion: the veritie of the Historie doth presse vs vnto it: that Charles had bin an ill brother, and ought more honour and obedience to him, to whom that great Author of Nature had giuen the right of eldership aboue him, yet should hee haue bin regarded as a sonne of France, and from his infancy receiue a portion fit for the entertainment of his estate and house. Kings haue alwayes power to controule the insolencies of their neereft allied, when they forget their duties.

But howeuer, let vs obserue the order of diuine Iustice, who easily raiseth vp homebred scourges: but in the end he doth cast the rod in the fire. Lewis must bee measured with the same proportion he had measured his father, and Charles must suffer for the rashnesse of his rebellions.

This death being little lamented, makes such to speake, as had but too diligently obserued Lewis his speech, hearing one day of the death of the King of Castiles brother: He is but too happy (saith he) to haue lost his brother: but hatred and ill will ground their passions euen vpon needesse points.

At the same instant, Nicholas Marquis of Pont, heire of the house of Aniou (one of the above named) made sure to Anne, the eldest daughter of Lewis, abused with the great (yet vaine) promises of the duke of Bourgongne, renounced this so worthy an alliance of his souereigne Lord, for a frustratory hope, which the vassall gaue him to marry his daughter: but hee was ignorant that death the ycare following would punish this rashnesse, and preuent him from the inioying, either of Anne or Mary. A season likewise famous by the death of Charles Earle of Eux, a wise and vertuous Prince, whose faithfull seruice to France deserues this testimony: that being sonne to Philip of Bourgongne, Earle of Neuers & Rethel, and grand child to Philip the Hardy, a son of France, and duke of Bourgongne, and by consequence neere kinsman to Charles, yet in all these combustions, he had faithfully serued the King, and preferred the flower de Luce before the Red-crosse. Let vs likewise obserue the death of Willm Chartier bishop of Paris, who (after his conference with the league before Paris, in the Kings absence) was always in such disgrace with him, as after his death, Lewis caused his Epitaph to be changed, making mention of the bad services he had done him, during the warre of the common-weale, suborning the Inhabitants in favour of the Bourguignon. The death of the Duke of Guienne had wonderfully afflicted Charles of Bourgoigne, and to encrease it, he had intelligence, that the Britains would not arme, considering that he was dead for whom they should rise. In the meane time the chance was cast: he had beene at great charge, and to tume head without reticution, were a shame: but that which made him mad, Amiens & Saint Quentin were lost: he must hazard all. And first he writes to many townes: he chargeth the King to haue consented to his brothers death, and labours to draw them into armes, declaring himselfe their Protector, but no man stirres: so the small effort of his letters, sets him on fire, and in his choller he marcheth to Nefle in Vermandois: hee spoyle, burnes and makes all desolate, belicgeth the towne, batters it, and takes it: kils the greatest part of five hundred Archers, commanded by one called Little Picard, takes some, and amongst others the Captaine, and cuts off some of their hands. Many souldiers and townsmen flying into the Church, are barbarously slaine at the altars, embracing the Images: the Duke enters himselfe into the Church on horse-backe, and seeing these carcases; Behold (sayes he) this is goodly, I haue good Butchers: then he burnes and razeth the place.

Fiftene hundred franke-archers being in Roye, vnder the command of Peter Aubert, Bailife of Melun and Noion, are amazed, and at the Dukes first approach, abandon the Towne, and yeld it vnto him; Loifes of Balagni, Mouy, Rubempre, and others of the arrierban, with about two hundred lances compound, leauing horse and armes, euery man at armes onely hath a horse. The Duke puts a garison therein, and likewise into Montdidier. Thus he hotly pursues his conquests: but Beauvais cooled this heat. He did be leager it (being vnprouided of men warre:) the Inhabitants were commanded then by the afore said Bilagny, and some few men at armes, so as they were not able to saue the towne, without the present assistance of him, who doth looke and restrain the reins of his Justice at his pleasure. At their first approach, the Lord of Cordes leading the vanguard, plants two Canons against the gate, makes a great hole, but for want of munition the battery ceaseth, they come to blowes, the one to enter, the other to defend the entry, and they presse the Duke to set forward: the defendants ready to be forced, set fire on the portall, which makes the assaillants to retire. The Duke arriues, and suffers the fire to take his course, hoping in the end the towne would be his. And indeed if he had lodged a part of his army towards Paris, there had beene small hope of safety. But God had otherwise decreed, for in sight of the enemies troopes, he giues courage to the Earle of Dammartin, to the Marshals of Isachim and Locheac, to William of Vallieu, the Seneschals Lieutenant of Normandy, to the Lords of Crussill and Rubempre, to Beine and Torey brethren, to Bert, Salcedard, Thenot of Vignoles, and Atteri of Croy (all braue men & worthy of memory in his siege) to thrust themselves into the towne, with a good number of foot, and about two hundred lances: who at their first entry, giue their horses to the women (who take them, set them vp, and looke vnto them) and present themselves vpon the walls, encouraging the Beauuouins, and discouraging the Bourguignons. The Duke being enraged, makes all his Canons to approach, and thunder 15 dayes together: he makes a breach, and giues a sharpe assault, but well defended. Sixscore men are slaine, and 1000 being wounded, leaue the place, so as the Duke retires his companies appointed for the assault, and being frustrate of his conceited hope, prest by extreame famine, he raiseth the siege, and retires in good order, fearing a charge. But these valiant Captaines knew that the best course was to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. This was on Saint Magdelins day, the 26 of the siege. A small aide doth sometime great good. Beauvais wauered, and was ready to compound. But what courtseie might they expect of a passionate enemy, who breathed nothing but blood and fire? For the auoyding whereof, louing & kind dealings were of great moment, which this towne receiued of those two mighty neighborcities, Paris & Orleans, assisting the with pioneers, victuals, canon, powder, bowes, arrows, pikes, tooles, apparel, and other necessary refreshings, but especially from Orleans, with a hundred pipes of Wine, a meanes whereby the eternall prouidence preferred them from sicke, spoyle, and a generall desolation by fire, wherewith the Bourguignon threatened them, if force had preuailed. Beauvais freed, the Duke marcheth into Normandy, and presently surrender.

A presently takes Eu, Saint Valery by Crotay, Rembures, and (being the scourge of this desolate Realme) leaues in all places behind him the pitifull and cruell markes of his passage: he spoiles and burnes all the Country of Caux, Neufchâtel, of Nicourt (a good and a great towne of warre, but vnfurnished of men) Longueuille, le Fahy, euen vnto the gates of Rouen, being little annoyed or hindered by the Constable, who led four hundred Lances: whose winking serued as a Whetstone to sharpen the Kings displeasure and hatred against him, and the ieaousie of both these Commanders, hauing of purpose entertained this warre betwixt them, who cunningly smother a secret dislike, which cost the said Constable his life. Then Winter approaching, he retires into Picardy, he had no sooner turned his backe, but these brane Captaines in Beauvais, recover Eu, Saint Valery, Rembures, and so casting themselves into Noyon, they frustrate the dukes purpose, who meant to besiege it. The Bourguignons fire flames yet farther. A swarme of his partisans, led by the Earle of Rouilly, the Constables sonne, falls vpon the Country of Tonnerre, spoiles the Country, runnes as farre as loigny, and vnto Troies; burnes both Farnes and Villages, without resistance. For reuenge whereof, the Dauphin of Auvergne flies to Bourgoigne, drawing after him, where he passeth, a burning besome. Pitifull exploits of war, the witness of reuenging Spirits, and alwayes the people smartes for the error of great men. But behold other troubles, Peter of Bourbon, Lord of Beauieu, being at Lestore, as Lieutenant general for the King in Guienne, was surprised by the Earle of Armagnac, who was lately dispossessed of his lands: who by this meanes recouers the said towne. Lewis moued with this affront, causeth his army to march, and followeth himselfe in person: but the Cardinall of Arras commanding the troopes, receiues the towne by composition, makes the Earles appointment: and the better to confirme it, he breakes the Sacrament in two, takes the one halfe, and giues the Earle the other, either of them swearing this accord. Trusting therein, he abandons the Towne to the Cardinall, who brings in the army, and by some souldiers suborned, he caused the Earle to be murdered saying of his prayers, not in the Castle, but in a priuate house neere to Saint Geruais Church, and then sacked the towne.

Gods Iustice is slow, but in the end it payes home. This Earle had (vnder a false Bull of dispensation, purchased for money of Ambrose of Cambray, Referendary to Pope Calixtus) married his owne sister: and after by sundry rebellions, purchased the Kings displeasure, and made himselfe guilty of diuine and humane treason. But abhorring the Earles life, let vs likewise abhorre the Cardinals proceeding, selling (vnder the holy Communion) his blood to them that trusted in his oath. The King put many Gentlemen in prison at Loches, who had followed the said Lord of Beauieu, whom the Earle had sent home: but the chance fell vpon John Deymer, being quartered at Tours: who dying, charged the Lord of Saint Basil, a younger brother of Albret, with this treason, being nourished and bred vp in the house of Bourbon, for which crime he lost his head at Poictiers, the fourteenth of April 1473. And to increase Lewis his crosses, Parpignan (a towne in the County of Rossillon) is by treason deliuered vp to the King of Arragon, the ancient Lord, where he enters with his sonne, about the end of April. But the King had an army ready, the which hee sends thither, and belicgeth it: the French were yet masters of the Castle, by the faithfull valour of master James of Fou (issued from the house of Britany) hee recouers it, and giues the government to Tanneguy of Chastell. Thus the troubles raised by the Earle of Armagnac, and the King of Arragon, were like to fire of Straw.

Let vs obserue in the same course, the apprehending of the Duke of Alanfon, so shall we see the carriage of Lewis. He is accused to haue offered the sale of his Duchy, and other lands in Perche and Normandy to the Bourguignon: and then to follow his fortune, (a crime which shall put him in minde of his condemnation pronounced at Vendosme) hee was seized on by Tristan the Hermit, Prouost of the Kings house, (a speedy executioner of his Maiesties will) and brought before the King, who sends him to the Loure at Paris, where by a sentence giuen by the Chancellor of Oriole, the 17 of Iuly 1474, hee was condemned to lose his head, reseruing notwithstanding the Kings good pleasure, who in the end of the year 75, shall bind him vnto him the second time for his life.

piguan, he assembles all his forces vpon the Marches of Britany, to the number of 50000 men, ready to imploy them in that Country. But the Duke, by reason of the death of the Duke of Guienne, being frustrate of the intelligences he had in France, and too weak to auoid this storme that threatned him, sent vnto the King, (lodging at Pont de See,) Philip of Efflars, a Gentleman of his house, & William of Soupleinville, a follower of the Lord of Lefeur. His maiesty giues care to an accord. The duke of Britany being possessed of a wife & valiant a man as Lefeur, might much annoy him: For in Britany there was neither ingement nor vertue, but what proceeded from him (so saies the History.) Moreover, he had alwayes during these partialities shewed himselfe a Frenchman, and would neuer yeeld that any places of Normandy should be giuen to the English: he must therefore be dealt with. To this end the King commands Soupleinville to giue him the demaunds in writing, which his master made as well for the Duke as for himselfe. He doth it, and obtains them all: forty thousand Franks pension for the duke, the which was paid in 2 yeares. For his master, fixe thousand Franks pension, the moiety of Guienne, the two Seneschallships of Vannes and Bourdelois, the Captainship of one of the Castles of Bourdeaux, that of Blay, the two Castles of Bayonne, of Day and of Saint Seuer: foure and twenty thousand crownes in gold, payable in foureyeaes: the Kings order, and the Countie of Comminges: for Soupleinville fixe thousand Crownes, payable at like termes: twelue thousand Franks pension, the Mairalty of Bayonne, the Bailiwick of Montargis, and other small preferments in Guienne: for Philip of Efflars, foure thousand Crownes in reward, and twelue hundred Franks pension, the Bailiwick of Meaux, and to be Master of the waters and Forests of France: which things they should enjoy during the life of Lewis, who was alwayes well and faithfully serued by Lefeur.

Now the Briton is satisfied, and sequestred from the alliance of Bourgongne, against whom Lewis now turns head, but the season in the which the Duke of Bourgongne retired into Picardy, caused a truce for one yeare, ending the first of Aprill 1475. A truce which (while the Bourguignon shall giue our French leaue to breath) shall imbarke him in so many quarrels, as in the end, the most important shall swallow him vp. A truce likewise concluded to the Constables great prejudice: for both the King and the Duke hated him deadly, as the motive of these diuisions. He had lately seized on Saint Quintin, expelling the Lord of Curton, & a hundred men at armes, which he had in entertainment from the King. Charles had likewise many causes of dislike: he was the instrument to take Amiens and S. Quintin for the King, he sought to reduce him to that estate, as to force him to marry his daughter with the Duke of Guienne: but the chiefe ground was, that during the siege of Amiens by the Duke of Bourgongne, the Constable had made a road into Hainault, spoiled the Countrey, and burnt (among other exploits) the Castle of Seure belonging to Isidore of Launai, of whom the Duke made good account: for reuenge whereof he passed into Picardy and Normandy, as we haue seen. Moreover, he had mithey enemies both with the King and Duke, who all ioyntly conspired his destruction, and animated their masters with all their credits. So all this yeare of truce is spent chiefly in making merchandise of the Constables life. Humbercourt and Ungonet Chancellor of Bourgongne, had some priuate spleene, for in a conference held at Roie, where the Constable was employed for the King, they grew so bitter in words, as the Constable had giuen them the lye: to whom the Bourguignons modestly answered; That they did not impute this injury done vnto them, but to the King, vpon whose word they were assembled; and to their master, whose person they did represent, to whom they would make report.

In the end, at the instance of either part, a day is held at Bouuines: for the King there came the Lord of Curton Gouverneur of Limosin, and Master Iohn Heberge afterwards Bishop of Eux; and for the Duke, the two aboue-named. They pronounce the Constable an enemy, and guilty to both Princes, they promise and swear one to another, that the first that may apprehend him, shall put him to death within eight dayes, or deliuer him to his companion to doe his pleasure. That he should be proclaimed by Trumpet, an enemy to both parties, with all those that should serue and assist him, and confiscate all his goods, mouables and immouables. The King promiseth to giue S. Quintin, Han and Bohain to the Duke, with all the money that might be found within the Realme, appertaining to the Constable, and all his lands holding of the Duke, and at a certaine day

A day the King and the Duke should meet before Han, and there with their united forces besiege the Constable. But some will say, to what end serue all these voyages, and so many meetings? whereto for many plots to intrap the Constable? must the King (to be reuenged of his seruant) make an agreement with his capital enemy, who enen late had sought to take away his life by poyson, promising a Merchant named thier fifty thousand Crownes to effect it: who hauing imparted it to Iohn Hardy his seruant, sometimes in household with the Duke of Guienne, he suffered the said Hardy to lose his life, and to be quartered publicly at the Greue in Paris?

Lewis iudged of the future by the present, and with one stone gaue many blowes. Hee disarmed his enemy, or at the least gaue him means to transport his armes farther off, whither the great designs of his ambition did draw him, as wee shall see hereafter: and moreover, the King could hardly seize vpon the Constables person, without the dukes intelligence, for he was feared directly betwene both. Hee held S. Quintin, and had Han and Bohain, his owne places, very strong and neere, hee might put in men from whence and when he pleased. Hee had intertainment for foure hundred men at armes well paid, whereby he got much, in not keeping his companies full. Hee exacted a Crowne for euery pipe of Wine passing through his Country into the low Countries. Hee had five and forty thousand franks of ordinary entertainment from the Kings, very rich Siegnuries, and great intelligences both within the Realme and in the Dukes Countries. Hee was a man of action, and could both helpe and hurt much. To conclude, hee knew well that flying from the one, he should bee well accepted of the other. Moreover, the personage and the places he held, deserved a good peace, and either of the two Princes would gladly haue enioyed him absolutely, if hee had bene constant, and not dissimbling to either.

Yet for all this hee auoydes all danger. Hee is aduertised that his head is set to sale, wherupon he sends to both Princes, speaks big, and faith; that hee vnderstands all their practices, but especially to the King, That the Duke by this conuention sought onely to draw him to his party, and to put him in disgrace with his Maiesty, and this did Lewis apprehend most. In truth these two Princes laboured exceedingly, who should deceive his companion most. According vnto man, it is better to deceive, then be deceived. Lewis presently countermands his Ambassadors, giues them charge not to conclude any thing against the Constable, but to prolong the truce, so as the foure Ambassadors (who had already mutually giuen their seales, containing their resolution taken against the Constable) deliuer them vp, and returne without any conclusion. The King fearing lest this affront might force the Constable to make his peace with the Duke, and so deliuer vp to him S. Quintin and other Forts, that were in his power, prevents him, giuing him to vnderstand, that an enterview shall make his peace. They appoint a day and place, three leagues from Noyon towards la Ferte vpon a little river. The Constable came first, but as a confidence prickt with the feeling of his misdeeds, wants no distrust and feare, hee demands hostages. The King seemes to like well thereof. On the riuers side, they make a strong barre with grates very high: towards the Constable: there he presents himselfe, accompanied with three hundred Masters, hauing armes vnder a loose caskette. The King approacheth, accompanied with aboute fixe hundred men at armes, and amongst others Chabannes Earle of Dammartin, Lord Steward, and a mortall enemy to the Constable. Oh Lord Stuard! but for thy presence, with what colour could the Constable haue shadowed his excuses? At the first entrance hee kneeles downe, and beseecheth his Maiesty, not to hold it strange, if he appeare in armes, and thus followed, considering the quarrell he had with Dammartin. Then they treat together, the King grants him a generall abolition of all that was past, he leaues him the guard of S. Quintin, and continues him the pay of his men at armes, being before restrained of some quarters pay. The Constable promiseth to serue his Maiesty against all men, without exception, and so he opens the barre and passeth to the Kings side, who reconciles him with the Lord Stuard, and the next day suffers him to returne to Saint Quintin. A presumption of too hard digestion for so iudicious a Prince as Lewis was, to see his Officer present himselfe like a Prince that were his enemy, yea his equall in power. But all comes to one end, if wee will haue patience. The Court could not endure this manner of proceeding, and the murmuring which Lewis heares, makes him remember; that it is too great a presumption in a seruant to plant plant a bar before his master, and to present himselfe vnto him accompanied with men at armes, all being his subiects and vnder his pay, and too base in him, to goe and receiue the submissiō of his Constable. A folly approaching neere to that of Peronne.

An act which shall much incense the Kings hatred against him, and breed a worme in the Constables conscience, the which shall gnaw him with continuall disquiet, doubting how to maintaine himselfe betwixt two such mighty enemies: but in the end he must fall: to reach vs, That neither our merits, nor any seruices we can doe to our Princes, should cause so great presumption, as to thinke they could not live without vs, or that wee haue means to prescribe them a law. For naturally they hate such as thinke they are beholding vnto them, and dispatch them at length that haue braued them. Good deeds are pleasing, whilst that hee which receiues them hath means to recompence them, but when they are so great, or we esteeme them so, as they are beyond all compasse of requitall, in stead of thanks wee receiue nothing but hatred and ill will. It is therefore better to bee beloued then feared.

Let vs now see what passed during the truce. Lewis hauing his mind free, and his body discharged of armes, hee resolves to provide for his heires. Doubtlesse the choice which he made of two Princes of his blood, did testifie, how much he did cherish his house, giuing them two precious pearles out of his Iewell house, Anne his eldest to Peter of Bourbon, a goodly Princeesse, and Lant the yongest to Lewis duke of Orleans, being yet very yong, and afterwards the 57 French King: whereunto he did not yeeld but to please the King, for she was foule and crooked. This season is likewise famous for a notable Ambassage from Arragon, touching the affaires of Roussillon. The King making the Ambassadors to iudge of the whole peece by a patterne, causeth them to see, the 20 of Aprill, a hundred and foure thousand men armed in battell, all in one livery, with red cassocks crossed with white, all Officers, Bourgeois and Inhabitants of Paris.

We haue said, this truce should proue an incomb to the Duke of Bourgongne, let vs examine the effects by the causes. At what time the King tooke Amiens from the Bourgignon, Adolfe that wicked and vnkind son of Arnold Duke of Guelldres (repining at his fathers long life)ooke him prisoner one night going to bed: and making him to march on foot without hofe, in a most cold season five Germane leagues, he thrust him in the bottomes of a tower, where as the Sun did neuer shine, but by a small grate, and there he held him 6 moneths. The Duke of Cleues, whose sister the prisoner had married, vndertakes his quarrell, and seeks by force to free his brother in law. But Adolfe hauing married the Duke of Bourbons sister, in the Bourguignons house finds great fauour. So the Duke of Bourgongne labors to reconcile them. The Emperor deales in it, but all without effect, vntill the Pope had interposed his authority, who commanded Charles of Bourgongne, vnder great penalty, to draw the old man by force out of prison, seeing his sonne would not enlarge him by intreaty. Adolfe on the one side, seeing so many Potentates busied in this action, and on the other fearing the Dukes forces, he releaseth Arnold, who in the dukes chamber, (notwithstanding the inequality betwixt the father and the sonne) offers his sonne the combat. Charles seeks to reconcile them, to the sonnes advantage, to whom he offers the title of Governour of Bourgongne, the Country of Guelldres with all the reuenues, onely Graue, a small towne, should remaine to the father, with three thousand Florins of rent, and so much pension, and the title of Duke. But oh impious and horrible answer! I had rather (sayes Adolfe, to those that deliuered this speech vnto him) cast my father headlong into a ditch, and my selfe after him, then yeeld to this accord: he hath bene Duke these 44 yeares, it is now time that I were. I will willingly leaue him three thousand Florins a yeare, upon condition that hee neuer enter into the Duchy: with many other words unworthy of a Sonne. Charles grieved at the obstinacy of Adolfe, leaues both father and sonne at Dourlans, and retires to Hedin. Adolfe to recouer the Country, disguiseth himselfe like a French-man, and passing a ferry neere vnto Namur, he is discovered by a Priest, who giues intelligence, whereupon this yong Duke is taken and carried prisoner to Namur, where he remained vntill the death of the Duke of Bourgongne, that the Ganto is deliuered him, hoping by force to make him marry with Mary the heire of Bourgongne; afterwards Dutcheffe of Austria, after the folly which they had made him commit before Tournay; a farall place, for the reuenge of the wrongs hee had done to his father. Arnold died during *Adolfe*s imprisonment, whose ingratitude had

A lustily moued him to leaue the succession to the Duke of Bourgongne. So Charles building vpon this donation, goes with force to take possession of the Duchy. This new conquest bred new proiects, and euen then hee conceived such an imaginary power as, he the end hee sinke vnder the burthen. Hee neuer had to goodly an army, especially in hodie. The Earle of Campobasso, and Gabot a Neapolitan Gentleman, (the first a Greeke in disposition and most wicked, the second a very honest man,) commanded 1000 men at armes, Italians: hee had 3000 good English, and good numbers of his owne subiects, well mounted, well armed, and of long time trained vp in warre, with great store of artillery. Hee was at truce with our King, and to keepe him occupied, the English by his practice were ready to land in France. What then should hee suffer his men to lie idle without employment? Guelldres had incouraged him. The Emperor was no man of resolution, willing rather to endure some disgraces, then to be at charge, and without the aide of some Princes of Germany his power was small. These baits thrust him forwards, but the expiration of the truce might haue stayed him. Yet he obtains a prolongation of the King for sixe moneths, whereunto Lewis yeelds willingly. Foreseeing (as he had a more found iudgement then those which did disswade him) that this Prince sought his owne ruine: that hauing finished one enterprise, another would spring vp, and so quarrell grow vpon quarrell, which the Princes of Germany would well prevent, being alwaies united in matters which concerne the Emperor.

C So it chanced. And as in to great a proiect, he must needs wonderfully discontent the Nobility and Commonalties of Germany, so was it expedient for him, to tye some vnto him. He procures an enuie with the Emperor at Treues, and there treats of the marriage of Mary of Bourgongne his daughter with Maximilian Arch-duke of Austria, the Emperours sonne: which done, the Emperor should erect his lands and signeities in Gaule Belgie, to a royalty: hee should incorporate foure Bishopricks to this new Kingdom, whereof the royalty should appertaine vnto him, and not to the Emperor, and should create him vicar Generall of the Empire. Fredericke findes these demands so inciuill and vnfearonable, as hee leaues the Duke of Bourgongne at Treues, and parts without bidding him farewell. And now another occasion thrusts him on. He that had once passed the bounds of modesty, must needs grow exceeding impudent. Two contended for the Archbishopricke of Colongne, the one was brother to the Landgraue of Hesse, the other a kinsman to the Conte Palatine of Rhin, whom the aduerse faction had expelled. Charles was banded for the latter, and vndertakes to restore him by force, hoping to plant his ensignes in Germany, or at the least to haue some part for his charges.

He first comes to Nuz vpon the Rhin; four leagues from Colongne, supposing (that if hee took it) to fortifie it well, and then to plant another Fort about Colongne by the surprize of some towne of importance, thereby to force the towne to yeeld, and so to mount vp the Rhin to the County of Ferrete (the which hee had in payne of Sigismund Duke of Austria, brother to the Emperor) and so to command all that great and rich passage of the Rhin, euen vnto Holland, where it ends, thereby to deuoure Lorraine, and so without the Emperours ayde, to surpasse the title of King of Sicile and Ierusalem. But Nuz was not vnto his end. The Landgraue of Hesse had cast himselfe into it, with many of his kinsmen, and friends, to the number of eighteene hundred horse, with a sufficient number of foote, to keepe the place. The Citizens of Colongne, with their neighbors, arme sixteene thousand foote, and incampe vpon the Rhin, right against the Duke, to cut off his victuals that came out of Guelldres, and to stay the boats with their Cannon.

The Emperor, and Princes both spirituall and temporall do arme, and as the King had often solicited them, they send vnto him to make a triall of his intent. Lewis failes not to graunt what they demanded, promising twenty thousand men, when as the Imperiall army should be at Colongne. But he had woike at home. Edward King of England discontented, that Lewis had supported Henry, and the Earle of Warwick, against him; prepares (in the Bourguignons fauour) sixteene hundred masters, all Gentlemen well mounted, and the most part barded, which made a great number of horse, and 14000 Archers all on horse-backe, with a great number of foote. The Duke of Britany hauing already consented to rebellion, should receiue three thousand English, and ioyne his army with them as appeared by letters written by the hand of Wylfe sometimes master of the kings horse, and then then servant to the Britton (the one letter to the King of England, the other to Hastins A great Chamberlaine of the said Realme) the which the King did buy of a Secretary of England, for threecore markes of silver.

In the meane time, the King treats of a peace with the duke of Bourgonne, to procure this forme, or at least to prolong the truce. The Duke excuseth himselfe vpon his word given to the English, who labours to draw the Duke from Nuz, exhorting him to accomplish the conventions, considering his great charge, and that the season fit for warre was almost spent. To this end, the Lord Scales, nephew to the Constable, makes two iourneys to Charles, who pretends by fruitfull orations, that his honour is much engaged in this siege, and that he could not rise without disgrace. Lewis to crosse him (being alwaies his craft-master in any action, either of war, or peace) procures him many and new enemies. It was no matter of difficulty to draw in Rene the sonne of the daughter of Rene King of Sicily, the heire of Lorraine, by reason of his grandmother, after the death of John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine his vncle, and of the Marquis Nicolas sonne to the said John. For the duke being dead, Charles of Bourgonne, desirous to wnite this Duchy to his Countie, had caused him to be taken prisoner: but he was deliuered in change for a yong German Prince, who was taken studying at Paris; and marching presently with his army, hee had easily deuoured that Prey, if the King following him, had not forced him to passe on. Rene therefore sends to desire him before Nuz, and fortified by some French troops, commanded by the Lord of Craon, he enters the Duchy of Luxembourg, spoiles the Countie, and razeth Pierrefort, a place of the said Duchy, and neere to Nancy. Sigismund of Austria, had in the year 1469, ingaged his Countie of Ferrette to the Duke of Bourgonne, with all the lands he enjoyed on either side the Rhin, for threecore and ten thousand Crownes. Charles had placed Peter of Hagenbac there for Governor, a wicked man, a violent extortioner, and insupportable both to the Nobility and people, who complained Sigismund, beseeching him to succour them against the outrages, and concussions of Hagenbac. Sigismund had been long in dislike with the Swisses, his neighbors; but by the kings means, they were all easily reconciled.

So they conclude a league, in the which the imperiall Cities ioyne, Strasbourg, Basil, Colmar, and Slestadt, and contribute to furnish the sum due by Sigismund to Charles, the which they consign into the hands of a banker at Basil: then the inhabitants of these ingaged lands, signify vnto the duke of Bourgonne, that they had freed themselves of the oath they had made vnto him. And holding themselves freed from the Bourgonns obedience, they reject his Lieutenant generals command. To suppress them, he assembles a great troop of Picards, Flemings, Henneuers and Lombards, & on Christmas day at night (a good worke on a good day) he seeks to bring them secretly into Strasbourg. The Citizens beate them backe, kill & take many, the rest fly to Briancon with Hagenbac. The Briancons arme, and are the stronger, they seize on the Governor, expell the soldiers, and then doe they speedily informe of his misdemeanours, giuing intelligence to all their allies, and demand iudges to iudge of the proceffe. They depute some from Alsatia, Strasbourg, Basil, Savoy of the blacke forest, Fribourg, Berne, Soleure, and other places, who condemn Hagenbac to dye, vpon foure principall crimes: for that hee had caused foure men of Honor to be beheaded at Than, without any forme of law: to haue made and displaced Officers at his pleasure contrary to his oath: to haue brought in foraine nations into places with all liberie: and for that he had rauished women, forced virgins, and committed incest with Nunnes. The Duke of Bourgonne aduertised of the death of Hagenbac, resolves to be reuenged of such as had bene actors. And hereupon Henry Earle of Witttemberg and Montclaird, is taken by the dukes men. Those of Basil aduertised herof, send a number of men with artillery to Montclaird, to stop the Bourgonns passage, who summon the Castle: the which refusing to yeeld, he sends fixe thousand horse, vnder the command of Stephen Hagenbac, to reuenge his brothers death, and to make warre vpon the Bishop of Basil, who (whilest that Sigismund assembles his confederates) spoils about thirty villages, kills, takes, caries away, and ransomes, men, women, children and cattle. Behold a strong party made against Charles of Bourgonne, by the Kings policy, whereby the Swisses entering into Bourgonne, take Blamont, besiege Hericourt, & fear the Bourgonns that come to succour it, and kill two thousand which done they retire.

The

A The truce now expired: as the King had vnder hand stirred vp the Duke of Lorraine, the Germanes, and the Swisses against the Duke of Bourgonne, sufficiently busied before Nuz, he now by open force takes from him, spoiles, and burnes Trouquoy, Montdidier, Roye, Montreuil, and Corbye: and then sends the bastard of Bourbon Admiral of France, General of his army, before Arras, and thereabouts, who spoiles and consumes with fire most of the places lying betwixt Abbeville and Arras. The inhabitants of Arras force their men of warre to goe to field, vnder the command of the Earle of Rhomon, the Queenes brother. But the Amirall hauing layd a strong ambush, sends forth about forty Lances to draw forth the townemen, who falling out as to an assured victory, are compassed in like partridges in a net, defeated, chased and slain to the number of fourtene or fifteene hundred, many are taken prisoners, and of the better sort, Iames of Saint Pol, the Constables brother, the Lords of Contay, Carency, and others. At that time the King did set the Prince of Orange at liberty, (being of the House and bearing the armes of Chalon) taken in warre, being set at thirty thousand Crownes ransom, the which the King did moderate to ten thousand: and caused it to be preciously payed to the Gentleman that held him, by means whereof he became the Kings Leige-man, and did him homage for the said Principality. So as the King gaue him power to intitle himselfe, By the Grace of God Prince of Orange, and to coyne money of gold and silver of as high a standard as that of Dauphine: to grant all graces, remissions pardons, but for heresie and treason.

This transaction, with the former prizes, did wonderfully discontent the Constable, jealous of the Kings good successe, & fearing likewise some check by to mighten an army, which the Admiral and the Earle of Dammartin had at his gate. For the auoyding whereof he giues the King a false intelligence, that the English were at sea, ready to land at Calais: hee persuades the King to provide for the places of Normandy, he promitteth faithfully to defend the marches of Picardy, and in his masters absence to reduce Abbeville and Peronne to his obedience.

But let vs heare another notable part of treachery: hee seeks by all means to weaken the King, and yet would hee not fortifie the Bourguignon: but that the English should crosse both their Estates, that his owne might stand firme in the midst of their confusions. With this designe, he procures the Duke of Bourgonne, to send Philip Bouton, and Philip Pot Knights, to the Duke of Bourbon, and hee for his part sends Heiter of Ecluse, to signify vnto him, that the English would soone land, that the Duke of Bourgonne, and hee and the Constable, ioyning all their powers together, would easily conquer the Realme, exhorting him (for the auoyding of his owne ruine and his Countries) to ioyn with them, the which if he refuse, and that it fall out ill for him, he was not to be pited.

The Duke of Bourbon sends the King two letters of this tenor, brought to him at diuers times by Ecluse, who makes answer to the Duke and Constable; that neither promises nor threats should draw him from the obedience and faithfull seruice hee did owe vnto his Maiesty. Lewis will produce these letters to the Constables confusion, in the end of the next year. For the present, he must assure his frontiers. There is no newes yet of the English. Lewis marks well this chafe, and will cause the Constable (who supposed himselfe to haue the advantage of the game) to lose the party. Poore Nobleman! how many misfortunes fore-tell thy approaching ruine? Thy brother prisoner: Thy wife dead at the same instant, one of the chiefest pillars of thy house: who as sister to the Queene, might at need haue preferred thy head: Thy Nephew Scales prisoner, with the instructions hee brought from England to the Bourguignon. And to fill vp the measure, thy son the Earle of Rouffy defeated at Grey in Bourgonne, and prisoner with the duke of Bourbon, who shall not leave him vntill the end of the year: (for forty thousand Crownes ransom) with the losse of two hundred men at armes, Lombards, the Baron of Couches and many others. The Marshall of Bourgonne, sonne to the Earle of Saint Martin, two sonnes of the house of Viteaux, whereof the one was Earle of Joigny, the Lords of Longey, Lisle, Digoine, Montmartin, Ragey, Chaligny, the Bayliffe of Auxerre, the Ensigne-bearer to the Lord of Beauchamp, and many others, escaped death but not imprisonment.

Sufficient warnings to amaze a resolute mind. Hereafter the Constable is afflicted with strange distemperatures, fed with the neighbourhood of the Earle of Dammartin, being ing lodged nere S. Quintin, whom he knew to bee none of his friends. And fearing lest the King should assault him, he sends to take assurance of the Duke of Bourgogne, intreating him to send him his brother James of Saint Pol, the Lord of Fienens, and some other his kinsmen and friends, to put them into Saint Quintin, and to keepe the towne at the Dukes deuotion, (without bearing S. Andrewes crosse) the which he promised to fore vnto him within a prefixed time.

The Constable desires Lewis to be his Constable.

They come: they present themselves within view of Saint Quintin, once, twice, and thrice: but the Constable suspects them, and sends them backe. They came still, either too soone or too late: so as at the brute of these forces the Admirall calls himselfe into Arras; whereof followed the taking of James of Saint Pol, who being brought before the King, hauing liberty to speake, he confessed, that at the two first iourneys, he came onely with an intent to comfort his brother: but at the third time, seeing the Constable had deceived both his Master and him, if he had been the stronger, he would haue kept the place for his master, without offering any violence to his brother: whereupon his Maieesty set him at libertie; very well appointed, sending him vnto his death. And although the Constable had lately done a notable disgrace vnto the King, yet his Maieesty dissembled it witley: and to take from him all cause of iealousie, he wills him to goe and make warre in Hamault, and to besiege Anennes, whilst that the Admirall was busied in Artois. He goes, but very loth, and with exceeding feare, and stayes but little: he retires betimes, being advertised (as he informed the King) that two men in his army (whom he described by apparent signes) were suborned to kill him. This new feare, accompanied with distrust, bred a terrible diffidence in the Constables head, who hauing lost his credit both with the King and Duke, will yet entertaine himselfe by both, and perswade them that he is seruant but to one. He lent often to the Bourguignons campe to draw him from the siege of Nuz, that he might ioyne slyly with the English at their coming on land, and then vpon the returne of his messengers, he gaue the King some plausible intelligence, to cause him to like of his conference with the Duke, sometimes disgracing his affaires, to win the credit of an affectionate seruant with Lewis, sometimes extolling the Duke, to terrifie the King. But oh policie simply shadowed!

On the other side, he knew well that he had greatly offended the King by his last action. He sees himselfe forsaken by his most confident seruants, Jenlis and Moray, whom the King had entertained. There might haue assisted him in his peace-making, the which he shadowed with some recompence, that the King had promised him for the County of Guis. Lewis heares them giue them good words, and commands the Constable to come vnto him. But the confidence of our misdeeds is a grieuous testimony. The variety of his troubled thoughts, will not admit an easie reliefe. He offers to come, so as his Maieesty will sweare vpon the Crosse of S. Lau, that he will neither doe, cause, nor suffer any treachery nor outrage to be done to his person. This Crosse hath bene kept at Angiers time out of mind, with an old beleife, That whosoever swearing thereon, doth forswear himselfe, hee dies within the yeare, of a miserable and violent death. Lewis refuseth this oath: but submits himselfe to any other. The more he excuseth himselfe, the more the constable presseth him. Thus passeth hourly from either of them vpon this assurance: behold, two great personages of sundry humours, wonderfully troubled in mind, and it seemed they feared like, to perish or to separate themselves absolutely. Yet Lewis was the more cunning, and did his businesse more courtely. But if these two afflicted themselves in this sort, Edward of England, and Charles of Bourgogne were in no lesse doubt one of another. The King had sent Iohn Tiorclin the Lord of Broisse, to make his excuse vnto the Emperor, for that hee had not lent the army promised by the treaty, assuring him to doe it, when he had ended his enterprises begunne, and for the most part well forward both in Bourgogne and Picardy, intreating him in the meane time not to make any agreement with the Duke: and that the one should not treat of a peace without the other. That hee should confiscate all the Dukes Siegneries that held of the Empire, and that hee would leaue vpon such as depended on the Crown of France, as Flanders, Arthois, Bourgogne, and many others.

Lewis Crispe and a subtle to the Emperor.

The Emperor, a man of more wit then vertue, answers by a gentle Apologie, That they must not divide the beares skin, before the beaſt be dead. As if he should say, Come according to your promise, let vs take this man, and then weare his spoiles. Let vs now see what what

A what he doth before Nuz, where wee haue left him much perplexed how to free himselfe with his honour from that enterprize. Two mighty armies attended him and cut off his viuals both aboue and beneath the Rhine: all the Princes of Germany both spiritual and temporall, had ioyned their forces in infinite numbers; all the townes and commonalties did willingly contribute to this charge. Two other considerations did trouble him. The King made great war against him, and had burnt many places in Bourgogne; Picardy, Arthois, and Ponthieu. Moreover, he had laboured all his life to draw in the English, but without any effect till now: and would hee abandon so goodly an army, passing now betwixt Douer and Calais, complaining of his breach, threatening (if he delay it any longer) to take another course? Yet must the Bourguignon finde some honourable pretext for his rising.

There was with the Emperour an Apostolike Legate, going from army to army, to mediate a peace. The king of Denmark was there in person, for the same effect. In the end, the place is deliuered into the Legates hands, to dispose, as the Sea of Rome should decree. Thus Nuz after a yeares siege, sees the Bourguignon dislodge with the losse of foure thousand of his choice men. A hard departure, that notwithstanding the necessity of his Army, and this mighty Imperiall power, yet not daring to affront him, hee dislodge the besieged and Citizens ouercome with hunger and toyle, who had been forced within ten dayes to yeeld to his mercy. Charles would willingly haue been reuenged of Rene for his deſce: yet he forbears vntill the next yeare, but with another issue then hee expected: he shall be well beaten & then slaine. At this time vrgent necessity draws him elsewhere, and his troopes hauing need to bee refreshed, hee sends them to liue vpon the spoiles of Lorraine and Barre, and himselfe with a small traine goes to meet Edward at Calais. Edward being yet at Douer, send Garter his King at armes, a Normand by nation, to Lewis with a letter of defiance, the tenor whereof smelt more of the French then the English. He summons him, To yeeld vnto him the Realme of France, as his right; that hee might restore the Church, Nobility and people to their ancient liberties, and free them from great burthens and afflictions: and vpon his refusal, he protests of all the miseries that should follow, after the accustomed manner and forme in such like cases. A bare deſce grounded vpon a

the King.

D subiect long before debated, and often decided. The King reads the letter, commands the Herald to be brought into a chamber vnto him, being alone, and saies vnto him: That he knew well the king of England was thrust into this enterprize by the people of England; by the Duke of Bourgogne, and by the Constable of Saint Paul. That the Duke came from Nuz like a vanquished and needy man, that winter grew on, vnfit for the effects of warre, that the Constable would deceive King Edward, and liue onely in his dissimulations, entreating euery man, and trusting no man. In the end, he solicits Garter, to perswade his master to make an agreement with him, giuing him three hundred Crownes with his owne hand, and promise of a thousand, if it might be accomplished: and in publicke, he caused a goodly peece of crimfon veluet to be giuen him, containing thirty elles. E The Herald promiseth to doe his best indeauer, aduising him to send a Herald to obtaine a safe conduct, for the sending of Ambassadors, at what time as Edward haue passed the sea: who at his first entry finds himselfe much deceived of his expectation, for the Duke had promised to ioyne with him, with two thousand five hundred men at armes, with a great number of other horse and foot: and for his assurance, to put some strong places into his hands, namely, Saint Quintin, relying vpon the Constable. That finding the King overcharged, and ready to receiue a mate, hee should begin the wars in France, three monthes before the landing of the English army, but his army was so weak and poore, as he durst not shew it.

The first cause of Edward discontent
against Charles.

Let vs here acknowledge another notable fauour of God to this Crowne, who had so blinded the iudgement of this duke, as he continued obstinate & wilfull, before this strong place resolutely defended, whereas he should haue attended the English. Wee confesse that both together would haue dangerously shaken the estate of this Realme. So the English and Bourguignon part from Calais, passe by Boullen, and draw towards Peronne: where thinking to lodge, they were disappointed, which gaue some dislike vnto the English. Being at Peronne, the Constable sends Lewis of Creuille to the Duke of Bourgogne, excusing himselfe, for not deliuering vp of Saint Quintin, whereby (saied hee) he should haue lost all his credit, and intelligence in France, and hereafter bee altogether vnprofitable for him. But he was now wholly at his deuotion, seeing the King of England within the Realme. Moreover, he promiseth the said Duke, To perseue and follow him, and all his friends and allies, as well the King of England, as others, and against all men, without any exception: and intreats him that that writing of his owne hand may serue as a gage of credit with the said King. The Duke giues his letter vnto Edward, assuring him moreover, that the Constable should not only giue him entrance into Saint Quintin, but into all his other places.

He deceiues both King Edward and Duke Charles.

Both the King and Duke beleued it. The King, for that he had married the Constable's daughter, for that the Constable was in so great feare and distrust of our Lewis, it seemed he should not dare to faile of his promises. They part from Peronne, and approaching neere S. Quintin, they send some English troops before, to enter the towne, and to the taking of a certaine possession. But the Negro (saith the Prouerbe) changed his hew. The signall they giue them of their approach neere vnto them, are skirmishes and Cannon shot. Two or three English are slain, and some taken, & so they recover their army, greatly discontented with this affront. The Bourguignon, to colour this foule and trecherous part, pretends the Constables meaning to be very good, that he could recover the yielding thereof, with any apparent pretext, if at the simple sight of so small troops he should be amazed: that he would be forced therunto, and if all the whole army marched, he would make no refusal. But these were iests: he desired but to win time, and not to shew himselfe enemy for any man. The next day Charles of Bourougogne takes leave of Edward, promising to returne speedily with all his forces.

Another error in the Duke of Bourougogne.

Edward and his men had final practice in the estate of our Realme, they are not those braue warriors which had so long gouerned our France: they needed conduct and direction to fashion them to our armes, without the which they know themselves at their first triall to be vnprofitable: but in a short time they are fashioned and become good souldiers. In the meane time they are abandoned, and the season of doing any thing almost past: they must therefore be resolute. And thus the King discouers that Edward would agree. The English had taken the seruant of James Grasse, a Gentleman of the Kings house, but for that he was their first prisoner, Edward giues him liberty. At his departing, Howard and Stanley, (both in credit with Edward) said vnto him; Recommend vs vnto the King your master, if you may speake vnto him. (After the Herald had named these two, to obtaine a passport for the Ambassadors that Lewis should send to treat) This message bred some zealousie in the Kings head, who then was at Compeigne: for Gilbert the brother of James Grasse followed the duke of Britany, and was in great credit: but being carefully examined, they find, he deferred fall. Lewis remembers the direction the Herald had giuen him, and suddenly takes this resolution with himselfe, To send a seruant the sonne of Meridol of Rochel, belonging to the Lord of Halles (or Scales) in quality of a Herald.

A counterfeit Herald.

This seruant had his countenance and personage very vnpleasing, yet a good wit, and a sweet speech. But why did Lewis make choice of a seruant, whom he had neuer seene but once, amongst so many thousands more capable of that charge? hee might discouer him if need required, as intruding himselfe, or at the least aduenturing without his priuity, and at all hazards, the losse of a seruant was not great. This Herald fashioned after the Kings mind, hath his charge deliuered him, and is attired with a coate of armes, made likewise in half, of a trumpets banner, enameled like a petty Herald, that belonged to the Admirall; and then he goes to horse-backe, without any mans priuity except Villers, Master of the horse, and the Lord of Argenton. Being arrived at the English army, he is brought before the King, to whom he deliueis his charge; That the King his master had long desired to haue good amity with him, to the end that both their Realmes might hereafter liue in peace: That since his comming to the Crowne hee had neuer made warre, nor attempted any thing against the Crowne of England. If hee had receiued the Earle of Warwicke, it was only to crosse the Duke of Bourougogne: That the Duke of Bourougogne should not haue procured his passage into France; but to make his peace with more advantage with the King. If any others were actors (meaning the Constable) it was but to serue their owne turnes in crossing him, and to worke their priuate profits, not regarding the affaires of England. That now winter grew on, that his army was not raised without exceeding charge (this was secretly to offer a recompence of all or part, which was a great perfwader to peace.) That such as nourished this warre betwixt them,

A were some Noblemen and Merchants, who made their profits of the peoples losse: That if the King of England would giue eare to a treaty, the King his Master would embrace it with so great affection, as both himselfe and his Realme should remaine well satisfied. And for prooffe, if it pleased him to grant a safe conduct for an hundred horse, the King would send Ambassadors vnto him well informed of his pleasure: vnlesse hee desired a mutuall interview in some place, mid-way betwixt both armies, then the King should grant a safe conduct for his part.

Another Ambassador from both Kings.

These speeches please, and this counterfeit Herald returnes with a safe conduct, as he desired, accompanied with another Herald, to cary one from the King of the same tenour. The next day, the Ambassadors of either side meet, in a village neere to Amiens: For the King, came the bastard of Bourbon Admirall, the Lord of S. Pierre, and Heberge Bishop of Eureux. For Edward, came Howard, Sellenger, and Doctor Morton, afterwards Chancellor of England, and Archbishop of Canterbury. In truth it was much to so humble himselfe, but the weighty burthen of affaires which oppressed our King, forced him therunto, who with one stone gaue two strokes: for Lewis sent backe his enemy, to the great confusion of the Duke of Bourougogne. Let vs generally confesse, that it is not now alone, that God doth shew his singular grace and fauour to this Monarchie; The Briton was watchfull, and ioyntly with the Bourguignon, they practised crosses of dangerous consequence.

C The English from a general demand of the crown of France, restraines himselfe to the Duchy of Normandy or Guienne. But a franke demander, requires a bold denier. Lewis protests, that he would do any thing to send the King of England out of his Realme: but to yeeld him the possession of any lands, he wil rather put all to hazard. He had a goodly and mighty army, which they esteemed (saith the Originall) an hundred thousand fighting men, and in these might doe much, the English being in bad tearmes with the Bourguignon. But the quickest course is the best, and both being willing to agree, and accord is soone made. In the end, the King grants the English three score and twelue thousand Crownes present payment: (Paris lent the money, vpon promises of restitution by the Feast of All Saints next following.) The marriage of Charles with the eldest daughter of King Edward (both being yet very young, neither shall it take effect:) and for the estate of his house, the Duchy of Guienne, or fifty thousand Crownes yearly, payable in the Tower of London, for nine yeares following; at the end whereof, he and his wife quietly to enjoy the reuenues of the said Duchy, and the King should remaine discharged of the payment of fifty thousand Crownes to King Edward.

Articles agreed at with the English.

Moreover, the King promised sixteene thousand Crownes pension to some of Edwards fauourites, who had much assisted in this reconciliation: to Hastings two thousand, to Howard, to John Cheney Master of the Horse, to Sellenger, Montgomery, and some others, the remainder. And besides, there was great store of Silver and Plate distributed among King Edwards seruants: so cury Saint had his candle. These conditions performed, Edward should repaile the Sea, and leave Howard and the Master of his horse in hostage, vntill he had recovered England: yet not without an interview of both Kings. This peace should continue nine yeares, comprehending the Dukes of Bourougogne and Britany, if they pleased. The Bourguignon hearing these newes, hatts to returne to the English, followed only with sixteene hundred Horse; At his first triall he discouers his inward passions by his outward countenance. But he came too late to prevent it. Edward tels him, that hee hath made a truce for nine yeares, and exhorts him to enter, according to the referuation he had made. Charles replies by fits, and after a reproachfull manner: That Edwards Predecessors Kings of England, had performed many high exploits in France, and with much sweat and toyle had won great reputation. He checketh him that he did not procure the English to passe, for any need hee had, but onely to giue them occasion to recover their ancient inheritance. And to make it manifest, that he had no need of their comming; he would not accept of any truce with the King, vntill that Edward had bene three moneths in his owne Country. And hauing thus layd, he returnes towards Luxembourg, from whence he came. A braudo of ill digestion to the English and his Councell, but plausible to all the friends of confusion.

The Duke of Bourougogne reproacheth King Edward for making a truce.

But what is become of our Constable? there is no speech of him during this treaty: Now is he more incombred with feare then cuer. He knowes well, that he hath displeased the king, the English and the Bourguignon, al alike, and fill he apprehends the conclusion at Bouinnes. In the meane time he seeks to please all, and sets a good face on it. Edward had freely made offer to the French Ambassadors, to name some Noblemen, that were traitors (said he) to the King and his Crowne, and to proue it by their hand-writings.

Edward discovers the Constables designes.

The King holds a Councell vpon this matter: some maintaine, that this accusation is fraudulent, and that the English would make his demands the greater with the wracke of anothers honour, as hauing good intelligence in France. But Lewis his judgment was more sharpe, he knew the Bourguignons courtes, he considered the season, that the English had not any one place in their hands, and that the Bourguignon had deceived them. Moreover, he knew well, that the Constable would not giue them any entry: and lest he should be farre imbarqued in the league, the King entertained him with many entrie, and kept him in good humour: and the Constable likewise sent often vnto the King, yet alwayes swimming betwixt two streames, vnderstanding that the treaty betwixt the two Kings, grew to some perfection, hee seemed well satisfied, and sends Lewis of Creuille Gentleman of his house, and Iohn Richer his Secretary, aduising the King, that to voyde this threatening foraign tempest hee should procure a truce, and to satisfie the English, it were good to grant them one or two small Townes to winter in. He supposed in doing this, the English should be beholding to him, and rest fully satisfied for the affront at Saint Quintin.

Lewis his subtil industry.

Note alwayes, that Lewis was a wonderfull instrument of diuision, when hee pleased. Contay a prisoner at the defeat of Arras, went and came vpon his faith to the Duke of Bourgogne, to treat a peace. He was by chance in Court at the comming of the two persons. The King hides him in his chamber behind the hangings, to heare and report to his master the speeches the Constable and his people held of him. Creuille by the Kings commandement, with a loud voyce, said, that the Constable had sent them to the Duke of Bourgogne, with many instructions, to diuide him from the English; and that they had found the said Duke to farre incensed, as by their perswasions he was not onely ready to abandon them, but to charge them in their retreat. Creuille in speaking this, did counterfeit the gesture of a passionate Prince, stamping and swearing, Saint George (the oath of Charles of Bourgogne) saying, that he called the King of England, Blanchborne, and the sonne of an archer, whose name he caried: words accompanied with all their dignities that might bee spoken. This moued laughter in the King, who taking pleasure at the repetition thereof, and seeming somewhat deafe, made him to straine his voice in the report. Contay no lesse amazed then the King was pleased, would neuer haue believed it, if he had not heard it.

The Constables treachery.

And although it grieved the King much to dissemble the Constables counsell, to giue some places to the English; yet would hee not discover his discontent to these Deputies, but answered them graciously: I will send to my brother (the Queene and the Constables wife were sisters) and let him vnderstand my minde, hauing cunningly drawne a promise from his Secretary to reueale what did concerne him. And at the same instant hee dispatched Contay to the Duke his master with letters of credit of the Kings owne hand: and somewhat to satisfie the Constable, he giues the English Eu and Saint Vallery, to lodge in during the treaty of peace. In the meane time (oh notable trechery!) behold one of the Constables ordinary trickes; hee sends his confessor to the King of England with letters of credit, and intreats him earnestly not to trust to the Kings promises, but rather to seize vpon Eu and Saint Vallery, and there to passe some part of the winter: that within two months he would lodge him better. Yet he giues him no other security, but much hope, and an offer to lend him fifty thousand Crownes, with many other goodly shewes, to draw him from so profitable an accord. Edward answers, that the truce is concluded, and that he will not alter any thing. That if he had kept his word, he would haue accepted it. Thus our Constable despaires on all sides. The king foreseeing that the Constable would thrust Edward into ialousie, resolu'd by his bounty to take away all cause of suspition for the effecting whereof, hee sends Edward three hundred carts laden with the best wine he could get: and within Amiens (Edward lodging within halfe a league, for confirmation of the truce) hee causeth two long tables to bee set vp at the entry of the towne, furnished with exquisite meats, and all kinds of prouocations to drinke, with men to attend all comers and goers at the table. At euery table where five or six men of reputation,

An interview of the Kings.

A fat and big, the better to encourage the Drinkers: amongst others were the Lords of Craon, Briquebec, Breame, and Villiers, Gentlemen of a pleasant humour: and wheresoeuer the English tooke any lodging, they might not spend any thing. This bounty continued three or four dayes; during the which, if Lewis had meant treacherously, hee had good meanes, they entering into Amiens confusedly, to the number of nine thousand, for of this great multitude, some did sing, and some slept, ouercome with wine and drowsinesse. But contrariwise, he committed the guard of the gate to English archers, whom Edward (at Lewis his request) had sent, to take in, and put out whom they pleased. It was then concluded, to appoint a place for an interview of these two Kings. It is done with lesse confusion and hazard in a small place. Piquiny vpon Somme was held convenient: an ancient Prophesie which the English obserued, described this very place. To this effect they build vpon the bridge two penties of wood, the one for Lewis, the other for Edward, either of them capable of ten or twelue men. Betwixt both was a partition, with grates to put through ones armes, going ouerthwart the bridge, that no man might goe from the one to the other. Lewis made his profit of fore-past events: hee knew that if the barre at Montereau had had no more passage then this, Iohn Duke of Bourgogne had not ended his dayes so lamentably, in the narrow bounds thereof. The 28 of August Lewis comes first to the barre, accompanied with Iohn duke of Bourbon, the Cardinal his brother, and followed onely with about 800 men at armes. Edward comes after, hauing with him the Duke of Clarence his brother, the Earle of Northumberland, his Chamberlain Hastings, his Chancellor, and others: and behinde him all his army in battell. Either King had twelue men about him, foure of the which went from one part to another, to search if there were nothing practised to the preiudice of their masters. They embrace each other through the grate, and sweare vpon the holy Bible, to obserue the Articles agreed vpon. The oath taken, Lewis mingling his serious discourse with some mirth, inuities Edward to come to Paris, that hee would feast him with the Ladies, and giue him the Cardinal of Bourbon for his Confessor, (a pleasant man and of free life) who willingly would giue him abolution, if happily he should sinne in that case. Then they converse together a while without any witness. And vpon the Kings demand, whether the Duke of Bourgogne would not accept of the truce, (men take an oxe by the horne, and a man by his word, as with the like policie the Duke of Bourgogne might haue beene surprized at his departure from Liege.) Edward answered, that he might doe as he pleased, I will summon him againe (saith he) if he will not hearken to it, I will referre my selfe to you two. This accord being made, Lewis begins to play vpon another string, and makes the like demand touching the Duke of Britany, for whom he chiefly made the motion. But he findes the English resolute in his protection, as hauing found no friend so kind in his affliction. Lewis surceaes, and with a wonderfull courtesie takes leaue of the King of England, contents all his followers with some kinde words, and giues presents to some priuate Noblemen, the Heralds and Trumpets, who to shew their thankful minds, beganne to cry, A lorgeffe for the most noble and mighty French King: a lorgeffe, a lorgeffe. He hath alwaies made it manifest, that he was exceeding suspitious, and that from an antecedent hee could cunningly draw a good consequence. He is no sooner on his way to Amiens, but hee studies of Edward his facility to hearken to the going to Paris: that he was a very goodly Prince, and of an amorous complexion, and that some nice Parisian might stay him longer then his estate required, or at the least draw him to passe the sea another time: that his Predecessors had loued Paris and Normandy but too well: He therefore desires to see their backs, and must by some meanes withdraw him from this humour, wishing rather to haue him his good brother and friend beyond the seas, then here. The necessity which forced the King against the Bourguignon, serued for an excuse.

The policy proceeding of Lewis.

Moreover, the King was grieved, to see the English so resolute to defend the Brittons quarrell: hee would gladly haue obtained that freedome, to make warre in Britany, the which hee wonderfully affected, and made a second motion vnto him by Bouchage and S. Pierre, who returned with this answer: That whosoever doth attempt (saith hee) against the Duke of Britany, I will passe the seas in person and succour him. So hee was no more importuned. Edward had an especiall cause to entertaine the loue of the duke of Britany, for at the defeat of Henry King of England, as wee haue heard, Henry Earle of Richmond, and neereft kinsman to the said Henry, after the death of his sonne the Prince of Wales,

Wales faued himselfe with his Vncle the Earle of Pembroke, and hauing entred a barke in haste, they were with tempest driuen vpon the coast of Britany, and there forced to take land, where they were seized on, and led with sure guard to Vannes. A very happy chance for the Duke, for while he holds this goodly gage, he was assured to command the forces of England: but very vnhappy for the Earle, for if he might haue landed in France, Lewis without doubt (to crosse Edward) would haue laboured to restore him. This truce did wonderfully displease some of Edward's household seruants: Lewis of Bretrailles among the rest, a Gentleman of Galfcoyne, was greatly discontented, giuing out, that the King his Master hauing in person wonne nine battels, had gotten more dishonor by the voluntary losse of this tenth, (which was in a manner gotten) then he had purchased honour in the former nine. That the French might with reason laugh at Edward's credulous facility, Lewis aduertised by the Lord of Argenton, of this Galfcoyne's free discourse, resolues to stop his mouth, to the end he should not hereafter spend his tongue to the preiudice of this Estate: He sends for him, and makes him dine with him, offers him great aduancement, so as he will serue him. Vpon his refusal, he giues him a thousand Crownes presently, and promisseth to doe good for his brethren that remained in France: binding him to maintaine (as much as in him did lye) the friendship growing betwixt these two crownes. Bretailles did not iudge amisse. Our Lewis had sometime a more liberrall tongue then was conuenient, and feared much, lest some words had passed him, whereby the English might discouer that hee mocked him: and so it chanced, yet behold how hee couered it. The day after this enter-view, being in his Cabinett, hee fell to test of the wines and other presents hee had sent to the English. But hee discouered not a Galfcoyne Merchant dwelling in England, who by chance was crept in to obtaine a licence of the king for the transporting of certaine pipes of wine, freed from impost. This Merchant might talke, hee must therefore be won, and stayed in France, vnder some apparent pretext. The King sent the Lord of Argenton to walke with him, aduanceth him to a good office in the towne where he was borne, he giues him a thousand Franks presently to transport his family, the transport of wines he required, and a man to conduct him to Boudeaux: but all vpon condition that nor he, but his brother, should make the voyage into England. Thus the King made amends for his rash speech.

Edward is now vnder faile, he was a new Conqueror, his presence was therefore more needfull in England: he did neuer much affect the voyage. Two principall reasons drew him into the action. The one was, all his subjects gaped after the possession of this crown, did sollicite him, and the Bourguignon prest him. Another was, he might reserve a good part of the money that should be raised for this voyage (for the Kings of England leaue nothing about their reuennues, but for the warres of France.) But see the policy of Edward: he had of purpose brought with him ten or twelue of the chiefe Bourgeses of the City, whose credit was great with the commons, and who had with all care procured this tax. These men were soone weery with this military toyle, presuming that at the first triall, a profitable battell should decide the quarrell. And to make them taste more feelingly the sweetnesse of peace, from the sharpnesse of warre, Edward doth sometimes trouble their heads with doubts, sometimes with feares, to keepe them from murmuring at his returne into England. On the other side, he loued his pleasures, and was of a complexion not able to endure the trauels requisite for the Conquest of this Realme: and although the King was ouercharged with enemies, yet had hee provided well for his defence. But see the most vrgent reason of Edward's retreat. The performance he desired of the mariage betwixt the Dauphin, and his daughter. A mariage which made him dissemble many things, whereof Lewis will make his profit. To conclude, as they which haue beene deceiued in their friendship, hate without dissembling, Edward before he parted from Calais, sent the King thofe two letters of credit, which the Constable had writte vnto him, with all other verball assurances which he had giuen him. Sufficient testimonies to accuse & conuince him of these crimes, wherewith he shall be hereafter charged. Let vs now reconcile the dukes of Bourgongne, and Britany with the King. Contay was now returned from the Duke of Bourgongne, the day of the enter-view, and had found his master in a good humour, when as the English were returned. Hugonnet Chanceller of Bourgongne, and other Ambassadors for the Duke, meet at a bridge mid-way betwixt Auenues, and Veruins in Hainault, so well accompanied with Archers and other

A men of warre, that one of the English hostages, whom the King had led with him, took occasion to say, that if the Duke of Bourgongne had bene followed with many such men when he came to salue King Edward, peradventure they had not made a peace. The Viscount of Narbonne answered: That the Duke wanted no such men, and that hee had lent them to refresh themselves, but sixe hundred pipes of Wine, and a pension which the King gaue them, made them hast home to their Country.

The English moued herewith: It is as euery man said (replies he) that you would deceiue vs. Doe you call the money the King giues vs a pension? It is a tribute: and by Saint George you may talke so much, as we will returne againe. This quarrell staid their proceeding: neither did they preuaile any more the second time, when as the King appointed Tanneguy of Chastel, and the Chanceller Oriole to heare the said Ambassadors at Veruins: but the third assembly which was in the Kings Chamber, made a full conclusion (and in truth Bretay had reason to say one day to the King, that his horse was well laden when he was on him, for that he caried all his Councell with him: for indeed hee did effect more in his presence, then all his Ambassadors together,) where there was a truce accorded for nine yeares, according to the other, but by reason of the oath which Charles of Bourgongne had sworne to Edward in his choller, it might not be published vntill the seventeenth of October following.

Edward (discontented that the Duke of Bourgongne would treat apart) sends Montgomery (a Knight very inward with him) to the King to Veruins, he requires two things, the one, that he would take no other truce with the Duke then which hee had made: the other, that he would not suffer Saint Quintin to be yeilded vnto him: and if hee would continue the warre against the said Duke, he would returne the next spring and ioyne his forces with the Kings, so as he would recompence him for the losse he should sustaine by the customes of Wooll at Calais, which would be of no value, (being estimated at fifty thousand Crownes) and pay halfe his Army.

The King to satisfie Edward, answers, that it is the same truce they had made together, and for the same terme; but the Duke would haue letters apart: hee thanks him for his good offers, and returnes him home his Ambassador and hostages. Lewis had lately learned, that the French and the English do easily quarrell when they are together, and a small matter would reconcile them with the Bourguignons. As for the Britton, the King could not well digest the answer which Edward had made to Bouchage and Saint Pierre, whereby he easily discouered the strict alliance betwixt them: but seeing he could not diuide them, being in the Abbey of Victory neere to Senlis, where he had a priuate deuotion, the peace was absolutely confirmed, whereby the King renounced all rights pretended by him to the Duchy of Britany, reseruing the soueraignty and homage according to the ancient custome. He promised to keepe the Dukes person in safety, and to maintaine his priuileges, and prerogatiues, without forcing him to follow him out of his Duchy, but with his owne good liking: and moreover, he should caule to be giuen vnto the Duke of Britany, the hands and seals of all the Princes of his blood, and of the Noblemen of the realme, both spirituall and temporall, with reuocation of all alliances, or former promises, and restitutions, to be made, of all things taken during the warre. The patent hath the same date with that of the Duke of Bourgongne.

Let vs now bring the Constable into open view, to play the last act of his Tragedy: finding that all these shifts and deuices, could not breake the reconciliation of the two Kings, the next day after their enteruiue, he writes very humbly to the King, by a seruant of his named Rapine: That hee was well informed how his enemies laboured to bring him in disgrace, charging him with many things whereof he had shewed contrary effects: for that during all the fore-passed confusions, hee had faithfully kept all these places which his Majesty had committed vnto him, and beate backe the enemy whensoever hee presented himselfe. And to purchase some credit, he offers to deale with the Duke of Bourgongne, who (if the King please) shall helpe to defeat Edward and all his army. Lewis dissembles, and writes to the Constable, what was concluded the day before, that at this time hee was busied with many affaires, and had need of such a head as his. A captious word, but well vnderstood by Rapine: who takes it for a beginning of fauour for his Master. But alas, how easily doth man deceiue himselfe in his imaginations: and what can a perplexed soule produce: but trouble and confusion? the truce is no sooner confirmed with the

Bour-

The Constables piteous estate,

Bourguignon, but the conclusion of Bouuines is reuiued, whereof we haue made mention. Now this poore Constable knows not to whom to flee.

And as euery man runnes as far as he can from an imminent shipwrack, his best friends, his most affectionate seruants, and his most confident fouldiers abandon him. What shall he then doe? whom shall he implore? what Sanctuary? what succours? he knows well he hath equally displeased, Lewis, Edward and Charles; his lands are on all sides inuironed by his enemies. He is too farre from any safe retreat. He holds strong places, yea almost impregnable: but who shall defend them? he inioyes great treasure, but they violently hunt after it.

What refuge shall he choose? shall he goe to the King? but by what meanes shall he purchase grace? he is too farre incensed, and is seized of the letters which the Constable had written to the King of England, and the Dukes of Bourbon and Bourgongne. May he rely vpon Lewis his word? but he would not sweare vpon the crosse of Saint Lau. Shall he passe the seas? he gaue Edward too vnkind welcome neere Saint Quintin. Shall he call himselfe into Charles of Bourgongnes armes? but he hath spoyled his Countrey of Hainault, he would haue forced him to marry his daughter with the Duke of Guienne decreed, and hath often treacherously deceived him; being aduanced by his meanes to that great dignity of Constable.

The Constable in a desperate estate,

To conclude, he alone hath more then all others mainrayned these Princes in hatred, so as what party fouer he takes, he is vndone. Yet must he needs vnmaske himselfe and flee to one, for what meanes hath he to warrant himselfe alone against so mighty enemies which shall he choose? poore soule! beaten with distrust, feare and despair, for yielding to the one he incensed the other. Moreouer, there is lesse danger for him to be besieged by two, then by one alone, being impossible for two armies to accord long together: and contrariwise, being charged by one, there is some hope to make his peace. Sometimes he resolves to flee into Germany, and to buy a place there, vntill he be reconciled to the one: sometimes to keep his strong Castle of Han, the which he had well fortified to serue his need. But he is so amazed as he dares not discouer himselfe to those few seruants that are left him. Moreouer, they are all subiects to some one of these Princes. Yet he must resolve: and better is it to fall once, then stagger alwayes.

But they haue both ioyntly conspired his death, he is well informed thereof, and hath seene a copy of their mutuall seales. Yet when once he hath passed his word, he will make a conscience to breake it. But there is no faith in the Court of France: hee hath offended the King too much, and hath too great aduersaries, and no man might safely loue him whom Lewis hated. The Duke of Bourgongne is more moderate, more easie to pacifie, and if he giue his faith, he will be ashamed to deliuer him, who had thrust himselfe vnder his protection. He gaped after Saint Quintin, he must yeeld it vp vnto him, and redeeme his head with the price of this good place. He stands firme in this resolution, and beleeueth Charles to lend him a safe conduct, to go and treat with him of matters concerning his estate and person. At the first Charles makes some difficulty, but in the end hee thinks he may well dispense with his conscience for Saint Quintin.

So the Constable accompanied onely with fifteene or twenty horse, goes towards Mons, in Hainault, to Esmeriz, great Bayliffe of Hainault, the dearest of his friends, attending newes from the Duke of Bourgongne, who made warre in Lorraine vpon the deffe we haue spoken of. The Foxe is now out of his earth. It must be forseeene, that this yeelding reconcile not the Constable to the Duke. The King well informed what troopes were in Saint Quintin, and of the Inhabitants affection, hasteth thether with fouen or eight hundred horse. They meet him with their keyes: the quarters are ordered, all his forces enter, and he follows. And to take from the Bourguignon all hope to recouer Saint Quintin by the Constables meanes, he giues him aduice to the taking thereof: for although in the diuision made at Bouuines of the Constables places, this fell to the Duke, yet would not the King that he should make his peace with the Bourguignon by the deliery thereof.

Saint Quintin yeilded to the King,

The Constable prisoner,

Charles aduertised hereof, sends to the great Bayliffe, that he should guard Mons well, that the Constable goe not forth, and that hee should appoint him his lodging for a prison. Here the Bayliffe prefers obedience to his master, before the Constables loue. Lewis aduertised of the Constables detention, requires the Duke of Bourgongne by

Bouchages,

The Constable deliuered to the King,

The Constable beheaded,

Charles of Bourgongne breaks his oath with the Constable, and the tide of a King,

A Bouchages, and Saint-Pierre, either to deliuer him, or to performe the conuention. Hee promitteth to doe it, and causeth him to be caied with a sure guard to Peronne. Hee had now taken diuers places in Lorraine and Barrois, and did barter Nancy, whereof hee desired to see issue, for the deliery or retayning of the Constable, so as with this deligne, in stead of eight dayes concluded on at Bouuines, he lets passe a moneth and more. But the Kings great instance, and his army which lay houering in Champagne, as ready to succour the Lorraine, and to crosse the Bourguignon in that enterprize, the conquest whereof hee greedily pursued, to vnite his Territories, and to passe freely from Luxembourgin to Bourgongne, (for inioying this Duchy, he came from Holland vnto the Confinnes of the Diocesse of Lion, vpon his owne land) made Charles to send Humbercourt, and the Chancellor Hugonnet, (both great enemies to the Constable) to deliuer him at an appointed day, to such as the King should send. Charles supposed to haue wonne Nancy by that day, but he was deceived in the time. And in truth they had no sooner left him, but a countermaund comes from the Duke, after the raking of Nancy, but too late.

The prefixed day being come, they deliuer the Constable at the gates of Peronne, into the hands of the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France, Bouchages, Saint Pierre, Cerisy, and others: who led him prisoner to the Bastile at Paris, the said Admirall charging the Chancellor, first President, and other Counsellors of the Parliament being there present, in the Kings name, to make a speedy triall of him, vpon his letters written to the King of England, and the Dukes of Bourbon, and Bourgongne. So by iudgement of the Court, giuen by the President Popincourt, he was beheaded at the Greue, the 19 of December, and by an especiall grace was buried at the Gray-Fryers in Paris. A pittifull spectacle, to see so great a personage laid vpon a scaffold, allied to the houses of France, England, Bourgongne, Sauoy, and many other great personages, the chiefe Officer of this Crowne, mighty in lands, in treasure and in friends, abandoned of his friends, his goods confiscate, degraded of his Offices and finally to serue as a spectacle to the whole world.

He was witty, valiant, and of great experience: but in his latter yeares bereaued of the grace of God. Let vs apprehend this Oracle: It is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the liuing God. The pit he had digged for another, must swallow him vp. He had with all his force laboured to maintaine these two Princes in hatred and mutuall dissention, to subsist in the midst of their partialities. He had often and impudently lied vnto them, and being both very reuengfull, it was impossible to auoide their snares. But who can warrant the Duke of Bourgongne from the law Cornelia? must his cruell couerousnesse force him to giue security to this poore Lord, to thrust him into an vndoubted ruine. Fourecore thousand Crownes in mouables, and threecore thousand Crownes in ready money which he got by his spoiles, were they valuable to the satisfiying of his conscience? God leaues nothing vnpunished, and we shall learne hereafter, that this disloyall act in him was the iust ruine of his house: a house for a hundred yeares flourishing in all perfections of felicity, the which hereafter shall runne headlong to a strange Catastrophe: and by the meanes of a young and vnexperienced enemy, weake in regard of the Bourguignons great and redoubted power: God resists the high minded, and chooseth contemptible things, to vaine and confound the proud. Let vs with one breath, see the declyning and ouerthrow of this house of Bourgongne.

The violent ambition of Charles, had (as we haue heard before) armed him with a boyling desire to be a King: but Frederic the third scorned it. From that time he still plotted to get this quality. René (before Earle of Vaudemont, sonne to Ferris of Lorraine, and of Yoiland, daughter to René King of Sicilia, and Duke of Aniou, and of the onely daughter of the Duke of Lorraine, eldest brother to Iohn Earle of Vaudemont, Father to the said Ferris, and now Duke of Lorraine) had desired him before Nuz, grieved with the Bourguignons outrages. This is a good expedient to purchase this pretended royalty. Lorraine made him a free passage, to vnite his countries, and moreover, by the conquest of this Duchie, he should qualifie himselfe King of Sicilia, and Ierusalem, the hereditary title of this house. This vent of vaine-glory tranfports Charles into Lorraine: and for pretext of a quarrell, he pretends a great summe of money to be due vnto him by Renés predecessor: for non-payment whereof (after the taking of many places) he comes before Nancy, besiegeth it, batters it, but takes it not so soone as hee presumed, being valiantly defended beyond his expectation. The King also vnder-hand fauoured this young Duke,

Duke, procuring him secretly the alliance of the Suiffes, and the Imperiall Townes of Alsacia.

Charles since the siege of Nuz had in pay about a thousand men at armes, Neapolitans for the most part. The Earle of Campobasso commanded foure hundred, a partisan of the house of Anjou, against that of Arragon: and for this cause being banished his country, had alwayes followed Duke René of Sicilia, or Nicholas sonne to John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine: after whose death Charles of Bourgogne entertained many of his seruants: especially this Earle, a wicked man and of a corrupt conscience, who in the beginning of the warre of Lorraine entred into practice with Duke René (heire apparent to the house of Anjou, after the death of King René his Grand-father by the mother) promising to prolong the siege of Nancy, and cause defects in necessary things touching the siege. He might well doe it, hauing more authority in this army then any other Captaine. But he behold another act of notable villany.

The Duke of Bourgogne had giuen him forty thousand ducats before-hand, to raise his company. Passing at Lion, to goe into Italy, he grew familiar with a Physician, named Simon of Pauly, giuing by him the King to vnderstand, that for an hundred thousand Crownes in ready mony, his company entertained, and a good Earldome, at his returne, hee would deliuer him the Duke of Bourgogne, and confirms the same to Saint Puy, who then was Ambassador for the King in Piemont. Being returned, and his troope lodged in the Country of Marle, he reiterates his offer to the King, to kill the Duke when hee should come to the campe, if he desired not to haue him brought a prisoner vnto him, assuring himselfe to execute it easily: for (saith he) he is accustomed to visit his army, mounted vpon a Nag, and ill accompanied: Or if the King and the Duke should any time fight a battell, he would turne to the King with his company.

Leuis abhorres the treachery of this wicked wretch, and to shew the Duke his franks and royall disposition, hee giues him intelligence thereof by Contay. In the meane time, Campobasso directs the Bourguignon all he can from the warre of Lorraine, and makes the taking of Nancy, proue more difficult. The Duke is so much incensed therewith, as from iniurious words, he proceeds to blowes, and strikes him. A blow which the Earle will reuenge in time. He dislikes for the present, and Charles either thinking the Neapolitan had forgotten this outrage, or supposing that his hired souldier had beene bound not to reuenge it, or happily fearing if he lost him, his affaires would receive some dangerous checke, he entertaines him still in his seruice: yea (euen contrary to the Kings aduice) he loued, or made shew to loue him better, supposing that Leuis his intention was, to stir diuision betwixt him and his most trusty seruants. But let vs rather say, that hee which founds, euen to the deepest thoughts of man, had by a iust iudgement, taken away all apprehension from this Prince, not to taste the wholesome counsels that were giuen him, with most apparent reasons. This proud presumption, like vnto Nembroth, made him conceiue a world of Chimeraes, and bring forth a shamefull confusion, as wee shall read hereafter.

He is now puffed vp with the new purchase of Lorraine, by the taking of Nancy, with the possession of Saint Quintin, Han and Boham, and with the Constables moueables; but he would not make this the limits of his conquests. The Suiffes had incensed him, redeeming of the county of Ferrere for Sigismund Archduke of Austria. Moreouer, they had spoiled James of Sauoy Earle of Rhomont, brother to the Prince of Orange of many places, lying within their marches. These Noblemen were allied, and partakers to the Duke, and thrust him on to reuenge. On the other side, the King desired to parle with him, after the manner of Picquigny, wishing him to lodge and refresh his troopes, tired both with the siege of Nuz, and the warre of Lorraine, and to grant a peace to this mountaine Nation, being poore but yet froward. But Charles prestres the violent passions of his ambition, before the honest and wholesome counsell of Leuis, and enters into Suisseiland. The Cantons hearing of his approach, intreat for peace: they offer to yeeld vp the place in question, and by a second Ambassage, to renounce all alliances that should dislike him, especially the Kings: to cruce him against all men, yea against the King, with six thousand men, for what pay he would giue them, and as often as he would call them. If he did triumph ouer them by an absolute victory, there were no profit to be found, seeing the spurs of his horsemen, and the bits of his horses, were of more value then all their country.

A But he refuseth all accord, no preuention can stop this streame. He marcheth, and after this imaginary conquest of the Cantons, he passeth the Alpes, and layes hold of Italy, for that Frederic Prince of Tarantum, son to Ferdinand King of Naples, was lately come to him, with hope to marry his daughter. Moreouer, old René King of Sicilia & Duke of Anjou, and vncle to the King, seeing his sonne John, and his Grand-child Nicholas were deceased, promised to resigne vnto him his pretensions of Sicilia, to adopt him: for his sonne and heire, and soone after, to put into his hands the Earldome of Prouence. But we shall soone learne the causes that moued him to this attempt: he gaped, about all other things, after the goodly estate of Milan, where he presumed to haue great intelligences.

B The Ambassadors being returned, the Suiffes protest of their submission, and of their desire to pacifie all things, calling: God and the world to witnesse: and then they prepare for their defence. Charles for the first fruits of his army, furnished with fiftene thousand men from the Duke of Milan, and five thousand from the Duchesse of Sauoy (for how he loues strangers better then his own subiects; and the troubles of his mind, makes him conceiue a hatred and iealousie against them) he takes Lozana, a mountaine towne, seated vpon the Lake Lemane, with other places in the Country of Vaux, causing the Garrison for the most part to be hanged. Then he brings the whole body of his army, (being about fifty thousand men, and five hundred pieces of Artillery of all sorts) before Granson, lying neare to the Lake of Yuerdun, which belonged to Rhomont, being defended by seven or eight hundred Suiffes of the Canton of Berne. He batters, makes a breach, and giues an assault, with the losse of a hundred men. But the batterie continuing, the defendants (not able to hold the towne) fire it, and recouer the Castle, where hauing many Towers beate downe, they compoud to haue their liues saued. An accord treacherously broken, for hee caused fourescore to be hanged (some write five hundred and twelue) hee drownes two hundred, and puts the rest in prison. A detestable cruelty, and so odious vnto all the Cities vpon the Rhine, as they send men to the Duke of Lorraine and the Suiffes to their aide.

Hee is nothing amazed therewith; but for the stately entertainment of Ambassadors that came vnto him from diuers Countries, namely from Germany and Italy, hee shewes D himselfe in his campe with incredible pompe and state: pavilions and rich tents, glittering armes, goodly standards, vessels of gold and silver, of inestimable value, rich apparell, exquisite Tapistry, Jewels, precious stones, and other costly ornaments: to conclude, the goodliest furniture that might beaurifie a campe. The Suiffes not yet aduertised of the losse of Granson, send foure or five thousand men to releue it: but too late. The Duke (contrary to the opinion of the best aduised) goes to meet them. They campe at the entry of the mountaines, hold the straits of hard access, and of great aduantage for the foot, and dangerous for the horse, where one man might stay fifty. But he was (as the prouerbe saies) mounted to the Pies nest, and God blinding his vnderstanding, prepared an exemplary abatement of his pride. He sends a hundred archers before, to seize on a passage of the mountaines; who discouer not an ambush off shot that kept it, the which suffer a part of the foreward to enter, whereas the battell could not succour them, whom they charge with such resolution and fury, that with this terrour the Bourguignons fle, and fall vpon the other part, which was yet in the plaine, which likewise turns head towards the campe. The battell and rereward seeing the foreward in rout, shrinke presently, and (notwithstanding all the Dukes labour to stay them) they saue their liues by flight, ill-informed of the small numbers of their enemies, who pursue them with all fury. Charles himselfe was forced to loyue with them that fled, abandoning both campe and artillery, to saue their persons, laying in no place vntill he came to Loigne, fiftene or sixtene leagues from Granson. A baser flight then the pursuite, for want of horses, so as the Duke in the midst of so great a terror, lost but seven men at armes, but very many foot. This happened the second day of March.

A day not so famous for the losse of men, as of spoile, esteemed at three millions, where with the Suiffes (not so cunning in those dayes as now) made themselves rich, although they were ignorant of the value of things. For a proofe of their grosse and rude ignorance the Original obsequies: that they did reare in peeces the goodliest and most sumptuous pavilions in the world, to apparell themselves. That a souldier did sell a silver dish like pewter, for two pence halfe peny. Another taking vp the cafe of the Dukes great Diamond, where as whereat did hang a great pearle: the which he viewing put vp againe, and so cast it into a Cart, comming afterwards to fetch it, he sold it to a Priest for a Florin worth twelve pence: the Priest sent it vnto their Lords, who gaue him fixe shillings. They held it to be the goodliest in Christendome. Besides many others, they got three pearles of inestimable value, the which they called the three brethren, with two other the most rare stones that could be found.

To conclude, whatsoeuer the Duke had of rich or sumptuous, he caused to be caried after him in ostentation, to shew his superfluous and fearefull greatnesse vnto strangers. So the eternall God did signifie vnto Ezechias by Esay. That all the cafers of his dragger, silver and gold, his sweet perfumes and precious oymment, with all his artillery, yea, all that was found in his treasures, all that was in his house, all that his fathers had gathered together vnto that day, should be caried vnto Babylon: for that he had made a shew to the Ambassadors of Berodac-Baladan, the sonne of Baladan King of Babylon.

The Swisses revenge the cruelty of Charles at Cranston.

Lewis fears the good successe of Charles.

Presently after this battell, the Swisses recouer their lost places, take downe their companions and bury them, and hang vp many Bourguignons with the same halters. The King remained at Lion, attending the successe of the Bourguignons forces, fearing exceedingly, lest he should subdue the Cantons. He disposed of the house of Sauoy, as his owne: the Duke of Milan was his ally: he held Lorraine, and hoped for Prouence, which succeeding, his power extended from the Westerne Sea, vnto the East: and France had had no issue out, but by the Dukes fauour, or by sea: for the preuenting whereof, Lewis sent often to the Duchesse of Sauoy his sister in law (being wholly at the dukes deuotion) to René his vncle, being much incensed against him, so as he would scarce heare his messengers, to the Princes and commonalties of Germany, who returne him an answer, say vnto the King that if he warre not against him, we will make our peace, and warre our selues against him. This was it he feared, yet would he not break the truce, neither haue Charles discover the messages he sent. But now the Bourguignons shipwracke cheered him, grieuing onely at the small number that were slaine.

The Duke fears the King should breake
the truce.

The Duke on his part was toucht with leare, and to preuent it, he sends Comay to the King, charged with humble and gracious speeches, contrary to his custome. Hee beseecheth his Maiesty to obliue the truce loyally, excuseth himselfe that he did not assit another, to enterview neere vnto Auxerre, and promisth to be there shortly, or wheresoeuer it should please the King. The King assurms him of his demands, neither was it yet time to doe therwise, but to keepe himselfe in the shade, whilest that Charles chafed. Lewis was well acquainted with the loyalty of the Dukes subiects, who would easily crosse him, seeing him oppressed with aduersitie. One mischiete comes neier alone: the losse, shame, and despight, to see himselfe vanquished, layes him sicke in his bed. But behold a rougher charge in prosperity friends come by hundreds, in aduersity they flie by thousands. Galeo duke of Milan leads the dance; he was allied to Charles by reason of his practices in Italy: which being dissolved by his check, he sends a Citizen of Milan to the King, he disswades him from making a peace with the Bourguignon, and to preuent it, he offers him a hundred thousand Ducats presently. The King detesting the inconstancy of this man, who three weekes before was estranged from him, hunting after the Bourguignons fortunes, with a great and solemne Ambassage: considering also, that their wiues were sisters, and his couetous proceeding: he reiects his money, reproacheth the little loue he bare to his brother in law, but in the end he accepts of his alliance. René King of Sicilia seconds him. Charles had already (vpon the hope which this good old man gaue him) sent the Lord of Chasteauguion into Piedmont, with twenty thousand Crownes, to make a leauy of men, to take possession of that Earledome.

But vpon this defeat, he was happy to saue his person, and to lose but his silver, seized on for the King by Philip of Sauoy Earle of Bresse. Vpon this amazement, Lewis sends to his vncle, desires him to come, and to assure himselfe of good entertainment, else he would provide by force. Iohn Cossé Senechal of Prouence, an honest man, and of a good house in the Realme of Naples, perswaded his master to this voyage, giuing the King to vnderstand, that the treaty of René with the Bourguignon (the which he himselfe had procured) tended to no other end, but to let the King know the wrong he had done his vncle, hauing taken from him the castles of Barre & Angiers, and intreated him ill in all his other affaires, and that he neuer had any will to performe the accord. A liberty of speech very pleasing

A vnto Lewis, who from that time respected his vncle, and they liued like good friends. Then René made a transaction with the King, that after his death the Earledome of Prouence should returne to the King, and be incorporate to the Crowne.

In doing whereof, the Queene of England, daughter to the said René, and widow to Henry the sixth, King of England, whom Edward held prisoner, was redeemed by the King, for fifty thousand crownes. For this cause the yeelded vnto the King all the right he might pretend to the said county, and for a certaine pension which the King assigned her during her life. The Duchesse of Sauoy sent Montigni secretly, to reconcile her to the King, yet will she try the issue of the Dukes fortune. The Princes of Germany, and the Imperiall townes, who before were enforced to temporize, now shew themselues enemies, and turne from him.

Fredericke, Prince of Tarentum, grieued with the strange dissemblings, touching the pretended mariage, leaues him: and soone after returning into Fiance, he maries a daughter of Sauoy, the Queens sister. What then? Shall he flie to his Hollanders & Flemings? But he knowes their inconstancy, and that they fauoured not his flight: yet he sends his Chancellor Hugener, with twelue Commissioners, to require aide of men and money from his subiects, who returne with this resolution: That if the Duke their Lord were prisoner, they would morgage and sell their liuings to redeeme him: that to disswade him from the war, and draw him home into his countries, they would assit him with all their power. But to continue it, they are not relolued to doe any thing. To conclude, euery bird had his pecke at this Owle. Euen as when a tempest ouerthrowes some great tree, euery one tears off a branch. He yeelds not yet, but would be ashamed to confesse himselfe beaten by such a wretched people: and although all these crosses had wonderfully increased his sicknesse; and that heauinesse, melancholy, and other passions had altered his blood, with great prejudice to his health: yet he gathers together the peeces of his wracke, and within few months goes to field with his army. Hauing staied some space at Lauzan, he went the ninth of Iune to campe before Morat, a smal towne two leagues from Berne, belonging to the Earle of Rhomont, wholed the foreward. Anthony, ballard of Bourgogne camped vpon the Lake with thirty thousand foot and horse. The Duke lodged in the mountaine, and Rhomont vpon the descent towards the Lake, with 12000 men.

Charles armes against.

He besiegeth
Morat.

The Cantons were sooner in armes at this shooke, then at the other: and if beafore they gaue him a light defeat, they shal now giue him a generall ouerthrow. In their league are numbred twenty townes, prelates, and commonalties: Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Vri, Suits, Vnderual, Zug, Glaris, Fribourg, Soleure, Basil, Chasthouze, Appenzel, Sangall, the Grisons, the Earle of Toquembourg, the Abbot of Sangall, Valois, la Caste, Dye and the ten iurisdiccions of Malny. All these did furnish eleuen thousand Pikes, ten thousand halberts, 10000 foot, and 4000 horse: and the King, who made war against the Bourguignon, at another mans cost, had vnder hand giuen the Duke of Lorraine means to ioine with six hundred men at armes. Moreover, the townes of Rhine, Songoy, and Ferrete, had sent a supply of three thousand men.

All these forces being ioyned, the two and twenty of Iune, behold at the first encounter, the foreward is so violently charged, as the Earle of Rhomont is forced to saue himselfe with ten or twelue horse. The Garison of Morat falls out, and ioynes with the Duke of Lorraines troopes; they charge the Bourguignons campe, force it, and ouerthrow him with a horrible slaughter of his men. He recouers Befanion by the swiftnes of his horse; and from thence Riuer, in the county of Bourgogne. In this bataille died about eightene thousand men (others say two and twenty thousand seuen hundred) and of Swisses fiftie men onely. At this day are seene the spoiles of this bataille, in a chapel, built where the bataille was fought, and filled with the bones of such as were slaine. The Swisses pursuing their victory, take all the places of the county of Rhomont, and along the Lake Lemán, euen vnto Genéua, which are at this day vnder the iurisdicción of Berne, and the Bishop of Basil, & razed many places & castles vpon the Marches of the Franche countie. The duke of Lorraine, hauing a good share in this notable victory, with his French troopes, and some supplies from the confederates, recouers Vaudimont, Espinall, Nancy, and some other places by composition. Now is Charles of Bourgogne exceeding heauy, and for that the house of Sauoy had bene the chiefe motiue of this warre: (whereof the first firebrand had beene for some carts laden with skins, taken by Rhombot from a Suisse), and doubting lest the would speedily be reconciled to the King, he sends to take her by force, and brings her to Rouure near Dijon, with her youngest sonne Duke of Sauoy. Philibert the eldest, then Duke, was (with the helpe of some seruants of his house) retired to Chamberi. The King, who neuer lets slip any advantage, and who politickly builds vpon anothers shipwracke, treats with the Bishop of Geneva, a sonne of Sauoy, a man of a free disposition, & gouerned by a Commander of Rhodes, both tractable, who deliuer into his hands the Castles of Chamberi, Montmelian, and another place, in the which were all the Duchesse iewells. Shee seeing her selfe deprived of libertie, dissembles no longer, but sends Riueral, a Gentleman of Piedmont, to the King to mediate her peace; but with all the fury that might be: knowing well that it was dangerous to displease him, befeehing his Maiestie to free her. Lenis, a better brother then she had beene a sister, sends to deliuer her, by Charles of Amboise, Lord of Chaumont, Gouernour of Champagne, who brought her to Plessis for Tours; whither the King was returned: who hauing renounced the alliance of Bourgongne, recovered her children of the King, with the places, iewells, and all things that belonged to her, and then conducted her home at his owne charge. But Charles, is he tired? So many disgraces; so many losses of men of war, places, friends, and treasure, haue all these daunted him, as he hath lost all courage: He is now solitary at Riuere, sad, mournfull, grieved, displeased in himselfe, way-ward to his seruants, despised of his subiects, abandoned of his friends, and hateful to all the world: he seeks neither comfort or counsell of any man, and his great auerity is the cause that no man dare giue it him. And doubtlesse these encounters were sufficient to make him lay aside armes, and humbly to acknowledge, that the scourge of God doth aduertise vs, that we are strayed from our duties, and to lift vp our eyes, hands, and hearts to heauen, there to seeke for consolation, and not among men, rather restoring that which we haue pulled from others vnjustly, then continuing obstinate in our reuenges.

But Nancy must be the place of his funerall, it was wonderful commodious for his passage to his other Signeuries; but his army being vtterly ouerthrowne, it was not possible to leaue new troopes so speedily, to succour the Lord of Beures, of the house of Croÿ, who defended it against the Lorrain. Campobasso did diuert him, shewing that the city was but slackly besieged, that it was needfull to breathe, and to refresh his spirits tyred with the forepassed toyles; & in the meane time continues his practises with Duke René. René pressed him still for succours, yet could he not arriue vntill the day it was yeelded, with such forces as he could get out of Flanders, Luxembourg, and Bourgongne. Hee beseegeth againe before it could be fortified and victualled, and within few daies brings it to exceeding famine. The Lorraine, nor yet strong enough, attending such troopes as came to him out of Germany, and Suisse land, adventures a company of soldiers, carying some victuals. They crosse through the Campe maintaining the skirmish, whilst that such as came meale entred the towne. Cifron, a gentleman of Prouence, and Steward to the Duke of Lorraine, was taken prisoner amongst others. Charles commands he should be hanged. This gentleman had bene the actor betwixt Campobasso, and Duke René. Seeing that he must of necessity die, he desires Charles to heare him, & that he would discouer a matter which concerned his person. Charles answers in choller, that they were but thifts; and Campobasso, fearing his tongue, doth hasten both the Duke and Prouost to this execution; for (said he) by the law of armes, euery one that seeks to releue a place after the Canon hath plaied, and is taken, deserves death. Cifron makes a new request, and the Duke sends to know what he would say. He refuseth to reueale it but to the Duke himselfe; and as they returned with this answer to the Duke, Campobasso remaining at the chamber doore, where the Duke was writing with a Secretary, makes them beleue that the Duke's pleasure was, that they should dispatch him; and so Cifron was hanged. He still continues his siege, and neither shame, losses, the season of the yeare, nor his weaké army; neither the great succours which he sees comming to the Lorraine, nor the secret aide the King gaue vnto his enemy; neither Alphonfus King of Portugall, his cousin Germane, who then attended some succours from the King at Paris, against the Castilian, and went expressly to him to mediate a peace, to be the sooner dispatched (for the King excused himselfe vpon the issue he feared of this war of Lorraine) could moue him.

The battaile of Nancy.

Charles ouer-
come & slaine.

Nancy pressed with famine, was ready to compound, if Campobasso had not by secret intelligence reuiued their spirits: when as beheld the Duke of Lorraine comes with an army of foureteeen or fifteene thousand men, French, Swisses, Germans and Lorraines, and lodgeth at Saint Nicholas of Varengeuille. Campobasso, not able to do the Bourgougnon a greater dispite, leaues him with nine-score men at armes with him, & the Lords of Ange & Montfort with six-score, & they go to René. A great maiine for the Duke, whose troopes were but bare and weak. Notwithstanding vpon the Swisses protestation, that they would not fight in the company of a traitor, the Duke sends him to Conde, a castle vpon the riuier of Moselle, a passage for victuals which came to Charles from the valley of Luxembourg & Metz. He takes this passage and stops it with trees and carts, to stay the flight of such as should think to saue themselves, foreseeing already the Bourgougnons ouerthrow, hoping by this means to haue a share of the booty, and prisoners, as it happened indeed. But the foulest & most treacherous act of his tragedy is, that he left men suborned to begin the fight at the first charge, and others to obserue the Duke, & if he fled, to kill him. Charles, vnderstanding these newes, hearkeneth thereto (contrary to his custome) yet hee follows not the aduice of his counsell. The most experienced, counsell him to retire to Pont a Mouson, which he held yet, and to fortifie himselfe there, suffering them to victual all Nancy. They told him, that the Germans loued the ayre of their hot bouises too well: that René would want money, so all would disband, without meanes to ioine together againe in long time: that their victualling could not be so plentifull, but it would be spent before the middelt of winter, & in the meane time he should refresh his army, increase his troopes, and furnish himselfe with all things necessary, seeing that he had money, which was the sinew of war. A wife counsell, but Charles halted to his ruine. He had in his army, but 4000 men, whereas not about 1200 were in case to fight, yet by the aduice of some foolish people hee will hazard a third battaile, exposing a handfull of men ill armed, and ill mounted, panting yet with the first and second encounters, against an army fresh, lusty, and glorious with two notable victories. The fifth of January, vpon twelfth Eue, René puts his army into battaile, neare vnto a lake at Neuville. The Germans and Swisses diuide themselves into two battallions: the Earle of Abstein, and the Gouernors of Zurich and Fribourg lead the one, the Adouyers of Berne and Lucerne the other; the rest, both French and Lorraines, march vnder their ensignes: one battallion goes towards the riuier, the other takes the high-way from Neuville to Nancy.

The Duke of Bourgongne attends them firmly, in a place of strength & aduantage, hauing before him a little riuier, betwixt two strong hedg-rows, neare to the hospital of Magon, & at the entry of this great high-way (where one of the battallions marched) Charles had planted the greatest part of his artillery, which thunders vpon the Swisses at their first approach, but with small hurt, being far off. This battallion leaues the high-way, & mounts vp towards the wood, coasting along the Dukes army. The Duke makes his archers to turn head, appointing two wings of men at armes, the one led by James Galiot, a Neapolitaine, an honest man and a valiant Captain; the other by the Lord of Lalain, lieutenant of Flanders. This battallion hauing gotten the aduantage on the higher ground, stands firm: then like vnto a violent streame it falls vpon the Bourgougnons army; & with a thundering volly of shot defeats the foot. At the same instant the other battallions chargeth Galiot squadron, who behaued himselfe like a wife & valiant Captain; but the horse seeing the footmen amazed, leaue all & flie after. The other wing, commanded by Lalain maintains the fight, but vnable to withstand the violent hooke of the Swisses, in the end they giue way, and turne towards the bridge of Bridores, where was the greatest shew of their men that fled. This bridge is halfe a league from Nancy towards Thionville, & Luxembourg; Campobasso had stopp the passage, so as all such as tooke that course, were either slaine, drowned, or taken: if any recovered the woods, the peasants beat them downe with leuers, a chafe which continued from noone, vntill two houres within night. Charles thinking to saue himselfe, was ouerthrowne by a troope of men that followed him; discouered by them, which the traitor Campobasso had left to obserue him.

The next day he was found among the dead, lying frozen in a ditch, well knowne by many of his household seruants. He had three wounds, one with an halbard about the eare, which cut him to the teeth, the second with a pike through both the thighs, the third by the fundament. René caused him to bee honourably buried in Saint Georges Church at Nancy. In this Battaille there died three thousand Bourguignons, and there were taken the Earle of Nassau, the Marquis of Rothelin, an English Earle, Anthony and Baldwin brethren, bastards to the Duke (whose ransom the King did pay) and many gentlemen. The booty was small: but the victory of Granfon was yet fresh, & as they then did sing, He lost his goods at Granfon, his men at Morat, and his life at Nancy. Behold this great Nemroth, who made himselfe equal with Emperours, and yielded not to the greatest kings: before time the terror of Christendome, feared by his subiects, fought to by his neighbours, who had purchased to himselfe the surname of terrible, and warrior, drunke with ambition, transported with the desire of anothers estate, now confounded with his owne greatnesse, who with his fall ruines his house. Doubtlesse, the daies of mortall man are like to graffe, he fades like the flower of the field: for the winde passing over it, it is no more seen, nor the place thereof knowne. Shame and destruction follow pride at the heeles. And who doth iudge by the effects, that the chiefe causes of his ruine were couetousnes, pride, and cruelty: couetousnesse, in that contrary to his honor and faith, he had deliuered the Constable, for the greedy desire he had to enioy Saint Quintin, Han, and Bohain, and some moouables: Pride, in that God hauing raised him to greater dignity then any of his predecessors, accompanied with many goodly and singular graces, yet hee thought that the habitable earth could not prescribe limits to his conquests; attributing all to his owne force, and not to the power of the eternall, and the happie successe of his affaires to his owne iudgement: Cruelty, for that in the war of Liege, he had bathed himselfe in the blood of his poore Subjects, glutting his wrath with that sex and age whom the rigor of war doth easily pardon.

And what shall we say of the right hands he caused to be cut off, of those pooreouldiers at Neffe: Of the fires wherewith he hath wasted so much country? Of the Swisses hanged at Granfon, after they had yielded vpon his faith given to the contrary; & of lae had hanged a gentleman being taken in the war. He had good parts, valiant, painefull, vigilant, desirous to entertaine men of merit: liberal, but with discretion, to that end many might asle of his bounty. He gaue aduice priuately, honoured strangers, and receiued Ambassadors with State. But since the battaille of Montlehery, presuming by his only valor to haue forced a mighty King to leaue him the field, he conceived to ouerween a presumption of himself, as neuer after would he belecue any other counsel but his owne: attributing the issue of his enterprises to his owne iudgment and industrie, with obstinate a constancy in his vnmearured designs, as in the end it was his confusion. So the voice of the Eternall breaks downe the Cedars: yea, the Eternall beates downe the Cedars of Libanus. But, let vs note the iudgment of God, that before Nancy he deliuered the Constable, and before Nancy he was betrayed by Campobasso. And let vs obserue the like in our daies as we shall see hereafter. Eleuen daies before this battaille, Gales Duke of Milan was murdered in a Church by Andrew of Lampogagno, a Milanoise, who leauing a Son very young, left withall many discords for the government of the Duchie, amongst many Noblemen, one amongst them called Robert of S. Severin, near kinsman to the Duke, banished from his house by the stronger faction, retired himselfe into France, hoping to persuade the King to attempt something against the State of Milan. Lewis taught by former experience, that the French haue alwaies lost easily and with shame, that which they had gotten with much paine and sweat in Italy, would not hearken vnto it, no nor suffer any succors palls for the relief of the Florentines, being ancient friends & allies to the French, against whom Pope Sixtus, and Ferdinand King of Naples made war. But for that hee would not seeme vtterly to abandon them, he sent the Lord of Argenton vnto them, with some troopes leauied in the State of Milan, as we shall shortly see.

But, what doth Francis Duke of Britany, hauing lost one of the chiefe supporters of his building? He sees, that of three of the strongest heads of the Common-weale, two are cutt off, Charles Duke of Guienne, and Charles Duke of Burgongne, and he knowes full well, that the King will not leaue this outrage vnreunged vpon such as remaine. The treaty made at the Abbey of victory had become confirmed by the Estates of Britany. Lewis had by his Deputies renounced all pretenfion to this Duchie: but he forgets nothing, though hee sleeps. He is now freed from his most mortall enemy: by all probability, he should hereafter employ his forces in Britany: he must therefore warrant himselfe with some honorable support, and must seeke protection from the English.

This

the King

A This negociation required much secrecy and silence, for Lewis was exceeding iealous, and discouered cunningly such practices. So as the subtilty were surprisid in their owne subtilties. Peter Landays Treasurer of Britany, was the man best acquainted with the dukes most secret intelligences, and vnder him, William Gueguen. For the dispatches, for England hee vsed one Maurice Bromel, who for three yeares space was the messenger to cary letters betwixt the duke of Britany and the King of England. It chanced that Bromel passing at some port, discouered himselfe to a seruant of the Kings, who presently aduertised his Maiesty. Lewis did cunningly make his profit of these aduentures. Yet must hee not rashly apprehend the companion, thinking it best to discouer more. The King, to win this messenger, cunningly employes a certain man of Cherebourg in Normandy, who could counterfeit the Dukes hand, the King of Englands, and their Secretaries. This Agent for the King, treats with Bromel, and for a hundred crownes for every letter coming from either part, gets a promise of him, and a place appointed to deliuer the letter and to receiue his money. The Agent made copies, counterfeited their hands, and falsing them vp with a seale either counterfeit, or of hisne by Bromel, he sent the copies into England, and brought the King the originals. In the end, two and twenty letters, what of the Duke and Edwards, fell into the Kings hands, without discouery.

And although the Duke sought to the English more to defend him at need, then to offend, yet would he maintaine himselfe in the Kings good fauour. For this effect, one day among others, he sent Charvin his Chancellor, the Senehall of Vannes and others of his Councell, to giue Lewis to vnderstand the deuotion he had to his seruice. At that time the King pursued his conquests vpon the heire of Bourgongne, being ready to besiege Arras as we shall presently shew. Being ariued, they are all committed prisoners, and lequestred vnder diuers guards. After two dayes, the King sends for the Chancellor, reproacheth him, that hauing often conferred with him of the affaires of Britany, holding him for an honest man, heeides it strang, that he had alwaies so constantly assured him, that his master had no secret intelligence with the King of England, seeing that now the contrary was manifest. The Chancellor continues in this protestation, and for more assurance engageth his life: but twelue letters written by Gueguen and signed by the Duke, and ten others by D. Edward, make him hang downe his head, and to confesse himselfe faulty. Bur for his owne particular, he protests of his innocency, & in case that he or his companions deputies, be found to haue bene acquainted with this intelligence, he will lose his life. The King is satisfied herewith, he returns them backe without any farther audience, and giues them the originall, for a prooofe against the Duke. He iustly complains, that making shew to fauour him, he doth notwithstanding practise with the most ancient enemy of the crowne. That if he do not renounce all intelligence with the King of England, he will not take him for his friend. Charvin being returned, makes his report deliueis the Kings commandement, his answers, his countenance in speaking, the accents of his words, and the consequences that might ensue. He beseecheth the Duke to retire himselfe in priuate, and then

E to verifie his sayings, he laies vpon the table the two and twenty letters.

The Duke amazed to see that plainly discouered, which hee thought to haue bene known but to two, sends for Landays & commands him vpon his life to tell him, by what means they might fall into the Kings hand; the which must needs proceed from one of the two. Landays knowes the hands and seales, but cannot conceiue the residue: and all amazed he offers himselfe to prison, and to lose his life, it hee bee any way found guilty. Then he remembers that only Bromel had alwaies caried & re-carried these letters: they must finde out him (being then employed in that action) & make him vnfold that doubt. He therefore sends after him in post, & takes him at Port-blanc, where he attende at a winde to imbarke, and was brought to Nantes. His confession did absolve Landays; & he was cast into the Riuer in a Sack very secretly, lest the King should be aduertised thereof, who sufficiently informed of the Dukes ill mind, turned his armes into Britany. But the war against Mary of Bourgongne troubled him sufficiently, yet to proceed with some lawfull pretext, he would fortifie himself with a grant he obtained from the Lord of Boufflac, & of Nichole of Britany his wife, the only heire of Charles of Britany, Earle of Ponthieure: a house which in old time did quarrel for the succession of this Duchy, by the which transaction, in the yeere 1479, the 19 of Ianuary, they yielded vnto him all the rights they might pretend to the said Duchy. But it is now incorporate to the crowne, by a iustler title then by armes.

By what means, Abbeville, Doullans, Montreuil, Roye, Montdidier, Peronne, Han, Bobain, Saint Quintin, Tournay, Arras, Hesdin, Boulogne, T.rouenne, Douay, and other places were reduced to the Kings obedience, and Bourgongne united to the Crowne.

The first intelligence the King receiued of the onerthrow of Charles of Bourgongne, gaue no assurance of his death; for by means of the posts he had newly established, he had speedily aduice. Thereupon he resolues to enter Bourgongne with the army he held in Champagne and Barrois, attending the Duke; and vpon this sodaine terrour to fall vpon the country. And he imagined to haue both right and means to do it: right, for his rebellion and treachery committed against the Crowne; means, for that the flower of all the Nobility of Bourgongne was lost, and all his forces disperfed. It happely the Duke liued, this would be his ruine. It was also to keepe the Germanes and Swisses from the possession thereof, and to saue the Prouince from ruine, loath to suffer a stranger to liue thereon, seeing it holds in foueraignty of him.

In the meane time he giues away, (in case the Duke be dead) some lands which the Duke possessed, and sends the Admirall with the Lord of Argenton, with authority to open all packets vpon the way; and if the Duke were dead, to receiue into his obedience all such as would yeeld themselves. Vpon the first day of their journey they had certaine aduice by a messenger which the Lord of Craon sent to the King. Abbeville made the way to the rest. The Admirall, and Argenton had sent a man before, to treat with the soldiers; who attending the coming of these Noblemen, there came forth to the number of foure hundred Lances. Being come forth, the people open the gates to the Lord of Tournay; and they spare the King thoe Crownes and pensions, which the Admirall by vertue of his warrant had promised the Captaine. This was one of the Townes which Charles the seuenth, had deliuered by the treaty of Arras: the which should (for want of his male) returne to the Crowne.

Doullans follows. They summon Arras, the King pretending this towne to be his by confiscation for non performance of duties, and in case of refusal, they threaten force. The Lords of Ransleinc and Cordes make answer to John of Vacquery (afterwards chief president of the Parliament at Paris) that the County of Arthois appertained to Mary of Bourgongne, and came to her directly from Marguerite Countesse of Flanders, Arthois, Bourgongne, Neuers, and Rhetel, married to Philip the first, Duke of Bourgongne, sonne to John, and younger brother to King Charles the fifth, beseeching him to maintaine the truce made with Duke Charles deceased. So they returne without doing any thing, but only won some men, that soone after serued the King well: who (resoluing to reduce such places by force, as should disobey his command) goes to Picardy. In this voyage, he caueth his Court of Parliament at Paris to come to Noyon, with the masters of Requests, and some Princes of the blood, to resolve vpon the procelle of James of Armagnac Duke of Nemours, and Earle of March, prisoner in the Bastile at Paris, and taken in the yeare 75 at Carlat, by Peter of Bourbon Earle of Beauieu, at what time the Dukes wife dyed partly for griefe, and partly by child birth. Shee was daughter to Charles of Anjou, Earle of Mayen. By which Court (being found guilty of high treason) he was condemned by a sentence pronounced by John Boulenger the first president, to lose his head vpon a scaffold at the Halles at Paris, on Munday the 3 of August: and was by the like grace buried at the Gray-Frayers, as the Constable had been. He was one of the chiefs of the war for the common weale, whom the King laboured to bring to his end all he could. Lewis is exceeding glad, to haue surmounted his most malicious aduersaries: the Duke of Guicene his brother, the Earle of Armagnac, the Constable, the Duke of Nemours. All the house of Anjou was dead, René King of Sicilia, John and Nicholas Dukes of Calabria, and their cousin the Earle of Mayen, afterwards Earle of Prouence, whose successions hee had gotten.

But the more the house of Bourgongne exceeded all the rest in greatnesse and power, hauing with the helpe of the English, continually shaken the estate of this Realme, for the space of thirty two yeares vnder Charles the seuenth, and their subiects being alwayes ready to trouble this Crowne by Wars: so much the more pleasing was the death of their last Duke vnto him, knowing well, that being now freed of his greatest incomber, hee should

A should hereafter finde greater ease. Yet he erred in his proceeding, not taking so good a course, as he had forecalt in the life of Charles of Bourgongne, in case he should die; for allying himselfe by the marriage of the Dauphin, his son, with the heire of Bourgongne, or at the least with some of his princes (for that there was a difference of age betwixt the) he had easily drawn vnto him the subiects of these large and rich Siegneuries, and had preferred them from many troubles, the which haue afflicted both them and vs by the same means: and freeing them from warre, hee had greatly fortified his Realme, recouering with small toyle, that which he pretended to be his. The which he might easily effect: for the Bourgignons were very humble, without support and without forces, not able to make aboute fiftene hundred horse and foot, which were preferred at this generall ouerthrow.

But these are humane discourses, wherein hee had done better, then thus resolutely to haue fought the ouerthrow of that house, and by the ruine thereof, to purchase to himselfe friends in Germany or elsewhere, as he pretended, but without effect. Presently vpon his arrivall, Han and Bobain yeelded. Saint Quintin takes it selfe, and calles in the Lord of Mouy. William Bischope, (borne at Molins in Niuernois, a man of bafe quality, but enriched and raised to great authority by Duke Charles,) Gouverneur of Peronne, yeelds the place, and the Lord of Cordes inclines to the French party. They failed of their enterprise at at Gand, but it succeeded at Tournay. The King had sent Master Oliver le Dain his Surgeon, borne in a village neere vnto Gand, not only to cary letters of credit to Mary of Bourgongne, (who then was in the possession of the Gantois, that suffered no man to speake vnto her, but in the presence of witnesses) perswading her to yeeld vnto the Kings protection, seeing that both by father and mother, (shee was issued from the blood of France, (being well assured that he should hardly obtaine her) whilest that he provided her a husband fit for her quality, as also to worke some alteration in the City, they being discontented with the Priuiledges which Philip and Charles had taken from them, and the rigorous exactions they had made. Oliver hauing stayed some dayes at Gand, is called to the Towne-house to deliuer his charge. He deliueis his letter to the Infanta, assisted by the Duke of Cleures, the Bishop of Lege, and other great personages. Shee reads it, and they call him to deliuer his message. He answers, that he hath no charge but to speake to her in priuate. They reply: It was not the custome, especially to a yong Gentlewoman that was to marry. He insists, that he will deliuer nothing but to her selfe: they threaten him with force: he is amazed, and going from the Council, (considering the quality of the person) they doe him some disgraces, and if he had not speedily escaped, hee had bene in danger to haue had the ruer for his graue. Doubtlesse it is a great hazard, when matters of importance are managed by men of meane estate, and the people thinke themselves contemned, if they be treated with all by men of bafe quality. This barber knew something for to preuent this inconuenience, hee learned himselfe Earle of Meulan, (others write of Melun) whereof he was Captain. But Lewis reposed great trust in two men of the same sort. Being gone from Gand, he retires to Tournay, the which lies vpon the frontiers of Hainault and Flanders, a strong and a goodly towne, but free, and at that time a neuter, seated sily to keepe those two Prouinces in subiection. Oliver was there some dayes without respect, during the which hee corrupted thirty or forty men, and fraught with their promises, hee sent secretly to the Lord of Mouy, that at the breake of a certaine day appointed, he with his company and some other troopes, would be in the suburbs. He comes at the appointed time, and master Oliver with his men giues him entrance, to the content of the people, but not of the Gouverneurs, of the which hee sent seuen or eight to Paris, who departed nor: whilest that Lewis liued.

To speake truly, Oliver shewed both wit and valour in this stratagem; and for the faction of Gand, he is not so much to be blamed, as he that employed him. Conde, a small towne betwixt Tournay and Valenciennes, cut off all viuals from the French, and hindered the victualing of Tournay. It was taken and burnt, for that it did but employ men which might serue elsewhere, and Tournay was sufficient to keepe the Country in obedience. It seemed that the prosperity of the Kings affaires and his great desires began to trouble his spirits: for prooffe whereof, a Gentleman of Hainault (the Originall doth not name him) afflicted with many others, offers to deliuer vp the principall Townes and places of the Country. He talks with the King, who likes not of him, nor of the rest hee

he named. The reason is, they would sell a good peece of seruite very deare. Yet hee referred them to the Lord of Lude, bred vp from his youth with him. But Lude seasoned with the same humour, transported with his priuate profit, demands at the first, what the townes would giue him to manage their affaires. So as the Hannuyer (who would haue no competitor in his gaine) departed without effecting of any thing, and the enterprise proued vaine. Without doubt God would not glut vs with felicity, and it is needfull to haue crosses, to make vs to know our felues. Moreover, it was not reasonable to vsurpe any thing vpon this Countie of Hainault, for that it holds of the Empire, and in regard of the ancient alliances betwixt the Emperours and our Kings, whereby they ought not one to take from another. And for prooofe, Cambray, Queinoi, le Conte, and some other places of Hainault, had willingly put themselves vnder the protection of Lewis, the which he deliuered as freely, with the forty thousand Crownes that they of Cambray had lent him, for the charges of the warre.

Am bassade to Lewis of Bour-gongne.

Whilest the King was resident at Peronne, an Ambassage comes to him from the Infanta of Bourgongne, consisting of the principall men about her: a- namely, the Chancellor Hugonnet, a very wise man, and honourable: Himbertcourt, a Gentleman experienced in matters of weight: Veere, great Nobleman of Zeland: Cripure (otherwise called Gruise, or Gruire) with other Ecclesiasticall and secular men. They intreat the King to retire his army, and that all controuersies might be quietly ended, according vnto right and reason. They shew, that by the customes of France, and the ordinances of his Predecessors Kings, the women did succeed in the Counties of Flanders, Arthois and other Provinces therabouts. That remaining but one onely daughter of the deceased Duke of Bourgongne, yong, and an Orphelin, he should rather protect, then oppress her. That the marriage of the Dauphin with her, should bee more proportionable, then with the daughter of England. And for the more credit, they brought a letter, written in parafite by Mary the Infanta of Bourgongne, and some part by the Dowager her mother-in-law, Sister to Edward King of England, and some part by Rauestein brother to the D. of Cluces, and neere kin man to the yong Lady, yet none of any credit but that of the Infanta. This letter gaue authority to Hugonnet and Himbertcourt, and said moreover: That Mary Duchesse of Bourgongne, was resolved to gouerne her affaires by the aduice of foure persons, the Dowager, Rauestein, Hugonnet, and Himbertcourt. Mary beseecheth the King, that whatsoeuer it should please him to negotiate with her, should passe by their hands, and that he should not impart it to any other. The King (fore seeing that by the confusion of this people hee should settle his affaires) meanes cunningly to make his profit of this letter, but not thinking it should cost two so vertuous heads, in sowing diuision betwixt the Duchesse and her subiects. Yet before he giues audience to these Ambassadors, he treats priuately with either of them, Hugonnet and Himbertcourt, (whereof the first had all his liuing in Picardy, and the other in Bourgongne;) and they desirous to bee continued in their ancient authorities, giue care to the Kings offers: they promised to serue him, as the foresaid marriage might take effect.

Diuision betweene Mary and the Orphelins.

The rest, whose Estates were not vnder the Kings command, would not tye themselves by promise, but with the alliance of the houses of France and Bourgongne. This was most expedient for the King, but the violent conditions they propounded, withdrew his loue much both from her and them in particular, supposing he should soon haue all, without accepting of a part by an accord. Moreover, he was possessed with a wonderfull desire to conquer Arras. The Lord of Cordes might doe much, hee was Lieutenant in Picardy vnder the deceased Duke, Seneschall of Ponthieu, Captaine of Courtray, Boulongne and Hedin, Governor of Peronne, Montdidier and Roy: he was yonger brother to the Lord of Greucecourt, and already did shew himselfe to be French, his estate lying within the territoire of Beauuais. The townes vpon the riuier of Somme, by the death of Charles, (the last issue male of the house of Bourgongne) returned to the King, and so Cordes became the Kings Leage-man. His duty then bound him to yeelde vnto the King such other places as he commanded, but he was bound by oath to his Mistresse seruit. A dispensation will false it. There is no hole but Lewis findes a pin for it. Vpon his motion to the Ambassadors, that the deliuerie of Arras would make the way plain for a good peace, and request, that they would be a meanes to Cordes to open the City of Arras vnto him, (for in those dayes there were both walles and ditches betwixt the City

He doth it willingly, and sweares fealty to the King, who presently stoppes vp all approaches to the towne, then he goes to incampe before Hedin, leads de Cordes with him, whose men made a shew to defend the place, as ingaged by oath to their Lady: for their credits sake they endured the battery some dayes, then seeing their defences taken away, and their loope-holes battered, Ridde of Launoi giues care to his Captaine, & yeelds the Towne. The King for his reward gaue him a chaine of twenty linkes, and euer linke worth twenty Crownes in gold, and a good pension for his maintenance. The taking of Hedin, brought the King to Therouenne and Montreuil, the which easily yeelded to his obedience. Boulongne being summoned refuseth, but being battered, it yeelds the fifth or the sixth day. The towne belonged to Bertrand de La Tour, Earle of Auvergne: the King finding it commodious for the State of his Realme, compounded, giuing him a sufficient recompence, and as new Lord of the Towne he did homage, without sword or spurres, bare-headed and on his knee, before the virgin Mary, offering (as a duty to the said Image) a heart of masse gold, weighing two thousand Crownes: vpon condition, that hee and his successors Kings after him, should hold the Countie of Boullen of the said Virgin, and doe homage vnto her Image, in the Church dedicated to her name, paying at euery change of a vassall, a heart of pure gold of the same weight.

ty of Boullen,

The Deputies of Arras taken and many of them executed.

C While the King remains at Boullen, those of Arras seeing themselves enuioured on all sides, write to their friends of Lille and Douay, to succour them with some numbers of men: and moreover, they send to the duchesse of Bourgongne, to furnish them with some succours, meaning to put themselves into her hands. The Deputies being two or three and twenty in number, make shew to goe to the King, to treat with him, and vnder this colour they obtaine a passe-port of the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France. But being discovered vpon the way to Flanders, they were taken, brought to Hedin, deliuered to the Primos Marshall, condemned, and eightene of them beheaded, the rest were saued by the Kings ariall. Amongst them that were executed, there was one ondard of Bussie, borne at Paris, and married at Arras. The King had in former time offered him the place of a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris then voyde, and since hee gaue him the office of Master of the accounts at Arras. He caused his head to be vnhuried, and set vpon a pole in the market place, with a red hood furied with meniuier, like to the Councillors of the Parliament. A worthy punishment for so malicious an ingratitude.

There were some few horsmen at Douay, of the remainders of Nancy: they armed three hundred good and bad, and some few foot, and march at noone day in the sight of Arras. The Lords of Lude and Fou, with the company of the Marshall of Loheac, aduertised of their approach, goe to meet with them, they fight with them, kill and take in a manner all of them. The King at his ariall, caused foure-score of these prisoners to be executed, to terrifie those few men of war that remained in the Country. Some of them enter the town, but they were not able to stand out against so great forces. So as after a hard battery they yeeld by composition: That they should remaine vnder the Kings obedience, as their Soueraigne, for want of heires male, rights and duties being not performed: That the Subsidies and Tributes should be leauied by the Kings officers, and deliuered by them to the heire of Bourgongne, untill shee had done homage and taken her oath of fealty to the King her Soueraigne Lord. During which time the Inhabitants should receiue no garison from the King. This was the fourth day of May.

Arras yeelded.

These things thus concluded, the King sent the Cardinall of Bourbon, the Chancellor of Ortole, de Cordes Gouverneur of the Towne, and Guiof Poi, Bayliffe of Vermandois, to take the oath of fealty of the Inhabitants. But after this oath, holily and religiously receiued by the Deputies, who tooketh their repast in the Monastery of S. Vast, behold an insolent troupe of desperate people comes crying, Kill, Kill: yet they were but terrified, and saued themselves presently in the City. This terror, together with the greedinesse of the Commanders, was the cause the composition was but ill offered: for in the presence of Lude and Cerisy, many good Citizens and other rich men were spoyled and slaine, and the City for at three score thousand crownes fine to the King, the which they say was afterwards restored. And to keepe these mutinies in awe, the King transported most of the Inhabitants of Arras, and planted it with a new Colony of French, commanding it should be called Ville Francoise. At the same time the King aduertised, that the Flemings were in armes, and lodged a Blancosse, he sent to charge them, but they dislodge at the brunt thereof, yet not so speedily, but they leave about 2000 men slain at the first charge; and the like number in the chafe, being pursued eight Leagues within the County of Flanders. The French in their returne, razed Mont-Cassell, Fiennes, and some other places. The Gantois, whom the severe punishment of the Liegeois had kept in awe, now break forth. They make a ward of their Duchesse, force her to restore their ancient priuiledges, which Philip & Charles had taken from them, and suddenly they resolve a deadly reuenge, vpon such by whom they say they had been controlled. They lay hold vpon those whom they called their twenty and sixe Lawyers, whom Charles had established in the gouernment of the City, and puts them all, or the most part to death. They haue (say they) cut off ones head without any authority, for their power ended with the death of Charles. And moreover, they slew many good men within the City, that were wise and faithfull friends to Charles in his life. But they proceed yet farther.

The happy course of Louis his conquests doth much amaze them, whereupon they assemble some forme of a Parliament, by aduice whereof they make a motion of peace to the King, by an Ambassage, giuing him to vnderstand, that the Infanta of Bourgogne is determined to gouerne herselfe hereafter by the aduice and counsell of the three Estates of her Countries: they request the King to desist from making war, and to appoint a day when they may quietly pacifie all controuersies. There was nothing at that time able to withstand the violence of the Kings army. The Low-Countries were left naked of soldiers, those which furnished (being inconstant) had forsaken the Infantes seruice: Hee was well acquainted with the insolency of this people, not able to digest any man of iudgement that had been in any authority with their deceased Prince. He knew, that their inclination was to loue the declining of their Lord, so as it were not with the prejudice of their Country. And therefore he fore-casts (if he might) to sow some seeds of diuisions amongst them, whereby he should greatly incommber them. Hee stayes the Ambassadors vpon their speech. That their Prince would not conclude any thing without the counsell of the three Estates of the Country: whereunto hee replies, that they speake without warrant, and that he is duly informed, her meaning is to gouerne her affaires by priuie persons, who desired no peace. And vpon their protesting to the contrary, affirming that they were grounded vpon good instructions, the King opens Maries letters, brought by Hugonnet, Himbercourt, and other Ambassadors, at their first Ambassage, and they returne with no other dispatch then this letter.

Behold here a company vnexperienced in affaires, returne light with care, but fraught with reuenge and diuision: they make their report vnto their Lady, assisted with the Duke of Cleues, the Bishop of Lege, and many other great personages. They strike on that string which they meant to play vpon: that the King had proued them liars, in that they maintained constantly, that the referred the gouernment of her affaires to the resolution of the States. And for proof as they maintained the contrary, not imagining her letter to haue beene produced, behold the Pensionary of Gand, a brutish man and without respect, draws the said letter out of his bosome, and contounds this basefull Princeesse before the whole Assembly. The Dowager, Raufsein, Hugonnet and Himbercourt were likewise present. The Duke of Cleues instructed the marriage of his eldest sonne with the Infanta: he sees himselfe now frustrate by the above-named, so as hee presently becomes a mortall enemy to Himbercourt, from whom he expected fauour in this fate. The Bishop of Lege complained of many disorders committed by him at Lege, whereof hee had the gouernment. The Earle of Saint Paul, sonne to him that was beheaded, loued neither Hugonnet nor Himbercourt, for they had deliuered his father to the Kings seruants. The Gantois, according to their humors, hated them deadly, for that they were men of merit, and had beene good and loyall to their master.

To be short, the night after the letter was deliuered, Hugonnet and Himbercourt were tumultuously seized on, and deliuered to suborned men of their Law: and for that they had caused the City of Arras to be yeelded by the Lord of Cordes, as they said, or rather vpon certaine corruptions in iustice, and bribes which (they said) had beene receiued by them of the City of Gand, in a sute against a priuate man, and vpon many extortions in their charges, and other things contrary to the priuiledges of Gand, against the which

A (say they) whoe euer offends must die: these two reuerend and graue personages, were with a shadow of Law condemned by the Sheriffe of Gand, and notwithstanding their appeals before the King in his Court of Parliament at Paris, supposing that this respite and delay, might giue their friends meanes to procure their deliuey, they were vnwillingly put to death. Oh vniust, barbarous, and inhumane people! That the humble and earnest supplication of thy Princeesse, being in the Towne-house, nor her weeping and desolate presence before that mournfull scaffold, were not of force to preserue and keepe the liues of these two her faithfull seruants.

This execution ended, they sequestred from this poore Princeesse, the Dowager and Raufsein, who had signed the Letter, they disposing absolutely of her. Poore, without doubt, hauing not only lost so many good and great Townes, but also sees herselfe now in the tyrannical possession of the ancient persecutors of her house. A great corolluse, to be commanded by such as should obey. Afterward they banished whom they pleased, placed and displaced officers after their owne appetites, chase away indifferently all such as had best deserued of this house of Bourgongne. And to continue their popular fury, they deliuered out of prison Adolfe Duke of Gueldres, whom Charles had long detained, and making him their head, they made a leauy in Gand, Bruges, and Ypre, of about twelve thousand men, the which they sent to Tournay, and burnt the suburbs, and then they retire. But the garison issuing forth, put wings to their feet: so as Adolfe a valiant Prince of his person, turning head to fauour them that fled, and to make the retreat, was overthrowne and slaine, with a great number of his people with him. The Infanta was nothing grieved; for if this stratagem had succeeded for the first fruits of his armes, some hold they would haue forced her to marry this Adolfe.

But wee haue wandred long enough in Arthois and Flanders, let vs retire a little into Bourgongne, and consider how this Duchy became French. John of Chalon, Prince of Orange, was in great credit there. He possessed much land, both in the Duchy & County, he was a man of action, and much esteemed in the Country, and pretended some inheritances against the Lords of Chaumergnon his Vncles. Charles of Bourgongne had giuen sentence in fauour of his aduersaries, and (as he said) to his great preiudice, so as he had twice left his seruice. Now the question is to win him againe. The King promiseth to inuest him in all those places which he pretends to belong vnto him, by the success of his grand-father, and to giue him good preferments in France. So he makes him in shew the head of that army which the Lord of Craon commanded, being Lieutenant general for the King in Bourgongne, whom the King trusted more then the Prince, being rash & light in the change of parties. Craon hauing commandement to enter into Bourgongne, sends the Prince of Orange before, to practise the Towne of Dijon. He wrought so politickely, that Dijon and many other places, both of the Duchy and County, did willingly submit themselves to the French command. Auxonne and some other places of strength continued still vnder the obedience of Mary of Bourgongne. Craon seeing himselfe in possession of these places, desired rather to hold them vnder the Kings authority, then to deliuer the to the Prince of Orange, notwithstanding the Kings promise and instance, who desired to gratifie this Prince, and yet would not discontent Craon, who commanded the forces. The Prince hauing to doe with a man that would yeeld nothing without good consideration, and seeing himselfe frustrate of his pretensions, he ioynes with Chastaignion his brother, and Claude of Vaudry, a braue Gentleman, raiseth some troopes, with the which hee draweth from the King the most part of the above named places, with as great facility, as if he had conquered them for him, and then followes the Infantes party, whose age and weakness, required a great support by some worthy alliance.

There was some speech of Charles the Dauphin, but hee was but nine yeares old. The Duke of Cleues laboured for his eldest son, the Emperour for his sonne Maximilian King of Romanes. Mary desired much the alliance of France, but the King had done her a great disgrace, deliuering her letters to the Gantois, the which shee had secretly written: which caused the death of those two good men, and the banishment of her most affectionate seruants. Moreover, her Estate required a man to gouerne it. Shee would willingly haue married with the Earle of Angoulesme, if the King had bene so pleased.

The humours of the heire of Cleues pleased her not, nor such as were about her. The Emperour kept (as a pawne) a Diamond with a letter, which the Infanta had written vnto him, him, by her fathers command; whereby shee promifeth to accomplifh the mariage, in A forme, according to her fathers pleafure. He fend it to the dueheffe, to auerre her hand and promife, demanding if ſhe would perfift therein. She doth auouch the contents, and agrees to make it good. So Maximilian comes to Gand, & there the mariage was conſum- mated. A mariage which ſhould proue a fire-brand, to kindle (by their defendants, both within this Realme, and in many other eſtates) the combuſtious tumults and furies which haue followed; the which happily had been auoyded by a French alliance. But God had otherways decreed. This mariage was cōſummated during the Orangeoſ reuolt in Bour- gogne, the which continued ſomewhat long, by the ſupport the Germanes gaue him in fauour of Sigifmond of Auſtria Vncle to Maximilian, who (hauiſng his territories adioyn- ing, and eſpecially the County of Ferrette, (the which hee had retired by the Suiſſes meanes) would galdly haue gotten ſomewhat of his neighbours. But the indiſcretion of Sigifmond, and the want of money to pay the Bourguignons, were a meanes that the King did more eaſily preuent the Prince of Orange his practices, who now called himſelfe Lieutenant to the ſaid Germanes. They ſupplied him with ſome troopes, with the which he recovered almoſt all the County, continuing his courſe, vntill that Craen came to be- ſiege him in Grey, a ſmall towne of the ſaid County.

Craen beſieged before Dole.

Chafteauguion ſeeing his brother cooped vp, and the place ready to yeeld to Craen diſcretion, poſts thither with all the forces he can, and comes to charge *Craen*ſ army in front, whileſt that the beſieged ſhould ſet vpon him behind. So charged both before and behind, he found the match hard: yet by the defeat of fourteene or fifteene hundred men, for the moſt part enemies, and the taking of Chafteauguion, hee wonne the victory, Craen leads his army after this victory before Dole, the chiefe towne of the County: but for that he did preſſe it but ſlackly, and neglected his enemy, whoſe forces he knew to be but ſmall, he had ill ſucceſſe: for in a ſhorte ſally they ſlew many of his men, and caried a- way a great part of his artillery. This affront brought him in diſgrace with the King, who fearing a more dangerous checke, hearing likewiſe complaints from all parts, of his great exactions and money vniuſtly taken, puts him from the government of Bour- gogne, preferring in his place Charles of Amboiſe, Lord of Chaumont, a valiant, wiſe, and vigilant Captaine. Loue preuailes more then force. He perſwades the King to pa- cifie the Suiſſes and other Germanes, who followed the Prince of Orange, in fauour of the houſe of Auſtria: and to make the way more eaſie for the King, hee himſelfe doth praſiſe the Commanders.

Then began the Suiſſes firſt league with the Kings the which hee effected by meanes of twenty thouſand frankes he gaue yearly among the Cantons, and the like ſumme to be diſtributed among ſome Captaines which he employed. And to pleaſe them, hee made himſelfe a Bourgeſſe amongſt them, and obtained the title of the firſt allied to their Com- mon-weale. A title which the Duke of Sauoy pretended to bee due vnto him aboue all others. They likewiſe for their parts, promiſed to furniſh fixe thouſand men to ſerue the King continually, for foure Germane Florins & a halfe a moneth, a number which conti- nued alwayes vnto the death of Lewis. The Suiſſes are now vnder the Kings pay, and ſo the Bourguignons partie much weakened, who aſſemble the Nobility of the Country to- gether, vnder the Prince of Orange, and defeat the companies of Salezard and Coming- hen neere vnto Grey. But Amboiſe (being fortified with men and artillery) takes Verdun, Montſauion, Semeur in Lauxois, Chaſſillon vpon Seine, Bar vpon Seine, Beaulne, and Rochfort neere vnto Dole, belonging vnto Faudray. Thus hauing freed all the ap- proaches to Dole, hee camps before it, batters it, makes a breach, giues an aſſault, and takes it. Some troopes of the townes laſt ſubdued thruſt themſelues into it, either to warrant it from ſpoil, or to haue a better ſhare, but there enters ſuch a multitude of Frank- archers, as it was impoſſible to ſaue it from ſacke and fire. Yet the King repaired the ruines about the walles, building a great part of the wall towards the riuier of Doux, with a great trench, whereby a great part of the ſaid riuier did run forth, inuironing that part of the wall: but this is nothing, in regard of the fortifications which haue bene ſince built, whereby it exceeds moſt of the Cities of Chriſtendome, being famous at this day, in Se- nate, Vniuerſity and Armes.

Auxonne deſerued along & ſharp ſiege, but the wiſdome of Amboiſe preuailed ſo wel after the ſiege of Dole, that (giuing the chiefe offices of the towne, to ſuch as demanded them)

A them) it was yeelded within fixe or fixe daies, and likewiſe the Caſtles of Ion, Saint Agnes vpon Salins, Champaignole, Arguel, and ſome others built vpon rocks. Be aſon, an Imperial towne, yeelded to the King (by his Lieutenant generally) the like duties as they were accuſtomed to doe the Earle of Bourgogne. Thus Bourgogne being conquered, remained ſome time in the Kings quiet poſſeſſion. A young horſe hath need of a gentle hand, to make him taſte the bit with delight. But Verdun and Beaulne not able to endure the command of the French, began firſt to kicke, yet by the Governours diſcretion, they were ſpeedily ſubdued and recovered from Simon of Quiney, who led a troope of fixe hundred men of foot and horſe, Germanes and others. tumultuouſly aſſembled in Ferrette B and thereabouts, to put into the aboue named places. Verdun was taken by aſſault, and ſubiect to the accuſtomed inſolencies in the like priſes. Beaulne yeelded by compoſition, in the beginning of Iuly, with liues and goods ſaued, and for a ſine they payed forty thou- ſand crownes. Theſe ſudden exploits did ſo terrifie the other townes, as all kept them- ſelues within their due obedience.

But how doth Edward King of England looke vpon this Theater, where our men play the petty Kings? And how doth he ſuffer the King without any oppoſition, to enlarge his eſtate by the taking of Arras, Boulongne, Hedin, and ſo many other Townes, and to be lodged many daies before S. Omer? In truth our Lewis had a quicke conceit, and very watchfull. He knew well that the Engliſh in general, were wonderfully inclined to war a- gainſt this Realme, as well vnder colour of their ancient pretenſions, as for the hope of gaine, inticed by many high deeds of armes, wherein they haue often had the aduantage, and of that long poſſeſſion both in Normandy and Guienne; where they had command- ed three hundred and fifty yeares, vntill that Charles the ſeuenth diſpoſſeſſed them. That this baite might well perſwade them to croſſe his deſignes: theſe two mighty Princes neighbours, cannot ſee (without iealouſie) the one to grow great by new conqueſts, and the other to be at quiet. He therefore entertaines Edward with ſundry Ambaſſages, pre- ſents, and goodly ſpeeches: cauſeth the penſion of fifty thouſand crownes, to be duly payed at London, and ſome ſixteene thouſand diſtributed among ſuch as were in credit about him: ſo as the profit they drew from the iudicious bounty of Lewis, tyed their D tongues, and blinded their eyes. Money was mucke to him in regard of a man of ſeruiſe, and he was pleaſed to vaunt, that the great Chamberlaine (whereof there is but one in England) the Chancellour, Admirall, Maſter of the horſe, and other great Officers of England, were his Penſioners. So hee gaue vnto Howard four and twenty thouſand crownes in money and plate, beſides his penſion, in leſſe then two yeares: and to Ha- ſtings great Chamberlaine, a thouſand markes of ſiluer in plate at one time, as appears by their quitrances, in the chamber of accompts at Paris.

The politicks liberality of Lewis.

Lewis had great need to vie this policy and bounty, for this young Princeſſe did infinit- ly preſſe Edward, who for her cauſe did often ſend to the king to demand a peace, or at the leaſt a truce; and in the Court of England, there wanted not ſome to incenſe Edward, that E ſeeing the term was expired, by the which Lewis ſhould ſend for the Infanta of England, (whom they called Madam the Dauphine) he would deceiue him. Yet no reſpect, neither private nor publike, could moue Edward: hee was purſue, louing his pleaſures, vnable to ſuffer paine, glorious of nine famous victories, and fraught with home-bred enemies: and aboue all, the loue of fifty thouſand crownes (ſo well payed in his Tower of London) kept him at home. Moreouer, the Ambaſſadors that came from him, returned laden with rich preſents, and alwayes with irrefoluate anſwers, to win time, promiſing ſpeedily to re- ſolue the points of their demands, to their maſters ſatisfaction.

The diſpoſition of Edward King of England.

But let vs obſerue another ingenious policy: Lewis neuer ſent one Ambaſſadour twice vnto Edward, to the end, that if the former had happily treated of any thing that tooke not effect, the latter knew not what to anſwer, and ſo ignorance ſerued him for an excuſe with delay of time. Moreouer, he inſtructed his Ambaſſadors ſo well, as the aſſurance of the mariage they gaue to the King and Queene of England (the accompliſhment whereof they both greatly deſired) made them take hope for payment. Yet the King had neuer any ſuch meaning: there was too great an inequality of age: and thus getting a moneth or two by mutuall Ambaſſages, he kept his enemy from doing him any harme, who (without the bait of this mariage) would neuer haue ſuffered the houſe of Bourgogne to be ſo oppreſſed. Another reaſon diſſwaded Edward from embracing of Maries quarrell.

She

The reason why Edward neglected Arras
in Bourgongne

She had refused to marry with the Lord Rivers, brother to the Queene of England. The which match was not equall, he being but a poore Baron, and the the greatest heire of her time. And the better to keepe Edward quiet, the King inuited him to ioyne with him, and comforted that he should haue for his part the Prouinces of Flanders and Brabant, offering him to conquer for him, at his owne charge, foure of the greatest townes in Brabant, to entertaine him ten thousand English men for foure monthes, and to furnish him with artillery and carriages, so as Edward would come in person, and seize vpon Flanders, whilist that he employed his forces elsewhere. But Edward found that Flanders and Brabant were hard to conquer, and painfull to keepe: and also the English, by reason of the commodity of their traffike, had no will to this warre. Yet (said hee) since it pleaseth you to make me partaker of your victories, giue mee of those places you haue conquered in Picardy, Boulougne, and some others: then will I declare my selfe for you, and assist you with men at your charge. A wife and discreet demand: but those places were no lesse conuenient for Lewis, who was loth to beat the bush, for another to get the birds.

It appeares, that Edward did wonderfully affect the alliance of France, and feared to grieve the King any occasion to intinge it, so as (some say) he caused his brother the duke of Clarence to be put in prison, vpon colour that he would passe the seas, to succour the Duke of Bourgongne: for the which crime, he was condemned to haue his head cut off, and his body to be quartered, a punishment inflicted vpon traitors in England. But as the memory of this mother, Edward did moderate this sentence, and gaue him the choice of what death he would, whereupon he was drowned in a Pipe of Malmesey. But this Duke was sometime in law to the Earle of Warwicke, whom Edward had slain in battell, as we haue said: and it seemes the greatest crime they could obiect against him, was the priuie hatred which supers commonly beare to those who they doubt might but crosse their tyrannicall vspurations. But as we haue recreated our selues beyond the Sea: let vs now passe the Alpes, and see what is done there, suffering our warriours to enioy a truce vntill the next year. There were at that time two mighty families in Florence, the one of Medicis, the other of Papis. These were supported by Pope Sixtus the fourth, & by Ferdinando King of Naples, to overthrow the absolute government of the City: they attempt to murder Lan- renco de Medici, and all his followers, and gaue for watch word to the murderers, when as the Priests celebrating the high Masse, should say, sanctus in the Church of S. Repare, where they should assist at a certaine day.

Lan- renco escaped, but being maimed of many of his members, hee saved himselfe in the Vestry. Julian his brother was slaine and foure of their followers. Then ranne they to the Palace to murder all those which had the government of the City, but being mounted, they see that some of their men had abandoned them, so as they were not about foure or five, and which was worse, the gates were shut vpon them. The senators (seeing these rascals thus banded) put their heads out at their windows, they see this tumult, and heare James Papis and others crying Liberta, Liberta, and Popolo, Popolo, (words to moue the people, and to make them follow their faction) but they moued not: so as Papis and his companions fled from the place, and those that were entred were presently hanged at the bars of the Palace windows. Francis Saluati Arch bishop of Pisa, hauing laid Masse with a cuirasse on his backe, was taken and hanged in the same habit. The Gouernors seeing the whole Towne to stand firme for them and the Medicis, they send presently to all the passages, to apprehend a lynch as should be found flying. James and Francis Papis were presently taken, with another Captaine of the Popes troops vnder the Earle Ieronimo, and hanged instantly, with other great personages to the number of fouretene: some grooms and other base people, were knockt down in the streets. Nicholas Cardinal of S. George, nephew to the Earle was a long time prisoner.

The King aduertised of this hurly-burly, sends the Lord of Argenton, both to take (in his Maties name) the homage which Bonne Duchesse of Milan, ought for the Duchy of Venoua, in the behalfe of the young Duke Iohn Galeas her sonne, and to receiue the men at armes, which they had granted in fauour of the Medicis. The Pope aduertised of the execution done at Florence, doth excommunicate the Citizens, and with the same breach commands his army to march, and to ioyne with that of Naples, being great and faire it was commanded (for the Pope) by the Duke of Vrbino, Robert of Rimini, Constantine of Picardy, and many others: and for Ferdinando, by his two sonnes, the one Duke of

- A Calabria, the other Don Fredericke. They take many places about Florence, and almost ruine the whole State. There were few Commanders, of small experience, and weak forces. The Kings assistance did somewhat comfort them, being after much warre abolished and reconciled to the Church. As also to terrifie Pope, Lewis had called a Council of the French Church at Orleans for the restoring of the pragmatick Sanctio in France, and to abolish the custome to cary money to Rome for the obtaining of Bulls: yet the Assembly brake off without any conclusion, and was referred to Lions the next year, but without effect. Thus passe the affaires of this world, but many doe oppress him at the length. Our Lewis hath in a manner ouerliued all his greatest enemies, and now hee begins to decline. Troubles, care and waywardnesse, call him mildly to his graue: the vigor of his spirits faile him, and hereafter we shall see a strange alteration in his humors. The truce ends, and seeing wee must returne to warre, let vs beginne it by some notable stratagem. The Arch-duke Maximilian hath now the Flemings hearts at his deuotion. To employ them, hee camps before Therouenne, with about twenty thousand Flemings, some Germane troopes, and three hundred English, led by Thomas Abercrombie an English Captaine. The Lord of Cordes Lieutenant Generall for the King in Picardy, assembles what troopes he can, out of the neighbour garisons, eight thousand francke archers, eleven hundred men at armes, and makes haste to releuee it. Maximilian vnderstanding of their approach, raiseth the siege, marcheth towards them, and affronts them at Guinegast. Des Cordes was the stronger in horse, but the weaker in foot. The forwards ioyne without any slay, the Arch-dukes (being led by Rauelein) doth not maintaine the fight, but is soone broken and chased euen vnto Aice by Cordes and Torci. The foot stand firme, supported by the Arch-duke himselfe, the Lord of Rhomont, the Earle of Nassau, and two hundred Gentlemen al on foot: the franck archers of the French, supposing that these footmen would flie with the foreward, fall vpon the baggage. The Duke doth charge them, forcing them to leaue their booty and fall to armes. The slaughter was great, but most of the enemies. Eleuen thousand Bourgougnons were slaine, faith the History, and nine hundred prisoners, amongst the which was a Germane Earle, & the King of Polands sonne: of the French there died foure thousand, and the small number of the Kings army, made the enemy continue master of the field, who gathering together the remainders of his troopes, tooke the Castle of Malainoy by assault, where Captaine Remonet (notwithstanding the faith which was giuen him when he yelded) was hanged. For satisfaction hereof, fifty of the aboue-named prisoners, were hanged by ten in a place, ten where as Remonet was executed, ten before Douay, ten before Saint Omer, ten before Arras, and ten before Lille. Des Cordes did runne rashly to this battell and without the Kings commandement: who was somewhat amazed with the first news, thinking they had concealed the truth, and that it was quite lost for him. If it be so (said hee) farewell all my latter conquests: he was not accustomed to lose, but alwaies very happy, being loth to hazard much in fight. But if any Captaine had meanes to tell him a good place, hee was a liberall purchaser at what price soeuer: but the seller must afterwards take heede of his Gossp the Hermit the Controuler of his house.

This blaine made Lewis resolute to treat a peace with Maximilian, so as it might bee profitable vnto him; and that he might thereby curbe the Arch-duke, and by the helpe of his owne subjects, so as afterwards he should haue no meanes to annoy him. For this effect the King seeks to the Gantois, that by their mediation, a marriage might be made between Charles the Daulphine, and the daughter of the said Arch-duke, vpon condition to leaue the Counties of Bourgongne, Auxerre, Mafcon, and Charolois, and to quit him Arthois, referring Arras in the estate hee had letted it, the City commanding the Towne, the which hereafter should bee held of the Crowne by the Bishop. As for the Duchie of Bourgongne, the Earldome of Boulogne, the Townes lying vpon Somme, and other places in Picardy there was no mention. The Gantois (and by their solliciting, those of Bruges with some other chiefe Townes of Flanders and Brabant, who desired rather to suppress, then to fortifie their new Lord) gaue eare to this transaction, ill increasing Maximilian and his wife all they could, being loth to submit themselves to his command: first, for that he was a stranger: secondly, for that they knew more iudicious Princes, but not any more couetous then his father, whose sonne was seasoned with the same base couetousnesse, which caries with it great contempt. treating ended with a truce, attending the conclusion of a generall peace. In the meane A time our Lewis applies himselfe to order his Reialme, to reforme Iustice, and the Court of Parliament (especially for the tediousnesse of suites) one of the principall points for the which he hated it) but without any diminution of the number of his officers, nor of their authority. Moreover, he desired to bring into all the Countreies of his obedience, one custome, one waight, and one measure, to suppress those horse-leeches the practitioners, and the Merchants fraud. He had wonderfully oppressed his people, yea wittingly: and neither admonitions nor supplications could procure any reliefe: the moum must come from himselfe, he is now wholly addicted therunto, but sometime a burning feuer tending to fury, sometimes a cold palsey, sometimes the trouble of the Rheumoids, sometimes his speech sayling, sometimes some other fits or distemperatures of mind ediuert him from his good humor. To teach vs, neuer to deserre that vnwill to morrow, which we may presently performe: for wee ought to feare, that God will not giue vs the will and meane to doe well, when we haue once neglected it. All these ordinary infirmities made him froward and vnpleasing to his household seruants, causing him to take their seruices well meant in euill part. And being one day at Forges neere vnto Chinon, about dinner-time, troubled with his ordinary fits, as hee would haue drawne towards the windowes, they hindred him: vpon his first recovery, hee chafed away all those that had by force stayed his approach to the windowes: neither would hee euer admit them to his presence, holding themselves happy to enioy their offices. His iudge C ment being troubled, it made him thinke, that this manner of proceeding did derogate from his authority, which he sought to maintaine about all things, neither would hee be disobeyed in any thing, doubting lest in the end they should controll him in the government of his affaires, as distract of his wits. Vpon his amendment after any infirmity, hee would still know what expectations and dispatches they had made. Hee tooke the letters, and made shew to reade them, although he had no knowledge, or very little. Yet must they please him in all things, being dangerous to offend him. This first fit continued about fifteene dayes, at the end whereof hee recovered both speech and iudgement. He fers the Cardinal of Baluc aliberty, (a prisoner since the year 1468.) at the request and pursuite of Cardinal Saint Peter ad Vincula, Legate in France, being sent to mediate a peace betwixt Lewis and Maximilian, and to sollicite them to succor the Christians oppressed vnder the Turkes persecutions, whom the King satisfied with hope and good words.

Cardinal Baluc
is set at liberty

But being come to Peronne, and hauing giuen Maximilian and the Flemings intelligence of his arrival, they would not admit him, and so his voyage proved fruitlesse. Neither admonitions nor requests could euer moue the King to deliuer Baluc, & now a scruple drawes him to it, seeking an absolution for that hee had detained him so long in prison. And as he feels his strength and senses to decay, so jealousie and distrust (very incident vnto him) increased daily, and apprehending death, hee feared lest his owne subjects should hasten it by some new practices. In this perturbation, hee remembers that John Duke of Bourbon had followed the D. of Guienne in the warre of the Common-weale: and that he might ioyne with the Duke of Britany, to raise vp new troubles, and so shorten his dayes. He appoints certaine Commissioners ill-affected to the house of Bourbon, who not able directly to touch the Dukes person, they summon his Chancellor, his Attorney Generall, the Capraine of his Guards, and other principall Officers, to appeare in person, before the Court of Parliament at Paris. Being examined and heard, and finding nothing wherewith to charge them, they were freed, and death did follow after free the said Duke from the feare he had conceived of the Kings hatred. Hee had imitated the Duke of Bourgonnes army, and by the aduice of des Cordes his Lieutenant generall in Picardy had newly imposed fifteene hundred thousand Frankes, for the maintenance of ten thousand foot: whereof the sixe thousand Swisses before mentioned were a part: two thousand five hundred pions, and fifteene hundred men at Armes of his ordinary, to fight on foot when as need should require, causing a great number of carts to be made to inclose them, and tents to campe in, and therefore hee called them soldiers of the campe. And for that they complained that the franke-archers did greatly oppress the poore people, he did cassier all their companies. When this new campe was ready, he went to see it ranged in battell in a valley neere to Pont de Larche in Normandy,

A vnder the command of his Lieutenant Generall, causing them to lie in campe a whole moneth together, to the end hee might see what quantity of victuals were necessary for them: and then he returned into Touraine. Being at Tours, behold a relapse, which he feared greatly. Hee loseth his speech, they hold him for dead, hee remains two houres couched on a pallet in a gallery. Being somewhat recovered, seeking to diuert his distease, and to reuiue his spirits by the change of ayre, hee went to Argenton, and then returned to Tours, but still languishing of his discale forrelling death. Then hee vnderooke the journey of Saint Claude, which many Gentlemen had vowed being present at his fall. Vpon his returne, newes comes of the death of Mary of Bourgonne, B who going a hunting mounted vpon a stirring hobbeys, was cast, and after dyed of a quindian, hauing had by Maximilian, Philip Arch-duke, Marguerit afterwards Queene of France, and Francis that dyed yong. A vertuous Princes, liberrall, respected and beloued of all her subjects.

This death was wonderfull pleasing vnto our Lewis, in the midst of his afflictions, who not dreaming that he had one foot in the graue, thinks now to doe his businesse the better: for (sayd he) the Emperour is miserabill beloued and of small credit in Germany: Maximilian yong and of small experience, and ill beloued of his subjects: and moreover, the pupils are in the Gantois keeping, a people inclined to mutiny against the house of Bourgonne. Yet he repined much at the secret intelligences the Duke of Britany had with the English: and now a new subject thrusts him on to this enterprize, the which doubtlesse he had vndergone, if his health would haue suffered him. Francis Duke of Britany, vnderstanding that they made excellent armes at Milan, sent to buy a great number, and (to the end they should not be discovered by the noyie, and breed a new suspition in the King, if hee heard thereof) he cauled them to bee trussed vp in packes of silke, with cotton. These armes passing vpon moyles through Auuergne, Doyac Gouvernour of the Country had some intelligence, and aduertisheth the King thereof, who declares them forfeited to the benefit of Doyac.

This buying of armes, made Lewis to gape, more then euer, after Britany, but he defers the execution, to practice the Gouernors of Gand by the Lord of Cordes, and treats the marriage of the Dauphin his sonne, with Marguerite the daughter of Maximilian and Mary lately deceased. The late surprize of Aire by Cordes, amazed the Flemings and Brabanders, and made them willing to seeke an agreement with the King. To this end, Maximilian and they together send a great Ambassage to Arras, managed for the Arch-duke, by the Lords of Bergues and Launoy, with some Secretaries: and for the Commonalties by the Abbots of Saint Bertin and Saint Peter of Gand. The King appoints his Lieutenant generall in Picardy to heare them, with La Vaquerie, lately created first President of the Parliament of Paris, and other graue personages. A peace is concluded by meanes of the said marriage, in fauour whereof, they giue (as a portion to the said Marguerit) the Countiees of Arthois and Bourgonne, the lands and Seigneuries of Malconois, Auxerrois, Charolois, Salins, Bar, Sens and Noyon, to enioy them euer or euer. And in case that young Philip Earle of Flanders should die, Marguerit should succeed him in all the Lordships that belonged to her deceased mother, the Ioueraignty of Flanders remaining to the King. By meanes hereof, the Arctellians (that had bin confined) returned to Arras, and the city recovered her ancient name.

Thus Marguerite was conducted into France by the Lady of Rauestein, the bastard daughter of Philip duke of Bourgonne, and receiued by the duke and Duchesse of Bourbon, who led her to Amboise, the place of the Dauphins aboad, where the marriage was solemnly celebrated. Edward was wonderfully incensed at this marriage, seeing himselfe deprived of his pension, and fearing lest this disgrace should breed him great contempt, yea a rebellion of his subjects, seeing the effects of that which he would not beleue. Moreover, hee did finde, the King had newly planted strong defenses betwixt them two, and his conquests did stretch very neere vnto him. Hee conceived to great a grieue vpon all these considerations, as soone after he died, partly for sorrow, and partly of an Apoplexy. Soone after the death of Edward, Lewis receiues letters from the Duke of Glocester, who (by the murder of his two nephewes the sonnes of Edward, his brother) had usurped the Crowne of England, and was called Richard. This Richard fought the Kings friendship, but Lewis abhorring so barbarous a cruelty, would not vouchsafe to answer his letters, nor to heare his message. But he enjoyed not A long this tyrannous usurpation. God raised up that Earle of Richmond (whom we haue seene to long prisoner in Britany) who with some little money from the King, and three thousand men leauied in the Duchy of Normandy, passed into Walles, and ioyned with his father in law the Lord Stanley, with fixe and twenty thousand English, with which forces he encountered Richard, fought with him, and slew him in the field, and then was crowned King of England. At the same time, William of March, brother to him whom they commonly called the Boare of Ardenne, (to install his sonne in the Bishopricke of Liege,) leauies a great number of foot and horse, and besiege Lewis, brother to the Duke of Bourbon, being Bishop there. The Bishop craues succours from the Archduke of Austria and the Prince of Orange his brother in law, who notable to come in time, and prest by some secret partisans of La Marche, hee goes forth in armes to fight with his enemy, and was slaine: whereby La Marche entred into Liege, but soone after he was surprized by the Lord of Montaigny, ayded with some troopes from the Archduke, and suddenly beleached.

Our Lewis is now well satisfied touching the affaires of Flanders: there remained nothing but a reuenge of Britany. But oh! how doth suspicion, feare, distrust, and finally death, breake off his great desires? he is now at Plessis neere Tours, priuate, solitary, and shewing himselfe to few. Hee leaues a decay of his estate, and yet is become vnable to gurne a great estate. The opening of a doore feares him; his owne shadow amazeth him, C death terrifies him, but (the worst is) his conscience troubles him. He puts his most trusty seruants from him, he doubts his neere kinmen, hee abhorres them he suspects, and suspects all the world. The few whom hee doubts most, hee distrusteth, with a couple of his Guard to guide them; peniue, sad; dreaming; froward; peeuish and cholericke: every thing displeaseth him, all is vncomfortable, all offends him; hee knows not what is fittest for him, either life or death, and yet he would lue and reigne. He knows that he hath many enemies, and hath offended many, that the greatest of the Princes lue him not; that the meaneer folk murmured, and that the people hated him: for hee hath ouercharged them, yea more then any of his predecessors; and hath not means to ease them; and although he had a will, yet it is now too late.

Oh what a grievous testimony is the conscience of our misdeeds! Few enter at Plessis, but his household seruants, and the Archers of his Guard, whereof there are foure hundred daily in guard at the gate. No Nobleman lodgeth there, none come there but his son in law Peter (afterwards Duke of Bourbon, by the death of Iohn his brother) and few of his followers: and yet hee thinketh still, that some one enters to offer violence to his person: or that by loue or force they will pull his scepter from him. Hee causeth his sonnet to be straightly guarded, and will not suffer many to see him, lest he should bee made the head of a faction. His daughter hath no access to him: his sonne in law no credit. His son in law returns from the Dauphins marriage: Lewis with a deuice, makes the Capraine of his Guard to search such as are entred with the Duke, to see if they were not secretly armed. He commands him to hold the Councell, then hee disolues it: for in his absence they would make Monopolies. Who did euer see a minde more distrust, more vnquiet, and fuller of cares? He distrusts his sonne, his daughter, his sonne in law, and generally all those that may command.

The Castle gate is safely guarded; but they may leape ouer the walles, they must bee planted with gaddes of iron, with many points, and so thick as no man might passe them: and moreover, the ditch at Plessis, compassed in with great barres, with foure engines of iron at the corners: Canoniers, and forty Crosse-bow men were appointed to stand, ten a day and night Centinell in the ditch, with commission to shoot at any one that should approach in the night, vntill the opening of the gate in the morning. Doubtlesse, the iustice of God would that those cages of iron, and those of wood couered with plates of iron both within and without, those shackles, bolts, manacles, chaines tied to a great bowle, waightry beyond humane force: where he had oftentimes imprisoned many, (yea and of honour,) for very trifolous causes, should now be to many tortures to his conscience, at the last point of his death: and as he had giuen them eight foot in bredth, and it may bee so much in height, to stretch out themselves, so he now retires himselfe into a little corner of the Castle, and like another Perillus, they were tarall to their first deuiler. A of Verdun remained foureteeene yeares shut vp in the first that was made. To conclude, no dispatch came to Court, during this lamentable estate. The King had but one or two about him, men of no credit, who knew well, that after his death, the best that could chance vnto them, was to be shamefully chased away. But a great confusion attends them shortly. These men made no report vnto him of any thing that hapned, but only that which concerned the Estate and the Realme, labouring to maintaine loue with all men. As for his person, every day a new groomer of his Chamber, every day new seruants. Yet knowes he not whom to trust. One onely amongst the rest gets some credit, but forced. It is his Physician, James Cottier a Bourguignon: hee giues him ten thousand crowns monthly, and B what Offices, or what lands he will demand, be it for himselfe, or his friends: and for a nephew of his the Bishopricke of Amiens; and (as a man would say) his Crowne and his scepter, so as he will prolong his life. An odious, impudent, and audacious Physician: who to continue his credit, said vnto the King. I know well that one of these mornings, you will send me away with the rest, but (swearing a great oath) you shall not lue eight dayes after. A strange heart-breaking, to be braued by a rascall, whereas so many great Princes did yield him voluntary obedience. But oh vanity, to thinke that the deuice of man can adde one minute to mans life! Lewis had neede to haue bene put in minde of this Oracle, I haue said you are Gods, and all the children of the Lord, but you shall die like men; and you that are Princes shall fall like other men.

C At that time lued Francis borne at Paul in Calabria, a deuout Hermit, without learning, but of an austere life, and holy reputation, founder of the Friars Minimes. The King sent for him by a Steward of his house, in the compay of the Prince of Tarentum, son to the King of Naples: at the first sight hee kneeles vnto him, and desires him to prolong his dayes, in truth, we haue often zeale, but not according to knowledge. But, Put no confidence in the chiefe of the people, nor in any of the founes of man, who haue no power to deliuer thee. O how happy is hee, whom the mighty God of Iacob helpes, and whose trust is in the Eternal! In the meane time, Lewis declines, and death follows him at the heeles: yet will hee not haue men to thinke so, and omits no inuention to diuert this opinion, both within and without the Realme. Within, hee attires himselfe richly, contrary to his custome, and D shewes himselfe, but onely in his Court, and gallery: hee makes seuerall lawes to be feared: sends away officers, dischargeth men at armes, cuts off pensions, & takes some quite away. To conclude, he passeth his time, to make and marre men. Without the Realme, he payes that duty in England which he owes, and all other places, where hee will haue them thinke that he is found and alie: he sends men vnder colour to buy something: Into Spaine, Naples, and Germany for some horses; in Sicilie, some good Mules, but especially of some good officer of the Country, and payed double for them. In Britany, Gray-hounds, and Spaniels. In the Kingdome of Valence, little Water-dogges. In Denmarke and Sweden, Hawkes. In Barbary, little Lions, of the bignesse of Foxes. To conclude, the more he feared the decay of his dignity toward his latter end, the more hee fought to be feared, and E takes away all occasions to thinke that his end approached. Feeling his end draw neere, he sent for the Dauphin his sonne, whom he had not seene in many yeares, causing him to be nourished apart, lest the colour of his presence should haue bred some faction, as there had rashly risen in his young age against Charles the seuenth his Father. And experience hauing taught him, how dangerous a sodaine alteration was; he commanded him expressly not to displace any Officer, and especially to maintaine Oliuer le Dain in the Offices and goods hee had gotten in his seruice, as hauing assisted him well in his sicknesse: (but as this man was hastily and too highly exalted, so must he and some others of like sort bee shortly suppress.) and Iohn Dayac, gouernor of Auvergne, from whom hee had received good and notable seruices, to call master Guyot Pot, and the Lord of Bouchage to Councell, and to follow Philippe of Cordes for armes: Not to beleene his mother, especially in the gouernment of his State, who (as a Sauoisien) hee had found by experience, to fauour the Bourguignon: and generally, to confirme all those in their dignities, whom hee had aduanced: And to ease the people, whom hee had oppressed by the necessitie of the warres. Few dayes after the King had spoken to the Dauphin his sonne, his ordinary infirmity takes him, and he suddenly lost his speech, with a great debility of his forces. Hauing recovered (iudging himselfe but a dead man) he sent the Duke of Bourbon to King his sonne (so then he called him) giuing him the charge and gouernment of his said sonne,

Then he sent the Chancelor with the seale, and part of the archers of his guard, and A Captaines, all his hounds, hawkes, and other things, and all such as came to see him, he sent them to Amboise. Yet was he not so well reioiced for his death, but hee had some hope to escape, namely by the means of his Hermit, and a multitude of reliques which were brought from Rheims, from Paris, and from Rome, the holy oyle, the rods of Moses and Aaron, the holy Crosse (were it true or false) and such like, untill the Diuines had taken counsell to let him vnderstand, that hee deceived himselfe, and that his only hope must consist in the mercy of God. A hard sentence to a man that had so often commanded, that euen in the last pangs they should pronounce that cruel word of death, the which he feared beyond the condition of man, and preuented by all the remedies that might be inuented. Yet behold he disposed himselfe; I haue (said he) hope that God will helpe mee: but withall he added: yet happily I am not so sicke as you suppose. Notwithstanding, he felt the helpe of heaven, for his speech was restored, his vnderstanding good, his memory perfect, whereby he pronounced many prayers, adding thereunto, by his last Will and Testament: That de Cordes should giue out the enterprise they had concluded vpon Calais: that they should suffer the Duke of Britany to liue in peace, without feare or suspight, and likewise all the neighbours of the Realme: that vnder the fauour of a peace of five or six yeares, the people might breathe, and the King his sonne grow in age. Finally, on Saturday the thirtieth of August, hee yeelds vp his soule quiet to God, hauing liued threecore yeares and one, and reigned three and twenty: he made choice for his buriall at our Lady of Clergy the place of his deuotion.

A cunning Prince, wise, painfull, reuengefull, vigilant, industrious, of a great memory, neuer hazarding that, which by policy, dissembling, money, or any other industry he might obtaine: vnquiet in his raigne, vnquiet in his life, and vnquiet in his death, not able to folue but in extremities: Deuout, but inclining to superstition. A great oppressor of the people, but to giue to Churches, to foraine pensioners, and to purchase them deadly whom he had found fit for his purpose, as we may easily perceiue by the discourse of his life. He was continent beyond the ordinary of great and generous Princes: and in truth greatly to be commended, in that he had so virtuously contained himselfe within the bounds of his professed vowe, and neuer to haue knowne other women than his own wife. And if the 61 yeare, (the which he alwayes apprehended as the fatal period of his life, for that none of his predecessors since Hugh Capet, had passed that terme) had not ended his life, he had reformed the State, ordred iustice, & releued the people. Happy in his death, hauing changed a continuall toile, into an eternall rest: happy in that rest (which we hope for in heauen) to haue left a Successor quiet of himselfe, young, but of great hope, and chiefly, for that he had seen the Church, during his raigne, freed from that long and inuenerate three and twentieth Schisme, which had so long turmoyled it. We haue seen, that by the renunciation of Felix the fifth, Nicholas the fifth of that name, remained in quiet possession of the Pontificall Sea. The most memorable acts of his Papacie, were the great Iubile, which he did celebrate in the yeare 1450, where there was fo great a concourse of people, that about two hundred were smothered, going and coming out of the Churches, besides an infinite number of people that perished in the riuer of Tyber, through the fall of the bridge of Saint Angelo. This Pope loued learning, he gaue great pensions to learned men, sent them into diuers places, to seeke out bookes which lay hidden in darknesse, by the negligence of the ancient, or perished by the violence of the barbarous, filling his Library at Vatican, he caused many Greeke Authors to be translated into Latine. He repaired many Churches and other buildings ruined at Rome, enriching them with vessels of gold and siluer, and crossees beautified with precious stones. Finally (grieved for the taking of Constantinople from the Christians, the dyed of thought, a Feuer, and the Gout, or as some will say, of poison, the 25 of March 1458. Calixtus the third of that name, a Spaniard, of the age of 85 yeares, before called Alphonso Borghia, Bishop of Valence, and Cardinal of the foure Crownes, succeeded by the consent of the whole Colledge: commended, for that in the first fruits of his Popedom, he had (according to a vow he had made) proclaimed a warre against Mahomet. And to sit

A vp Princes, he sent some notable Preachers in those dayes, as John Capistran, and Robert de la Lize, Friars, to exhort Christians to releue their brethren, detained vnder the Turkes tyranny, and by ringing of the bell at noone-day, to inuite them to pray for those that fought for this quarrell: yet blamed, for that vnder colour of his Indulgences and pardons, which were sold for five Ducats a peece, he had gathered together, and left to his successors, a hundred and fiftene thousand Ducats.

He died in July 1458, Pius the second called Anus Silvius, a Siennois, a poore boy, hauing attained to much knowlege, by his laborious study, obtained the dignitie of Pope. He had bene the Popes Secretary, at the Councell of Basil, and by writing had impugned the authority of Eugenius the Schismaticke: and soone after was crowned Poet laureat, by the Emperor Frederick the third, and honoured by him with many Ambassages to diuers Princes. Nicholas the fifth made him Bishop of Triest, and after of Sienna, and Calixtus, Cardinall. But vpon his entry to the Popedom, he fought to suppress two bookes, which hee had published for the approbation of the Councell of Basil, and afterward laboured very ambitiously to enlarge the Roman Sea: for the increase and preservation whereof, the History saith, he neither feared Kings, nor Princes, people nor tyrants. A great enemy to King Lewis the eleuenth, whilst that he would not yeeld to the abolition of that pragmaticke sanction: who to crosse him in that yeare 64, did forbid to cary any money to Rome, or to bring any buls from thence, renewing the same Edicts in the yeare 1478. But in the end he was so flattered by this Anus, and by his successor Sixtus the fourth, as hee renounced all the rights of the pragmaticke sanction. Hee had likewise proclaimed a voyage into Turkey, by a Councell assembled at Mantua. But the Ambassadors of King Lewis and of René Duke of Aniou, hauing laid open the rights which the house of Aniou had to the Realme of Naples, and the wrong was done him, vsurping it to the behoofe of Alphonso the bastard of Ferdinand, whom this Pope had by his absolute authoritie put in the possession of the Realme; he grew so bitter against the French for Ferdinand, as the said Ambassadors would not promise any thing, in their masters name, for this warre: so as the assembly was dissolued, the eight month, without any good to Christendome. An Ambitious man, austere to Princes, a great persecutor of the enemies of the Clergy, D courteous and officious to his friends, bulie for the enriching of the Church, a great builder. And finally, as he was ready to depart from Ancona, to march in person against the Turke, who was then entred Italy, a quotidian ague seized on him, whereof he dyed in the yeare 1464. Of him we reade thus much: as Platina and Sabellicus do report. Priests are forbidden to marry for a great reason, but yet there is a greater for the which they should bee suffered. And moreover, Peradventure, it should not be the worse, if many Priests were married, for many being Priests and married, should be saved, the which in their barren Calibat are damned. He likewise would haue abolished some Nunneries of Saint Brigit and Clare, and caused the Nunnes to come forth, to the end (saith Calixtus Secundus) that vnder the habits of religion they should not hide their adulteries.

by his predecessors, who did forbid Priests to marry: so as seeing himselfe a scoone to the people, he resolved to give Priests liberty to marry, but an Apoplexy tooke him suddenly out of this world, the 25 of July 1471, leaving a rich treasure. In truth, They gather goods (saith the Oracle) and know not who shall enjoy them. Some impute this sudden death to the Author of the Magicke art, the which he practised.

Sixtus the fourth, borne at Saoune, and named Francis of Ruere, General of the Grey-Fryars, and Cardinal of Saint Sixtus, Legat of Auignon, was installed by the Electors in the Colledge, in the Pontifical chaire. Liberal and charitable to his owne, beyond the bounds of true zeale: for in their fauour he gaue Indulgences and Pardons prodigally, and granted many other things against all right and reason: so saith the History. Amongst the rest, hee advanced Peter of Ruere, to a Cardinalship: a monstrous man in his expences, who in two moneths deuoured in vanities, dissolation and loosefesse, above two hundred thousand crownes, besides the debts wherewith he charged his heires. Hee repayed many decayed Churches and Monasteries, built new, and leane them great revenues. He restored the Abbutrics (which was a Colledge of learned men, and studious in diuine and humane lawes, Poets, Orators, Historians, &c.) first instituted by Pius the second, then abolished by Paul the second his successor. Then did he institute anewe Bullists, people fitter to get money, then for any other thing, and nine Notaries of the Apostolicke treasure, appointing them certaine revenues: which offices were sold in the beginning for five hundred crownes, and since for two or three thousand crownes: so well could they sell their merchandize. Sixtus made many vniuersal warres, against Ferdinand King of Naples, for that against the Popes liking, he had succoured his sonne in law Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrara, besieged by the Venetians: against the Venetians whom he did excommunicate: against the Florentines, excommunicated likewise with an interdiction of fire and water. But by the intercession and threats of the King, and the succour the Venetians gaue to the Florentines against the Pope (who had incensed Ferdinand King of Sicilia, Alphonso Duke of Calabria, and Frederick Duke of Vrbis, Captaine-general for the Church) to make warre against them, he absolved them. Then being sick of a Feuer, hauing newes that a peace was made betwixt the Venetians and other Potentates of Italy, he dyed suddenly. There flourished vnder him Iohn Regiomontanus, a great Mathematician, Rodolphus Agricola, Pomponius Latus, Ambrosius Calepin, learned men in humane Lett. Let it suffice to haue noted such Popes as haue reigned vnder our Lewis, and now let vs see that which concerns the Empire.

That great Iohn Huniades, a firme and found rampier for the Christians against the Turkes had left two sonnes, Ladislaus and Matthias. They had for an hereditary enemy Vhrke Earle of Sicilia, neer kinsman and a favorite to Ladislaus King of Hungary and Bohemia, sonne to Albert of Austria, borne after his fathers death. Ladislaus the eldest, complaining one day to Vhrke, of the slanders wherewith he wrongfully charged him to King Ladislaus, they passed from words to blowes, so as he slue Vhrke: for the which the King of Hungary caused him to be publicly beheaded, and lead Matthias the younger, prisoner to Prague in Bohemia, to puthim to death, farre from the view of the Nobility of Hungary, to whom the memory of Huniades was wonderful deere and precious. But as Ladislaus prepared for his marriage at Prague, to be sonne in Law to Charles the seventh, behold a blacke and deadly poison suddenly choakes vp the ioy which that new alliance had conceiued. After whole death there aride great quarrels for the succession. Some Noblemen of Hungary, withed the Emperor Frederick the third for their King: the greatest part preferred Matthias, both for that he was of the Nation, as for the happy memory of his father Iohn.

The election being made, Matthias is set at liberty by George Boiebrac, the new King of Bohemia: he demands the Crowne. Frederick armes himselfe with a constitution, which he had receiued from Elizabeth mother to Ladislaus deceased, when she sent him her son to bring vp. Vpon refusal, they goe to armes; but the Germane Princes pacified this quarrell, concluding, that Matthias should pay for his Crowne vnto the Emperor, foure score thousand Crownes. In the meane time there springs vp new seeds of warre in Germany. Pius the second (making the Emperor, and his deuotion to the Roman Seais support) puts Dietrick Isenburg, from the Archbishopsrick of Mentz, advancing Adolph Nassau in his place. Isenburg opposed himselfe vigorously against the Popes exactions, who

A spoiled (as he said) the Provinces, vnder a pretext of warre against the Turke: and moreover, he would not tie himselfe by oath vnto the Pope, who would likewise bind future Ecclesiasticall Electors, not to assemble the Electors of the Empire, for the election of any new Emperor, or for any other cause concerning the Empire, before he were duly informed, to the end his pleasure might be preferred before all others. An audacious and vniuersall demand. Frederick the victorious Conte Palentin of Rhine then administrator of the Electorship of his Nephew Philip, the sonne of Lewis his brother, being a pupill, stood firmly for Isenburg. Lewis Duke of Bawaria, furnished the rich, ioyes with Frederick. The Emperor hated them both, and desired much to crosse them (although in his heart he had reason to fauor that party, for the which they fought) but he feared the valor of Frederick and the wealth of Lewis.

The Pope vrgeth him to stirre vp some great Princes of Germany, to oppose against the protectors of Isenburg, rather then against Isenburg himselfe. Adolph of Nassau, was assisted by Albert Marquis of Brandebourg, Lewis of Bawaria, surnamed the black, Charles Marquis of Baden, and his brother, Iohn Bishop of Metz, with Elric Earle of Wurtemberg: all which enuied the prosperity of Frederick, and yet feared to try his valour. Frederick was the weaker in men, but right hath a strong party. They neglecting their enemies small forces, charge him disorderly: he resists them valiantly, beats them, cleares them, and puts them to flight, takes the Marquis of Baden, the Bishop of Metz, & the Earle of Wurtemberg prisoners, the first of July 1461, and to let them vnderstand that they had erred in the discipline of warre, spoiling the corne, and burning the Mills, hee caused them to tye the first night of their imprisonment without bread.

The end of this warre was the beginning of another, more fatall for the Emperor. The Pope deposed George Boiebrac from the Crowne of Bohemia, as fauouring the doctrine of Hus, and appoints Matthias, surnamed Cornutus, but the Emperor would not grant it, depending of the Empire. Matthias was much moued, and the more, when as after the death of George, the Lords of Bohemia, and the Emperor likewise, leauing him, made choice of Ladislaus the sonne of Casimir, King of Poland, and of Elizabeth, daughter to Albert of Austria. In this warre, the Imperiall Maiestie was not onely taken, but through Fredericks misfortune almost ruined, and he in a manner expelled out of all Austria, & reduced vnder the power of a strange Lord, mighty & warlike. When as behold Albert Duke of Saxony, sonne to Frederick the second Elector of Saxony, father to duke George and Henry, Grandfather to Maurice and Augustus Electors, leaues a goodly army at his owne charge, assailes Matthias, and so weakens him in many battels, as hee abandons the greatest part of Austria, and forceth him in the end to accept a peace with such conditions as Albert would impose. During these partialities in the West, God raised vp some meanes to crosse the Turkes exploits, if the diuisions of Christian Princes, for the most part procured by the Popes, whilest they fetled themselves, had not conquered their own forces against themselves. Three years after this pittifull wound which the Christian Church receiued by the losse of Constantinople, Mahomet the second, besieged Belgrade, but to his confusion. A handfull of men, lead by that braue Huniades, in two dayes together, gae him two bloody battels, winnes them, kills about forty thousand of his men, spoiles his Campe, takes his Artillery, and with some difficulty hee saued his person, being wounded in the left pap, and caried out of the fight as dead. Mahomet seeing by this disgrace, that the land did not fauour him; meanes to try another element: hee rigs a great fleet of Gallies, to leize vpon the Islands of the Archipelagus. But he had purchased a mighty enemy, Vsunchissan of the race of Asimbei a Turke, Lord of Cappadocia, Armenia, and some other Countries adioyning, who had lately slaine Metalaobire, or (as some write) Demir of Persia, and by that victory inuaded the Realme. Vsunchissan hauing disappointed the designs of Mahomet, grew so proud, that to make this victory the more famous, he drew rich presents out of the treasures of Persia, and sent them vnto Mahomet, requesting him not to attempt any thing against Trebisonde, nor Cappadocia (a Conquerors request imports an imperious command) Countries which belonged vnto him by reason of the dowry of his wife, the daughter of Danid Commene. Mahomet not able to digest that a meaner then himselfe should prescribe him a law, employes all his wit to obscure the glory of this new King. He therefore sends a part of his fleet into Asia, directly to Pontus and Sinope, towards Trebisonde. And he himselfe, with an incredible speed crosseth Asia, and camps neere to Vsumcassan. Three battels are fought: Vsumcassan wins the first against Amarath Bascha, a Greeke by Nation, neere to the riuer of Euphrates, which Bascha was slaine: and the second against Mahomet, where he was in prison. These two battels did wonderfully weaken the Turkes forces. In the third, the Persians amazed with the vnaccustomed noise of the Turkish shot, vnable to endure the terror of the harguebusse, Vsumcassan and his men oppressed with this new army, lost the honour of the two first dayes, and Zemald the sonne of Vsumcassan was slaine with a shot.

Mahomet pursues his good fortune, besiegeth and takes Sinope the Capitall City of the Prouince; and afterwards all Paphlagonia: then the campos before Trebifonde, batters it by Sea and Land, and in the end takes it; spoyle the treasures of King Dauid Commene: sends him prisoner with his two sonnes, and his cousin Iohn le Beau, to Constantinople, to serue for a shew, the day of his triumph, causing them afterwards to be barbarously slaine, rooting out the race of Commene. In the same voyage he tooke Silicia from Pirames Caman, and being returned to Constantinople, hee conquered with his army by sea, the Islands of Lemnos and Lesbos: he vnpeopled Mitilene, and transported the Inhabitants of the Island into another Country.

With his forces at land he assailed Dracula Prince of Valachia: who with such small forces of foot and horse, as the thornesse of time would suffer him to leauy, did so furprile and shut vp Mahomet, as both he and his army were in a manner ruined: when as behold Mahomet Bascha, Lieutenant General in the Turks army, with a braue and hardy resolution, opened the passage by force: but with great losse of his men, the which (fortified with new troopes), he sends into high Misia and Slaouonia: chased Stephen King of Bosnia, out of laize the chiefe City, dispossessed him of his Realme, and in the end lew him about the yeare 1463. A while after Matthias King of Hungary recouered the said Citee and Realme, ouerthrew a great army of Turks spoyling the Country of Sirme, took many places in Croatia and Dalmatia, and in the end expelled Mahomet, being come to besiege laize, spoyle his Campe, and was master of all his baggage. Scanderbeg (expelled his Country) was retired into Italy, where the wing that the diuision of Christian Princes was the means to confirme the Turks estate, and that it was impossible to make him giue over this audacious and insatiable desire, being at Lisse vpon the riuer of Drille, he was surprised with a Feuer, whereof he dyed, being three score and three yeares old, in the yeare of our Lord 1467.

A Prince exceeding all men in valour, of a wonderfull courage, so as euen with a vehementy his lips did bleed, at the beginning of euery charge. He neuer refused battell, neuer turned his backe, neuer was hurt but once, lightly in the foot with an arrow: he neuer led aboue fixe thousand horse and three thousand foot, and had slaine with his owne hand aboue two thousand Barbarians, striking with such force, as he cut many in two peeces.

Mahomet being freed by the death of Scanderbeg, vnderooke three warres at one instant: Mesithes of the race of the Paleologues, had commission to goe to Rhodes: Antimath Bascha into Italy, to conquer it, with Rome, and the Empire of the West: and Mahomet himselfe goes into Asia. Mesithes being often beaten, was forced to returne with the remainders of his army, languishing and in pittifull estate. Antimath lands in Calabria, takes Otranto, and so amazeth all Italy, as the Pope (neglecting all in regard of the safety of his person) resolues to leaue Rome. Mahomet going into Asia, dyed of the Collicke, neere vnto Nicomedia, in the yeare 1471. A happy death for the Christians: for Otranto besieged by the Italians, ayded by Matthias, was yeelded by composition, with their liues and goods saued, without attending five and twenty thousand Turkes, which Antimath (pursuing his victory) brought to their succours. Thus Italy was deliuered from imminent danger, and the Pope assured: we will now leaue the raigne of Baiazet, successor to Mahomet, to continue our worke in the West.

His Raigne will not hold vs long, but after the Duke of Orleans league, the motiue of five yeares warre in Britany ended by the Kings marriage with Ann the eldest daughter to Francis Duke of Britany, we shall be transported beyond the Alpes, to take the possession, which René King of Sicile, and Charles Earle of Maine his brother, had by their testaments left to Lewis the 11 to thetherights they pretended to the Realme of Naples: vpon the way we shall see him entertained by Lewis Sforce, in the Towne of Ast; then hauing received the Forts of Florence, with the Citee of Pisa, from Peter de Medicis, hee enters Rome, notwithstanding the gaue-saying of Pope Alexander, and hauing vied therein the rights of a Conqueror, he treats an accord with the said Pope: receives from him the title of Emperour of Constantinople, with the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples: & consequently cauleth himselfe to be crowned King of Sicile. And to augment his honour, he makes his passage, maugre the forces of all the Princes and Potentates of Italy, at Poumoue: and laden with glory and spoyle, returns triumphantly to seeke some rest in France, after his weary toyle. But alas! when as in the Greene and vigorous season of his life, he shall meditate of a second voyage for the recovery of his Realme of Naples (as easily lost as wonne) and when as the Easterne parts liue in hope to haue the Christian Church restored by him, oppressed now vnder the Turkish tyranny: Death vniust and vnseasonable, according to man, shall with himselfe cut off all his goodly designs, the which he had laid in the beginning of his flourishing youth, to cary him to the fruition of a better rest. The iudicious Reader may iudge, if wee haue reaped more honour and profit in the getting, then shame and hurt in the losse of so many Estates lying farre from vs. Charles came to the Crowne at the age of thirteene yeares, delicate, weak, sickly in his youth, milde, gracious, deuout, but willfull in his humours. Lewis had bred him vp at Amboise, attended on by few seruants, not visited by any, without any instruction, but bare reading, not willing to helpe nature by art. Yet the weaknesse thereof hath oftentimes more neede of a prop to support it, and a spur to prick it forward, then of a bit to restraine it. Did he feare that learning should impair his health, or corrupt the good feeds which nature had planted in his minde. He was content, that according to his fathers humour, his sonne should learne this onely sentence in Latin. He that cannot dissemble, cannot rule. But he did him wrong: for, he was inclined to the reading of French bookes: and he came no sooner to the crowne, but they found in him a desire of knowledge, which made him to haue a taste in the Latin tongue. But as the apert time of his age was slip away without profit, so did he salute the Mutes but a farre off: weak of body, but of a good wit, capable of counsell, and susceptible of the helpes requisite for the government of a firme and solid State. His minority was the cause of a quarrell, betwixt the Duke of Orleans (a yong Prince & nerest to the crowne) & the Earle of Beauieu, for the Regency, which caused his coronation to be deferred vntill the next yeare: after the which an assembly of States should determine of the administration of the King & realme. The Princes of the blood attending this solemnity, hauing bin so often wronged by Oliuer le Daim, Daniel his seruant, and Doyac, who had wholly gouerned the deceased King, did without the Kings priuity (whose yong to make restitution. To teach meane men, raised by the bounty of Kings, that man is A morrall, but the memory of indignity is immortall with great men.

At the same time the Duke of Britany was wholly possessed by Peter Landays his Treasurer, (of whom we have formerly spoken) by whose flanders and suggestions he had suffered his Chancellor Chassin, to die miserably in prison of hunger and cold: being a very honest and a reverend man. Landays was the sonne of a poore Taylor in the suburbs of Rachapt, at Vitry in Britany, as it appeareth in his proceffe, quick witted, and bush-headed. His first access to the Duke was in the quality of a Taylor, and after he vsed him to carry his loue letters, the said Duke being of a very amorous disposition. In the end he makes him master of his Wardrop, and finally his Treasurer generally; then hee began to manage the Treasure, Justice and affaires of State at his pleasure, he did preferre Officers by his letters without the Dukes appointment, and place or displace whom he pleased: proud, treacherous, reuengefull, implacable to such as had offended him. Presumptuous, declaring such Noblemen of Britany, as could no longer ensure his arrogancy, guilty of high Treason, for that they had attempted against his person, forfeits their goods, banisheth their persons, and arming his master to their destruction, the which they could not auoid, but by a generall pardon and remission.

In the end their patience is moued. John of Chalon Prince of Orange, sonne to one of the Dukes sisters, and John of Rieux Marshall of Britany, the Principall of his Court, hauing layed a plot, with the other Barons of the Country, at all adventures to seize vpon Landays: they enter the Castle of Nantes, being secretly armed, seeke for Landays, and find him not, being gone to Pabotiere, a house of his vpon the Loire, neere vnto Nantes. The Duke is amazed at this insolent proceeding, and beleeues it is some practice against his person. One of his seruants goes vp to the battlements towards the towne, and cries out aloud: That they seeke to force the Duke. The archers of his guard storme: the officers and gentlemen of his house flee thither, the people troope together. They place such Artillery as they find in the towne against the Castle, ready to batter down the gate. The vnder takers (who had not fore-seene so dangerous a consequence) shew forth the Duke vpon the battlements, and caute him to speake. He assures them, that they haue not attempted any thing against his person: and to satisfie the multitude, Philip of Montauban enters by agreement, he aduiseeth these Noblemen to absent themselves for a time, in the meane time the people would be pacified, and the Dukes wrath appeased. Landays on the other side hauing escaped a troop that was sent to surpris him in his house, saues himselfe through the ditches of his garden, alone, and on foot: and so in the night recouers the Castle of Poence, and giues the Duke notice of his aduerture. The Dukes leads a conuoy for him, and is more ruled by him then before. So Landays assembles all the Officers and men of counsell in Britany: he sends them to the Vniuersities of Italy, layes open the violence done to the Duke in his owne house, by his vassals and subiects, and demands what punishment this offence deserues. The assembly answers, as Landays desired: that they found them guilty of high treason, yea in the highest degree, and therefore deserved death and losse of goods. A decree folloves, with condemnation of death, houses beaten downe, woods cut vp at the wast, with all the rigours which men condemned for such a crime might deserue. They flee into France, and offer their seruice to the Countesse of Beaucien, the Kings sister, complaining of the insolencies of Landays, without making further mention of their quarrell with the Duke. Landays discouers their retreat, he vnderstands of the discord betwixt Lewis Duke of Orleans, and the said Lady, and causeth his master (by letters written to Lewis) to accuse the disobedience and treachery of his Nobility, who acknowledging Anne for Regent of the Realme, deprived him of the honour and right that was due to him rather then to a woman, as the first Prince of the blood: he exhorts him not to relinquish his iust title, and promiset to assist him with his best means.

The Duke of Orleans had against his minde (as we haue heard) married Joane the youngest daughter of Lewis the Eleuenth, deformed and vnfit for conception, and followed the only aduise of the Earle of Dunois, sonne to John battard of Orleans, a man of great force, aduise, aduise, a good and a valiant Captaine.

This Earle did presently fore-cast, that (by the means of Landays, who did so secretly intimate Duke Lewis) forsaking Joane, he might marry with Anne the eldest daughter of Francis Duke of Britany. This hope drew him soone to Nantes, where hauing heard the complaints

A complaints of the French, and contented them with words and promises, without any meaning to accomplish them, moued rather with desire to gouerne the Estate, he returns into France, to assist at the Kings Coronation at Rheims, whereof the day approached. There were present at the Kings Coronation, the Dukes of Orleans, Alençon, Bourbon and Lorraine, the Earles of Beaucien, Angoulême, Vendôme, la Roche-sur-Yon, Montpensier, Longueville, Foix, Dunois, and those that were fled out of Britany, the Prince of Orange, John Lord of Rieux and Ancenis, the Earle of Aumale, Ponce de la Riviere (who was created Mairor of Bourdeaux) the Lord of Vrfe (who was made master of the horse) and others of their troope, all which brought him with pompe to make his entry into Paris, and to B prepare for a generall Parliament to be held at Tours, with more free access then had been vsual, yet not so effectual as was expected: euery one seeking rather to maintaine his priuate authority, then to procure the peoples ease. The pragmatike Sanction was restored, to vse it as they had accustomed. The Constables sword was giuen to the Duke of Bourbon: the government of the Kings person to his sister, a cunning woman, and somewhat of her fathers humour: but the name of Regent was forbidden to them all, to preuent jealousies. There was a Councell erected of twelue, by whom matters should be dispatched in the Kings name: of the which Lewis Duke of Orleans, should be President.

Lewis discontented with this deuiſe, seekes to hold his ranke, he pretends that being the first Prince of the blood, the Regency belonged vnto him; he assists at the Councell, in C Parliament, and in the Assemblies in towne, and notwithstanding the last Will of King Lewis, and the decree of the Estates, yet will he by force haue the name and effect of Regent. But our Kings who may not (to preiudice the elder, or for want of issue, their nearest kinsman, being a male and legitimate) dispose of their crowne: haue they not then power to commit the guard of their children, being yet pupils, and the Regency of the Realme to whom they please? Moreover, was it reasonable that he which was not yett sixe & twenty years old, who liued vnder his mothers wing, who by right had yett need of a gouernour, should be declared capable for the government of this Realme? So, want of yeares denied his grandfather of the same dignity, during the prenſe of Charles the sixth. This discontent is nouished by a new accident: Lewis playing one day at Tennis, where the La- D dies were present, there fell a stroke in controuersie, the which Anne iudged for the aduerſe party. Lewis otherwise moued, casts out some word, importing a lie. Anne discontented here-with, causeth it to be decreed in Councell, that the Duke should be committed prisoner: he is aduertised thereof by John Louen (or Louaine) a Gentleman of his house, and so retires to the Duke of Alençon. The Duke of Lorraine was come to demand the Duchy of Barre, (the which Lewis the Eleuenth had held) and the Earldome of Prouence, which he pretended to be his, as sonne to the daughter of René King of Sicilia, Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence, and by consequence the nearest kinsman to Charles Duke of Anjou (who by transaction and testament had made Lewis the Eleuenth his heire) yet was the but nephew to René, and sonne to Charles of Anjou, Earle of Maine his brother. Barre E was restored, and the Lorraine had a hundred men at armes entertained, with thirty fixe thousand frankes for foure yeares, during the which they should looke into the title of the said Earldome. During this tearme, some well acquainted with the Estate of Prouence, produce certaine testaments of Charles the first of that name, brother to Saint Lewis, and Earle of Prouence by his wife, and of other Kings of Sicilia, which had bene of the house of France, by the which, the house of Lorraine was not onely excluded from the succession of Prouence, (not liable to the daughter, while there remained a son of the race) but that also the realm of Sicilia, and all other Seigneuries possessed by the house of Anjou, belonged to the King. That K. René hauing regard to the said testaments, had at his death preferred his nephew Charles, before the said duke of Lorraine, son to his daughter.

F The Duke of Orleans grieved to be thus excluded from his pretensions, and that Anne alone gouerned the King her brother, practiseth the Dukes of Bourbon, Alençon, and Britany (the chiefe support & refuge of the discontented French) the Earle of Angoulême, John Vicont of Narbonne, Francis Earle of Longueville, and many others. Alain Lord of Albrét, hoping (by the means of Lewis, whom hee found to haue great credit with the Duke of Britany) to marry with Anne, the eldest daughter of the said Duke (having not duly examined the heart of Lewis) enters easily into this faction.

Thus all things threaten a horrible and pernicious warre, but more in shew then effect.

Lewis with his allies assembles some troopes, and thinking to put them into Orleans, the A inhabitants give him to understand by the Lord of Ioyeuze, deputed there on his behalf, that he might well enter with his household, but not with his souldiers. Boisgency was then his retreating place.

Anne and the twelve Councillors, cause him to be besieged by Francis Earle of Vendosme, Lewis his brother, Earle of Roche-sur-Yon, René Duke of Lorraine (whom the said Lady had wholly won vnto her, knowing him to be resolute, vehement, and of fidious) and Peter of Rohan, Lord of Gie, Marshall of France. In the end this warre was pacified by this agreement, that the Duke of Orleans should come to Court, and inioyne the plan that belonged vnto him: but Francis Earle of Dunois (the Dukes right hand) a busie body and the first author of the trouble, should retire himselfe into the County of Aft, belonging to the said Duke, or to what other place hee pleased without the Realme. Mal Lewis then bring his confederates in disgrace with the King, and now abandon them: behold the Duke of Bourbon and the Earle of Angoulême leading 300 Lances, eight thousand foot, and about eighteen hundred Gentlemen of Auvergne, Bourbonais, Foret, Beau-jeuils and Angoulêmeis, and Alain eight or nine thousand fighting men. If Lewis had attended them in some place of strength, how dangerously had hee shaken the new estate of Charles, not well settled during his minority? But he had too good a mind to tear out his own bowels, in their persons, whom the law in time should submit vnto him, & dismember the crowne, which he should weare in his turne. Anne, to disperse this storm, causeth the Earle of Beauieu her husband, to encounter their troopes, and forsooth the Duke of Orleans to march in person, against those that came to his seruice. They were all Frenchmen: and as they were lightly armed, so were they as lightly disarmed: the Marshall of Gie, and the Chamberlaine of Graulles, shall easily reconcile them. Alain being stopia his passage of Garonne, at S. Basille, by the Earles of Vendosme, and Roche-sur-Yon, was admitted to the same accord, vpon charge to furnish the King an hundred men at arms for his seruice: the which he deliuered vnder the command of S. Cyr, and Ferfaix. They are all dispersed: the King at Amboise, Lewis at Orleans, Alain in Bazadois, and all the rest to their houses: the Vicount of Foix, and Peter his brother being Cardinall at Nantes, vnder colour to visit their sister, wife to the Duke of Britany. They find their brother in law much incensed against his Nobility, and they resolute to defend themselves. But as both armies were ready to ioyn, an accord is made by some mediators: that considering the Dukes age and weaknesse of iudgment, the State should be gouerned by the aduice of his nearest kinsmen and friends. Landais is reiectred, and formes: hee drawes letters Patents in the Dukes name, and declares all those of the Dukes army, that had entred into capitulation with the enemies troopes, guilty of high treason, forfeiting all their goods as traitors: he carries this Patent to the Chancellor Francis Chrestien, to be sealed, and brings a commendement from the Duke to that effect: the which the Chancellor refused. Behold Landais hath purchased two enemies for one, and both haue sworn his ruine, but they must countenance it with Iustice. They depute the Lord of Pont-Chasteau to summon the Chancellor to doe Iustice vpon Landais, to appoint Iudges for his tryall, and to force him to appeare. They make informations against him, whereupon they decree to apprehend him. It is bruted throughout the towne, that Landais by sentence should be committed prisoner. The people run by heapes, they fill the Castle-yard, and will not depart till Landais be deliuered. He saues himselfe in the Dukes chamber. The Nobility doth force the Chancellor to repaire to the Castle and to demand this man. The Duke being constrained, deliues him, but vpon condition that he should not be vied contrary to Iustice, and commands vpon paine of death, that he suffers no outrage be done vnto him, vnder color of Iustice.

The Nobilitie being aduertised of his taking, posts to Nantes, and offer themselves vnto the duke, like humble subiects, suing for his fauour. Landais proceesse being made with that of Iohn of Vuiry, one of his seruants, by certaine Commissioners, they were hanged. This done, the people were pacified, and the Nobility, by the intercession of the Earle of Comminges, returned into fauour, and obtained letters of pardon. Then returns the Earle of Dunois to his towne of Parthenay in Poitou, but without the Kings permission. The King (that is to say, the twelve vnder his authority) suspected his returne, and (feeling lest the Duke of Orleans had sent for him, or that hee practised some new worke) sends for the Duke. Hee sends backe the Messenger with promises to follow, and vpon a second charge

A charge by the Marshall of Gie, doubting the humour of the Countesse of Beaugien, and moreover, mad at his ill vfrage, keeping him as it were confined within Orleans, without liberty to go forth in safety; he parts from Orleans, vnder colour to go a hawking: he takes the way to Frontenauux, and from thence to Nantes, whither the Earle of Dunois went to meet him. This departure was presently knowne, & Parthenay was suddenly besieged, taken and razed, with many other places in Guienne, which belonged to the Earle of Comminges, and others that were in Britany. These men slept not. A league is presently made vnder the Dukes of Britany and Orleans, whereinto there enters the Prince of Orange, Francis of Laual Lady of Dinan and Chasteaubriant, Iohn Lord of Rieux and Earle of B Aumale Marshall of Britany, the Earles of Angoulême and Dunois. The Duke of Lorraine who finds no great satisfaction of promises, is easily drawn into it. Maximilian King of Romans giues his consent. Charles opposeth Lewis of Bourbon, Earle of Roche-sur-Yon, great Grand-father to the Duke Montpensier last deceased, and makes him his Lieutenant generall in this warre: with Lewis of Bourbon the yongest brother of the Earle of Vendosme, he giues them for assistant, master Lewis of Tremouille Vicount of Thouars who had married Gabriele of Bourbon, sister to the said Conte Lewis.

Francis Duke of Britany had no great reason to be a Sanctuary for these mutines, and by receiving them to draw all the forces of France vpon his decayed age, attending nothing but his graue. But supposing to protect himselfe from the Kings surprises, hee must ruine his Country, his Nobility and his subiects. But then falls out another accident. The Lords lately reconciled grew in ialousie, that the French were come to reuenge the wrong done vnto their Duke: or else with their ruine and the Dukes, to make their peace in France. They desired to send them home for two respects, the one to content the King and his Sister, the other for that they should not grow in any such credit with the Duke, as in the end he might employ them against themselves, wishing in a manner for Landais, to oppose him against them. Moreover, they feared James Guibé, a Capitaine of the Dukes men at armes, and in good credit, Nephew to Landais and his seruant, lest he should seek some reuenge for his Uncles death. If it should be so, how could they subside? The King discouers this secret ialousie, and findes a good expedient, to thrust them out to their D own mutuall ruines. To this end he sends Andrew of Efpinay Cardinall of Bourdeaux, and the Lord of Bouchage, with instructions to Rieux Marshall of Britany, and commission to offer them men and meanes to expell the French out of Britany.

The best aduised discouer the Kings intent, that accepting of this offer, they make the way open for the King to enter into Britany. But in the end they agree: That he should not send into Britany for this succour, above foure hundred Lances, and foure thousand foot, and that at the Barons request, That the King should pretend nothing to the Duchie, whilst the duke lived. That he should not besiege nor take any Towne, Castle, or Fort within the Country: and that his souldiers should take nothing without paying. That when as the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Dunois and others should retire out of Britany, the King should be bound to withdraw his forces. And for the Britons: That the Noblemen of Britany should arme with him, and accompany his army to expell the French. The confirmation of these Articles is seconded with foure hundred Lances, and five or six thousand men led by the Lord of Saint André, who enters Britany on the one side: the Earle of Roche-sur-Yon on another, and the Vicount of Tours on the third. All the Country is suddenly filled with French men at armes, and the Orleansois are amazed, being vnfurnished both of force and counsell to resist. The Earle of Dunois being of more iudgement than the rest, considers that the company of a hundred Lances belonging to Alain of Albret, was a part of those foure hundred commanded by Saint André: that it was conuenient to winne him, and with this designe to put him in hope of the mariage of Anne of Britany. An inuention according to the necessity of the time, but this was not the Earles intent, who laboured to winne her for the Duke of Orleans, neither the Prince of Orange, who vnder hope of this alliance, had drawne the Arch-Duke Maximilian into this league, whereby he should enter into Bourgogne, with a mighty army led by the Duke of Lorraine, whilst that hee himselfe should annoy the King in Flanders and Picardy. But great shewes and small fruits. Hee was too poore and needy, as the King might easily disappoint all his practices and stratagem. Now are we deeply engaged in Warre. The Duke of Brittons army.

The Dukes army marched to succour this towne, when as Maurice of Mené being great of body and courage said, Whither goe we my friends? Our Duke is onely gouernour of the French, by whose perswasions we march against the French, who at their first encounter will betray him to their Nation, whereof I am well aduertised. Were wee not better to remaine in our houses with our wives and children, then to be thus led by the humours of others? A speech of a great consequence. He was of the best allied in Britany, issued out of the house of Guerlesquin, and had well serued Lewis the eleuenth, as Gouernour of Guise, and Capraine of a hundred men at armes in the Warres against the Flemings: a man of valor and counsell, and well aduanced by the said King, hauing the profits of La Ferté-Jard, Aiguefortes, Beunrage and Gorlonniere: but very inconstant in his changing opinions. At this speech they all scatter: so as of fixteene thousand, scarce the fourth part kept the field: the Duke amazed herewith, leaues Malestroit, and recouers Vennes: but hee was pursued so speedily, as he loseth his baggage, being faououred in his retreat by the Prince of Orange, who had posted from Nantes to his succour, very happily: for otherwise he had bene besieged and taken. Vennes being beleagred, yeelds for feare. The Duke at his departure had left two thousand eight hundred horse in it, vnder the command of Coetman Lord Steward of Britany, and of Amaury of Mouilly, and for Captaine of the towne James le Moine, who vnable to maintain the siege, retyred in hast. Coetquen went to Dinan, where he commanded; La Mouilly with his horse to Nantes, where the Duke was, and the Kings army did bend that wayes. Adrian del' Hospital a Captaine of men at armes, meets him vpon the way, defeated him, kills a great number of his troope, and takes many prisoners: some fixe hundred recouer Nantes. This was about Whitsonide. The Duke thus pressed, being weak in his person, and weak in his subjects: being diuided, weak in friends, weak in those who had engaged him in this warre for their quarrell, sends the Earle of Dunois, and Oliver of Coetman (who soone after fell to the French, and was made gouernour of Auxerre) to craue succours from Henry King of England. But to increase his misery, Henry was not yet in quiet possession of his Realme, crossed by some remainders of Richards party, the which he must suppress. The King resolved to besiege the Duke in Nantes, he comes in person to Ancenis, thither come the associate Brittons, repenting their indiscretion, for that they had taken townes, and spoiled the country, contrary to their promise, and their owne lands suffered the like extremities. Thus Nantes was besieged the 19 of Iune, well battered, well assailed, and as well defended. The deputies of England were foure times shipped to crosse the Seas, and foure times put back by tempest of weather. In stead of English, they brought fifty thousand Brittons of the commons, grieved to see the Duke besieged. The Kings army, either holding themselves vnable to fight with them, or neglecting them as fruitles forces, or doing it of purpose, the sooner to furnish the towne, gaue them free passage, and holding it likewise impossible to force a towne well furnished with commanders, men and victuals, they raised the siege the sixt of August, to go without losse of men to Dole: the which was taken and spoiled without resistance, the Brittons and other souldiers were put to ranfome.

Nantes being sieged,

During the siege of Nantes, Peter of Rohan Earle of Quintin, of the French faction, surprisid Montcontour, and summoned Guingamp, a passage for succours that came to the Duke from the Bishopricks of Treguer, Leon and Cornouaille. John of Coetman Lord of Chasteaugui, Captaine of the Towne, was at Nantes. Hee flies thither, and furnisheth the place with men sufficient to defend it, & hauing intelligence that Plasquellet with about fifty Gentlemen, Brittons of the Kings army, spoyleing the Country & drawing the Nobility to their party, dined in the Abbey of Begar, hauing called together the neighbor parishes, and assembled some troops, he charged them, ouerthrew them, and led them all prisoners to Guingamp: where the Iudges of Goello & Guingamp, by the Dukes expresse commandement, began to enforme against them, & had finished their processe, if some friends and kinsmen had not found meanes of delay, vntill the Dukes death ended that proceeding. This prize gaue courage to the Captaines of Dinan. They assem-

But the Vicont of Rohan, and the Earle of Quintin, offering to succour it, and moreover, the siege of Nantes requiring force and expedition, they retire to Rennes, to ioyne with the other forces, consisting of fixe or seuen thousand men. At the same instant Thon of Rocerf, Lord of Bois de la Roche, and Peter Long Lord of Kaeruegues (inticed with the great wealth which the Earle of Quintin had left in his Castle,) assemble some souldiers with many peasants, and besiege Quintin: they take it, and against the composition sworne, spoyle the towne and Castle, and (in hatred of the Earle, who followed the King) burnt it to ashes. The Earle by meanes of his subjects recovered it soone after: and Gouquet Captaine thereof before, expelled them againe, and spoyle the towne. But to what end serued this cruell stratagem, seeing that Rocerf had a house in the Country, and the Earle good meanes to be reuenged: as he was a yeare after, by the taking of Rocerf himselfe, and the spoile and burning of his house? The Phrygiens grow wile too late, saith the Prouerbe. The Nobility of Britany finding their error, by drawing the Kings forces into the country, to their owne ruine, they send to the duke: protesting to be no way associate with the king, but to defend themselves against the French that were neere his person, who they doubted had bene drawne in to preiudice them: they offer to serue him hereafter, and against all men, so as he will pardon them. The Duke receiues them, and grants his letters of abolition, deliuey and restitution of all their goods and dignities, as before the warres, namely, to the Vicount of Rohan, to the Lords of Auangour and Ricux, (largely put from the office of Lieutenant generall, and Martiall of Britany) as well for themselves as their assistants. Ricux enjoyed it, but the rest persisted in the Kings seruice. In the meane time the Kings army prepares to goe into Basse Britany, and to besiege Guingamp: but the Marshall of Ricux changing his party, makes them to change their proiect. Ricux was at Ancenis, wonderfully perplexed to see the French entred the Country, by a breach which the Nobility of Britany had voluntarily made them, deuising some means to repaire these confusions, drawne thereunto by his reception into grace. The Earle of Cominges going Ambassador to the King, passed by Ancenis, and confirmed Ricux in this good resolution, persuading him to goe vnto the Duke, with assurance that he should be graciously receiued. Ricux thinking to strike two strokes with one stone, sends Francis du Bois to the King, who at that time was at Pont de Larche: giuing him intelligence that the Duke of Orleans, the Prince of Orange, and others, retyred into Britany, were willing to leaue the Country, so as they might rest safely in their houses, without touch for that was passed.

Which being concluded, he beseeched his Maiesty to retire his men at armes, according to the treaty he had signed with his owne hand. Anne hearing this proposition. My friend (said she vnto the Gentleman) say vnto my Cousin the Marshall of Ricux, your master, that the King hath no companion, and seeing he is entred so farre, he will make it good. The Earle had no better satisfaction. An answer discovering the Kings intention, which was to incorporate this Duchy to the Crowne: the which caused the Marshall to yeeld to his Prince without dissenting. He draws some souldiers from Nantes in October, and deliueirs his towne of Ancenis into their hands, swearing they should keepe it for the Duke. In the end Francis of Laual, Baron of Chasteaubrian, sonne in law vnto Ricux, suffers him to enter the Castle, holding him to be the Kings seruant. Being the stronger, and lodging his troope within the towne, he commands (seeing that the King had broken the contract) all those that would not swear fidelity and seruice to the Duke, to retire the next day with bag and baggage. Could he be ill receiued of his master, carrying with him the deliuey of two so good places? The Prince of Orange hauing ioynd with some Germane succours, sent by Maximilian, and led by Baldwin Bastard of Bourgongne, and some 3000 men of the Countreys of Cornouaille, Leon, Treguer, and Goello, resolved to besiege Quintin, where the Brittons (ioyned with the French that were commanded by the Baron of Pont-Chasteau) did wonderfully annoy Guingamp: who being in a town vnfit for war, left the place, & gaue the Prince means to campe before La Chaize, a castle belonging to the Vicount of Rohan, but weakened by the losse of many of his men, part of them going daily to the French, and part disbanding by reason of the Winter; he retyred his army to Montcontour, resolute to take a view, and to punish such as were departed without licence. Yet notwithstanding all his care, and the Dukes seuerer command to the Gentlemen, to returne to the Campe within two dayes, vpon paine of the losse of their goods and honours, and

and to others of corporall punishment, those few forces which remained, vanished suddenly.

Thus the Duke wavers, betwixt hope and feare, fortified on the one side, but weakened on the other, seeing his estate incline to ruine. Hee had two pillars, which in his conceit might raise him, or at the least support him; Anne and Isabel. The Prince of Orange wooed Anne for Maximilian: Rieux the Lady of Isal, and the greatest part of the Nobility, for Alain of Albret. The first promised greater conditions, yet the King had incombred him much in Flanders, supporting the Gantois, so as hee could not succour his pretended Father in Law, neither with his person, nor his subiects; having small credit amongst them, and little money: for that they would not assist him to prejudice the King. Alain (whom others call Amand) had some forces in hand, and fed with this plausible hope, he brought about a thousand men out of Castile, and three thousand Gascons. The Duke would willingly have made two sonnes in law of one daughter, and vrgent necessity forced him, (like unto Charles of Bourgonie) to promise her to many, whom hee could giue but to one: euen as Erichonius satisfied his gluttony and continual hunger, whereunto Ceres had condemned him (having cut downe her groue) by the many sales of his daughter Mestra. In the end Anne is promised to Maximilian, who should come to marry in Britany; and withall, hee should bring great troops of men to succor the Duke against the oppression of the French. But he abused her no lesse then he is abused. Hereupon Alain comes with his Castilians and Gascons. At his first arriuall hee went to salute the Duke at Nantes, and then his mistresse, thinking to haue the greatest interest in her loue. But oftentimes two braue Grey-hounds courting a Hare, a third crosseeth them, and carries away the game, as we shall soone see. The Marshall of Rieux being ariued, haue his consent in fauor of Alain, at the Countesse of Lauals request, sister in law to the said Alain. It was no time now to leaue this Marshall (newly reconciled) idle. The Duke giues him the charge of his army, with commission to take Vennes, where Gilbert of Grassai, and Philip of Moulin, (of whom we shall make mention in the battell of Fornoue) commanded. He marcheth thither, batters it, and takes it by composition, the third of March. Then Saint Cir and Ferfais (who led the hundred men at armes of Alains company) declared themselves Brittons by their Captaines commandment, building frivolously vpon this marriage: yet some of the company retired to the King. The Kings army wintered, but Lewis of Bourbon aduerted of the taking of Vennes by Rieux, requires him by the surprize of Ancenis and Chasteaubriant, places neere the river, to make the siege of Fougeres more easie, on the one side, being a frontier towne, and of good defence, and on the other side, that of Saint Albin le Cormier. The Brittons army had bene eightene moneths in field without rest, to make head against the French, but now they must shew what courage is in them. The Duke of Orleans, Alain of Albret, the Earle of Dunois, the Marshall of Rieux, the Lord Scalles an Englishman, (commanding some three hundred men of this nation, sent by Henry King of England, by the means of the Lord Maurpertuis) the Signior of Leon, eldest sonne to the Vicount of Rohan the Seigniors of Chasteaubriant, Crenetes, Pont l'Abbe, Plessis, Baliczon, Montigni, Balius, Mutuel, and other Captaines of bands, go forth of Nantes, with an intent to raise the siege. Their army was 400 Lances, and 8000 foot, (beside 300 English, and 800 Germanes, sent by Maximilian) with good store of Artillery; for this great rabble armed, and tumultuously assembled by the Earle of Dunois, had bene in a manner all sent backe, as an unprofitable burthen vpon the earth.

But the matter is of importance, the French are not so easily forced to rise, and if an occasion of battell be offered shall they accept it? The Marshall of Rieux (best experienced in matters of war) with some others, are not of that opinion: for to what end (say they) should we hazard the estate and Country, vpon an euent which may be auoyded. If we lose the day, by what means shall we releue our selues? The souldiers that shall remaine after the overthrow, will want courage, and change their minds: the people would be amazed, the Townes stand in suspence, the Conquerour would become master of the Country, and take all Townes he should attempt without resistance. It were best to temporize, and to incampe at Rennes, being well furnished with victuals and things necessary, and in the meane time, to keepe the enemy occupied, forcing him to lie in field, tiring him with their horsemen, and cutting off his forrage, or else to lodge the army in the frontier

A frontier towne, to shut vp the victuals, and attend the winter: which being come, the enemy shall haue no meanes to lodge abroad, but must of force dislodge: and in the meane time, we shall see what profit will grow by the leagues of the kings of England & Castile, of the Arch-duke, and the Duke of Lorraine; all which giue the Duke great hope, to countertermine the Kings practices in Britany. The rest (rashly thrust on, partly by a yong and boyling humor, partly with desire to make triall of their forces) make answer. That the souldiers are wearied with this long bearing of armes without effect; that having now an opportunity to doe well, they obserue a great ioy in their resolutions, the which it was more fit to nourish then to quench: that their forces were vnitd all together, and asked nothing but employment; and that delay would make them leaue their Ensignes by little and little. In the meane time, Fougeres was at the last gasse; a towne of importance, and one of the keyes of the Country, that to leaue it in this extremity, were to shew a manifest proofe of cowardise to all the rest. To conclude: they say in a manner, that to temporise were to play the cowards. The first opinion was most probable, but the vehemency of the Earle of Dunois, and the heat of yonger heads carried it. All march: but see the pitifull first fruits of their first lodging at Andouille, a village vpon the way from Rennes to S. Albin, a contention fals betwixt the Duke of Orleans, and the Lord of Albret, a man of greater enuies, father to John the last of that name, King of Nauarre: but his mistris did not affect him, a good scholler in dissembling, to vse the power of Albret, for the benefit of the Duke her father. The Duke of Orleans did lie a higher pitch, and by the mediation of the Earle of Dunois, was very far in fauor with Anne of Britany: Alain discouers some good shewes of Anne, to the Duke of Orleans, whereupon they grow to so bitter words, as the day approaching they were ready to fight. But the enemy being at hand, was it now time to contend, to the preiudice of a whole army? But now the foresight of the Marshall of Britany, doth pacifie all: vpon this diffiulty they receive two seuerall aduertisements. Saint Albin of Cormier was battered by the French with three batteries, and yielded by composition, with their liues and goods faued: a small towne, but furnished with a very good Castle, but at that time vnfortified of men, victuals and munition, and Fougeres yielded vpon the like accord: Saint Albin was commanded by William of Rolsmeinen, an ancient captaine, who had had a command of men at armes vnder Charles the seuenth, and Lewis the eleuenth; but in the warres betwixt Charles the eight, and the Duke of Britany, he returned to serue his naturall Prince. The Brittons army marcheth to recouer this place, and the French to preserve their conquests, when as behold there ariseth a mutiny among the Brittons. It is secretly murmured, that the French Commanders their associates, had intelligence with the heads of the French army, the which suggestion did euen then hazard all, and if the Brittons had bene farther off, without feare of charge, they had easily disbanded. The Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange aduertised of this conceit, had great paine to worke any other impression. What doe they? to giue an assurance of the contrary, they leaue their horses, and E swear all to fight on foot with the Brittons and Germans. A more bold then wise resolution, but necessity did force them to appeale this mutiny which tended to fedition.

They order their troopes to fight. The Foreward to the Marshall of Rieux: the battell to the Lord of Albret, with some horse to couer his flanks. The Rereward to Chasteaubriant, and on either side, their carriages of artillery and baggage to couer some of their foot, being fauoured on their flanke with a small groue betwixt Saint Albin, and the village of Oranges. And to make the small numbers of strangers seeme great, they attire twelue hundred, (some say, seuentene hundred) Brittons, with casocks bearing a red crosse, the English livery. Lewis of Tremouille in the absence of Lewis of Bourbon his brother in law, commanded the Kings army. He giues the foreward to Adrian del Hospital, and old French Captaine, and famous in this warre: hee takes the battell to himselfe, and giues the rereward to the Marshall of Baudricourt, pressed by a more sudden charge then he expected. Gabriel of Montfauois with ten or twelue horsemen, sent out to obseue the Brittons countenance makes report of their good order.

The two armies approach, the artillery thunders, and kills many men of either side; a skirmish continues about two houres, which giues the French leysure to order their battell. sell: and at the first they kill Claude of Montfort, a brave Capitaine, sent by the King of England to succour the Duke, and the Lord Scales, a valiant Knight, with some others of the foremost ranke. Blaise a Germane Capitaine, to cover himselfe from the French artillery, changed his quarter, marching by as wife with his battalion, like unto a Croysant: but he is suddenly charged in flanke by four hundred French horse, broken, and many of them slaine. At the same instant, two hundred horse charge those which had the baggage in charge, and force them to retire. The Brittons horse that flanked the army, growes amazed, and leaves the foot naked. They charge them, and force them to their foot. The Duke of Orleans, and Earle of Dunois fighting vnphably on foot, doe what possibly may be expected from such gallant Princes, but the Duke flying among the Germanes was taken in the wood; the other seeing this generall ouerthrow, tore off his blacke crosse, the livery of Britany, and hid himselfe among the dead bodies: an Archer (that had bene of his company) knew him, and both of them were led prisoners to St. Albin, whence the Duke of Orleans was soone after caried to the great Tower of Bourges. The Marshall of Britany, and the Lord of Albret saved themselves in Dinan by the swiftnesse of their horses. All the counterfeite English with red crosses were slaine without remission.

The Lord of Leon (sonneto to the Vicount of Rohan) Pont l'Abbe, the Lord Scales, (an Englishman issued from that braue Talbot Monsieur (kinsman to the Prince of Orange) with fixe thousand souldiers of their army were slaine. Mosén Gralla (a name sauouring of the Lewes) Lord Steward for Ferdinand King of Castile, and chiefe of the Spanish troopes, was taken prisoner. Of the French, James Galeot a Neopolitane, a valiant and renowned Capitaine: and others to the number of a thousand or twelve hundred men; but few of any make. This was on Monday, the 28 of Iuly: a day of great import for the State, the which did wonderfully shake the Dukes affaires, being troubled in mind, and his subiects tired with toyle and terror, whereof doth follow practices of places, yeelding vp of Townes, and finally, euery one frames himselfe to follow the Conquerors footstepes: a day eternizing the happy memory of that Noble Knight, Lewis of Tremouille, great great Grandfather to Claude Lord of Tremouille last deceased, Duke of Thouars, Prince of Talmond, Earle of Guines, &c. and of the noble Princesse, Charlotte Katherine of Tremouille, Princesse of Conde, Countesse of Taillebourg, Baronesse of Suille, Craon, Boufmiens, S. Hermine, la Chaise, in the Vicountie, &c. mother to the most high & mighty Prince Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and first Peere of France, &c. hauing at the age of 25 or 26 yeares, by his incomparable valour and vertue, wonne the honour of so memorabile a victory. The next day, the Lord of Tremouille turnes towards Rennes, summons the towne, and (to terrifie the Inhabitants) he lodgeth his army in the villages of Aigne, Chasteaugiron, Veru, S. Supplice, and others thereabout. The Herald returne an answer: That the King had no right to the towne, and that he wrongfully made war in Britany; That notwithstanding his forces and happy success, God the guardian of their right, might doe vnto him, as hee had in former times to King Iohn before Poitiers, and to Philip of Valois at Crecy. That if Tremouille come, hee should find twenty thousand men to resist him. So the army leauing Rennes, marcheth to Dinan, vnder the command of the Vicount of Rohan. Amasury of Moulfay, gouernor of the towne, compounds at the first summon, to deliuer it into the Kings hands, vpon the accustomed conditions in like cases: to commit the guard thereof to whom hee pleased, and the inhabitants to swear vnto the King: which done, the French army should retire. On the other side, Guy the fifteenth of that name, Earle of Laul, causeth some French troopes to enter by night into his Castle of Vitre, and they became masters of the towne: and by the same meanes he drew his brother Francis Lord of Chasteaubriant, and Montasiant to the Kings party. The Baron of Pont Chateau, brother to the Vicount of Rohan, followed the example of Francis of Auagour, the Dukes base sonne, who had already deliuered the towne and castle of Clifton into the Kings hands; and the greatest part of the Nobility followed the same course. Hereafter wee shall see a ciuill war, rather then a foraigne. And for the last worthy exploit of this army, Tremouille besiegeth Saint Malo, both Towne and Castle, one of the strongest places in Britany, beautified with a goodly haue. It was able to hold out against the forces of a mighty army, as well for the

A fear thereof, as for the fortification: but they easily enter into composition. The Kings affaires advanced thus, as the Dukes declined: his Maiestie being at Angiers, hee propounds in Council whether hee should proceed to an absolute conquest of the Duchie, seize vpon the dikes person, and his daughters, giue them some pension, and marry them at his pleasure. He wanted no firebrands in Court, to kindle these combustions, dispersed throughout all Britany. My Liege (say they) if you once get the father and his daughters into your hands, you shall easily obtaine the whole Country, without striking stroke, and reduce the Nobility at your discretion. Guy of Rochefort Chancellor of France, a iust man, and of a good conscience, shewes, that the duke of Orleans retreat into Britany, had bene the chiefe motiue to draw downe the Kings forces. That his Maiestie hauing now the said duke in his power, the cause ceasing, the effect should cease: That the Duke was somewhat to be excused, if by the bond of alliance and affinitie, he had bene intangled in the disgraces of these Noblemen, fled vnder the shadow of his wing. Moreover, the King had no iust cause to pursue his owne vassall with such violence, to ruine his estate, to invade a pupils patrimony, and to spoile her of her Grandfathers inheritance. If the King werenot satisfied to haue the chiefe motiues of these confusions in his power, hee armed himselfe with a transport made to King Lewis, by the Lord of Bouillac & Nicolas of Britany his wife: that he must then examine the titles, and appoint men to looke into the rights of the one and the other: if the Kings pretensions were iust, it was in him to put them in execution: if not, the people would exclaime against this violence, and God the protector of the oppressed, would soone or late, raise vp some to reuenge it: for the peoples voice, is the voice of God, who cries to Princes, Due right to the needy and orphaned: doe iustice to the afflicted and poore. This aduice made the Lords of the Council pause a while, and many in the end conclude: That it was more conuenient to agree vpon Iudges, to decide this controuerfie iudicially. Doubtlesse God holds the hearts of men in suspence, & makes them yeeld to what he pleaseth: But our Countesse of Beauieu was not well pleased with this resolution, hoping to haue the Earldome of Nantes for her share. They let the duke vnderstand what the Council had decreed. These crosses, disreputations, age, and weakness of Iudgement, hindered the apprehension of his affaires, yet will hee deale surely. He charged the Earles of Dunois and Cominges with offers and submissions to the king, the king refers them to Verger to consider thereof: about belonging to the Marshall of Gye. Behold there grows great pretensions. The king pretends the propriety of Britany, by reason of the grant made by Bouillac. The Vicount of Rohan had not renounced his interest. He descended of Mary of Britany, sister to Marguerit the dukes first wife, the only heire of Francis the first, and Mary preceded the duke that then was, in degree of blood. But the pity was, she was a woman.

Precedente for Britany.

As for the pretended rights and grants of Bouillac, they answered: that the matter had bene fully decided by the treaty made at the Abbey of Victory, and many others. To the Vicount of Rohan: That it was ended by the contract of marriage, testaments, and ordinances of Dukes their Predecessors, and decrees of Parliaments. But the King hauing two strings to his bow, like a conqueror, grew wilfull, and his sister Beauieu more then hee. If one failed, the other was ready bent. Charles demands the ward-ship of the dukes daughters. It was of purpose, that obtaining this ward-ship, he might marry Anne at his pleasure, being twelve yeares old, and her sister seuen. This might not be; the Nobility would neuer haue endured it. Moreover, Charles discouers, that foraigne Princes repined thereat, and were ready to embrace this quarrell. They must therefore agree vpon Iudges, and a certaine place. Yet leauing nothing of his conquests of Britany, and being seized off some townes won by their swords, let the Iudges determine what they will, we will doe what we please. In the end they draw Articles: the King accepts them, and sends them to the Duke being at Coyron vpon Loire, where the Duke remained. He signes them, some willingly, the rest by force: enioying this happinesse in the end of his dayes, to haue changed this wretched warre into a publicke rest.

So, a peace is concluded, and sworn on either part, the one and twentieth of August. The King promisseth to call home all his men at armes, and the duke to dismiss all strangers: hee promisseth to giue the King for hostages, the Lord of Montasiant, Rainfort, and the son of the Lord Steward of Britany: and within a certain time, to assemble the Estates of the Country, and to make them confirme this Treaty. But Francis the second of that name, duke of Britany, oppressed with griefe, melancholy, and age, and sore brused with a fall: falls sicke and dies the ninth of September, leaving the Marshall of Rieux guardian of his daughters, the Earle of Comenges for an assistant, and Francis of Laual, Lady of Chateaubriant for gouernesse.

Presently after the Dukes decease, the Kings sends Ambassadors to Anne the new Duchesse, who gives her to understand, that the Kings intention was to maintain the treaty made betwixt his Maiesty, and the duke deceased: but to make it more firme, it was expedient for her to yield in three points to the King. The first: That seeing they were allyed vnto the King, reason would, that he should haue the guard, or wardship, and during their minority, the disposing of their lands and Seigneuries. The second: That Commissioners appointed (should decide their controuersie, touching the principality of Britany, by the first day of January next ensuing: and in the meane time, neither the one nor the other, should cary the name nor the authority of Duchesse, nor receiue the oath of fealty. The third: That all strangers should voyde the Country, as was contained in their contract. Anne makes answer: that she desires to keepe the treaty betwixt the King and her deceased father, without any other conditions: And for confirmation of her words, she calls a Parliament the 29 of December following, as the Duke was bound, to haue them ratifie the conuentions of peace. In the meane time there were robberies, taking of ranfomes, massacres, thefts, delolation of the Country, sale of townes, euen as in open warres. The Vicount of Rohan laboured to winne the townes by sweet words, and amiable letters; he shewes vnto them the mileries of this war, farre from any end, by the decease of their Duke: that at his request, the King had retired his army, attending, if the Nobility and Commons, would put themselues into the hands of the said Rohan, vnder whose command his Maiesty meant they should remaine, otherwise he was ready to reduce the obstinate to reason by force. Rennes, Guingamp and others (to whom he had particularly written) answer: That neither they nor the rest, can or ought acknowledge any other commander then the Duchesse: to whom during her fathers life, (and since his decease) they were bound by oath. Moreover, they were aduertised that the King was resolved to entertaine a peace with their Princesse, in the same manner as had bene accorded. They beseech him to rest satisfied with this answer, vntill they bee informed of the Duchesse intention, of the Councils, and the Marshall of Rieux: and in the meane time, to haue the good of the Country, and the peace in recommendation.

This answer puts the Vicount into choller, and the Earle of Quintin his brother thrusts him on, being desirous to be reuenged for the often taking, and spoiling of his towne. He goes to field with his troope, and neere vnto Pontrieu he encounters some men gathered together, with an intent to goe to succour the Duchesse: he doth charge them, defeat them, and kills a part of them, being abandoned by some Gentlemen that conducted them: then hee takes and sacks Pontrieu and Chateaulin vpon Trieuf, and so makes his way to Guingamp. Hee summons Chero and Goniquet Capitaines, to yeeld the Towne. They answer, that they will not obey him, so long as there shall bee a Duke or Duchesse in Britany. Vpon this refusal, he sends a Capitaine called Saint Pierre, Seneshall of Tholouza, and La Forest, to beleaguer it: who being repulsed out of the suburbs of Treguer, takes them of Montbareil and Pontauquen, spoile and burne them, and Rohan being aized, he takes the suburbs of S. Croix: then hee lodgeth in Montbareil, from whence hee discourereth the whole towne so plainly, as hee might shoot point-blanke into the market place: he burnes a part of the suburbs, and lodgeth his artillery: he plants another battery in the Iacobins garden, to batter the curtain of the wall betwixt the ports of Rennes and Fontani, and he makes a breach but not sufficient, yet hee gives an assault, and is repulsed. The next day hee changeth his battery, and plants it at the vpper end of the Friars garden: hee plays a whole day, beats downe a part of the wall, betwixt the Ports of Montbareil, and Treguer: hee offers a second assault, but it was as valiantly defended as the first. Goniquet thrust into the thigh with a pike, is carried out of the fight. The night brings counsell, and those which had withstood two assaults, will be vnable for the third, being now weakened of one of their chiefe supports, who was made vnable to serue, by reason of his hurt: morning being come, a truce is granted, to take aduice of their Duchesse. Rohan presseth it, and the Capitaines seeing their men decayed in number, as well by the taking of the suburbs, as at the two assaults, compound for ten thousand Crownes to the General,

A rall, to retire his army, and to receiue them into his protection, promising to furnish victuals & munition for the siege of Conquer, the which he had charge from the King to besiege, & for want of present money, by reason of the losses sustained by the war, to giue hostages. But this parlee was fruitious. During which time capitaine Boissel declares himselfe for the French, seizeth vpon the gate of the tower Quencille, and brings in the Earle of Quintin, (who gaped only for reuenge of this place) he takes and spoiles the town, and ranfomes the inhabitants, and amongst them capitaine Chero: Goniquet saues himselfe at la Roche de Rien. This chanced the 23 of January, after five daies siege. Conquer yeelds vpon their approach, & Breft followed, a most strong place, and the key of all the country.

Thus Ploermel, Chateaubriant, Malestroit, Vitre, Fougères, S. Malo, Dinan, S. Albin, Guingamp, Conquer, Breft, and other places, are in the Kings power. The Nobility disappointed for the most part of their best places, shroud themselues vnder the conqueror: there is small hope of succours. The English are diuided among themselves: the King of the Romanes hath worke at home, and those small succours that come from both, preuaile nothing: there is no money in the treasury, the Souldiers are not paid, the Crowne is wortht eight Frankes: Anne is forced to sell of her reuenues for the maintenance of her house: and to aggravate these mischiefs, her Council is greatly diuided about her marriage. The Marshall of Rieux, and the Lady of Laual, hold for Alain of Albret, but these will none of him. She protests, that whatsoeuer she had done in her fathers life, was in respect of him, being loth to disobey him, or to giue him discontent; and causeth the said protestation to be signified vnto him. The Chancellor and the Earle of Comenges, support her against the Marshall: he flies to armes, and besiegeth the Chancellor at Guerrende, (being seized of Annes person, to keepe her from falling into his hands, who would marry her against her will, where he pleased,) but he could not enter. All these confusions made an easie way to the King, for the execution of his enterprises. Being thus oppressed, she sends to her allies, the Kings of England, Castile and Romanes: the English succour her (and in a manner beyond her expectation) with an army of nine or ten thousand men, vnder the command of Cheney Master of the horse, accompanied with the Comptroller, and Ambassador of England: not for any hatred hee bare vnto the King, but for feare of too mighty a neighbor, if hee vnted this goodly Prouince to the Crown. The Marshall of Rieux, (hauing another meaning apart, seeking to tye the English Commanders vnto him, and to draw them to his faction) sends the Master of the horse of Britany, and the Lord of Kacrouff, to Penmarch, to receiue this Ambassador, and to offer him a conuoy to goe to the Duchesse, (who to haue this army neere vnto her person, makes it to land at Croisic, a port neere vnto Guerrende.) And to haue the people at his deuotion, Rieux giues out, that the Earles of Dunois & Comenges, the Chancellor and others, had laid a plot to deliuer the Duchesse to the French King. Anne fortified with this new supply, goes to field, desirous herselfe (being a Virgin) to affront the Marshall of Rieux, if hee presented himselfe: and being preuented of her entry into Nantes by the Marshall, she retires to Rennes, to giue order for the recovery of Guingamp. For this effect, she assembles some troopes, being assured that the French garison could not be suddenly releued, the kings army being employed far off in the conquest of the townes of base Britany. These troopes were seized of Pontrieu, & to stop the courses of Guingamp, had sent some gentlemen, with a number of the common people. Those of Guingamp encounter them, charge them, ouerthrow them, and kill many of the chiefe Gentlemen of note, William of Rostren Lord of Breledi, Thon of Ploerqueler Siegneur of Kaegabin, Thon of Ledeursault, K. aerloët, Pontgrou, Kaerneckrion, Botloy, Pregon, the eldest son to the Lord of Lanecrion, and an infinite number of the Commons. They presently take Pontrieu, sack it, and burne it. This was the sixteenth of Aprill. The next day, Goniquet being aduertised that about a thousand five hundred men of the English army, appeared at the Isle of Brehat, he went vnto them, and so wrought with the Commanders, as they landed at Pontrieu. The French hauing notice hereof, being about a thousand five hundred horse, being loth to ingage their honors in a place not to be held, without succours, and ill furnished with victuals and munition, they set fire of many places of the Towne cary away what they can, exact 1200 Crownes of the Inhabitants, and retire themselves, leading eight hostages, for the security of fifty thousand Franckes, granted by the Inhabitants to the Vicount of Rohan. This English army was presently followed by another of Spaniards, niards, commanded by Don Diego Pexes of Sarmiento Earle of Salmas, consisting of 4000 men at armes, and a great number of foot. Now Anne is strong, fortified with two new armies; and the King feares, that in stead of invading another mans Country, hee shall be forced to defend his owne. To prevent all danger, hee fortifies his frontiers, and sends Francis of Luxembourg, Vicount of Mariques, and Charles of Marigny, to Henry the seventh King of England, to draw him from the alliance of Britany, considering his bond vnto the King, by whose meanes hee was installed in the royall throne: but they were fruitlesse admonitions. The Kings calls for his Nobility, and all his companies of men at armes, and resolves to enter Britany with the greatest forces of this Realme. In the meane time hee puts two thousand foure hundred foot into Chasteaugontier and Proence; John of Bellay with his company of forty Lances into Brest: into Conquet Claude of Montfaulon, and Bongars a Captaine of foot, with artillery, victuals and munition: and foure thousand French and Swizzers were distributed into Dinan, Fougues, Saint Malo, and Vitre. But this was not sufficient to assure these places: a man of service doth oftentimes import more then the whole body of a towne. He therefore practiseth with John of Quellenec, Vicount of Fout, Admirall of Britany, by the meanes of the Vicount of Rohan. This Admirall armes some ships, to keepe the Brittons from besieging of Brest by sea, and Maurice du Mené (of whom we haue made some mention) with the Lord of Chastel (newly reduced to the Kings service, by the Lord of Kacriac) took the guard of the sea coast, to hinder the enemies landing. In the meane time the Britton lodge their strangers at Lamballe, and assemble all into one body. The Marshall of Rieux, impatient to haue bene left Tutor vnto Anne by testament, and not to haue her in his possession, being too weak to take her by force in regard of Alain, shee seeks to the English, and sends Sourdac to Henry, to let him vnderstand, that Albret might assist him much in the recovery of Guienne. That it were good to binde him vnto him by the marriage of Anne of Britany, and to sequester those from her that were opposite. When please, he hath the meanes to draw her into his Captaines power, vnder colour to perswade her to visit these great and goodly succours, that were come to serue her. Yet could he not preuaile in this point. She had already conceived some ialousie of the English: for her Treasurer (carrying them sixe thousand Crownes, which they had required, attending their pay) had discouered, that they treated with the Kings men, and that they were now in speech of a truce. Being moued herewith, he doth aduertise Henry, and beseecheth him to giue order, beleuing that this dealing was not with his consent. She complaines moreover, that the Marshall of Rieux detained Nantes from her, kept her retenuues, placed and displaced her officers: beseeching the king to command the Lieutenant of his army, to giue no support nor fauour vnto Rieux against her, but to pursue him as a rebell, and disobedient to his Princesse, attempting against her & her authority. Henry won by the Marshall, assures the Duchesse of the continuance of his great loue, and that he will answer at large to that which her Ambassadors had propounded, by some that he would send vnto her. In the meane time he desires his Army should goe to Rennes to the Duchesse, or that she might go to thê, to the end she might visibly see, if those forces were sufficient to succor her. And he giues her to vnderstand by Tusbourne Secretary of state that he had sent his Army to succor her against all men, and especially against Rieux: so as the army with the commanders may come to her to Rennes, or that she may go to the army, as she shall thinke best. A grosse policy, easily discouered at the first sight, that this was but a practice to put her and the chiefe of her counsell into strangers hands, to rule her at their pleasure. Anne finds this condition of hard digestion. And Henry fearing lest this distrust should make her to sue for an accord with the King, aduiseeth, that the surest meanes to fortifie the Duchesse party against the French, was the Marshalls reconciliation with her: and wrought therein so politically, that by mediation of John of Coetman and other Noblemen of Britany, an accord was made betwixt the Duchesse, the Earle of Comminges, and others of that party, with the Lords of Albret & Rieux, and the Lady of Laual: so as in the beginning of January all quarrels were pacified, and all were vntied in the common seruice of their country. During this treaty, the Marshall well informed that Brest & Conquet wanted both munition & victuals, went to besiege the fortresse of Brest by land and sea with threecore Britton ships: and the English went to Conquet. The King knowing how much these places did import, sends S. Pierre and Chazeron with 5000 foot,

A foot, to ioyne with the forces of Rohan, Saint Andre, the Seneschals of Tholousa and Carcassonne: and to draw forth part of the Garisons of Vitre, Fougues and Dinan; and five and twenty ships by sea, which put all the gallies to of Britany to fight; and after their example, the army at land retires so hastily, as they leaue part of their Cannon, wherewith the Towne was furnished, victualled, and relieved with fresh men: and Conquer likewise was freed from the siege of the English. Winter approached, and the cold and rainie weather forced both armies to leaue the field. And therefore a new truce was concluded, during the which, Iudges should be appointed to examine the interest of all parties: who for that effect should be sent to Auignon, a neuter towne, and they should name a neuter Prince, who (according to the report of the Iudges) should denie the controuersie. Maximilian was chosen. Doubtlesse it was a folly to spend much in spices, and want good intelligence. The King being vpon the point to consummate his marriage with the Arch-dukes daughter, relied on him. But in whose fauour should hee giue sentence, being in no good tearmes with the King; and hoping on the other side to ioyne vnto his ordinary tutor, the quality of Duke of Britany? Charles and Anne send their deputies vnto him, who are referred to Franckford. The Iudges come and pronounce a sentence, but not definitiue: That the King should deliuer all such places as he held, vnto the Duchesse, except, S. Albin, Cormier, Dinan, Fougues, and S. Malo, which should be sequestered into the hands of Maximilian, and the Duke of Bourbon: and to yield them vnto him to whom the Duchy should be adiudged: and all Frenchmen that bare armes, should leaue the Country, and the Duchesse likewise should dismisst the English, and other strangers. Taking a new assignation at Tournay, to iudge definitiue of the cause: but all this was but to win time. Maximilian makes his peace with the King, for his owne regard, whereby many places he held in Flanders were deliuered: and during these treaties, Isabel the sister of Anne of Britany dies at Rennes the tenth of Iune.

Anne remaining sole heire, the King of Romanes loue increased, and the Duchesse deuoted to be supported against the King, made her willingly yeeld. And for that Maximilian could not goe in person, he deutes the Earle of Nassau, Walpurgus Baron of Polhem in Austria, James Gondebaur his Secretary, and Lopian Steward of his house, with authority to treat, and conclude the marriage and to wed the said Duchesse. Notwithstanding the truce, no man will leaue his hold, neither will the King giue over the places he holds, nor the Duchesse dismisst her strangers, but some part of them, and puts the rest into Garisons. Shee sends not to Auignon, fearing perhaps the surprize of her writings. The Garison of Nantes runnes ouer Poictou, Anion, and other Countries. The Kings troopes commit the like acts of hostility. Some Germans enter into Britany. The Chancellor of Montauban goes to solicit in England. Charles will haue Anne first to discharge her English and Castilians. Anne replies, that in like sort hee ought by the treaty of Franckford, to yeeld her her places, and to leaue the other foure townes about mentioned, as neuters. Shee imputes the spoyles of Nantes, to the former diuisions betwixt her and the Marshall of Rieux, and promisseth that hereafter the like infolencies shall not be committed. That the Germanes comming was onely to force some of her subjects to obedience. That the Chancellors going to the King of England, was to agree vpon the charges due for the succours he had sent. That in truth, seeing the King to make new preparations to the prejudice of their treaty, shee had giuen the Chancellor commission, to treat for some succours of men. The King is discontented herewith, so as Grenenê and Coetqueu her Ambassadors returne with no other answer but a new assignation at Tournay. In the meane time the King armes, and makes great preparations at Pont-See, Anne serues him with the same fauce. Shee solicites the Kings of England and Castile, and her new spouse, to ioyne their forces, and to invade France with a might army. He that cannot circumuent his enemy with the Lions skin, must vie the Foxes. Charles is aduertised of this new alliance of Austria and Britany. The neighbourhood is dangerous, being thus fortified. He must auoyde this, and by some meanes get that for himselfe, with an ill neighbour pretends. Hee therefore sends to treat with the Duchesse, but she cannot affect him, that had shewed himselfe so violent an enemy. Yet he finds another expedient. Alain of Albret was frustrate of his hopes, and this deniall had mightily discontented him: he was therefore easily drawne away. The duke of Bourbon gouernes him so absolutely for a time, that vpon certaine promises and other preterments, he wins him for the King, who promisseth to deliuer him the towne of Nantes, wherein hee might doe A much, being armed with the Marshall of Rieux fauor. The effects follow: Alain surpriseth the castle of Nantes, and in hatred of Annes disdaine, he spoiles the Treasury of the dukes of Britany, in the which were all their precious stones, and the Duchesses Jewels, and deliuereth both Towne and Castle into the Kings hands, yielding him the right he pretended to the Duchy, by reason of his wife Frances of Britany, daughter to William Vicount of Limoges, a younger brother of the House of Ponthieure, for a pension of five hundred pounds a yeare, issuing out of the lands of Gaure, neere Tholouze; whereunto the Chamber of Account at Paris, with the Kings Proctor Generall, and the Inhabitants of Gaure opposed, maintaining, that there was no recompence due to the Lord of Albret for that seruice, seeing he had none. The King (who was in Sentenell) marcheth thither in person with his army, the fourth of Aprill, hoping now to finish this warre, and to send home the English. Hee marcheth, with an intent to besiege Anne in Rennes, whither this new terror had drawne her. But they had so suddenly peested all the approaches with numbers of trees cut out off the neereest forest, as they were forced to giue ouer that enterprize, to vndertake the siege of Guingamp, being the key of bafe Britany. The Inhabitants were reduced to extreme poeury, hauing lodged the English army almost a yeare, who for want of payment, had spoyled them of all their goods, and left it ill guarded with men for defence. Tremouille Lieutenant for the King, had this charge, who sent Adrian l' Hospital before, with part the army, to beleaguer the place. At his approach the inhabitants demanded a composition: the Lieutenant receiues them, with assurance of life and goods. But in his absence, he cannot saue the towne from spoile.

taken.

Then fell out the appointment for Tournai: Anne sends sixteene Deputies, who finde the gates shut against them, and no lodging but in the suburbs: the King disdaining this treaty, hauing intelligence of the marriage of Maximilian with Anne: fore-seeing, that from this stocke might spring a plant, which hereafter might crosse his estate. Maximilian was now much moued for the taking of Nantes: the Emperour Fredericke his father held a Diet at Noremberg, to provide howe meane to recouer this losse, and to encounter the French forces. The Princes of Germany promise him twelue thousand Laskes, which the Colonell George of Terreplaine should bring to him by August follow. D ing. The King of England should augment this army with a leaue of six thousand English. But the discord that fell out betwixt these two Princes, and the tediousnesse of the Germans, who are wonderful beaury, gaue the King meane to effect his desire, and to supplant Maximilian.

The Duke of Orleanse freed from prison.

At that time the King freed the Duke of Orleanse from prison, and by the same meane the Prince of Orange and the Earle of Dunois were reconciled vnto him. These meane were great meane to put the King in Maximilians place, being onely married by a Deputy. The Councell found no better expedient, to pacifie all these quarrels and troubles. But the Duchesse was strange: what meane is there (saith shee) to loue a Prince, who these three yeares hath made such cruell warres against mee? being a pupill and vnder age? who detraceth my Townes vniuersity? who spoyles my subiects? doth out-rage, and kill my officers, vpon refusal to pay him my rents and reuennues? who (notwithstanding former transactions passed betwixt vs) spoyles my Country, makes desolate my townes, and hath fought tyrannically to seize vpon my person. It was needfull to employ many great personages to pacifie this discontented mind. The King sends the Duke of Orleanse to that end, who cunningly doth practise the Marshall of Rieux, the Chancellor of Montauban, and others of the Councell, with the Lady of Laul (gouernesse to the Duchesse) and other Ladies her familiars, who both publicly and priuately lay before her, her fore-past dangers, the miseries in the which her subiects had been plungeth through warre, the neighbourhood of so mighty a King, who would continually oppress her, and the farre distance of Maximilian, a poore Prince, full of affaires, and of small credit, who hath no meane to raise her, neither could he euer succour her with a boue two thousand men. That shee had no better meane to purchase rest to her selfe, and peace to her subiects, then by imbracing the alliance of King Charles, whereby she should not onely recouer her places, but of a Duchesse of Britany, should become a peaceable Queene, and welbeloued of the whole Realme. If they were both married, it was but by Attorneys: finally, in such accidents, the Church doth willingly dispence with

A with such couenants not personally performed, to preuent the miseries that grow by war. Maximilian was farre off, vnacquainted with these practices, no man sought to preuent it: and these perswasions did ring dayly in the eares of Anne, to as in the end shee yeelds to follow the resolution of her states. They were wonderfully toyled and wearied with the warre, the people turmoyled, the Nobility impouerished, the Clergy oppressed, some townes taken, and some wauering: and moreover, they did see a great Prince demand their alliance with force, and the chiefe Noblemen inclined to the French faction. These reasons made it seeme more conuenient, and to be preferred before the flow succours of Maximilian.

1) Thus was Anne Duchesse of Britany perswaded, and a peace concluded and ratified by a happy and pleasing treaty of marriage, by the which (to maintaine the subiects of the Country in peace that were armed for either side) it was said, That all exploits and offences committed and done vpon assurance, or otherwise, during the wars on either side, should be forgotten, and remaine without reproach to any, as remitted, abolished, and recompensed: every man should returne to his home, and all soldiers depart the Country. A wife aduice to maintaine these two Countries in loue and concord. The City of Rennes yeelds at this happy composition, where the King entred in Nouember, vpon the assurance & consuet of the duke of Orleanse, with his simple traine, and without any men at armes, (for so it was agreed) to see the Duchesse, and to ratifie the treaty, making the Prince of Orange (for that he had been a chiefe instrument in this businesse) his Lieutenant generall in Britany: then heooke the way to Langeais in Touraine, whither Anne was conducted by the Chancellor Montauban, Coetquen Lord Steward, and by the Lord of Chasteaubriant, and the marriage was consummated the 16 day of December. The Articles of the contract are to be seen in the Originals. If this marriage were pleasing to God or not, let vs leaue it to the iudicious reader: so it is, that of three sons they could not bring vp one. Soone after Francis of Orleanse Earle of Dunois died, the chiefe fire-brand of this war, & likewise the principall motiue of this peace. From him are issued the dukes of Longueuille, and a little before him the second D. of Bourbon was deceased without children, to whom succeeded Peter Earle of Beaueux, who hereafter shall be D. of Bourbon, the eleuenth of that name.

treaty of marriage.The marriage of Charles with Anne.

2) This yeare was borne Gaston of Foix, duke of Nemours, son to Iohn of Foix, Vicount of Narbone, and of Mary of Orleanse, one of the greatest Captaines of his age, who shall giue ample testimony of himselfe in the wars of Italy, which now approach. There dyed also at Rome, Peter of Foix, Cardinall, brother to the said Iohn, and Vncle to Queene Katherine of Nauarre. Henry of England, wonderfully incensed at this marriage, sought by all secret practices to surprize some of the chiefe places of the Prouince: and at the first retreat of his army out of Britany, he caused it to make an offer at Port-blanc, and some other ports, but they were still repulsed by the faithfull care of the Noblemen of the Country: namely, by the Chancellor of Montauban, of Barraud d'Acigné, and other les-Captaines. Thus the English seeing their attempts like to take none effect bent their course to goe towards Calais, in the company of their King: who was making war in the County of Guines, whilst that Maximilian should enter the Realme with forces on the other side: then they besieged Boulle by sea, being kept from landing by the Lord of Cordes, and the bastard of Cardonne, Captaine of Arras, with such small forces as they could suddenly oppose.

But oh Bastard! whilst thou repellst this common enemy, how preiudiciall shall thy absence be from Arras? Four young gallants (saith the history) make false keyes to the gates, and gaue Maximilian intelligence, bringing him by night into the towne, vnknewe to Cardonne, Lieutenant to Cardonne. Some write that one of those, in whom he trusted for the opening of the gates, made this stratagem. But (howsoeuer) he was taken in his bed sleeping at his ease, and for a second token of bafe cowardise, he yeelded vp the Castle, without attending the succors that came vnto him. The towne was spoyled, without sparing of the Churches, or the Traitors houses. A worthy reward of their treachery. Thus wee preferre our Conquests. A while after they attempted Amiens, a shame to soldiers, that a woman should heare the first brute, and that her advertisement to the watch, in ringing the great Bell of Beffroy, should put the towne in armes. And as the first aduice came from a woman, so are they honourably qualified in the History. To be borne arms with their husbands, who by the care and command of Rubempré and of Anthony Clabault Maire of the Towne, did their duties so well (en-ry one repairing to the quarter, which had been formerly assigned him) as the enemy re-turned amazed. A duty which made them as famous, as their descendants infamous, by the notable treachery they committed in our dayes.

Peace with Italy.

Henry loved Peace, and was imbarke more at the instance of his subjects, (lest they should thinke him more gracious to the French then the ancient quarrels of both nation required) then for any desire he had to haue the King his Enemy, to whom he had a great and strict bond, as we haue heard. The chiefe cause of his grudge was a great summe of money, which he said he had lent to the deceased Duke of Britany. The King hauing discovered it, commands the Lord of Cordes to treat with him, and payes him the money, and so sends him home satisfied into England.

And with Maximilian.

This Peace made Maximilian willing to be reconciled. Moreouer, the Princes of Germany labored in this pacification, and the affaires of the Empire (in which his father had associated him since the yeare 1486) beganne to call him. The Swisses laboured it, and the people, especially those of the Low Countries (as well through the French warres, as by their owne priuate diuisions) were so toiled, as they detested the wars. In the end, a peace was concluded for four yeares only, by the means of the Duke of Bourbon, the Prince of Orange, and the Lord of Cordes. So he receiued his daughter Marguerit againe, with the Counties of Artois and Bourgogne, receiuing the reuenues and homages, and the King keeping the Castles, to place garisons in them, vntill the end of four yeares. Behold this Estate doth now enioy a happy rest, by the vnion of this goodly and great Duchy to the Crowne of France, and by a Peace confirmed with Henry and Maximilian. But as Charles had enlarged his Diadem with this new acquisition, so the vrgent importunity of his Schoolmaster, Louis of Amboise, Bishop of Albi, and of Doctor Maillard, made him to restore the Counties of Roussillon and Pargignan (too religiously) vnto Ferdinand King of Arragon, the which Louis & his father had gotten, hoping by this means to re the Spaniard to a perpetual peace. What should Charles doe then with his Nobility and his youth, he being young, vigorous, and of no idle complexion? Now a great desire makes him to cast his eyes beyond the Alpes, and drawes him to the conquest of goodly and rich Estates. But let vs examine the causes and proceedings farther off.

The first mo-tiue of the voyage of Italy.

We haue said before, that René Duke of Lorraine was in Court, and demanded restitu-tion of the Duchy of Barre, and the County of Prouence. During his aboad, the Realme of Naples being reuolted, the Nobilitie and the three Estates of the Realme put them-selves vnder the protection of the Church, as holding of it in fee. The Pope sends for René to inuest him in the Realme, vpon some right which he pretended. The Gallies of Genoa attended him; the Cardinall of S. Pierre was there to conduct him, and some from all the Noblemen of the Country prest him therunto, where they expected him so long, as the Pope was forced to make an agreement with Ferdinand, being assisted by the Florentines. Vpon assurance of this accord, which the Pope, the Venetians, the King of Spaine, and the Florentines had sworne and were bound to see obserued, the Barons of the realme re- turne home to their houses, and were all taken prisoners. The Prince of Salerne, chiefe of the house of S. Seuerin, escapes, and three of his nephewes with him, sonnes to the Prince of Bisignan, who retire themselves to Venice, and demand of the Seigneury what refuge they would wish them to chioose; to the duke of Lorraine, or to the king of France or of Spaine. The Venetians answer, That the duke of Lorraine was a dead man, vnable to sup- port so heavy a burthen: That the king of Spaine was already strong at sea, and the realms of Naples and Sicily would make him too mighty: that they had liued in good correspon- dency with the Kings of France, who in former times had possessed the said realmes. The delays of the Lorraine being but poore, made them thus to qualifie him: for he wanted neyther couragion nor valour. They were iealous of the neighborhood of a mighty prince, and did not consider that to call in a King of France to these Estates was the means to ruine them. So they passe into France, where the affaires of Britany held them about two yeares in their pursuit. One called Stephen deuers, a man of bafe sort, who had serued the King well in his infancy, as a Groom of his chamber, and now made Seneschall of Beau- caire, and president of the Accompts of Paris, and the Generall Brissones, afterwards Car- dinal, ruled their Maister.

These Neopolitanes gouerne them, and they imbarke him in this voyage, who of him- selfe

Wants for this voyage.

A selfe was farall: he wanted all necessary things. The King was young, and weake of comple- xion, he had few good Commanders, and fewer wife men: no money, and him/elfe wil- full, the best was, he had a gallant Nobilitie and young, but ill commanded, nothing o- bedient, and too wilfull like to their head, the which notwithstanding purchased the king an immortall glory. The leading and retorne of this army doublelesse was the worke of heauen. Before his departure, Charles required ayd and counsell of the Venetians. Ayd we cannot giue you (say they) for feare of the Turke, yet were they in peace with him, and the Turke then reigning was of small reputation. As for counsell it were presumption for us to counsell so wife a King, assisted with so good counsell; notwithstanding wee will helpe you rather then hurt you, and you shall be very welcome. In truth God will haue vs to confesse, that neyther the wit nor policy of man can disappoint that which his eternall prouidence had decreed. This succeeded otherwise then that Common weale expected. First, they conceiued not that the King would vndertake this voyage in person: moreover, they hoped to be reuenged of this House of Arragon, whom they hated exceedingly, imputing it to Ferdinand, as the means to draw downe Mahomet Othoman, who conquered Constantinople, and had done many outrages to the Venetians; and Alphonso sonne to the said Ferdinand had stirred vp the Duke of Ferrara to make that chargeable warre against them, the which had almost ruined them; and had sent a man to Venice to poyson their Cisternes, with many other complaints which they framed against this house. But the chiefe motiue was, for that by their means they could not extend their dominions, as well in Italy as in Greece. Thus they thought to vte the King as a scourge to whip the enemy, but not to ruine him; and by their shipwracke to haue means to seize vpon some townes in Apulia lying vpon the Gulfe, as it happened.

This was one motiue to transport the French Forces beyond the Alpes. Another was, that Bonne a daughter of Sauoy & widow to John Galeas D. of Milan, a woman both with- out honor & iudgment, was chiefly gouerned by a Secretary of hers, named Chico, bred vp in that house, and by her Caruer, Antonio Tascino. Chico to assure the estate of the young duke John Galeas son to the said John, had expelled all his fathers bretheren, Vncles to the sonne, and amongst the rest Lodowike Sforze, and Robert of Saint Seuerin, sonne of a bastard daughter of the house of Saint Seuerin: Tascino (who had a great interest in his Ladies bed and fauour) calls them home with her consent. Being returned, they take Chi- co, and against their promise to offer him any violence, they put him in a pipe, and drag- ging him through the cite of Milan, send him prisoner to Paui, where he died, and they modestly dismissed Tascino.

Lodowike Sforze seeks to violate the Duchy of Milan.

Lodowike and Robert freed from these two obstacles, fortifie themselves neere the Du- chesse, and euen then did Lodowike practice to vsurpe the Duchy of Milan. For the first fruits of this proiect, they sequester the two sonnes of Bonne and lodge them in the Castle, and feize vpon the treasure (which was then held to bee the greatest in Christen- dome). They make three keys, whereof three kept one, but they had the guard of all. They force her to renounce the Wardship, and Lodowike was made Tutor. This was not all: the Castle was carefully kept, and the Capitaine went not without the turne-pikes. Lodowike and Robert were not admitted, but with one or two followers. But two great Princes cannot raigne long together in one State without ialousie. Lodowike supplantes Robert, and puts him from all gouernment.

Thus Lodowike commands Milan absolutely, and Robert serues the Venetians: yet Galeas and the Earle of Caiazzo, children to Robert, shall retorne and doe Lodowike good seruice in the State of Milan. Then began Lodowike to increase in authority, grauing the dukes picture on the one side of their coyne, and his owne on the other, not without the murmuring of many, namely, of Isabel the wife of Alphonso Duke of Calabria, son to Ferdinand King of Arragon, as proud and haughty a woman, as her husband was weake of iudgment and without courage. This reyning made Lodowike to hasten his re- solution. And thus he proceeded: when the Duke went forth of the Castle, his brother remained within, and Lodowike conducting him home, the Capitaine did vically come forth vpon the bridge to receiue him. One day among the rest, Lodowike stays him pur- posely a little without the bridge, to draw forth the Capitaine, whom Galeas and the Earle of Caiazzo feize vpon, and on such as followed him.

that were in his power, if they yeeld not the place before the light be burnt: the which A they doe. He enters and placeth men at his pleasure: he puts the Capitaine in prison; and arraignes him, upon colour that he meant to deliuer vp the Castle to the Emperour. *Hee slayes some Germans, and makes them beleaze that they treated in fauour of the house of Austria, which of old time pretended some right to the Duchy: yet afterwards both hee and they were set at liberty. Lodowike is now master of the Fort. Hee must seeke meanes to maintaine this vsurpation: yet lest he should grow too odious, he makes all dispatches in the name of Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan his Nephew, a Duke in name only, but he in effect. In the meane time Isabel solicits her father and grandfather, to reuenge the iniustice and tyranny of Lodowike. Lodowike vnderstood well, that this act would offend many Princes: that his insolent and not accustomed exaction of mony made his name odious to all the subiects of the Duchy: and that Ferdinand King of Arragon with his sonne Alphonsus, would not faile to imbrace the quarrell and right of Iohn Galeas and of their Isabel. To crosse them, he cunningly (to the preiudice of the ancient confederacy of the Estates of Italy) makes a league betwixt the Pope, the Venetians, and Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan his Nephew (arming himselfe alwaies with that name) for their common defence, and namely of Lodowiks government, vpon condition, that the Venerians, and the said Duke should either of them send presently two hundred men at armes to Rome, and greater forces (if need were) for the recovery of such places as were detayned from the Church by Virgilius Vrsinus in fauour of Peter of Medicis his kinsman, associate with Ferdinand, and Alphonsus. And more to crosse their estates, Lodowike (who could not submitt to the midst of their united forces) sends an honourable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Caliz was the chiefe, assisted by Charles of Balbiano Earle of Belzoiofo, and Galeas of Saint Severin, who had married a bastard of Lodowikes: who greatly vrge the title he had to this goodly and pleasant country of Naples. They easily drew the King to taste a vaine glory of Italy, perswading him by great offers of seruice, luccors of men, money, and munition. But before we passe the Alpes, let vs examine the estate of Italy, and the right which our Charles pretended. Since the declining of the Roman Empire, Italy neuer enioyed a more happy prosperitie, then about the year 1490. A long peace had made the most barren places fruitful, it abounded in people, riches, great men of State, and good wits; in learning, D industry and military fame, such as that age could produce, beautified with the State of many Princes, not subiect to any other command but of themselves.*

Italy 1490.

Laurence of Medicis, a Citizen of Florence, was a great meanes to hold things in this prosperous Estate, a man of a quiet spirit, experienced in affaires, iudicious, of great authority aboue all his fellow Citizens, and (for that he gouerned Pope Innocent the eighth, his kinsman absolutely) renowned throughout all Italy. Hee knew that the greatnesse of other Potentates, would mightily shake the common weale of Florence, and therefore he sought by all meanes to hold them equall, by a generall oblation of peace. Ferdinand of Arragon, King of Naples, a wife Prince, and of great reputation, did much affect this publike quiet, but he had worke at home: Alphonsus Duke of Calabria his eldest sonne, being much discontented, seeing that Iohn Galeas Sforce, Duke of Milan his sonne in law, should cary but the naked and simple title of Duke, vnder the oppression of Lodowike his vnkle. But Ferdinand hauing yet a fresh impression of the late reuolt of his subiects of Naples, not ignorant that at the first motion they would open their armes to the house of France, considering the affection which most of his subiects bare vnto it of old, feared lest the diuisions in Italy should draw the French to inuade the Realme of Naples: preferring a present benefit before the indignation of his son, desiring rather to vaine himselfe with the other Estates, especially that of Milan and Florence, to countermeine the Venetians greatnesse, being then fearfulfull to all Italy, putt vp with the late ouerthrow of the Duke of Ferrara, father in law to Lodowike, after a long and dangerous hazard of their estate. Lodowike was in the same predicament with the rest: and moreover, peace was farre more necessary then war, for the preservation of an authority lately vsurped. Hereunto that commendable inclination to peace which he found in Laurence of Medicis, did moue him. And considering, that in regard of the inueterate hatred betwixt the house of Arragon and the Venetians, they should hardly make any firme league betwixt them, hee therewith concluded, that Ferdinand and his son should not be at need assisted by any other, to crosse him in his designs: and hauing them alone opposit, he should easily withstand them.

A So Ferdinand, Lodowike, and Laurence continued the alliance cheerfully which they had renewed in the year 1480, for five and twenty yeares: all the meane Potentates in a manner leaning vnto them: to whom the Venetians greatnesse was wonderfully suspected, managing their affaires apart, not imparting their counsels to the body of the common league, watching onely opportunity to grow great by the publike discords. Being all thus vnted, they were too strong for the Venetians; yet were they full of enmy and mutual ieaousie, one prying still into anothers estate, and continually making designs, so as they could not long lue in true and faithfull friendship.

The death of Laurence of Medicis, was a great cause of the breach of this generall peace. B An inseasonable death for him, hauing not yet liued foure and forty yeares complete: for his country, the which (by his wisdom and iudgement) flourished most happily in all the benefits which a long peace doth vsually bring forth; and for Italy, as well by reason of the affaires which he did wisely manage, to the generall good of the whole country, as also for that he was a notable instrument to temper the diuers humours & ieaousies which sprung vp daily betwixt Ferdinand and Lodowike, and to quench the flames which might easily cause a generall combustion.

This peace being well shaken by his death, was presently quite broken; not so much by the death of Innocent, who by his sloth was growne vnprofitable as well for himselfe, his friends, and the publike, after he had retired his armes, the which he had displayed at the C instance of the Barons of Naples; as by the succession of Roderike Borgia, who was then called Alexander the 6, a Spaniard, chosen vnder the factious discords of Ascanius Sforce, brother vnto Lodowike, and Julian of Saint Pierre, buying the suffrages of many other Cardinals, partly with ready money, and partly by promises of Offices and Benefices. He was subtil and quick-witted, excellent in counsell, vnto element to perfwade, and a great man of State. But (saith the Originally) his vertues were surpassed by his vices, dishonest in manners, insincerity, no shame, no faith, no religion in him: but an insatiable covetousnesse, an immoderate ambition, a cruelty more then barbarous, and a violent desire to aduance (by what means [power] his children, which were many in number. Peter the eldest sonne of Laurence of Medicis, was successor to his goodly honours, but not to his fathers good humours. Peter differed as much from Laurence, as that Hector drawne dead at a chariots taile, from Hector returning victorious, honoured with the spoiles of Achilles.

Troubles by the death of Innocent of Medicis.

Pope Alexander
disposition.

The peace of Italy turned by Peter of Medicis.

At his entrance to the government, following an aduice directly contrary to his father, without any other counsell then of Virgilius Vrsinus, of whose humour Peter depended (both their Mothers being of the family of Vrsinus) he made so strict a league with Ferdinand and Alphonsus, as Lodowike (a vigilant and subtil man) conceived presently that the Florentine forces might easily be drawne to preiudice him, in fauour of the Arragonois. This ieaousie was layed open by this accident. The confederates according to their custome, must send to congratulate and acknowledge the new Pope. Lodowike had wisely aduised, that all the Ambassadors should enter Rome together in company, and likewise E into the Consiistory before the Pope, and that one should speak for them all: For (saith he) by this manner of proceeding we shall make knowne to Italy, that there is not onely a singular lone and league betwixt vs, but also so firme a coniunction, as we shall seeme to be but one body and one Principality. Ferdinand approued this aduice. Peter did not publicly gaine-say it, but in private he could not digest it, being one of the Ambassadors chosen for the common weale of Florence, hauing resolved to beautifie his Ambassage, with a proud and stately traine. Hee considered, that entering into Rome, and presenting himselfe to the Pope in troope, his traine would appeare farre lesse stately in so great a company. And therefore he caused the King of Naples to frustrate this designe, as not to bee done without confusion. But Ferdinand loth to displease one to please another, doth aduertise F Lodowike, that hee did not recall his first consent, but at the instant request of Peter of Medicis.

There was yet another reason, which made Lodowike to suspect some secret intelligence betwixt Peter and the Arragonois. Francisco Cibo, bastard sonne to Innocent, after his fathers death had retired himselfe to Florence, to Peter of Medicis, brother to Magdalene his wife. Being planted there, Virgilius Vrsinus bought of him, by Peters meanes, Langguillare, Ceruette, and some other places nere to Rome, for forty thousand Ducats. The money was in a manner all lent him by Ferdinand, of purpose, to the end that Virgilius being being his kinsman and entertained fouldier, growing great about Rome, he might escape the more profit. Ferdinand found no better foundation for his safety, then to tie all or the greatest part of the Noblemen, within the territories of the Church, to suppress that Heresies head, if it should rise too high. This he laboured more carefully, doubting that Lodowike authority would prove great hereafter with the Pope, by the means of Cardinal Ascanius his brother.

The vanity of mans conceits must needs discover the weaknesse of his judgement. Of two mischiefs Ferdinand did choote the greatest, and grounding vpon a light profit, hee did not fore see, that he layed the way open to his owne ruine. For the Pope discouraging the Arragonis intention, and pretending that by the alienation of these small places lying in his iurisdiction, done without his priuie, they were by right forfeited to the Apollonike Sea. He exclaimes and complains against Ferdinand, Peter and Virgilius, protesting to omit no means that may serue for the defence of his dignity, and the rights of the Roman Sea. Lodowike embraceth this occasion, and seeing the Pope to study of some great reuenge against Ferdinand, he feeds his passions, by the loane of forty thousand Ducats and three hundred men at armes, leauied vpon the common treasure. Yet apprehending new troubles, he aduiseith Ferdinand, to perswade Virgilius, to content the Pope by some honest composition, to prevent the inconueniences & scandalls this diuorce might breed, and counselleth Peter to follow the domestick example of his father, and to be a mediator, as he had beene, betwixt Ferdinand and him, rather then a fire-brand to kindle diuision: but he talked to a deafe man. Ferdinand promisseth to doe it, but he ruined with one hand, what he raised with the other: he secretly solicits Virgilius to take possession of those townes, and not to yeeld the Pope any thing, but some certaine some of money, by means whereof he should remaine peaceable Lord of the said places, promising to warrant him from all troubles.

Lodowike finds hereby, that it behoues him to fortifie himselfe with new suppons and new alliances. He hath a good opportunity: the disdain of Alexander against the King of Naples, and the affection the Senate of Venice seemed to haue to the diuision of this league whereby their proiects had so long beene made frustrate. But the Pope loued his children dearely, and contrary to the custome of others) who called them Nephewes, as a more modest name) he impudently called them sonnes. He hoped to obtaine one of the bastard daughters of Alphonso, for one of his bastard sonnes (graft crab vpon crab, and you shall neuer reap good fruit) and whilst this vaine hope possessed him, he opened his eares rather then his heart to Lodowikes motion. Ferdinand, gaue his consent, but Alphonso hated the ambition and pride of Alexander. The Pope being thus frustrate, turnes all his thoughts to Lodowike, moued partly with disdain, and partly with feare, seeing Yvesin, by the exceeding great fauours which he received from Ferdinand and the Florentines, to be growne mighty in all the territories of the Church.

The Venetians had yet fresh in memory, the leagues made against them in the warres of Ferrara, in the which Sixtus had intangled them: and yet to withdraw them, he employed both his spirituall and temporal power. They had no more confidence in Alexander. Yet the policie of Lodowike did in the end worke this league, betwixt the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and the Duke of Milan, in the month of April 1493. Thus Lodowike is fortified on the one side: but he had another meaning then the Pope or Senate of Venice: and fore-seeing that he could not long build vpon the foundation of this new alliance, he resolves to assure himselfe by foraine forces, seeing that both his owne, and his friends in Italy were doubtfull vnto him. He therefore conuerteth his thought on this side the Alpes, seeking to draw the King to seize vpon the ancient inheritance of the house of Aniou. But let vs see by what right: Yvesin the fourth gaue the Realmes of Naples and Sicilia (vniuilly detained by Manfred bastard sonne to Frederick the second) to Charles Earle of Prouence, and of Aniou, to hold in fee, being brother to Saint Lewis, who obtained this title that was given him by armes. Charles the second succeeded his father, who left it to Robert his sonne, and this man died without heires. Joane daughter to Charles Duke of Calabria (d. ceased before his father) enioyed the succession. Being disinherited so to much for the sexe, as for the lewdnesse of her life: she adopts Lewis Duke of Aniou brother to King Charles the wife for her sonne, and then dyed of a violent death. Lewis passing thither with an army, dyed of an ague in Apulia, seeing himselfe almost in possession of the King.

A lesuabewas the Pope, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan.

The right of France to Naples and Sicilia.

A Kingdome: so as the house of Aniou reaped no profit by this adoption, but only of the Earledome of Prouence, which was continually possessed by the successors of Charles the first. Notwithstanding Lewis of Aniou sonne to the said Lewis, and afterwards the grappall child of the same name, thrust on by the Popes, as often as they had any quarrell with the Kings of Naples, haue often (but unfortunately) inuaded this Realme. By the death of Joane the Realme was transported to Charles of Durazzo issued his wife from Charles the first, to whom Ladislau his sonne succeeded: who dying without issue left his sister Regene the second for his heire: an unfortunate name in that place, whose indiscretion and impudency of life made them purchase the name of Volues. Lewis the third, making warre with the helpe of Martin the first against Joane, (leauing the government of the Realme to those to whom he had abandoned her body) she adopted for her sonne and heire, Alphonso, King of Arragon and Sicilia. Afterwards hauing renoked her adoption, vpon colour of ingratitude, she adopted the same Lewis: who employing his forces for her against Alphonso, expelled him the Realme: but he dyed the same yeare, leaving to his quiet possession the remainder of her life. Then, dying without children, she instituted René Duke of Aniou, and Earle of Prouence, for heire, being brother to the said Lewis her adoptiue sonne. This institution displeasing some Barons, who said that the will was forged by them of Naples, they called backe Alphonso. Hence sprung the warres and factions betwixt the Angeuins, and the Arragonois, nourished to long, by the couetousnesse of C Popes, who according to the opportunity of times, haue oftentimes granted their auctuities diuersly. Alphonso carrying it by force, and dying without lawfull heires, left Ferdinand his bastard to succeed, as a purchased share, not belonging to the Crowne of Arragon. John sonne to René assisted by the chiefe Barons of the Countrey, came to assaile him, but the happinesse and valor of Ferdinand giues him the repulce. René pursuing his sonne John, and dying without an heire male, names Charles his brothers sonne for heire, who dying without children, resigned all his inheritance to Lewis the Eleuenth, father to Charles the eight.

Charles was but two and twentie yeares old, little experienced in affaires, couetous of glory, and thrust on with a warlike desire; he often neglected the wholsome counsell of D the wisest, namely James of Grauille, Admiral of France, preferring the aduice of some of base quality that possessed him, corrupted by the Neapolitans that were retired for reliefe, and by the Ambassadors of Lodowike. The Nobility of France, commended the wisdom of Lewis the Eleuenth, who refused to accept of the Genouois when they offered themselves, being alwayes loth to attempt any thing vpon Italy, being both painfully and assaile to the Realme. They knew Ferdinand to be a wise Prince, rich in money, and of great fame; and his sonne Alphonso to be valiant, and well scene in the art of warre (but these were but shewes, and all their reputation turned into a ridiculous smoake). That for the government of Warre and State, the Kings Council was but weak, and their experience small that had most credit with him. He must haue a huge masse of money, and there was not any in his Treasury. Moreover, they objected the subtilty, and policy of the Italians: that Lodowike himselfe for a light profit would breake his faith: that hee would be loth to see the Kingdome of Naples, in the French Kings power; finally, to make any conquest beyond the Alpes, were to vnfurnish the Realme both of men and money.

All this was but to cast oyle into a fire already kindled. Charles rejects all aduice of peace, and with out the priuie of any but de Versa and Brissonne, he agrees secretly with Lodowikes Ambassadors: That an army passing into Italy for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Milan, should giue him passage through his Countrey, he should accompany him with five hundred men at armes: entertained: he should suffer him to arme what shipping he would at Genoa; and before he should march, he should lend the King two hundred thousand Ducats. On the other part, The King should defend the Duchy of Milan against all men; and should especially maintaine Lodowikes authority: and during the Warre, he should maintain two hundred lances in Als, a City belonging to the Duke of Orleans, to supply all necessities in the Duchy. This he signed with his owne hand, and promised more vnto Lodowike That going to the conquest of Naples, he should giue him the principality of Tarentum.

But did not Lodowike feare the power of so great a King, lately fortified with three goodly Prouinces of Bourgondy, Picardy and Britany, the which his father Francis Sforze would

All the wisest of the Kings Council dissuade him from the enterprise of Italy.

Articles betwixt Charles and Lodowike.

being his kinsman and entertained souldier, growing great about Rome, he might reape the more profit. Ferdinand found no better foundation for his safety, then to tie all or the greatest part of the Noblemen, within the territories of the Church, to suppress that Hierac head, if it should rise too high. This he laboured more carefully, doubting that Lodowikes authority would proue great hereafter with the Pope, by the meanes of Cardinal Ascanius his brother.

The vanity of mans conceits must needs discover the weaknesse of his iudgement. Of two mischiefs Ferdinand did choote the greatest, and grounding vpon a light profit, hee did not fore see, that he layed the way open to his owne ruine. For the Pope discovering the Arragonois intention, and pretending that by the alienation of these smal places lying in his iurisdiction, done without his priuie, they were by right forfeited to the Apollo-like Sea. He exclaimes and complains against Ferdinand, Peter and Virgilus, pretending to omit no meanes that may serue for the defence of his dignity, and the rights of the Roman Sea. Lodowike embraceth this occasion, and seeing the Pope to study of some great reuenge against Ferdinand, he feeds his passions, by the loan of forty thousand Ducats and three hundred men at armes, leauing vpon the common treasure. Yet apprehending new troubles, he aduiseeth Ferdinand, to perswade Virgilus, to content the Pope by some honest composition, to prevent the inconueniences & scandalls this diuorce might breed, and counselleth Peter to follow the domestick example of his father, and to be a mediator, as he had bene, betwixt Ferdinand and him, rather then a fire-brand to kindle dissension: but he talked to a deafe man. Ferdinand promisth to doe it, but he ruined with one hand, what he raised with the other: he secretly solicits Virgilus to take possession of those townes, and not to yeeld the Pope any thing, but some certaine some of money, by meanes whereof he should remaine peaceable Lord of the said places, promising to warrant him from all troubles.

Lodowike finds hereby, that it behoues him to fortifie himselfe with new suppons and new alliances. He hath a good opportunity: the disdain of Alexander against the King of Naples, and the affection the Senate of Venice seemed to haue to the diuision of this league, whereby their proiects had so long bene made frustrate. But the Pope loued his children dearly, and contrary to the custome of others) who called them Nephewes, as a more modest name) he impudently called them sonnes. He hoped to obtaine one of the bastard daughters of Alphonso, for one of his bastard sonnes (graft crab vpon crab, and you shall neuer reape good fruit) and whilst this vaine hope possessed him, he opened his eares rather then his heart to Lodowikes motion. Ferdinand, gaue his consent, but Alphonso hated the ambition and pride of Alexander. The Pope being thus frustrate, turnes all his thoughts to Lodowike, moued partly with disdain, and partly with feare, seeing Yrin, by the exceeding great fauours which he receiued from Ferdinand and the Florentines, to be growne mighty in all the territories of the Church.

The Venetians had yett fresh in memory, the leagues made against them in the warres of Ferrara, in the which Sixtus had intrugled them: and yet to withdraw them, he employed both his spirituall and temporall power. They had no more confidence in Alexander. Yet the policie of Lodowike did in the end worke this league, betwixt the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and the Duke of Milan, in the month of April 1493. Thus Lodowike is fortified on the one side: but he had another meaning then the Pope or Senate of Venice: and fore-seeing that he could not long build vpon the foundation of this new alliance, he resolues to assure himselfe by foraine forces, seeing that both his owne, and his friends in Italy were doubtfull vnto him. He therefore conuerteth his thought on this side the Alpes, seeking to draw the King to seize vpon the ancient inheritance of the house of Aniou. But let vs see by what right: Urban the fourth gaue the Realmes of Naples and Sicilia (vniuilly detained by Manfred bastard sonne to Frederick the second) to Charles Earle of Prouence, and of Aniou, to hold in fee, being brother to Saint Lewis, who obtained this title that was given him by armes. Charles the second succeeded his father, who left it to Robert his sonne, and this man died without heires. Joane daughter to Charles Duke of Calabria (d. ceased before his father) enioyed the succession. Being disinherited so much for the sexe, as for the lewdnesse of her life: she adopts Lewis Duke of Aniou brother to King Charles the wife for her sonne, and then dyed of a violent death. Lewis passing thither with an army, dyed of an ague in Apulia, seeing himselfe almost in possession of the King.

A league betwixt the Pope, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan.

The right of France to Naples and Sicilia.

A Kingdome: so as the house of Aniou reaped no profit by this adoption; but only of the Earldome of Prouence, which was continually possessed by the successors of Charles the first. Notwithstanding Lewis of Aniou sonne to the first Lewis; and afterwards the grampa child of the same name, thrust on by the Popes, as often as they had any quarrell with the Kings of Naples, haue often (but unfortunately) inuaded this Realme. By the death of Joane the Realme was transported to Charles of Durazzo issued his wife from Charles the first, to whom Lodowike his sonne succeeded: who dying without issue left his sister René the second for his heire: an unfortunate name in that place, whose indiscretion and impudency of life made them purchase the name of Volucres. Lewis the third, making warre with the helpe of Maximilian the first against Joane, (leaving the government of the Realme to those to whom he had abandoned her body) she adopted for her sonne and sole inheritor, Alphonso King of Arragon and Sicilia. Afterwards hauing reuoked her adoption, vpon colour of ingratitude, she adopted the same Lewis: who employing his forces for her against Alphonso, expelled him the Realme: but he dyed the same yeare, leaving to René Duke of Aniou, and Earle of Prouence, for heire, being brother to the said Lewis her adoptiue sonne. This institution displeasing some Barons, who said that the will was forged by them of Naples, they called backe Alphonso. Hence sprung the warres and factions betwixt the Angeuins, and the Arragonois, nourished so long, by the couetousnesse of C Popes, who according to the opportunity of times, haue oftentimes granted their iudgements diuersly. Alphonso carying it by force, and dying without lawfull heires, left Ferdinand his bastard to succeed, as a purchased estate, not belonging to the Crowne of Arragon. John sonne to René assisted by the chiefe Barons of the Country, came to assaile him, but the happinesse and valor of Ferdinand giues him the repulse. René pursuing his sonne John, and dying without an heire male, names Charles his brothers sonne for heire, who dying without children, resigned all his inheritance to Lewis the Eleuenth, father to Charles the eight.

Charles was but two and twentie yeares old, little experienced in affaires, couetous of glory, and thrust on with a warlike desire; he often neglected the wholesome counsell of the wisest, namely James of Grauille, Admiral of France, preferring the aduice of some of base quality that possessed him, corrupted by the Neapeditans that were retired for idleness, and by the Ambassadors of Lodowike. The Nobility of France, commended the wisdom of Lewis the Eleuenth, who refused to accept of the Genouois when they offered themselves, being alwayes loth to attempt any thing vpon Italy, being both painfull, and fatal to the Realme. They knew Ferdinand to be a wise Prince, rich in money, and of great fame, and his sonne Alphonso to be valiant, and well scene in the art of warre (but these were but shewes, and all their reputation turned into a ridiculous smoake). That for the government of Warre and State, the Kings Council was but weak, and their experience small that had most credit with him. He must haue a huge masse of money, and there was not any in his Treasury. Moreover, they objected the subtilty, and policy of the Italians: that Lodowike himselfe for a light profit would breake his faith: that hee would be loth to see the Kingdome of Naples, in the French Kings power; finally, to make any conquest beyond the Alpes, were to vnsurmount the Realme both of men and money.

All this was but to cast oyle into a fire already kindled. Charles rejects all aduice of peace, and with out the priuie of any but de Vers and Brissonne, he agrees secretly with Lodowikes Ambassadors: That an army passing into Italy for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Milan, should giue him passage through his Country, he should accompany him with five hundred men at armes entertained: he should suffer him to arme what shipping he would at Genoa; and before he should march, he should lend the King two hundred thousand Ducats. On the other part. The King should defend the Duchy of Milan against all men; and should especially maintaine Lodowikes authority: and during the Warre, he should maintaine two hundred lances in Als, a City belonging to the Duke of Orleans, to supply all necessities in the Duchy. This he signed with his owne hand, and promised moreouer vnto Lodowike; That giuing to the conquest of Naples, he should giue him the principality of Tarentum.

But did not Lodowike feare the power of so great a King, lately fortified with three goodly Prouinces of Bourgondy, Picardy and Britany, the which his father Francis sforce would would haue doubted, if a poore Earle of Prouence, had conquered the realme of Naples: and did he not apprehend him who had publicly protested, that he would neuer suffer the oppression of his cousin: for Charles and John Galeas were sisters children. Doubtlesse now the time was come, when as that should be verified which Laurence of Medicis spake a little before his death, vnderstanding of the vnion of Britany to the Crowne. That if the King of France knew his owne forces, Italy should suffer much, and the publicke predictions of Fryar Ieremie Sannonarola, whereof we will speake hereafter.

The voyage to Naples.

The Kings army.

The King now takes his way to Lions, to assemble his forces, and diuides them into two armies, at land and at sea. In that at land were about fixtene hundred men at armes, two Archers to a Lance, sixe thousand Archers on foot, sixe thousand crosse-bow-men, sixe thousand pikes, eight thousand Harguebufers carrying two hand swords, twelue thousand of Artillery, of iron and brasse, sixe thousand two hundred Pioners, two hundred expert Canoniers, fixe hundred master Carpenters, three hundred Malons, cleeue hundred men to cast bullets, to make coale, cords and cables, four thousand Carters, and eight thousand horse for the artillery. The army at Sea consisted of eighreene galleys, sixe galeons, and nine great ships. The chiefe Commanders that did accompany the King, were, Lewis Duke of Orleans Lieutenant general for his Maiestic by sea, the Earle of Angoulesme, the Earle of Montpensier, the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Nemours, John of Foix Vicont of Narbonne, the Earles of Nevers, Ligni, Boulongne, Bresse, the Lord of Albret, Lewis of Tremouille Vicont of Thouars: the Marshals of Gie, Rieux, and Baudricourt; the Lords of Cruso, Tournon, Pienes, Silli, Guise, Chandenier, Mauleon, Prie, Montaisson, d'Aligre, Bonneau, Genouillac, Fraizezeles, Chaumont, Chafillon, Palice, Vergi, d'Hospital, Beaumont, Myolans, Matthew ballard of Bourbon, the ballard of Bourgongne, with a great number of Noblemen, and voluntary Gentlemen. The Lord of Cordes (so famous in our History, for his singular valour, wisdom, and loyalty) dyed at Bresse, three leagues from Lions. The Lord of Vrfe, Master of the Kings horse, prepared all things necessary for the fleet at Genoa.

Some infection transported the King from Lions to Vienne, from whence the Duke of Orleans parted for Genoa, and there the voyage was fully concluded: for vntill that time the dissuasion of the best advised, and the detraction of the chiefe finewes of War, had held the in suspense: for that an hundred thousand franks, borrowed vpon great interest, in the banke of Soly at Genoa, could not long maintaine the ordinary charge of his house. Yet fifty thousand Ducats lent him by Lodowike Sforze, and the liuely impression of the Cardinal Saint Pierre (the fatal instrument of the miseries of Italy) did somewhat reuiue the fainting courage of Charles. What shame (saith he) what infamy, to giue ouer so honourable a resolution? an enterprife published throughout all the world? the Popes amaze: the terrour of Peter of Medicis? the ruine of the Arragonois? who can stay the violent descent of this army? euen vnto the marches of Naples? Doth he doubt the want of money? At the fearfull thunder of his artillery, yea, at the least brute of his armes, the Italians will bring vnto him: and the rebels spoyles shall feed his army: what shadow then? what dreame? what vaine feare doth cause this inconstant change? where is that magnanimity? where is that courage, which did but euen now brag to ouer-run all the forces of Italy vnitd together? In the end, the King marcheth the 23 of August, leauing Peter Duke of Bourbon, his brother in law, for Regent: who conducted the Queene from Grenoble into France.

Doubtlesse, we must obserue a singular and fauourable prouidence of God, in the conduct of this voyage, vnderaken vpon borrowed money: but where God works, all things are eafie. For a third proofe of his need, being at Turin, the King borrowed the Jewels of the Duchesse of Savoy, daughter to William Marquis of Montferrat, and Widow to Charles Duke of Savoy, and pawned them for 1200 Ducats: and for a fourth, being at Cassal, he pawned the Jewels of the Marquesse, widow to the Marquis of Montferrat, for the like summe: women worthy doubtlesse of our History, hauing loued our France with a singular affection. At Ast the King was toucht with the small pockes, and a feuer, which did hazard his life, but within fixe or seuen dayes he was recovered. Thither came Lodowike Sforze, and Beatrice his wife, daughter to the Duke of Ferrara, to salute him, and withall came very fauourable newes.

Ferdinand was lately deceased. Alphonso his sonne had two armies in field, one in Romagna,

A magna, towards Ferrara, the which Ferdinand his sonne Duke of Calabria commanded, accompanied by Virgil Vrsin, the Earle of Peitallano, and John Iagues of Triuulce, who afterwards serued the King. This army had to encounter them the Earle of Caiazzo, and the Lord of Aubigni a Scottishman, who stoppt their passage. The other at sea, led by Don Frederick brother to Alphonso, accompanied by Obieto of Fielque a Geneuois, and others, by means whereof they were in hope to draw the City of Genoa into their faction. But the Bayliffe of Dijon entring with two thousand Suisses, assured it for the King. Obieto with three thousand men had taken Rapaille, twenty miles from Genoa. The two Saint Seuerins brethren, and John Adorne brother to Augustin Gouverneur Genoa joynted with the Duke of Orleans, and a thousand Suisses, charged them, ouerthrew them, and slew a hundred or fixscore: (It was much in that age, for then their warres were not bloody) tooke some prisoners, and all that escaped were stript by the Duke of Milans people: so as Frederick could neuer gather them againe together. A disgrace which did much distaste the Florentines, being alwayes more inclined to the house of France, then to that of Arragon, and encouraged the King to proceed, animated thereunto, by the persuasions of Lodowike. My Lord (saith he) doubt not of this enterprife: there are three great parties in Italy: you hold the one, that is, Milan: the other fires not, those be the Venetians: you haue no businesse but at Naples, hauing conquered that realme, if you will giue me credit, I will assist you to become greater then euer was Charlemagne, and we will expell the Turke out of Constantinople. He spake well, if Christian Princes had been vnited.

The first ouerthrow at the Arragonois.

Finally, Charles makes his entry into Pavia, in quality of a King, vnder a canopy, the drums hanged, and the people crying God save the King. Then grew there some ialousie, they would haue the King rest satisfied with the towne for his lodging: but in the end, the Castle was opened vnto him, where he did visite John Galeas his cousin, being sicke, and at the point of death: not without great compassion of such as thought the course of his life would be soone cut off, by the notable treachery of his Vncle.

Placentia receiued him as willingly as Pavia, and thither newes was brought of the death of the Duke of Milan, leauing a son and a daughter. Lodowike posting thither, with promise to returne, vsurped the Duchy absolutely with the title. Thus all Lombardy marched at the brute of this French army, some for loue, and some for feare. They held out men to be religious, loyal, and full of bounty: but coquetoufnesse, robberies and other infolencies of souldiers, made them soone to alter their conceits, and the horror of the artillery (whose thunder was yet strange vnto them) amazed them. The Florentine, a cunning dissembler, had sent twise vnto the King, before he parted from France: at the first came the Bishop of Rhegium, and Peder Soderini: of whom they onely demanded paye, fixe, and a hundred men at armes maintained: at the second time, Peter Caponi, and others, who made answer, that by the commandement of King Lewis the Eleuenth they had renounced the alliance of John of Aniou (if he were associate with Charles of France in the warre of the common-weale) to enter into league with Ferdinando of Arragon, and therefore they could not rashly leaue it. But in either of these troopes, there was still some dexterity to Peter of Medicis, who gaue the King intelligence of the peoples desire, lifting vnto their hands for the recovery of their liberty oppressed by Peters gouernment, enuied euen by his neere kinsmen; and the best families, as the Caponi, Soderini, Nerli and others.

The death of John Galeas.

And for a second baite, Louirice and John de Medicis, cousins to Peter, came secretly to the King at his departure from Placentia, vowing great loue in general to the house of France, and much hatred to their Kinsman, against whom Charles was greatly incensed, for the excuse made to his Ambassador, which was sent from Ast: That the chiefe Citizens were at their houses in the country, and could not so speedily returne him an answer, but they should shortly let him vnderstand their resolution, by special Ambassadors.

Great practices against Peter of Medicis.

In the meane time they arriue ioyntly with the Pope. The King must not leaue Tuscany and the Estate of the Church behind him as his enemies. The Army passeth the Appennin at Pontremone vpon Magre, the which diuides Liguria (which is the country of Genoa) from Tuscany, and is vpon the marches of the Florentines country, of purpose to force them to plant the Standard of France vpon their walls, or else to take the weakest places to winter in.

The second exploit of the Kings army, was at Fiuzane, a towne taken by force, sacked, and

and all mercenary souldiers, with many inhabitants flaine. A hard stratagem, for men, who (as we haue said) made war rather in pompe and brauery then with blowes.

Serezane was sufficient to wishland, yea to ruine a great power: Serezanele was more strong, a fort built vpon the hill about the towne: but the Florentines diuisions had hindered all necessary prouision, but men. And indeed they were loth to make warre against the house of France, of whom they had of old time depended: and the rather, for that they were forbidden to traffike, and their men banished out of all France, by the especiall aduice of Caponi. The army could not continue there, the Country is strait and barren, compassed in by the sea and mountains, no victuall but what was brought from farr, and great store of snow. But the way must be laid open to Pisa, and if they had neglected the first place that resisted, what village but would haue held out? Paul Vrsin led some horse, with three hundred foot (meaning to put them into Serezane) who were encountered, beaten, and in a manner all slaine or taken prisoners, by some troopes of the forward going to forage beyond Magre. This terror made the Florentines to protest publicly, That they would no longer inuade the Kings displeasure, nor the Duke of Milan. Whereupon they sent fiftene or sixtene Citizens, and offer the King free entry into their City, whole onely designe was to expell Peter of Medici.

The Florentines offer the King free entry into their City.

Peter practised (by the means of Laurence Spinola his factor in the bankes at Lion) the Earle of Bresse, and Myolani the Kings Chamberlaine, Gouvernor of Dauphine. They procure him a safe conduct, and at the first treaty hee grants the King all his demands. That the forts of Serezane, Serezanele and Pietrofainto (the keys of the Florentine dominion of that side, those of Pisa, and the port of Liouorne, should be put into the Kings hand, who should be bound to redeliver them after the conquest of Naples. That the King should receive the Florentines into his alliance and protection, upon the lease of two hundred thousand Ducats, and the assurance of these promises should be concluded in Florence. A facility which discouered a wonderful feare and trouble of mind: for the King would haue beene satisfied with more easie conditions.

Lodowike was present at this Capitulation, who to reape some benefit of Charles his conquests, obtaines from his Maiesty for thirty thousand Ducats a transport for him and his heires, of the possession of Genoa: (which the King some yeeres before had granted to John Galeas Duke of Milan) yet discontented that Charles would not giue him Pietrofainto and Serezane in guard (which places he demanded as forcaibly taken away by the Florentines from the Geneuois, and had serued him as a means to lay hold of Pisa) hee returned to Milan, and did neuer after see the King, leauing notwithstanding Galeas of St. Seuerin, and the Earle of Belzoioz to reuer his Maiesty.

Charles is so discontented with the King.

Thus by the confiscation of these strong places, the ports of Romagna are opened vnto the King, he enters Luques being very honourably receiued by the Citizens, crying God save the King of France Augustus. From Luques hee goes to Pisa, Galeas of Saint Seuerin, following the instructions giuen him by Lodowike Sparze (who did not forget that the like accident would be the cause of his ruine) called the chiefe Citizens, and aduised them, that rebelling against the Florentines, they should craue liberty from the King: hoping by this means that he should one day draw Pisa vnder the duke of Milans command, to whom they were subiect, before the Florentines held it; this was in the same yeere that the Venetians conquered Padoua. Through this aduice the people trooptogether, men, women, and children: they flocke the next day about the King, going to masse, crying with open throat, Liberty, Liberty, beseeching him with hands lifted vp, and teares in their eyes, to free them from the Florentines oppression, by whom (say they) they were most tyrannously intreated. Rabo a Counceller, of the Parliament of Dauphine, and Master of Requests, said vnto the Kings, that their demand was iust, and that it was a pitifull thing to see the hard subiection that did oppress them. The King (who did not consider the importance of this action) breaking the treaty of Serezane, and that he could not giue liberty to a towne that was not his, into the which hee was receiued only by courtlike, rashly lets slip these words: I am content.

Pisa results asanthee Florentines.

Prickled forward a strong headed horse, and hee will run at random. This multitude doth presently change their cry of liberty, into cries of ioy, and running to the bridge vpon the riuer of Arne, they beat downe the Mazorco (this was a great Lion, planted vpon an high pillar of Marble, with the armes of Florence) and cast it into the riuer, and in the same

A same place they set vpa King of France holding a sword in his hand, and treading this Mazorco vnder his feet. But oh the lightnesse of Italians! few yeares after, at the entry of the King of Romanes, they shall deale with the King as with this Lion.

This ignominious and rash wound, giuen to the Estate of Florence by Peter of Medici, contrary to the example of his predecessors, without the aduice of the Citizens, and without any decree of the Magistrates, had wonderfully incensed his fellow-citizens. Being returned to Florence, to prepare his lodging for the King, going the ninth of Nouember to enter the palace of the Seignery, to treat of the Kings arrival, behold James Nerli a young man, noble and rich, with other magistrates, being armed, offer him the entry alone, but deny it to all his followers. He retires home to his house, and resolves to get that by force which he could not willingly obaine. He armes, and causeth Paul Vrsin to approach with his troope, the which was in the Florentines pay. The State proclaimes him a rebell, the people flye to armes, and cry liberty. Peter recouers the gates, and with him were the Cardinall John and Julian his brethren: they flye to Bolonia, and from thence to Venice. Peter had no cloake but one of his grooms: being hated of his fellow-citizens, dildained of his domestical seruants, his house spoiled, with losse of about an hundred thousand Ducats in mouables: and to increase his misery, a factor of his at Venice, refused him for the value of an hundred ducats in cloath: a notable example of the inconsistency of worldly affaires. Thus by the rashnesse of one young man, lately equall in a manner to great Princes, the house of Medici tell for that time, which vnder colour of ciuill administration, had gouerned the common-weale of Florence threecore yeares peaceably, and with a respected authority.

Peter of Medici & his brethren expelled Florence.

His miserable estate at Venice

Charles entered the next day triumphantly into Florence, himselfe and his horse armed, and his lance vpon his thigh. The Florentines were not ignorant of his discontent, for that they sought to crosse him in his enterprise, and that many of his followers, thrust on by couetousnesse, gaped after nothing more then the sacke of so rich a City, hauing first of all refused the power of France, and that others also did solicit the restitution of Peter of Medici, especially Philip Earle of Bresse. And although the City might worthily iustifie that violence whereof Peter and his complices were the onely motives, yet did they wisely foresee that the King would not let slip this opportunity to become their Lord. But being vnable to stop this violent streame by any force, they had secretly filled their chiefe houses with resolute men, receiued their entertained Captaines into the city, and did giue order, that euery man, both within and without, neare the City, should arme at the sound of the palace great bell. Thus fortified with men, they stand stiffly vpon the tearmes of composition. Ofttimes we lose the Eele by ouer-gripping. The fauour they did see some breace vnto Peter: the insupportable fumes of money that were exacted: the absolute Seignery of Florence which the King demanded, as hauing conquered it by the law of armes, considering in what manner he entered, made them refuse these rigorous demands, with a firme resolution to maintaine their publike liberty with the perill of their liues. Thus they grew angry on eyther side; and for a conclusion of the last conference, the Kings Secretary reading the articles which his Maiesty would resolutely haue concluded, behold Peter Caponi one of the foure Deputies for the city (a violent man, and one of the mightiest Families in the State, pulls the articles from the Secretary and teares them. Seeing you demand of vs (saith he) so outrageous conditions, you shall find your trumpets, and we our Bells.

The Kings entry into France.

The Florentines fortifie themselves in their houses for feare of the King.

This audacious brauery did moderate the excessse of their demands: for how lamentable had it beene, to haue fallen to any tragicall decision of their controuersie. The King calms him backe, and containing himselfe within the bounds of reason, passeth this capitulation: *That the Citie of Florence should be a friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the Crowne of France. That at the end of the enterprise of Naples, the King should yeeld up (without any charge to the Florentines) Pisa, Liouorne, Pietrofainto, Serezane, Serezanele, and all other places taken or recouled: and in case of denial, they might recover them by force: That they should giue the King fifty thousand Ducats in fifteen dayes, forty thousand in March, and thirty thousand in Iune following. They should pardon the Pisans their rebellion and other crimes. They should free Peter of Medici from banishment and confiscation, upon condition, that he should not approach within an hundred and fifty miles of their confines: nor his brethren nearer then an hundred miles. This accord was sworne vpon the great Altar in the* Church of Saint John at Florence. But matters succeeded other wise, as we shall see: so the A Florentines changed their red Lillie into a white.

Two dayes after, the King parted towards Sienna, a Citie well peopled, seated in a fertile country, in ancient time rich, mighty, & the second citie in Toscane, which yielded in many factions to the stronger party, so as they enjoyed more the name then the effects of liberty. They tooke off their gates for the Kings entry: notwithstanding the City being suspected of him, (for that it had beene always at the devotion of the Empire) hee left a garison, and tooke his way to Rome. Aqua pendente and Montefalconi (places belonging to the Pope,) received him with royall pompe, and layd the way open to Viterbo. The Florentine Forts which the King held, and the garison left in Sienna, made the Venetians and Milanese to feare, that he would hardly end his conquests with Naples. To prevent this common danger, they treat of a new confederacy, and had concluded it, if Rome had made that resistance to the King which many expected. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, the Popes forces, Virgil Vrsin, and the remainders of the Arragonois army, had resolved to camp at Viterbo, and there to make head against the King, but the roades which the Coloniois made (who had taken Ostia from the Pope,) and hindered the passage of victuals to Rome by sea,) having put all the countrey about Rome in alarme, being jealous of the Popes integrity, who began to hearken to the French demands, made him retire, leaving the way open for the King to enter into Viterbo by the favour of the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, and the Coloniois, and lo into the territories of the Vrsins.

The Pope is now wonderfully perplexed: he knows himselfe to have bene one of the chiefe motives of Charles his voyage; and since, without any offence, he hath opposed his authority, his counsell and his armes. Hee imagines, that the assistance hee shall draw from the King, shall be no surer then his to the King. He sees the Cardinals Ascanius, S. Pierre, and other his enemies in credit about the King. He feares that this prediction of Sannapola should now take effect. That the Church should be reformed by the sword. He remembers with what infamy he came to the Popedom; his government and his life, controules him. The Cardinals Ascanius, Saint Pierre, Colonne, Savelle, and above all these others, urge the King to suppress a Pope so full of vices; and abominable to all the world, and to proceed to a new election. Hee had no sufficient forces to withstand the stranger. Alphonsus droopes; Ferdinand is weak. Virgilius Vrsinus General of the Arragon army, Constable of the Realme of Naples, allyed to Alphonsus, (John Tourdain, sonne to the said Vrsin, having married a bastard daughter of Ferdinand the father of Alphonsus) bound to the house of Arragon for so many respects, had of late consented, that his sonnes should give the King passage, lodging and victuals within the territories of the Church: and leaues him Champagna, and other places for his assurance, untill the army were past the territories of Rome. The Earle of Petellano, and all the rest of the family of Vrsins, followed the same accord. And now Ciuita-uecchia, Cornette, & in a manner all about Rome, is in the power of the French. All the Court, all the people, are troubled; they demand an vnity. Being thus troubled in minde, hee sends the Bishops of Concord and Terme, to the King: but hee seeks to compound both for himselfe and Alphonsus. The King had not advanced his armes euen to the gates of Rome to that intent. Hee sends the Cardinals Ascanius and Colonne, Lewis of Tremouille, and the President of Gannai, to the Pope, who in an humour brings Ferdinand with his army into Rome, and suffers them to fortifie the weakest places. But where is the meanes to defend it? Ostia cuts off their victuals. The Cardinals being ariued (an act worthy of Alexander) they are presently taken prisoners, to make them to deliuer vp Ostia, and in the same tumult, the French Ambassadors are slayed by the Arragonois: yet the Pope caused them to be presently deliuered, and the Cardinals soone after. Hee sends the Cardinall of Saint Seuerin to the King, being at Nepes, and treats no more but of his owne affairs. And that which vrgeth him most, the King is come to Bracciano, the chiefe towne of the Vrsins: the Coloniois haue many of the Gibelin faction within Rome: the Earle of Ligny (cousin german to the King by his mother) and the Lord of Alegre were joynd vnro them, with five hundred lances, & two thousand Suisses, to spoile the Countrey beyond Tiber, and to keepe Ferdinand within Rome. But hee was more amazed when as about twenty fadomes of the wall fell downe of it selfe, the which invites the King, and forceth the Pope. But hee feares the Cardinals hatred, and the ruine of his estate.

The

A The King frees him of this doubt, and doth assure him, by the Marshall of Gie, the President of Gannai, and the Senechal of Beaucourt, that heing meane to make his passage by force; he is notwithstanding moued with the same reference that his predecessors haue alwayes borne to the Roman Sea, that entering peaceably into Rome, all their courtesies should be converted into amity and friendship. He yeelds, and first he obtains a safe conduct for Ferdinand, to passe safely through the dominions of the Church. Thus the King entered Rome with all his army, by the Port of Saint Mary de Popoly, in the manner as he had done into Florence: euen as Ferdinand Duke of Calabria passed out of Saint Sebastians gate, the last day of this yeare. The Pope, fraught with feare and distress, shuts himselfe vp into the Castle Saint Angelo, which he should treat with the King. And for that he refused to deliuer the Castle vnto the King, the artillery was twice drawne out of the Castle of Saint Marke, where the King was lodged: yet the presents and promises of Alexander preuailed much with some of the priuy Counsell, and the King of his owne disposition, was not inclined to offend the Pope. But what needs there any Cannon to batter a place, which opens of it selfe fifteen fadomes of the Castle wall (they the original) fell at the Kings arriuall. In the end the Pope gives the King the Forts of Ciuita-uecchia, Terracina, and Spolero (yet this was not deliuered) To hold them until the conquest of Naples, and grants impunity to the Cardinals, and Barons that had followed the King. Zemin Ottoman brother to Baiazet the 2, who since the death of Mahomet thirte father (being pursued by the said Baiazet) had saved himselfe at Rhodes, and from thence being led into France, had bene put into Pope Innocents power: for whose guard Baiazet paid yearly forty thousand Ducats to the Pope, that by the greedines of this summe, they should be the lesse willing to yeeld to any Prince, that might make vse of him against him. The King desired to haue him, to make him an instrument of the warre, which hee refused against the Turke, after that of Naples. But Alexanders holinesse, aduised the Turke to stand vpon his guard, and to provide that this young King preuaile not in his enterprise: for a recompence hereof, Baiazet (although he detested the Popes impiety) sent him two hundred thousand crownes, by George of Antie, the messenger of this aduice, intreating the Pope to free him of this lease. It was generally beleued, that he was poisoned, and dyed within few dayes after that Alexander had deliuered him. Moreover, it was said: That Cesar, Cardinall of Valence, the Popes sonne, should follow the King three months, as the Popes Legat, but rather to be a pawne of his fathers promises.

By meanes of this accord, the Pope returns to the Vatican, the Pontificall Palace; where the King made his filiall submission, obtains two Cardinals Hays, the one for the Bishop of Mans, being of the house of Luxembourg; the other for Briconnet Bishop of Saint Malo, and for himselfe the title of Emperour of Constantinople; and a promise to insert him in the Realme of Naples, without any prejudice to anothers right, and then hee cured many of the Kings euill. And to shew, that as eldest sonne of the Church, hee had as great iurisdiction, as the Pope within Rome, hee caused three feats for Iustice to bee done, and execution to be done of some that were guilty of a sedition made in the Iewes street.

Ferdinand was no sooner parted out of Rome, but the hatred which the people bare to the house of Arragon, discouered it selfe. The tyrannous oppressions of Ferdinand and therto Alphonsus were yet fresh. The Ille of Sicily flowed yet with the blood of foure and twenty Princes and Barons which had returned vpon his word, who being imprisoned after the rout of Arragon, Alphonsus (to make his comming to the Crowne famous) caused to bee slaine, amongst others, the Duke of Sessa, and the Prince of Rosane, who had married the sister of Ferdinand his father. Ferdinand had bene a man without faith, a slember, cruell, violent, a great exactor, infamous, a rauisher of women, and irreligious; (witness the Bishopricke of Tarentum, the which he sold to a Iew for thirteene thousand Ducats, for his son, who he had said was a Christian.) Alphonsus had the same qualities: and moreover, he was dissolute, impious, and wicked. Hercunto were added the old reliques of the Angeuin faction, which might helpe much to breed an alteration. Thus the people of Naples title: Aquila and Abruzzo aduance their ensignes, Fabrizio Colonne, keeps all in awe about Albi and Taillouffe, and all the rest of the Realme was ready to rebel. But that which most imports, the furies of his owne conscience torment him. Hee thinks that the ghosts of these murdered Noblemen appeare vnto him, that the trees and stones found into his eares the name of France. Hee sees his subjects ready to revenge the blood shed against his faith. Thus, unable to withstand both a for-raine and a home-bred enemy, he causeth his sonne Ferdinand to be crowned, whose young yeares had yet giuen no cause of scandall; and with foure light Gallies, laden withall kinder of Wine, (whereunto he was much giuen) feeds to garden withall some Jewes, and a little money, he fled to Marate in Sicile, where he suddenly changed his horrible excess into a Monkish life, assisting the religious at all houres of seruice, both day and night, liuing in abstinence, almes and prayers; but oppressed with the Hemroids and grauell, hee died, being ready to shut himselfe vp in a Monastery at Valentia the great.

This fight made the Kings way more easie, and verified the saying of Pope Alexander.
That the French were come with wooden shurres, and chafes in their harbingers hands, to make out their lodgings without any difficulty. Alluding it to the pricks of wood which pagans and lackeys put in the heeles of their Masters shoes, when they ride vpon their moylees. And in truth, our Frenchmens backs were not muchouer-heated with their armes in this expedition; nor any one place staying the King about a day, but the Castles of Naples. The King going from Rome comes to Velletri, from whence the Cardinal of Valentia (his fathers right sonne) stole from his Maistie. From Velletri he comes to Montfortin, a towne belonging to the Church, strong of situation, yet was it battered and taken in few houres. All that were found in armes were slaine, except the three sons of James Comte, a Roman Gentleman Lord of the towne; who preferring the hatred he bare the Co-lonnois, before his honour, had left the Kings pay to follow Alphonso. These with some others being rettyred into the Castle, yielded themselves prisoners vpon view of the Cannon. Mont Saint Ian, a towne belonging to the Marquis of Peicara, seated in the same plaine, vpon the confines of the Kingdome of Naples, strong both by art and nature, sur-rised with three hundred strangers, and five hundred inhabitants, which were resolute to defend their state, yet was it one day besieged, battered, assailed and taken in the Kings presence. Seauen hundred and sixe men were slaine in the fury of the fight, and but thirty French: and to terrifie the rest, it was burnt.

We are now ready to enter. The Arragonis must shew his courage. Ferdinand the new King assembles all the forces he can, hauing fifty cornets of horse, and sixe thousand choise foot, vnder the most expert Captaynes of Italy, and camps at Saint Germaine. The place is of easie defence, on the one side an high and inaccessible mountaine, on the other side the waters hinder the approach, and in front is the Garilan, a riuier vncasie to passe; and not farre off is the passage of Cancellio, a mountaine which of necessity they must passe:
It is the Key of the whole kingdome, here must they fight, or giue way. But this army was daunted, without courage, and without force: the name of the French had amazed them, and the Captaynes, partly desirous of inuouation, partly greedy of better entertainment, wauered in their faith and courage. The Marshall of Gie approacheth with three hundred Launces, and two thousand foot, but terror goes before him. In this amazement both Cancellio and Saint Germaine are shamefully abandoned, and eight pieces of great artillery are taken to thunder hereafter in fauour of the French.

Capoua was sufficient to receive the army, which marched after the forward, rather like traucellers then men of Warre, without order, without commandement, and without obedience, the soldiers gaping after nothing but spoile. The situation is very strong, hauing Vulturno before it (a riuier very deepe in that place) but their resolution was like to that of Saint Germaine; and to increase it, as Ferdinand made account to defend it, and by that meanes to hold Naples and Caiette. The Queene his Grandmother sends him word, that since the losse of Saint Germaine, there was so great a tumult at Naples, as all would be in vprore if he came not speedily. He goes, and promisseth to returne the next day.
But John Iagues of Triuulce (to whom he had giuen the Towne in guard) comes with some gentlemen of Capua to the King being at Calui: he presents him the towne and his seruice, and makes an offer to bring Ferdinand. The King accepts the Capuans offer, and the coming of Ferdinand, vpon condition that hee retainne no portion within the realme, but should content himselfe with such meanes as he should giue him in France.
In the meane time the soldiers lack *Ferdinand*s lodging and his stable: the men at armes disperse themselves in diuers places; Virgilius and the Earle of Perrellano craue a safe conduct from the King, and retire with their Companies to Nola. Ferdinand thinking

The whole Kingdome of Naples recon-royall entry into Naples.

A by this journey to haue assured the Neapolitans, returnes at the time prefixt, when as the Capuans aduise him not to set forward; seeing they were otherwise resolu'd. Auerle (a towne betwixt Capua and Naples) sends their Keyes to the King; and the Neapolitans determined to follow them. Ferdinand retired into the Castle, knowing that 500 Lanquenets meane to take him prisoner: he giues them the moueables of the said Castle, and as they were busie to diuide it, he slips from them, sets the young Prince of Rosane at liber-tie (whom by loue or force he caried with him) and the Earle of Popoli: hee causeth the ships that remained in the port, to be burnt and sunk, and saues himselfe with the Queene, Don Fredericke his vnkle, his daughter Isabe, and some few seruants, in the Ill- of Elchia:
and whilst he was within sight of Naples, he often repeated this goodly Oracle, if the Lord keepe not the City, the watchmen watch but in vaine.

Thus all wauer at the Conquerors fame, and with such cowardise, as 200 horse vnder the command of the Earle of Ligny going to Nola, tooke both it, Virgilius and the Earle of Perillano, without resistance, being retired thither with 400 men at armes, attending the safe conduct they had obtained from the King, being amazed like to the rest of their army, and from thence they were led captiues to the fort of Montdragon, and all their men stript. In the meane time the Neapolitans Ambassadors come with their keyes, desiring a confirmation of their ancient exemptions and priuileiges. The King enters the 21 of February, and is receiued with such exceeding ioy, both of great and small, of all ages, all sexes and all qualities, as euery one runnes as to their dearest redeemer, from a hateful and insupportable tyranny. Thus Charles (without planting of tent, or breaking of Lance) in foure moneths and a halfe, with an admirall happinesse, came, saw and ouercame. They say commonly, that the poyson lyes in the taile, & that the hardest part to flea of an eele is the taile. The perfection of the victory consisted in the taking of the Castles of Naples. The tower of Saint Vincent, built for the defence of the port, was easily taken.
Thenew Castle, the lodging of their Kings, seated vpon the sea, strong by nature and by an plentifully furnished with victuals & munition, and manned with five hundred Lanquenets, but abandoned by the Marquis of Peicara, to whom Ferdinand had left it in guard: who seeing the garison bent to yeeld the place, had followed Ferdinand, and was after some small defence yeelded, vpon condition to depart in safety, and to carry what they could away. And see here the first and greatest error which the King committed in this exploit, himselfe wanting experience, but his minions & fauorits no counteruesse.
Negue all these victuals and other moueables, to the first that begged them: who furnished themselves with the munition, whereon the preferuacion of the towne and place depended. The Castle de l'Ouo, built vpon a rocke, hanging ouer the sea, being battered with the Cannon (the which might only indammage the wall, but not the rocke it selfe) compounded, if they were not releued within a certaine time, and after foure and twenty dayes siege, it was deliuered into the Kings hands.

The King made his entry into Naples the 12 of May, in an Imperiall habit, & was recei-ued as King of France, and of both Sicillies (whereof the Realme of Naples makes a part) and Emperour of Constantinople. But herein hee made no iust accompt with him that giues and takes away Kingdomes. The Barons and Commonalties sent away their Captaines and troopes dispersed in diuers parts of the realme. Those which depended most of the house of Arragon, doe first turne taile. The Carissier, who enjoyed forty thousand ducats of Inheritance: the Dukes of Melfe, Grauiua; and Sora: the Earles of Montorio, Randi, Trapaldi, Celano, Monteleon, Merillano, and Popoli, come to doe their homage, and generally all the Noblemen of the Realme, except Alphonso Auale, Marquis of Peica-ra, the Earle of Acre, and the Marquis of Squillazzo, whose liuing the King gaue away.
Another rigour which shall be a great cause the following reuolts.

Calabria yeelds willingly to the Lord of Aubigny, sent thither with a small troope, except the Castle of Rhegium: but they waned meanes to force it, the towne held for the King. Abruzzo yeelds of it selfe. Apulia erects the Standard of France, except Tur-pia and Mantia; who notwithstanding had planted the Flower-de-lis, yet refusing any other command, then of the King himselfe: who had giuen them to the Lord Peris d'A- legre, and they returne to their first master. The Castles of Brundisium & Gallipoli, were neglected with too great confidence: but they shall serue shortly as a leuaine to stirre vp at discretion, after some light assaults. Tarentum, Otrante, Monopoli, Trani, Manfredone, Barle, and in a manner all other strong places yielded at the first bruto. But some holding themselves wronged, for that they had in a manner disdained to receive their deputies: others, for that they had sent no man to receive them, will soon returne to their first demand. The Isle of Ischia remained yet, and Ferdinand vpon the first intelligence of the yielding of the Castles of Naples had abandoned it to Janice d'Alaude, brother to the Marquis of Pescara, both most taithfull to their Prince, and was retired into Sicile. The King sends thither his army at sea, the which was cast by a tempest vpon the Isle of Corfe: yet in the end they anchored vpon the Realme, but after the last act of the Expedition. This army holding it selfe too weake to force the fort of Ischia, would not assaile it, and therefore the King resolved to send into Prouence and to Genoa for more ships, and to assaile the sea, the which Ferdinand scowred with foureteen galleies ill armed. But prosperity doth oftentimes make vs become insolent; and without considering the consequence, we easily let matters passe at adventure. Our French are now well lodged, they dreame of nothing but feasting, dancing, and tourneys: and the greatest about the King haue no other care, but to make the victory profitable to themselves without any regard, either of the dignity, or profit of their Prince, who not satisfied with the conquest of these goodly and rich estates, determines to advance his victorious forces. Let vs leaue them glured with ease, pleasure, and good cheare, and let vs make an escape into the East, to see how he had sped there, if the Pope had as well vntied the Potentates of Italy, to ioyne their common forces with our Charles, as he now sits them vp to crosse his new conquests.

Mahmet the second, left two sonnes, Baiazet the second of that name, and Zemin, (they name him diuersly, Zemin, Zizim, Gemin and Geme) both resident in their governments when the father dyed. Baiazet in Cappadocia, Zemin in Licaonia. Their absence sets the Balchaes and Captaines of the Ianifaries at discord, about the succession, for they fell from words to armes. Hereupon the Ianifaries proclaime Baiazet Emperour being absent: Isaac and Mesithes, chiefe captaines of the Turkish army, being then at Constantinople, set Cochart the sonne of Baiazet in the throne of his ancestors: they deliuer him the forts and treasure, that vnder colour of his nonage they might manage the affaires of the Empire at their pleasure. Baiazet posts thither, and by great bribes doth pacifie and win the hearts of the Ianifaries, and of their Captaines, incensed against him through the malice of some Noblemen. So Cochart being yet very yong, yielded him the Crowne willingly.

Zemin on the other side, was called by his friends and partisans, holding him to bee a man of greater courage, and better execution then his brother, being more fit for his booke, whereunto he was more addicted, then vnto armes. Pyrames Caraman King of Cilicia, and Caitibey Sultan of Egypt, incite him to warre against his brother. But he was vanquished in three battells, by Achanat Balscha, and despairing, fled to the great Master of Rhodes, leaving his mother and two twins, a sonne and a daughter in Carras, whom Baiazet caused to be murdered. Many Princes of Europe demanded Zemin, as Lew the cleuenth French King, and Matthias King of Hungary, hoping by his meanes to ruine Baiazet: but this was a good pigeon in the Popes Doue-house. Innocent the eight would haue him, hoping that Baiazet his brother would giue some notable summe of money to redeeme him, or else to keepe him from any other, that might vie him as an instrument to crosse his new Empire. Alexander, successor vnto Innocent, (a monstrous man in life, monstrous in his election, and monstrous in his death,) I haue horror to read, and more to report, what writers doe testifie, intreating the curious reader, to see them rather in the Originals themselves) being forced to deliuer him to Charles the eight, and so disappointed of his yearly pension of forty thousand Ducats, which hee received for the guard of him: corrupted by the money of Baiazet, he caused him to be poisoned: either grieved for the losse of his pension, or enuying the glory of Charles: or else fearing, lest if things should succeed happily for him against the Infidels, he should turn his thoughts and forces, to reforme the abuses and corruptions which had long before crept into the Church.

A while after the sight of Zemin, Baiazet caused Acomath to bee strangled, for that (growne proud and fierce, by reason of his wealth) he practised to ruine Baiazet, and to transport

The Turke

A transport the Empire to Zemin. A happy death for the Christians, of whom Acomath was an vniust and cruell oppressor. Baiazet freed by the death of these two men, he turned his forces against the Christians, and subdued Valachia. Then hee vanquished Caraman, reducing his principality into the forme of a Prouince. After that, hee marcheth with his army into Asia against the Sultan Caitibey, who had succoured his brother Zemin with counsell, men, victuals and money. The Sultan defeated the Turke in two great battels, the one was giuen neere to Adene in Cilicia, the other neere to Tarsis: in the which he tooke both the Commanders of the Turkish army prisoners, Mesithes Palologue, and Achomas Cherfegle, sonne in law to Baiazet, and slew about threelcore and ten thousand Turkes.

This checke made Baiazet to change his climate, and leauing Asia, to passe into Europe, where his aduersaries were not so strong. Hee tooke Durazzo, neere to Valone, and won a great battell vnder the command of Cadi-Balscha, against the Sclauonians, Hongarians and Croations, who were ouertrowne in the large plaines of Croatia, neere to Sauer, about the yeare 1493. But Iohn Castrion, sonne to that braue Scanderbeg, recovered that which Baiazet had vsurped: forcing him to accept of such conditions as hee propounded. Moreouer, Cerf-Richin defeated him in battell in Croatia, and expelled him the Country.

Then all those nations which lye betwixt Valone and Constantinople (being from the one to the other about eighteen dayes iourney) languished vnder the burthen of the Turkish tyranny, Albanois, Sclauonians, and Grecians, hoping for their deliuey by the meanes of our Charles. But what could he do, seeing those that should second the resolution of this yong Prince, were the first to ouertrow his designs by their secret practices? Charles, notwithstanding the death of Zemin, sent the Archbishop of Durazzo into Greece, an Albanois by birth, hauing an enterprise vpon Scutari, with Constantine a Greeke, afterwards gouernour of Montferrat, who had intelligence within the Towne: the Venetians haue no sooner knowledge of the death of Zemin, but to gratifie Baiazet, they will haue the honor to giue him the first aduice: for the effecting whereof they command, that no ship should passe by night betwixt the two Castles, which are at the entry of the gulf of Venice. This was the same night, when as the Archbishop should depart with many swords, bucklers, and iauelins, to arme those with whom hee had intelligence. But he is taken, and shut vp in one of those Castles: his instructions are viewed, whereby the Venetians informed of the fact, send to aduertise the Turkes in the places adioyning. In truth our French had not yet learned to know him, who guides our hands to fight, and our fingers to the battell. Attending a strange and sudden Catastrophe, they must plant the bounds of their victory in the Realme of Naples. Let vs now see the issue of this iourney. Wee haue left King Charles at Naples, seeking his delights, and his people hunting after profit, neglecting to expell the Aragonois out of those few places which held yet for them. In the meane time the peoples loue and fauour, (who loue not a stranger, but in their need) decreased.

The King had in his bounty freed the Realme of about 200000 ducats by yere: yet matters were not managed with that order and iudgement as was requisite: hee heard not the petitions and complaints of futers, but left the charge thereof to such as ruled him: whose incapacity and couerousnesse confounded all. The Nobility were not regarded, their seruices were not recompenced; they had no access to the King: no distinction of persons, no grauity but by chance: mens courages that were estranged from the house of Aragon, were not confirmed: no restitution of goods and offices to the Angeuins, and other Barons, which had beene banished by old Ferdinand: preferments were giuen to such as purchased them with money, and other extraordinary meanes: to many they were giuen without reason, and taken from others without any cause: the townes which were not wont to obey any immediately but the King, were giuen for the most part to Frenchmen. Things most insupportable to subjects, who had beene accustomed to the wife and well ordered government of Kings of the house of Aragon, and had hoped for better in the change of this royalty. These things did wonderfully blemish the reputation of the French. On the other side, there was no care to keepe the faith ingaged, for the restitution of the townes and fortresses to the Florentines and the Church. A pretext which serued as a principall ground for the following League.

The Venetians
discouer an enterprize against Scutari to the Turkes.

Causes of dif-content in the Realme of Naples.

In the meane time, Alphonso and Ferdinand lately King of Naples, lay before the Venetians the dangers they incurred by this new purchase to the Crowne of France. The king of Castile is in doubt of his Islands of Sicile and Sardinia. The Emperour is iecalous, and they giue him falsly to vnderstand, that the King desired his Imperiall Crowne. The Duke of Milan could neuer beleue, the King should find so great facility in this expedition, or proceed so farre with his forces. He was vnable to defend his estate newly vsurped. But another feare possesseth him, the seruitude that hangs ouer his head, and all Italy. The Pope opposeth, and the Turke at the Popes instance, threatens the Venetians, if they declare not themselves against the King. The Venetians, hauing seene the violent course of this happy successe, that the King, like lightning, had run through all Italy: that hee had seized vpon Pisa, and other forts of the Florentines, that he had left a garison in Sienna, and done the like in the territories of the Church. They imagined, that his proiects had a further reach then the Realme of Naples, and hold anothers danger to be their owne. To preuent it, they conclude a league, (for three intents, said they to the Lord of Argenton, the Kings Ambassador at Venice): To defend Christendome against the Turke: for the common defence of Italy, and for the preleruation of euery ones priuate estate. They conclude by secret articles to aide Ferdinand of Arragon, for the recouery of the Realme of Naples, who with great hope of the peoples loue, was ready to enter Calabria. That the same instant the Venetians should attempt some sea townes of the said Realme: The Duke of Milan (to cut off all succours that might come from France) should seeke to surpris the Duke of Orleans remained with small forces. And the confederates should giue the Emperour and the King of Spaine a certaine summe of money, to invade France with a mighty army. The Florentines had iust cause to forsake the King. He had not seeld them in the possession of their places. He preferred the counsell of such as supported the Pisians before the Florentines, on his faith, perswading him that if these were restored they would vntie themselves to the other Potentates: yet would not they enter into this League, desiring rather to recouer their places from his hand that did enioy it. The Duke of Ferrara dissembling, would not signe it, yet was hee content that his sones should accept the pay of an hundred and fifty men at armes, and the title of Lieutenant generall for the Duke of Milan. This League concluded, made the Courtiers desirous to returne into France, thrust forward rather by an inconstant lightnesse, then any wise consideration, or loue to the Kings honour and good: leauing many important affaires vndecided, and the Realme not wholly conquered: some chiefe forts, either not taken or not furnished, gaue an entry to the Arragonois. We doe oftentimes contemne an enemy ouer whom we haue an aduantage. So the Castles of Caieto, Rhegium, Brundisium, Gallipoli, Mantia, Turpia, Otrante, and other townes neglected, made the way to a generall reuolt. Now the confederates march to field, to ioyne their forces, meaning either to besiege Charles within Naples, or to fight with him in his returne. They must therefore resolute either to defend the Realme, or to leaue a good guard, and so depart before this great storme fell vpon them. The Spanish fleet landing at Rhegium, had furnished it, and assured it for the Arragonois. Mantia, Turpia, and Otrante seeing the League, and that they had not regarded them, plant the Arragon Ensignes, and receiue the garisons, which Don Fredericke had sent them. The Venetian fleet commanded by Anthony Grimaldi, appeared vpon the coast of Apulia. In the end, all the Realme begins to make open demonstration of a new will. But see, he that was euen now the peoples terror, the Iudge of anothers life and estate, the hope of the East, stands in feare to bee controlled. A scourge to abate the presumption which his victory had bred. The King leaues Gilbert of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier, for his Viceroy, a hardy and valiant Prince, but faith the History, Not wise, he did not rise before noone. And for the defence of the Realme, two thousand five hundred Suisses, a part of his French footmen, 800 French Lances, five hundred men at armes Italians in his pay, some commanded by the gouernor of Rome, some by Prosper and Fabrizio Colonnio, and by Anthony Sanelli, Captaines well preferred in the distribution of places and offices within the Realme, especially, the Colonies. Prosper had in the Duchy of Tracette, the City of Fundi, Montfortin, and about thirty other places. Fabrizio had the Countreies of Albi and Taillecouffe, which Virgil Prin did formerly enioy. The Lord of Aubign, a braue and wife Knight, was made Gouernor of Calabria, and had the Earledome of Acri, and the Marquisate of Squillazzo giuen him.

A The Prince of Salerne was restored to the office of Admirall, and he of Besignan well aduanced. Steuens de Vers, sometimes groome of the Kings Chamber, and after Senechal of Beaucaire, obtained the Duchy of Nola, the captainship of Caieto, and other commands, with the office of great Chamberlaine, and Controller of the treasure within the Realme, well affected to the guard thereof, but too weak of iudgment to beare the burthen and care of so great affaires. Don Iulian of Lorraine (greatly commended for his gouernment) was made Duke of S. Angelo. Gratian des Guerres, a valiant Captaine of great reputation, had the gouernment of Abruzzo: Gabriel of Montfaucon (of whom the King made great accompt) had Manfredonia, but hauing receiued it well furnished with victuals, and in a Country abounding with corne, he so deuoured his prouision, as after foure dayes siege, he was forced to yeeld vp the place for want of victuals. The King left George of Suilli at Tarentum, who caried himselfe with much honour. Hee died there of the plague, and the Towne held for the King, vntill that famine forced them to change their party. In Aquila, the Bayliffe of Vitry was commended to haue well discharged his duty. Such was the order the King left in the Realme of Naples, whereof followed a horrible disorder: for the greatest part of other Captaines, appointed in diuers places, applied to their owne priuate profit such commodities as they found within their places, for the defence whereof the King had greatly weakened his forces. So returning but with nine hundred men at armes, two thousand five hundred Suisses, seauen thousand men in pay, and fifteen hundred men of defence, chosen out of his traine following the Court, hee parted the twentieth day of May, taking his way to Rome, and his army at sea to Liurorne. The Pope made some shew to reconcile himselfe with the King, and the King laboured to diuide him from the league. In the end, a bad conscience made him go to Oruieto with his college of Cardinals, a thousand light horse, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, leauing a sufficient garison in the Castle of S. Angelo, and the Cardinall of Anafistia for Legat in Rome, to receiue the king, who refusing the Vatican, lodged in the suburbs. And the Pope vnderstanding, that hee approached to Viterbo, (although hee had giuen some hope of an enteruiue betwixt Viterbo and Oruieto,) yet he went from Oruieto to Perugia, with an intent if the King took that course, to recouer Ancona, and to retire himselfe by sea into some place of safetie. Yet notwithstanding the kings iust caused discontent, he redelivered him Ciuitaueccia and Terracine, refusing Ostium, the which hee leide in the hands of the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, Bishop of that place. The territories of the Church were not spoiled by his army, onely Toscanelle, which refusing to lodge his forward, was taken by force and sack. But wee must leaue records of our indifferen in all places. His enemies troope together, and during a fruitlesse stay of sixe or seauen dayes at Sienna, we giue them leisure to ioyne their forces. Moreover, the Florentines summon the King of his faith and promises, and to draw him thereunto the more willingly, (besides the thirty thousand Ducats which they were ready to pay, as remaying of their gift) they offered to lend him three score and ten thousand Ducats more: And to assist him in his passage with three hundred men at armes, vnder the command of Francesco Sasso, a braue Captaine, and faithfull to the King, and with two thousand foot. Three reasons should moue the Counsell to accept hereof. The want of money, the increase of their army, and that which did most import, the discharge of the Kings faith and royall oath: yet a sith and must first kindle, and in the end fire all Italy.

The Earle of Ligni, yong and vnexperienced, (yet fauoured of the King his cousin) laboured for the Sogues of Pisa and Liurorno, and the Sienois required him for their Lord, promising him an appointment of twenty thousand Ducats by the year, vpon condition he should maintaine three hundred foot for the defence of the place, taking away the ordinary guard, while the order of Monte Nouo (in whose power the gouernment of the City was wont to be) held in the Palace.

of King Charles.

The King (being yong) preferred the counsell of yong men, before the marshall of France, the President of Chancery, and others well aduised: and agrees, that hee should take the City of Sienna into his protection, binding himselfe to defend all that depended thereon, except Monteparsiano, where with he would not deale: neither for the Florentines nor the Sienois. But what were the fruits of this conclusion? but the shamefull expulsion of his garison, and of the Lord of Lile, whom the King had left there for Ambassador, by those of the foresaid order, who soon after recouered their ancient authority.

King Charles
refused the
offer.

In the meane time, Alphonso and Ferdinand lately King of Naples, lay before the Venetians the dangers they incurred by this new purchase to the Crowne of France. The King of Castile is in doubt of his Islands of Sicilie and Sardinia. The Emperour is iealous, and they giue him fallcely to vnderstand, that the King desired his Imperiall Crowne. The Duke of Milan could neuer beleue, the King should find so great facility in this expedition, or proceed so farre with his forces. He was vnable to defend his estate newly vsurped. But another feare possesseth him, the feruente that hangs ouer his head, and all Italy. The Pope opposeth, and the Turke at the Popes instance, threatens the Venetians, if they declare not themselves against the King. The Venetians, hauing seene the violent course of this happy successe, that the King, like lightning, had run through all Italy: that hee had seized vpon Pisa, and other forts of the Florentines, that he had left a garison in Sienna, and done the like in the territories of the Church. They imagined, that his proiects had a further reach then the Realme of Naples, and hold anothers danger to be their owne. To prevent it, they conclude a league, (for three intents, said they to the Lord of Argenton, the Kings Ambassador at Venice) To defend Chriistendome against the Turke: for the common defence of Italy, and for the preseruation of euery ones priuate estate. They conclude by secret articles to aide Ferdinand of Arragon, for the recovery of the Realme of Naples, who with great hope of the peoples loue, was ready to enter Calabria. That at the same instant the Venetians should attempt some sea townes of the said Realme: The Duke of Milan (to cut off all succours that might come from France) should seeke to surpris Aft, where the Duke of Orleans remained with small forces. And the confederates should giue the Emperour and the King of Spaine a certaine summe of money, to invade France with a mighty army. The Florentines had iust cause to forsake the King. He had not seeld them in the possession of their places. He preferred the counsell of iuch assiposited the Pisans before the Florentines, on his faith, perswading him that if these were restored they would unite themselves to the other Potentates: yet would not they enter into this League, desiring rather to recouer their places from his hand that did enioy it. The Duke of Ferrara dissembling, would not signe it, yet was hee content that his sone should accept the pay of an hundred and fifty men at armes, and the title of Lieutenant general for the Duke of Milan. This League concluded, made the Courtiers desirous to returne into France, thrust forward rather by an inconstant lightnesse, then any wise consideration, or loue to the Kings honour and good: leauing many important affaires vndecided, and the Realme not wholly conquered: some chiefe forts, either not taken or not furnished, gaue an entry to the Arragonois. We doe oftentimes contemne an enemy ouer whom we haue an aduantage. So the Castles of Caieto, Rhegium, Brundisium, Gallipoli, Mantia, Turpia, Otrante, and other townes neglected, made the way to a generall reuolt. Now the confederates march to field, to ioyne their forces, meaning either to besiege Charles within Naples, or to fight with him in his returne. They must therefore resolute either to defend the Realme, or to leaue a good guard, and so depart before this great storme fell vpon them. The Spanish fleet landing at Rhegium, had furnished it, and assured it for the Arragonois. Mantia, Turpia, and Otrante seeing the League, and that they had not regarded them, plant the Arragon Ensignes, and receiue the garisons, which Don Fredericke had sent them. The Venetian fleet commanded by Anthony Grimaldi, appeared vpon the coast of Apulia. In the end, all the Realme begins to make open demonstration of a new will. But see, he that was euen now the peoples terror, the Iudge of anothers life and estate, the hope of the East, stands in feare to bee controlled. A scourge to abate the presumption which his victory had bred. The King leaues Gilbert of Bourbon Earle of Montpenher, for his Viceroy, a hardy and valiant Prince, but faith the History, Not wise, he did not rise before noone. And for the defence of the Realme, two thousand five hundred Suisses, a part of his French footmen, 800 French Lances, five hundred men at armes Italians, in his pay, some commanded by the gouernor of Rome, some by Prosper and Fabrizio Colonnio, and by Anthony Saueilly, Captaines well preferred in the distribution of places and offices within the Realme, especially, the Colonies. Prosper had in the Duchy of Tracette, the City of Fundi, Montfortin, and about thirty other places. Fabrizio had the Countries of Albi and Taillecouffe, which Virgil had formerly enioy. The Lord of Aubign, a braue and wise Knight, was made Gouernor of Calabria, and had the Earledome of Acra, and the Marquisate of Squillazzo giuen him.

Three reasons should moue the Counsell to accept hereof. The predictions of Sauonarola.

by force. Then liued at Florence, Frier Ierofme Sauonarola, of the order of Saint Domini, in great reputation of a holy life, and a graue preacher, who by his sermons had greatly confirmed the Florentines affection to the King: he had long time foretold and preached the Kings coming into Italy, saying: that hee was sent of God to punish the sinners of Italy: that nothing could resist him: that hee should enter Pisa, and such a day the Estate of Florence should die. And in truth Peter of Medicis was banished that day, and many others things fell out as he had foretold (amongst others the death of Lawrence de Medicis) and he said he knew them by reuelation: that the Church should be reformed by the sword. He likewise affirmed: That notwithstanding the great forces of the Venetians, the King should returne without any great danger to his person: that he should be encountered upon the way, but the honour should be his, had he but a hundred men in his company. That God which had conducted him in his going, would guard him in his returne: but for that hee had not discharged himselfe in the reformation of the Church, as he ought, and had wincked at the thefts and insolencies of his troopes, that God had pronounced a sentence against him, and hee should haue his chastisement. The which he himselfe did signifie vnto the King in plaine termes: adding, that if hee would take pity of the people, and restraîne his men from doing ill, and punish the offenders, as his duty required, God would reuoke, or mitigate his sentence. To conclude, that he should not thinke to be excused for saying: I doe no euill. A lesson for Kings. That the faults they suffer in their subiects, are so many burthens laid vpon their owne backs, to plead one day against them, before his Maiestie, to whom they, like small other men, are accountable. And moreover, that the peoples voyce, is the voyce of God.

In the meane time, the Venetians and Lodowike Sforze make great preparations to stop the Kings passage: or at the least, to keepe him from attempting against the Milanais. And for the better effecting of their designe, they entertaine Iohn Bentiuole, at their common charge, who ioynd the Citie of Bologna to their league. Lodowike armed ten Gallies at Genoa, vpon his owne charge, and foure great ships, at the common charge of the Pope, the Venetians and himselfe. And to surpris the Towne of Ast (as hee was bound by the capitulation,) he leaued two thousand foot in Germany, (hauing lately drawne Galeas of Saint Seuerin into this action) with seuen hundred men at armes, & three thousand foot. By means of these forces he promised to himselfe an assured conquest of the Citie of Ast. He sends the Duke of Orleans three insolent conditions: That hereafter he should no more usurpe the title of Duke of Milan, the which his father Charles had taken after the death of Philip Maria V's cont. That he should not suffer any new forces to come from France into Italy. That he should send those into France that were in Ast. And for the assurance of these things, he should deliuer the said town into the hands of Galeas Saint Seuerin, who should keepe it faithfully for the King. A wretched man, who by a proud ostentation, thinks to amaze a noble courage, and cannot instantly hide the baseness of his owne. But by the aduice of the Lord of Argenton, Ambassador for the King at Venice, the Duke of Orleans had from the beginning furnished the place with foure hundred men at armes, & sixe thousand foot, two thousand Suiſſes, and five hundred men which Lodowike Marquis of Sauces had sent. The Duke of Bourbon had leaued his army to ioyne with the King vpon the Theſin, and to helpe his passage: But the Duke of Orleans employed it in the Marquisate of Sauces, to take Gilfrieres, the which Anthony Maria of Saint Seuerin held. And although he had expresse commandement from the King, to lay aside all enterprises, and goe to meet with him, yet did he accept the offer made by two Opizins, gentlemen of Nouarre, who hated Lodowike Sforze.

He passeth the Pau by night, at the bridge of Sture, accompanied by the Marquis of Saluces, and was let into Nouarre by the conspirators, without any resistance. In this place the Duke of Milan tooke his greatest delight, being most pleasant of all others for hauking, and hunting. This stratagem had bene dangerous in another of meane quality, seeing the question was to succour the Kings person, whom the French esteemed no lesse then a Kingdome. But seeing the Duke of Orleans had thus begun, why did he not proceed? Milan opened her armes, Paulia offered it selfe, and to that end sent twise vnto him. Lodowike (as delect in aduersity, as proud in his prosperity,) shewed the baseness of his courage. The Nobility and people desired nothing more then the ruine of this house of Sforze.

The

A The Venetians had let the King vnderstand, that if he made warre against the Duke of Milan, they would succor him with all their meanes. Thus Charles foreseeing, that by the taking of Nouarre, he should haue the enemies vpon him; & that the Duke of Orleans should need succors: he goeth on from Sienna to Pisa. Then Sauonarola comes to him to Poggibonle, and the next day to Castile Florentine, and vsing (as he was wont) the name and authority of God, he declared vnto him: That if he yelded not to the Florentines the places wherunto he was bound by oath, he should be rigorously punished. The King exculging himselfe vpon that which hee had promised to the Pisans, to maintaine them in liberty, before he had taken any oath in Florence, gaue both the Monke and the Florentine Ambassadors hope of restitution, after his coming to Pisa. At Pisa, the Citizens teares both of men and women, (beseeching them that lodged in their houses, to intreat the King, not to suffer them to fall again into the Florentines tyranny) made Charles to forget the promises and oath he had taken vpon the altar of S. Iohn at Florence: but most of all, the importunate sute of the Earle of Ligni, that the King would leaue him Pisa & Liouerne at his deuotion. Those which had impugned this resolution in Sienna, did likewise contradict it in Pisador (said they) if by the opposition of enemies, any disorder should chance, or any difficulty to passe through Lombardy, we should haue a sure & fit retreat at Pisa: whereas, if we restore them to the Florentines, when as they haue recovered all their places, we shal find them as inconsistent as the other Italians. Moreover, they gaue the King to vnderstand, that for the safety of the Realm of Naples, it were expedient to hold the port of Liouerne, for if the estate of Genoa should change for the Kings good, hee should bee in a manner Lord of all the sea, from the port of Marſeilles vnto that of Naples.

Finally, the King changed the captaine of the Cittadell, and left one called Entragues, a man (saith the original) ill conditioned, seruant to the Duke of Orleans, (whom the Earle of Ligni had recommended) with some footmen of Berry. Entragues wrought so, as he had Pietraſancta, Mortron, and Librefancta, nere vnto Luques. Serezane was giuen (by means of the said Earle) to a bastard of Rouilly his seruant, and Serezanelle to another that was at his disposing. Thus the King did willingly weaken his forces the which he must distribute into these places, to make his fauorits great. And as he suffered himselfe to be too easily caried away by the rash counsel of those he fauoured, behold vpon a hope giuen him by the Cardinals of Rouere and Fregos, obietto of Fiefque, and other banished men, on a sudden alteration at Genoa, hee sends with them (against the aduice of his counsell, who did not approue the weakning of his army, for if he should win the battell, Genoa would yeld of it selfe, but if he lost it, hee had then no need thereof) Philip Earle of Bresse, afterwards Duke of Sauoy, the Lords of Beaumont, Polignac, and Ambeiou of the house of Amboise, with sixe score men at armes, and sixe hundred crosbowmen, newly come out of France, sending after them the company of men at armes of Ytelle, and those men which the Duke of Sauoy had sent, fortified by the army at sea, reduced to seuen galleyes, two galeons, and two barks, commanded by Miolani gouernour of Daulphine, to countenance that at land.

But how easily doth man deceiue himselfe in his owne conceits? All these that went to take, are taken, euen at the same place where we haue seene our men defeat King Alphonſes troopes, and by the same men that they had beaten. Iohn Lewis of Fiefque, and Iohn Adorne, were led captiues vnto Genoa, where they lost the fruit and honour of a famous battell, in the which they might haue done good seruice.

But who will not thinke the predictions of Sauonarola to bee very true. That God would guide the King by the hand into safety; taking away his enemies iudgement, not to molest him in the most painfull straights of his voyage? Our French are now betwixt Luques and Pietraſancta, enuironed on the one side by high mountains, and on the other, by deepe marishes and bogges. They must passe a caufie, which a Cart set crosse, with two peeces of Cannon might easily guard. Pontremc, lying at the entry of the mountains, was held for Lodowike by three hundred foot. The Marshall of Gy arising with the foreward, they presently open the gates in fauour of Triunle, vpon promise to saue their liues and goods. But alas, the Suiſſes had not yet forgotten, that when as the army passed to Naples, some forty of their companions were slaine there in a tumult! For this cause, they fall furiously vpon them, kill all the men, sacke the towne, and burne it, and all that was within it, the Marshall not being able to prevent this disorder. The blood being inflamed, it transports vs beyond the bonds of reason, but as it growes cold, it returns to his right place. These Suisses doubted some punishment: or at the least, that the King should grow in dislike of them for this out-rage, committed both against the lawes of armes, and nations. But what? an vnbridled desire of reuenge, a military fury hath transported them: they are ready, though not to make satisfaction, yet to repaire it, by some notable seruice. And see, an opportunity is offered. The army staid on this side the valley of Pontreme, in extreame want of victuals: and the artillery could not passe these troublesome straights, without great toyle, and losse of time. And this gaue the enemy leasure to make one vnited body of all his forces. The Suisses come and doe voluntarily offer to passe it by force, as the King will pardon them: the which he doth. Leaving the valley, they must mount vpon a very steep hill, where their Moyleis did creepe vp with great difficulty. These men performe the worke of horses of burthen: they couple themselves by two and two, and so vnder take the worke, a hundred or two hundred at once, as the burthen required, and one being weary, another supplied his place.

Repaired by a notable peace of seruice.

The fore-ward was lodged at Foinoue (a small, but a good village, seated at the foot of the mountaine, enting into Lombardy) where he had the enemy in front: without doubt they were in great danger, if they had then charged them. But their desire to swallow vp this army in the middle of the plaine: giuing the King meanes (who lay fifteen French leagues off) to ioyne his troopes, laid the way open to shame and confusion, imagining, that to charge our French on this side the Mountaines, were to cut off all retreat to Pisa and other places of the Florentines. And on the other side, to fight without attending their men, were to doe them wrong, seeing that their foot were not excellent. If they mis-caried, they should purchase reproach with the Seignury of Venice. Some light skirmishes made the Marshall retire into the higher part of the Mountaine. Hence vpon the King ioynes with his foreward, on Sunday the 15 day of Iuly: and all the enemies forces ariued, being five & thirty thousand men in pay, two thousand six hundred men at armes barded, making foure men of combat to euery Lance: five thousand light horse, amongst the which were two thousand Albanos, and of the neighbour Princiues of Greece, who retaining the name of the Country, are commonly called Stradiots: as who would say, men of the campe; good soldiers, and well practised in armes. The rest were foot, well appointed with artillery.ouer the Venetian troopes, Francis Gonzaga Marquis of Mantoua commanded as Generall, a yong man, but of great courage and desirous of glory, and with him Luke Pisan, and Melchior Treuisan, were Commissaries of the army, being of the chiefe Senators of Venice: for Lodowick Sforza (who opposed some part of his forces against the Duke of Orleans: being nine hundred men at armes, twelve hundred light horse, and five thousand foot) the Earle of Caiazzo, a more polittike then hardy Captaine commanded, and Francis Bernardin Viscount, chiefe of the Gibelin faction at Milan was Commissary: and by consequence enemy to Trinulce.

Their army camped at the Abbey of Guaiuolo, about a league from Foinoue, vpon a little hill on the right hand of the Kings army. The King had no other forces, but what he brought from Naples, whereof we haue made mention at his departure. Hee must passe neere the enemy (being halfe a league off, and a small brooke called Taro, betwixt both.) There was no likelihood, that this great multitude should part without the hazard of a battell. To try their resolutions, the King (who desired only to passe quietly into France) caught the Lord of Argenton, lately Ambassador at Venice, to write vnto the aboue named Commissaries, that he desired to confer with them. They promise to meet the next day in a conuenient place betwixt both armies. The night was terrible in raine, lightning and thunder, a fearefull prediction of the day following.

Munday morning, the King armes himselfe complete, and mounted vpon his Saueyard (a horse which Charles Duke of Sauoy had giuen him) faire and goodly, managing him with all agility, blacke of colour, and answerable in proportion to him that was mounted thereon: he shewes himselfe to his troopes, with a cheerefull countenance, well coloured, and a speech contrary to his custome, strong, resolute, and wise, an assured preface of the honor hee should win that day. Putting his army into battell, hee placed in the foreward 350 French Lances, and Iohn Laques of Trinulce with his company of an hundred Lances, and three thousand Suisses; the chiefe hope of the army, commanded by

A by Engilbert brother to the Duke of Cleues (who did fight on foot, with the Bayliffe of Dijon, that had leauied them) and to second them, three hundred archers, some cross-bowmen on horse-backe of his guards, whom hee commanded to leaue their horses, and the most part of his foot, conceiuing that the foreward should be charged with the chiefe of his enemies forces. His Maiesty was in the battell, hauing about him feuen or eight yong Noblemen armed like himselfe (for the confederates had sent to discover him by a Herald, vnder color of some demand) and for counsell hee had the Lord of Tremouille. The Earle of Foix commanded the rereward: the baggage, by the counsell of Trinulce, was left without guard, exposed to pillage, to keepe the enemy occupied with that baite. Thus the army marched, when as Luke and Melchior the Venetian Commissaries were ready to partee. But the troopes were now in alarme, the Capitaines encouraged their men to fight. The neernesse of both armies calls them from words to blowes, they begin with skirmishes, the Cannon thunders, but with more noyse then effect. The Marquis of Mantua, his vnkle Ralph of Gonzagua, the Earle Bernardin of Montone, with a Squadron of fixe hundred choice men at armes, a great troope of Stradiots, and other light horse, with five thousand foot, passe the Taro vpon the backe of the French rere-ward, to charge them behind: leauing on the other banke, Anthony of Montfetre a ballard of the Duke of Urbins, with a great Squadron, to passe at the first call: ordaining moreover, that at the first shoock, a part of the light horse should charge in flanke, and the rest of the Stradiots should follow, to set vpon the baggage. The Earle of Caiazzo, with foure hundred men at armes, and a great number of foot, passeth likewise to charge the fore-ward, leauing in like sort on the other banke, Annikal Bentiuale with two hundred men at armes, to supply whē he should be sent for. And for the guard of their lodging, two great companies of men at armes, with a thousand foot, the Venetian Commissaries reseruing a supply for all euents. Thus the French army is inuironed on all sides, so as being broken, no man might hope for safety: and the King, who to strengthen the fore-ward, had weakened the other two parts, was forced to leaue the Knights he meant to make to some better leysure, & to turne his backe to the foreward, and his face to the enemy, approaching neere the rere-ward. The Stradiots fall vpon the baggage, they wound, kill, and spoile, and the Marquis is ablowes with the rere-ward, who at the first charge breake their Lances, and then valiantly they ioyne pel-mel with their battle-axes, swords, and other short weapons, the Marquis performing the part of a most valiant and vigilant Captaine, and his troope of most resolute men at armes. The King was brought rashly into danger, his followers being disperied here and there in the conflict, assisted with few about him but Mathew bastard of Bourbon, and Philip of Moulin a gentleman of Solongne, noted for that they had been seene very neere vnto the King in this conflict. The King did afterwards greatly fauour this Philip, he made him Keeper of the great Scale, gaue him a company of men at armes, the gouernment of Langres, and a great summe of money, according to the time, to helpe him to build Moulin, (a Caste neere to Romorant in Solongne.) Robinet of Fraizezelles (who led about fourscore Lances of the dukes of Orleans) Louis of Tremouille, with about forty Lances, an hundred Scottish Archers of his guard, and the Gentlemen of his household, did fight more courageously then their forces could permit, not without great danger to his person, being much esteemed by the Marquis, hoping to haue the like aduenture ouer him, as hee had vpon the said bastard, being wounded, and taken prisoner, neere vnto the King. But the apparent danger of his Maiesty had so inflamed those that were neere vnto him, as falling by heapes vpon the Italians, they couer their masters person with their owne: and so this sudden fury was stayed, by the charge of a Squadron comming at need from the battell broken by the death of Ralph of Gonzagua. A death vnworthy of him, for hee saved the French, and if he might haue bene credited, the King should not haue opened his passage by force, and quite ouerthrowne all by the counter-nesse of the Free-booters: for these men (seeing their companions enriched with the spoiles of the baggage, and to carry away ouer the riuer, some Moyleis with their burthens, and some horse or armor) they leaue their men at armes, and runne to the spoile. The other horse-men were moued presently with the like desire of gaine: and the foot stole out of the battell, to follow the like example.

On the other side, Anthony of Montfetre appointed by Ralph to succor when he should be called, keeping his stand (for that by reason of Ralphs death no man called him) the French took their field at large, and doubting their courage, they doubled their blows, as so by the death of some, and the wounding and flight of others, the Marquis his troops oppressed with the rough charge of our men at arms, in the end turned their backs, and were chased and beaten even to the rivers side, without taking of any prisoner, or care of booty, our French being loathed of this filthy gain, by that common voice, flying amongst them, Companions remember Guinegate, where the greediness of spoile had taken from them the better part of a notable victory. At the same instant the Earle of Caiazzo led his troops against the forward; but this was but a countenance, for even as they couched their Lances, seeing some of his troops unhorsed, John Piccinin, Galeas of Corcege, and others, fainted, and breaking of themselves, they had means to recover their battell. The Marshall of Gye seeing on the other side of the river an other regiment of men at arms, prepared for the battell, hee keeps backe his men, the which was held of some to be rather an act of cowardise, then of discretion; but by such a preference reason before danger, wise and judicious. The Swisses took about twenty of these run-aways, and slue them.

The army of the league o-uerthrowne.

The Marquis of Mantoua gathered together the remainders of this overthrow, and the Earle of Peillano (being prisoner upon his word, since the taking of Capoua) flying in this tumult to the Italians campe, kept them from a more shamefull rout. For the whole campe talked of a retreat, and the high way from Placentia to Parma was covered with men, horses and carts that retired. Then the King going to his fore ward (which had kept their stand) propounded unto his Captaines, whether he should charge the enemy in his lodging? Trinulce and Pistell counselled him thereunto, and Francis Secco (whom the Florentines had sent to conduct the King unto Ast) thrust him forward: But the passage of Taro being yncasie (by reason of the raine the night before, and the day of the battell) the companies being weary, the night approaching, and the King content to have had the advantage in so doubtful a fight, did moderate the heat of the pursuit, causing them to lodge at Medefane, a village halfe a league from the place where the battell was fought. So this battell ended; a memorable day, being the first of a long time, that had bene obstinately fought in Italy with blood shed and slaughter; (for in former times the Italian combats, were rather pleasant shewes then battells) famous also for the great numbers of Commanders that were slaine, the small number of conquerors, in regard of the huge multitude of the vanquished. There were numbered some five and thirty or forty French horsemen slaine, and some so groomes of the baggage. The Stradiots carried not away (of all their booty) but five and forty of the best horse, which were the Kings & his Chamberlaines: of Italians three hundred and fifty men at arms, amongst the which there were seven or eight of the house of Gonzagna, Rainucio, Farnese, Bernardin of Montone, about sixscore Gentlemen of the Marquis his company, & so great a number of others, as they were esteemed to be three thousand five hundred, and not one prisoner. Let vnto member, That the eternal God scatters the counsels of the nations, and brings to nought the practices of men. And in another place, That the King is not saved by a great army, neither doth a mighty man scape by his great force. The King stayed the next day at the same lodging, and departed on Wednesday the 8 of the month, without any sound of Trumpet, burying the enemy vnder color of a parlee, fearing them that feared him. But if he could have made profit of his victory, and turned head against them, who were yet amazed, as their owne commanders did confesse, all had sought for their safety by flight. And if he had displayed his colors in fauour of little Francis, son to John Galeas Duke of Milan, the name of the usurper was so odious to all the Duchy, and the name of their lawfull Lord so pleasing, as the people had easily confined Lodowike into the castle of Milan, and consequently the Venetians had lost most of the places they possessed in Italy: so ready is that nation to follow the victors happinesse. This was the counsell of Trinulce: but the King would not attempt any thing upon the right which the duke of Orleans pretended to the Duchy, being now in possession of Nouarre. Moreover, God which had giuen him the honour of a victory, would take from him all cause of presumption, depriving him of the principall fruits that depended thereon.

This so happy victory, opened a passage for the King, yet was he to encounter a world of difficulties, steepe and craggy mountaines, rough valleys, dangerous forests, rivers hard to passe, want of victuals, & behind him the Earle of Caiazzo had passed the river of

Taro

A Taro with two hundred Lances, to cut off them that lingered behind. The river Treby gave the first obstacle with some terror: for about ten of the clocke at night, the river swelled so high, as it was impossible to passe it before five in the morning, the boulders wading about breast high. The King did wisely to dislodge without brute, being (besides the enemies Army) so neere to Lodowike Sforzes strong garisons, hauing a great number of horse, and twelue hundred Lanquenets, lodged in Tortone and in Alexandria, and five hundred others with the forsaide Earle, who were entred into Placentia fearing some alteration.

Truly Charles did daily feeble the truth of Sauonarolles predictions: That he should endure much, but the honor should be his. The river of Scruia was kept by Gaspard of Saurin, furnished the Fracasse, brother to the Earle of Caiazzo, and Captaine of Tortone, but aduerted that the Kings meaning was only to passe, he retired to his charge, furnished the army with victuals, came vnto the King, and excused himselfe, for that he could not lodge him within the towne: the which he kept for Lodowike. After a shower comes a sun-shine, faith the Prouerbe. The king is now in a friends Country, at Nice, belonging to the Marquis of Monterrat, and from Nice to Ast. Then the great army of the league, which had followed him into the Country of Tortone, hauing no more means to annoy him, went to ioyne with Lodowikes troops before Nouarre, the which was in great want, for the duke of Orleans had gouerned the victuals he found therein very ill, and had neglected to furnish it as he might haue done, considering the fertility of the Country. He had of late retained the supply of seven thousand five hundred good fighting men, sent to the King by the duke of Bourbon: and contrary to his Maiesties commandement, he hath taken places from Lodowike: and now in stead of succouring, he demands succours, for want whereof he shall be forced to yeeld what he hath gotten.

But Charles had other worke. Naples is in danger: Ferdinand sought all means to recover it, and hauing presented himselfe with Gonsalve Fernand of the house of Agilifer of the territory of Cordoua, with sixe thousand men neere vnto Seminare, after the taking of Rhegium, he had fought to draw the whole Realme into rebellion, if the Lord of Aubigni, Gouernor of Calabria, had not by his vigilancy and valour slackt the heat of the peoples rage. And the quarrell had bene ended by the death of: imprisonment of Ferdinand himselfe, if John of Capoua, brother to the Duke of Termini, (whom Ferdinand had brought vp a page) had not performed the part of a most faithful and loyall seruant, who leauing his horse, lost his life to saue his master, Ferdinand hauing his horse slaine vnder him. Gonsalve fled through the mountaines to Rhegium: Ferdinand to Palma, lying upon the sea neere to Seminare, and from thence to Messina. Ferdinand grieved with this disgrace, will once againe try the hazard of armes. He is well informed, that all the City of Naples desires him greatly: many of the chiefe, both of the Nobility and people, call him secretly. And therefore, before the brute of this overthrow in Calabria should alter this good humor, he parts from Messina with threecore vessels with top masts, and twenty lesse, furnished more for shew and bravery, then for any good seruice, hauing no forces proportionable to so high an enterprize. The peoples fauor and desire supplied his want of men. The townes of Salerne, Melfe, and Caue, display their Ensignes, and he-houers about Naples, attending some mutiny in the City. But all was in vaine: the Vice-roy had in time manned the approaches, and suppressed the rebellion which began to breed. But according to the aduice of some, he should haue armed such ships as were in the harbor, with footsolders and men of execution, and haue charged the enemy, who being strong in shipping, and weak in men, was retired to Ilicia.

The conspirators faint not, but seeing their practice discovered, make a vertue of necessity. They call backe Ferdinand, and intreat him to land, to giue both force and courage to those that would rise in his fauour. He approacheth, and lands at Magdeleine, a mile from Naples. Here the Vice-roy shewed no lesse courage, when he should most fear, then he had shewed himselfe fearefull when as resolution was most necessary. He leads in a manner all the garison out of the City, to disturb his landing. The Neapolitans embracing this occasion, fly to armes, troope together at the sound of the bell, seize upon the gates, and proclaime Ferdinands name in all places. Our French are now in danger on all sides: shall they attend the foraine enemy, or shall they goe to charge them within the City? They haue no means to enter by the same way they came forth: all are armed, all is barred vp. There is no other access but by the port ioyning vnto the new Castle: A but the way is long and hilly, and they must goe about a good part of the Towne walles. But during this march, Ferdinand enters, and riding through the City, the people receiue him with great cries of ioy: the French hauing recouered the Castle, seeke to winne the heart of the City; but being repulst with crosse-bowes and small Artillery, and finding the entry of euery street well manned, the night likewise approaching abandoning almost two thousand horse, good and bad vpon the place, hauing no means to keepe them within the fort, vnfurnished of prouisions, all put themselves into the Castle, despairing euermore to recouer the Towne.

Caliste facke by the French.

Presently Capoua, Auerfe, Nola, the castle of Montdragon, and many other places follow this example, and the greatest part of the Realme turnes to Ferdinand. Some one must needs pay for all. Caliste hauing taken armes for Ferdinand, the French garison enters the towne with fury, makes a horrible slaughter of the rebels, and sacks it. The Venetia army at sea, besiegeth Monopoli, a City of Apulia, both by sea and land, giues a hot assault, they take it by force, and the Castle by composition, and afterwards the Towne of Pulignan. Charles aduerted of these results, being parted from Ast towards Turin, he sends away Peron of Basche his Steward, to hasten an army at sea, from Villefranche neere vnto Nice, the which caried two thousand fighting men, with store of victuals, vnder the command of the Lord of Arban, a valiant Captaine, and well experienced at sea, yet very unfortunate in this expedition: for hauing discouered Ferdinands fleet about the Isle of Poreze, consisting of thirty saile, and two great ships of Genoua: they presently turne taile to the enemy, leauing him a small Biscaine ship for a pawne, and recouer the port of Lioorne, where the Capitaine could not stay the greatest number of his souldiers from landing, who tooke the way to Pisa.

The French fleet flies voluntarily.

In the meane time, the Arragonois employes all his forces against the new Castle, the Castle del'Ouo, and other forts held by the French. And to makes the way the more easie, he fortifies the Hippodrome, mans Mont Saint Herme, and Puisfaucou, and assailes the Monastery of the crosse. But being at the first greatly annoyed by the Artillery, hee conuerts his force into policy, which proues unfortunate for the Author. There was in it a Moore, sometime seruant to the Marquis of Pescara. The Marquis founds him, and hee promiseth to giue entrance. For this effect, he mounts in the night by a Ladder set to the Abbey wall, to conclude of the conditions, the manner, and the time, but hee discouered not another Paris, who lying behind the battlements of the wall, cut the throat of his Chilles with a Crosse-bow. The Marquises death was repaired by the reuolt of Prasjer and Fabricio Colannes, who notwithstanding the great aduancements they had from the King (caried away with a light beleefe, spread abroad by certaine lying letters of Lodowick Sforze, that the King was dead at Fornoue, and seeing moreover, that the French affaires declined) they returre to Ferdinands pay. The Castles thus beleaguered; the sea shut by Ferdinands fleet; famine increasing daily, and all hope of foraine succours cut off by the voluntary rout of Arbans navy, made the Viceroy to yeeld vp the new castle to Ferdinand after three moneths siege, with promise to go into Prouence, if he were not releued within thirty dayes, departing with bag and baggage: and for assurance of this capitulation, he gaue for hostages, Tues of Alegre, la Marche of Ardenne, la Chapelle of Aniou, Regu, berlin, Catelan and Iensis: this was the sixth of October. If any reliefe came vnto them, it must be of those forces that were dispersed within the Realme. So the Lord Perfi d'Alegre, brought the Suisses, with many of the companies of men at armes, accompanied by the Prince of Bisignan, and diuers other Barons persisting yet in their fidelity. Ferdinand aduerted hereof, opposeth the Earle of Monteleone. They encounter at the Lake of Pizzale neere to Eboli, where our French had a reuenge of that braue fight of their army at sea. For the Earles forces exceeding Perfi in nuber, fly at the first approach, without any fight, leauing Ferdinand son to Julius of Verane Lord of Camerin prisoner, but being not pursued (for that our men came to another end) they retire without any great losse to Nola, and after to Naples. This victory thrusts forward our men to the execution of their designe. Ferdinand (to hinder their approach) casts vp a trench from Mont Saint Herme, to Castle del'Ouo, and plants artillery vpon the hills adioyning, the which doth greatly endamage the French, and takes away all means to enter the Castle. This side wanting fresh water, made them retire in disorder, leauing behind them some peeces

Castle Nouo abandoned by the Viceroy.

A of artillery, and part of the victuals they had brought for the releefe of the Castles, being discontented with the small endeavour the besieged had vied to receive them.

He that giues ouer, loseth the game. The Viceroy frustrate (by this dislodging) of all hope of succours, leauing three hundred men in the Castle Nouo (a number proportionable to the victuals that remained) and a conuenient garison in that of de l'Ouo, imbarks by night with the rest of his souldiers, being 2500, and takes his way to Salerne. Ferdinand complains that the accord is broken: that it was not lawfull for the Earle of Montpensier to depart suddenly, without taking leaue, and with such a company, before he had consigned him the Castles, threatening to be reuenged of the hostages for this iniury & fraud, the which were yeelded a moneth after the prefixed time, when as the garisons compounded for their departure, being vnable to endure the famine any longer: those of Castle Nouo, vpon condition the hostages should be deliuered: those of de l'Ouo, if they were not succoured by the first day of Lent ensuing. But let vs leaue Ferdinand confirmed in his throne, and returne to Nouarre.

Nouarre was at the last cast, they had no more corne, no more horses, but for few daies: some dyed of hunger, some languished of sicknesse. Mugnes, Brione, Camarian, Bolgare, and other neere places (with the forts built by the French) were taken by force, and the enemy (lodged in the Suburbs,) were so many block-houses: neither was there any means to succour them without a battell. But how? The King tooke his pleasure at Turin, and at Quiers, he had no will to hazard another battell for our towne onely, which the Duke of Orleans would keepe, and no man would fight but in the Kings presence. The Prince of Orange (who in matters of War had great credit with the King) and all the other commanders, desired rather to end the siege by some friendly agreement, then by the hazard of a battell. Winter approached: euery one sees his store spent, many are sicke, some retire without leaue, others obaine it. The enemies giue care to a peace. His army was newly increased by a thousand Reisters, led by Frederick Capelle, of the Countrey of Ferrete, and by eleuen thousand Lanquenets, commanded by George of Aberfing, borne in Austria. The leaue which the Bayliffe of Dijon went to make in Suifferland, was not yet ready. Why then (considering the consent of both parties) are not these great numbers dismissed friendly without force? some few sought contention, they had the Kings ears open, and their words were Oracles, as Brissonne Cardinall of Saint Malo, and the Archbishop of Rouan: yet would they not leaue their robes to put on armes, but keepe themselves safe from blowes. The King (say they) must not begin, let his enemy speake first, he is here in person: The Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Venetians and the Duke of Milan are by their Deputies. But whilest they stand vpon this point of honour, their teeth grow and their stomachs shrink at Nouarre. And thus the matter was handled, referring the honor of both parties. About that time the Marquesse of Montferrat died, daughter to the King of Seruia in Greece, leauing two sonnes, whereof the eldest was but nine yeares old. The Marquis of Saluce, and Constantine Vncle to the said Marquis, one of the ancient Noblemen of Macedony (the which Mahomet Ottoman had many yeares before inuaded) contended for the government of the two pupils. To accord this controuersie, for the safety of the children, and the content of the Countrey, the King had sent the Lord of Argenton to Calal Ceruas, and the Marquis of Mantoua, a Steward of his, to condole this death. These two fall into discourse, to pacifie both armies without blowes: so as by the Stewards perswasion, Argenton writes to the Venetian Commisfaries, vnder colour to continue the parle they had vpon Taro. Giuing care thereunto, they impart it to the duke of Milans Captaines. In the end, by common consent, they meete betwixt Bolgare and Camarian. There were for the King, the Cardinall of Saint Malo, the Prince of Orange, the Marshall of Gie, and the Lords of Pienues and Argenton. For the Confederates, the Marquis of Mantoua, Bernard and Contarin the Commisfary of the Venetians Stradiots, and Francisco Bernardin Fisconte.

Their chiefe controuersie was vpon the deliuey of Nouarre. Milan holds in fee of the Empire, and therefore the King did vrge, that Nouarre, as a member of the said Duchy, should be deliuey to Maximilian, by the hands of the German Captaines, that were in the Italianes campe, and the confederates would haue him leaue it absolutely. In the mean time, the famine growes so great, as it kills about two thousand of the Duke of Orleans men; and their great necessity required nothing but expedition. But more difficulties growing growing then could suddenly be decided, they conclude a truce for 8 dayes, with permitt: A on for the Duke of Orleans to come forth with a small traine. For the surety whereof, the Marquis of Mantoua did willingly offer himselfe, as an hostage to the Earle of Foix, after an oath taken, that they should proceed sincerely in the treaty of peace, and that it was not onely to free the Duke of Orleans. The Duke being come to the King to Vercell, for the prolongation of the truce, vntill a conclusion of peace, all the men of Warre came forth, and were conducted into a place of safety, by the Marquis of Mantoua, and Galus of Saint Seuerin. So the towne remained in the Inhabitants keeping, with an oath, not to deliuer it to any, but with the consent of both parties. And thirty men were left in the Castle, vnder the Duke of Orleans authority, to whom they should daily send viuals out of the Italians campe for their money.

Twenty thousand Suisses at Vercell for the King.

Within few dayes after, arised the Bayliffe of Dijon, with his Suisses, who vnder coler of ten thousand which he thought to bring, the number was doubled, running at the name of the Kings purse. So great a number of men of one Nation, was suspicious. The one moity ioynd with the Kings army nere to Vercell, the other camped apart, five leagues off. This new supply, reuiued the courage of the Duke of Orleans, and of those whose fingers itched. But to what end were a battell, seeing that Nouarre had not moued the King, but onely to free the Duke, and his seruants that were now deliuered from captivity?
And what meanes were there to fight with two thousand eight hundred men at arms barded, five thousand light horse, eleuen thousand Germans, and an infinite number of other foot, in a campe intrenched with palissadoes, and deep ditches full of water? a counsell fit for scarlet robes, thrust on rather by their owne couetousnesse, then with any spect of the Kings honour or the Dukes. This Cardinal of Saint Malo, did hee more at-fect his Maiesties seruice, or the priuate advancement of his house, seeing that his vnmeasurable greedinesse extorted this confession from his owne mouth; That the Duke of Or- leans had promised him ten thousand Ducats for his sonne, if he had this Duchy of Milan? Doubtlesse great Princes vfe good and bad instruments to satisfie their desires, but the end they abhorre the vnlawfull practises of their workemen.

The treaty of Vercell.

On the other side, this great number of men, newly arised, who desired nothing but employment, made the Italians mindes more inclinable to peace. So the Marshall of Gie, the president of Gannai, the Vidame of Chartres, Argenton, Pienmes and Moruilliers, having conferred againe with the Confederates, where the Duke of Milan did assist in person, they concluded an accord, more through the necessity of the season, and want of money, desirous to returne home with the shew of an honourable peace, then with any confidence it would continue. It was agreed, That the King should be serued by the Duke of Milan for Genoa, as of his vassall, against all the world; and in so doing, the Duke should furnish at his owne charge, two ships to succour the Castles of Naples (the which he yet, and the year following, should serue the King with three, and go with him in person to the enterprise of Naples, if by chance he returned, and should suffer the Kings men to pass. If the Venetians did not accept of the peace within two moneths, but would maintaine the house of Arragon, he should aide the King against them: and the King should giue him all that should be taken from them. That of fixscore and foure thousand Du-cates lent to the King in that voyage, he should forgie fourescore thousand. And for the expences made at Nouarre, hee should pay the Duke of Orleans fifty thousand Ducats, by the month of March following. That for the surety of Genoa, the Duke should giue two hostages, and deliuer the Chastelet into the Duke of Ferrares keeping, as a Neuter, for two whole yeares, the guard thereof to be paid at their common charge: and in case the Duke of Milan should forfeit Genoa to the King, the Duke of Ferrara should then deliuer the Chastelet to the King, and the Duke of Milan should giue two other hostages of Milan. That the Duke should not impeach the Florentines, to recouer what belonged vnto them. That Trivulce should be restored to his lands and goods.
And that the prisoners, the Confederates had taken should be deliuered. This peace was sworne on either side: the Venetians craue respice for two moneths, to accept, or not; and the King transported with a great desire to see his France, resolved to part the next day.
But aduertised that the Suisses practised either to assure themselves of his person, or to seize vpon the chiefe in Court, for three moneths pay, which they said was due vnto them, by an accord made with Lewis the Eleuenth, that lo often as they should goe forth with

A their Ensignes displayed, they should receiue that payment; he parted from Vercell (into the which may Suisses were gotten) and went towards Trine, a Towne belonging to the Marquis of Monterrat. This humour possessed them by the instigation of those to whom this peace was not pleasing.

From Trine, the King sent the Marshall of Gie, the President of Gannai, and Argenton, to Lodowike Sforze, to moue him to an interview. But he grounded his excuse vpon some speeches which the Earle of Ligni, and the Cardinal of Saint Malo had vied. That they should take him (when he came) to the King to Pauis, yet would he willingly parlee with the King, hauing a barre and riuer betwixt them. He had heard talk of the parlee betwixt Edward and the Constable of Saint Paul, with Lewis the eleuenth. Charles taking this distrust in ill part, receiued his hostages of Milan, and impatient to attend the Geneuois, aduancing to Quiers, he sent Peron de Bafche to Genoa, to receiue the two carrakes promised by the treaty, and to arme foure others, wherein he made account to ship three thousand Suisses, to relieue the Castles of Naples, knowing that the army of Nice had bin altogether vnprofitable. But it was sufficient for the Milanois to promise: hee knew well that hunger would force the Wolfe out of the wood, that is to say, that want of viuals would shortly expell the garisons out of those Castles. Moreouer, being perswaded, the King would hardly repasse the Alpes, he seckes the friendship of Ferdinand, arming two ships for his seruice.

Charles did then send the Lord of Argenton to Venice, to know if they would accept of the peace, and to passe three articles. To re-deliver Monopoli, which they had taken from him: to draw backe the Marquis of Mantoua, their Lieutenant generall, and others they had in the Realme of Naples, for Ferdinands seruice: and to declare King Ferdinand to be none of the league lately made, in the which there was only named the Pope, the King of Romans, the King of Spaine, and the D. of Milan. For answer, they flatly refuse all the Kings demands, as hauing no warre with him, and that their meaning was onely to succour the Duke of Milan as their ally, whom the King fought to ruine.

And for the making of an agreement, they offer to be a meanes: that Ferdinand should doe homage to the King, for the Realme of Naples, with the Popes consent: and should pay hundred and fifty thousand Ducats yearly; and a present summe of money, the which they should lend: for the loane whereof they should haue Brundisium, Otranto, Trani and some other places in Apulia in pawne: that Ferdinand should giue the King some places for safety, to make warre against the Turke, according to the hope wherewith Charles had fed all Christendome. The which, if hee would vndertake, all Italy should contribute thereunto. That the King and they should dispose of all Italy without contradiction: and for their part, they would serue the King with an hundred galleies at their owne charge, and with five thousand horse by land. But this Turkish warre was but a glorious cloake for eury priuate mans couetousnesse. And who can wonder if God did suddenly frustrate our designs, hauing another ground then we made shew of? Who will not iudge, but this offer had beene as honourable for France, as the generall losse of the sayd Realme was dishonourable? Charles would willingly haue vnderaken it, and the greatest part of his Councell did allow it. But Tacitus obserues of Vitellius, That his iudgement was such, as he found all harsh that was profitable, and took nothing in good part but what was pleasing, and that proued hurtfull. A lesson for Princes, not to trust so confidently to some particular persons, for the gouernment of their affaires, but to impart it sometimes to others: neither to aduance any one so high; as all the rest should bee his inferiours, for making himselfe to be feared and respected aboue all (as the Cardinal Bri- gones, his brethren & kind-folke did) he commonly makes his house great at his masters cost. But it was the humour of this young King, fearing (saith the History) to displease them to whom he gaue credit, and especially such as gouerned his treasure, as the aboue named.

Our Conquerors are now arised at Lions, in the moneth of October, not greatly care-full of those they had left at Naples, without any intelligence or letters from the King, but onely counterfeit, and nothing but promises for assignations of pay, whereof followed the generall losse of the Realme: who for a signe of their conquest, left them nothing but the possession of a stinking and contagious disease, which afterwards spread ouer all France: the which (being till then vnkowne in our parts, and the Phisitians not acquainted with the cure thereof)lodged many in the graue, leauing many deformed and lame A of their limbes , and subiect to continuall aches.

Charles, hauing continued two months at Lions, he received two very troublesome and vnpleasant aduertisements: one was domestically, the death of his Sonne the Dauphin, deceased at three yeares age: A goodly childe (saith the Originally) and bold in speech, who feared not those things which other children are accustomed to feare. The other was foreigne, the yielding of the Castles of Naples. The King passed ouer his mourning lightly, for being little both of body and vnderstanding, he began to feare, lest the Dauphin growing in these generous dispositions, which they noted in his infancy, should soone blemish the fathers power & authority. A lamentable thing, that so great a Monarch should feare his owne Child lying in a cradle. But that was certain that Charles the seuenth, his Grand-father had bene jealous of Lewis the eleuenth his sonne. Lewis had terrified his father, and was in feare of his sonne Charles the eight: and now Charles apprehends some decay in his estate by his sonne. Jealousie is a disease which doth commonly infect Princes houses. The other accident was of greater consequence, and toucht him more neerely, But were not these crosses sufficient to afflict him, but he must receiue a publike shame, by means of a priuate mans couetousnesse?

The Florentines prest the performance of their treaty, sworne at Florence, confirmed at Ast, and afterwards at Turin. Charles writes to this effect to Entragues, Capitaine of the Cittadell at Pisa, and to the bastard of Saint Paul, to restore those places to the Florentines which they commanded. But these gentlemen are good Merchants, they sell the which they are commanded to giue. Entragues interprets the Kings Letters-Patents according to his owne couetousnesse, and excuseth himselfe with a secret charge, he said he had receiued it, not to deliuer it without the Earle of Lignies hand-writing, in whose name he commanded Pisa. But this was the chiefe cause, he must haue money. Florence did not offer any, Pisa must pay it, or else fall into their hands whom they hated to the death. To draw them vnto it, he hath another wicked practice. He sends to the Florentine Commissaries, to bring their Army to the Port of the Suburbs of Saint Mary, that if the Pisans would not receiue them friendly, he would force them to abandon the said gate, being so commanded by the Cittadell, as it could not resist without the Captains sufferance. He did not beleue the Florentines should so easily haue taken the Bulwarke of the said suburbs. But when he sees the assailants enter pell-mell, kill some, and take others prisoners, he turnes his artillery vpon the Florentines, kills and hurts them, and forceth the Florentines to abandon the place. In the end, prest by the Kings commanding letters, both to the Earle of Ligni, to him, and to all the Garisons, to leaue the said places, he deliuers it them for twenty thousand Ducats, and after sells Pietresanta to the Luquois, and Libresanta to the Venetians. And the aboue named Bastard, as good a Merchant as the other, sells Serezane and Serezanelle to the Geneuois. And all to the Kings dishonour, his subjects shame, and the absolute losse of Naples. Saillant, who commanded in the Port of Liorno, is commanded to haue yielded the place to the Florentines at the first summons, and Entragues banished the realme of France, by a decree of the priuy Councell. Yet the Duke of Orleance (his Master) caused this sentence to be repealed. The Pisans, being masters of their Cittadell, razed it to the ground. And rather then they will submit their necks to the Florentines yoke, they implore aide from the Pope, Emperour, Venetians, Geneuois, Siennois and Luquois. But whilst that Lodowicke consults whether he should receiue them into his protection, the Venetians prevent him. So, many dogs fighting for one bone, pull one another by the throat, whilst the most politicke carries it away.

The Viceroy in the meane time gathers together the remnant of his Shipwracke. And as the ruolt of the Colonnois had greatly weakened the Kings party, so hee hoped to repaire it by the means of Virgilius Vrsinus, who seeing the Colonnois his enemies newly advanced to great authority with Ferdinand, he accepted of the Kings entertainment, being agreed, that he with the house of Vrsin, should make a leauy of fix hundred men at armes, and with the Vielli cross Ferdinands attempts, who by diuers euents laboured vehemently to recouer that which the King held yet. And let vs now see the successe of their affairs. The successe of armes is variable, but God holds them in balance, and giues the aduantage to whom he pleaseth. Our men had sometimes the better, and sometimes

A times the worse. But this is but a languishing fit. Our French being encamped at Nocera, had by an intelligence taken and slaine seuen hundred Aragonois, going to surpris Gifone, neare to Saint Seuerin: but seeing Ferdinand fortified with the Popes troops, they leaue Nocera, to take Saint Seuerin, and Gofenze, which was lately rebelled against them.

Abruzzo continued firme through the valour of Gratian de Guerres, against the attempts of the Earle of Popoli: and the comming of the Vrsins and the Vitelli, did greatly molest the lands of Moncassin, and the neighbour country of Labour. Calabria (although the long sicknesse of the Lord of Aubigni, had staied the course of his prosperity) remained yet at the Kings deuotion. The Viceroy had mounted and armed such as came with him from Naples. All these considerations gaue courage to our men, and made the way to a battell, which the Viceroy and Vrsins greatly pressed. But the want and necessity of money to pay their strangers doth cast an Apple of discord in the Army: eight hundred Lanquenets for want of pay, goe to the Aragonois, who fortifying the enemy, make our French so much the weaker. Behold a fore blast for a house that threatend ruine, and now comes the blow which in few months shall strike vs dead.

At the first the Venetians would not receiue Ferdinand into the league of the Potentates of Italy, to the end that vrgent necessity might force him to yeeld them something, watching lo long for an opportunity, as in the end they finde it. Ferdinand had a great action in hand: he must hazard all to become (as they say) a rich Merchant, or a poore pedler. He accords with the Venetians, and in regard of a succour of seuen hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horse, and three thousand foot, led by the Marquis of Montoux; and their Navy entertained which then lay vpon that coast, with a loane of fifteene thousand ducats, he deliuered vnto them Otrante, Brundisium, and Thrane, and consents they should retaine Monopoli, and Pulignano, which they then held, vpon condition to deliuer them vpon payment of such money as should be imploied in the guard thereof, so as it amounted not to about two hundred thousand Ducats. Moreover, the Pope, they, and the Milanois sent other companies of men at armes leauied in common. And Lodowicke, who would not directly breake the treaty of Vercell, agreed secretly to pay ten thousand Ducats monthly towards the wars of Naples. If the Earle of Montpensier were in want, Ferdinand was as needy, and the Venetian succours could not bee so soone ready. So the weakenesse of both parties, being sick of one disease, kept them from attempting much, yet idleness makes the souldiers slothfull. To keep them in exercise, the Viceroy practiseth an intelligence vpon Beneuent: but he was preuented by Ferdinand, who had notice thereof: he leaues it to take Ferezane, Apice and many other neighbour townes, wanting victuals: and the season approaching to collect one of the most important reuenues of the realme, which was the custome for Cattell in Apulia, he marcheth to frustrate the enemy: it mounted yearly to fourescore thousand ducats. Ferdinand followes to stay the Viceroyes course, attending his succours.

At that time there arises a French Navy at Caiete, of fifteene great ships, and seuen lesse, wherein they had shipped eight hundred Lanquenets at Sauona, and the troops appointed for the great ships that should haue bene armed at Genoa. This army takes lirt at their landing, with other neighbour places. Don Baptista Caraccio had promised to giue him entrance into Sessa, but Don Fredericke, Ferdinands Vncle, preuented him, committing the Bishop, and others guilty of this practice to prison. The fury of the war was in Apulia, and the successe was variable, for both parties lodged in diuers townes, who rather by their ordinarie roads then any valor, made warre against the poore Cattell. Virgilius Vrsinus, and Marian Saualle had gathered together an infinite number of cattell, being the custome betwixt Saint Seuer and Porcine, and Ferdinand with six hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and fifteene hundred foot, comes by night to driue them away: who by the breake of day being planted before Saint Seuer with his men at armes, to make head against Virgilius if he issued forth; hee caused his light horse to driue away about threecore thousand head of cattell. Saualle issued forth of Porcine to the rescue, but being too weake, hee was forced to retire with the losse of thirty men at armes.

This checke drew the Viceroy against Ferdinand, being at Fogge, to recouer both the honour and prey that was lost. Vpon the way hee encounters eight hundred Lanquenets nets, betwixt Nocere and Troy, which went to ioyne with Ferdinand: he chargeth them, A and being obnoxious in fight, defeats and kills them all, with some losse of his men: and so presents himselfe in battell before Fogge, but none issuing forth save the light horse, helay in ambush in the wood of the Incoronate and recovered the greatest part of the cartell. Then presenting himselfe before Fogge, hee retires to Saint Seuer: when as the light horse, falling vpon those that did drue away the boory, deprived either party of the greatest profit, for the cartell being dispersed here and there were abandoned to the first that could take them. Hereupon the army at sea ioynes with the Viceroy, and the Marquis of Mantoua with the Arragonois. So the chiefe forces of both armies approach, The French were stronger in foot, and the Italians in horse, which held the estate of a faires in suspense.

to Lions.*

The King began againe to affect the affaires of Italy, and having made a progresse to Toures and Paris, to performe (saith the History) some vowes which hee had made at Fournoue, he returns to Lions. His owne inclination drew him naturally to this warre: glorious, for that he was the first of the Kings of France, after many ages, that had renewed the French armies in Italy. Moreover, the Florentines, the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, John Laques of Triulce, the Prins, the Earle of Montoire (sent to that end by the Barons of the Realm of Naples, who yet did cary the flower de Lize): but with more efficacy than all the rest, the Cardinall of Saint Malo, and that Mignon the Senehall of Beaucare, gaue him a certaine hope of Victory, by meanes of a great and speedy succour; and contrariwise of an apparant losse, if matters were more neglected. Euen those which before had dissuaded this enterprise of Italy, grieved now exceedingly to see their conquests cowardly lost, and the French Nobility to perish, who (vsurnished of aide) were ready to suffer shipwracke. The Admirall of Grauille alone could not fauour this warre.

These resolutions were somewhat hindered by the warre which the King supported in the County of Roussillon, from whence the Spaniards made ordinary roads and robberies in Languedoc. Charles of Albion, grandfather to the deceased Marshall of Saint Andrew defended the frontier, as Lieutenant to the Duke of Bourbon, Governor of that Province, the which was greatly endamaged by the Gascon of Saules, a little towne in the said County, strong of men and situation, and defended by some Gentlemen of the King of Castiles house, who were seconded by an army in field, bigger then the French. Albon undertakes to besiege Saules, batters it, makes a breach, and giues an assault, and within ten houres carries it by force, where he slew some forty Spanish gentlemen of mark, and about foure hundred men of defence. A worthy reward for the wrong which the Castilian had done to Charles, who had so willingly restored him the possession of his Countrie, hoping to binde him by this good turne not to crosse him in his designs vpon the realme of Naples, as vpon the contract of reddition hee had promised. This exploit kept the Snailles within their shells, who vnder pretence and colour to continue their conquests vpon the Moores, whom they lately ouercame and chased out of Granada, in the end they mentioned a truce, the which (being concluded from March to October, E for themselves and such of their faction as would accept it) diuided the Castilian from the other confederats, attending that a mutuall assembly at Montpellier should end all their controuersies by a firme and durable peace.

Charles greatly affects the enterprise of Italy

Thus Charles freed from this incombrence, returns more vehemently to his first designs: and to draw his counsell therunto, he said, that hee felt a diuine inspiration in his soule, which called him into Italy. It was according to the predictions of Sasaparola. In the end it was concluded, that Triulce should return to Ast, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant, with eight hundred Launces, and foure thousand French and Suisses: that the Duke of Orleans should soone follow, and then the King: that thirty ships should passe the straights into the ports of Prouence, and should be armed for the passage of Naples with men, victuals, money, and all other munition. A braue designe and a goodly order if it had taken effect. But it is a great errour in Kings, to giue the chiefe places of authority, rather to Church-men then to their Princes, or to Noblemen of merit: seeing that these men haue but one oath, which is to their King, and the other hauing two, they commonly preferre that which they owe vnto the Pope. The Cardinall of Saint Malo, gouerning the treasure, and in a manner the whole state, did not directly contradi the Kings will (having so greatly affected the first voyage) but so slackt the expeditions, delaying the necessary

A necessary payments, that no prouision was effected, and who would not beleue but the Pope giuing to this man a Cardinalls hat, would likewise draw him to his faction.

But let vs heare another disturbance, when as Curry man supposed that the King would speedily passe the mountaines, he makes a posting voyage to Paris, and to Toures, for three reasons. The first vnder colour of deuotion; to take leaue (saith he) of S. Denis and S. Martin, according to the ancient ceremonies of the Kings of France. The second, to bid the Queene farewell, who was resident at Toures. The third, to draw all the Cities of the Realme to aide him with money, after the example of Paris; to auoid the necessities of the year before. But he did not set downe the fourth, and it may be more vrgent, the loue of one of the Queens maides; an importune passion, which doth so restrain all the spirits of man, as he neglects all other cares. Charles departs and returns not in foure moneths: he sends Triulce to Ast, with a small troope, more to confirme the friendship of Philip the new Duke of Sauoy, by the death of the little Duke his Nephew; then for any preparation of war: and for the prouision of Naples, six ships were provided laden with victuals, and laden with hope to be soone followed by a great army, and to receive forty thousand ducats due at Florence: This was physicke after death: for if they had arriued in time, they had preferred, or at the least staied for a season the losse of the Realme: If Brissone were so dull in these commissions in the Kings presence, Iudge if he made any halt in his Maiesties absence.

C Yet the body of the Neapolitan state was so shaken, as for want of speedy remedy it was ready to fall. The two armies approach, both so tyred, as the war must suddenly end by the ruine of the one. The French were camped before Circello, ten miles from Beneuent: and Ferdinand to diuert this siege, was before Franget of Montfort. For the succouring whereof, our men leaue Circello: but the Lanquenets apprehending a second assault, left the place at random, this was a losse which did greatly import our men.

They had meanes in shew to defeat this army, so busie at the sacke of Frangette, as the Captaines aduertised, that there was but a valley betwixt the French and their lodging, they could not in time call backe the souldiers from the spoile to armes. The Earle of Montpensier would haue embraced this occasion, Virgilius Prinsius did vrge it, Perfi d'Allegre by an enuious or malicious shew of hazard which they should incur in passing the valley at the mercy of the enemy, loathing the Suisses and Lanquenets, which hee commanded, discontented moreover with the small entertainment they had giuen him when he presented himselfe to succour the Castles of Naples hindered the execution: and moreover vnder colour of pay (as they say) he caused the strangers to mutine. Thus the Viceroy forced to found a retreat, went to follow the siege of Circello, where Camillo Vitelli, performing the office of an excellent Captaine and souldier, during the assault was wounded in the head with a stone wherof he died. An accident which causeth the French to abandon both the assault and siege, to retire towards Arriane, and to seeke some meanes to draw the Arragonois to battell. But they had to deale with cunning temporizers, who knowing our men to bee pressed with the want of meat and money, and foreseeing that the slacknesse of their succours would breed greater di commodities and disasters, they suffered them to keepe the field, and lodged in their forts, where their commodities could not be cut off.

Not only the Army, but also the other parts of the realme were greatly distressed. Antibal the bastard sonne of the Lord of Camerin, had of late defeated the Marquis of Bitonte of the French faction, in Abruzzo: for a reuenge, Gratian de Guerres being in field, ouerthrew the Earles of Selane and Popoli, leading three hundred horse, and three thousand foot for Ferdinand. Notwithstanding, the losse of an occasion of a victory at Franget, the extreme necessity of all things, the discord of the Captaines, and continuall contradiction of Perfi, refusing to obey the Earle of Montpensier, for that (saith he) he had against reason abandoned the castles of Naples, the disobedience of the souldiers, the discontent of the Neapolitan troops following the King, not paid, and inuiously intreated in the diuisions of booties or victuals, the departure of many from the campe, the mutinies of the Suisses and Lanquenets, who cried out tumultuously for their pay, the neighbourhood of many townes, supported by the enemies army, & many disasters concurring, daunted the courage of our souldiers, engendred a contempt & harred in the people

people, and forced our men to flie from place to place, without any hope of meane to fight with the enemy, who to spare the blood of his people would not hazard any thing.

All these difficulties carried our French into Apulia, and as they were busied in the king and sacking of Atelle, and then to possess Venouse, a strong towne, and abounding with victuals, Ferdinand takes Gualdo in one day (the which in former times had endured a siege of fourteene moneths) and taking from them all hope of Venouse, he forceth them to retire to Atelle, and presently campe before it, desirous to winne a Victory without perill and losse of men: and cutting off all the passages, he takes from them all meane of reliefe. But this accident made his designs more easie. The remainder of the Languedocers, who since their departure from their houses had received but two moneths pay, seeing the time of their entertainment past, they went to the Arragon party. And that which hastened the total ruine of our men, was the cue in Calabria. By reason of the Lord of Aubignis sickness, many of his men were gone to the Viceroyes Army. The Duke of Melere, and Albert of Saint Seuerin, with many other Barons of the Country (as vnto the King) lodged at Laine, vpon the river of Sapri, couered with the Castle on the one side of the river, against any one that should assaile them vpon the high way, and from some other places belonging to the Prince of Bisignan. It is very dangerous to be too confident especially in matters of war. These Noblemen assembled all the forces they could, to charge Gonsalues, who made war in that Prouince, and after the taking of some places, was camped before Castrouillare: Gonsalues prevents them, and coming neere the river, he causeth his foot to march toward the bridge, which lyeth betwixt the Castle of Laine and the Village; which bridge was negligently guarded, relying vpon the above-named places, whilst he passeth with his horse at a Ford two miles about, both might charge our men at once instant. The effect succeeded: he arises before day, findes them without Sentinell, and without guard, chargeth, and breaks them in many places, takes eleuen Barons prisoners, and almost all the Souldiers, who flyng towards the Castle, fell among the foot, who had already seized vpon the bridge. This Victory laid the way open for Gonsalues to ioyne with Ferdinand, with six thousand men, and this lieste was the ruine of our troops, pressed with three armies, the Arragonois, Venetian, and Spanishe. So as being no more able to be relieved with victuals, nor goe to forrage, neither to haue any passage to the river to water their horses, being themselves in great extremity for water, vanquished with so many difficulties, and abandoned of all hope, after two and thirty daies siege, they obtained of Ferdinand a truce for thirty daies, and necessary victuals for that time: during the which none of the besieged should goe forth: Licence for the duke Montpensier to signify this accord vnto the King, the souldiers, their liues and goods saved, with the which they might retire into France by land or sea, and the Vrbin with other Italian Souldiers whether they would, out of the realme: Impunity to the Barons and all others that had followed the French faction, and restitution of their goods and offices, so as within fifteene daies they returned to Ferdinand. All this is good, but there follows a very dishonourable promise: That if the Earle of Montpensier be not relieved within thirty daies, he shall deliuer Atelle, and all that hee holds within the Realme of Naples into Ferdinand's hands, with all the Artillery. Thus reason yields where force commands.

The time expired, all were conducted to the castle of Stabbia vpon the Sea, and the Viceroy was summoned to yeeld vp all the other places, which the King possessed. But pretending that his authority did not extend to the Capitaines which commanded in Calabria, Abruzzo, Caiete, and other places, which the King himselfe (and noche) had gotten them in guard. The Arragonois making shew to dismisse them, caused them to be conducted (but more properly confined them) vpon this controuersie to Blay and Pozzol, where (vnder colour that shipping was not yet ready) part of them by the want they had endured, and part by the indisposition of the aire, being hot and vnhole some, and part feeding intemperately vpon grapes, and other fruit halle ripe: but with more likelihood, hauing (as some write) seasoned their meats, and mixt their wines with drugs insupportable for the stomacke, the Earle of Montpensier died: and of six thousand men, scarce fifteene hundred returned safe to their country. There is but one hazard to lose all. A battell (although very desperate) had bene far more honorable and lesse fault.

But let vs rather note the examples and errors of others, then reprooue them.

Virgilus

Virgilius, and Paul Vrsin, by the Popes commandement (who had sworne the rithne of that house) were shut vp in the Castle de l'Ouo: their men (led by Iohn Jordan the sonne of Vrsin, and Bartholomew of Aluian) were stript in Abruzzo by the Duke of Vrbin; and these two commanders called by Ferdinand to Naples, were likewise imprisoned. Aluian escaped soone after, the rest died in prison. Now all things smile vpon the Conquerour, but he pursues the victory otherwise then we can doe: and in these garboiles, euery one flies to the stronger, and makes his peace as he may. Ferdinand sends Don Fredericke his vncke, and Prosper Colonne before Caiete, and Fabrizio Colonne into Abruzzo, who received Aquill for the Arragonois, tooke the rocke of Saint Seuerin by force, and caused the Captain and his sonne to be beheaded, to terrifie the rest: then he went and encamped before Salerne, where the Prince of Bisignan made his peace, for himselfe, for the Prince of Salerne, for the Earle of Cappacio, and some other Barons. Gratian des Guerres (forced to give way to this violent streame) leaues Abruzzo, and retires himselfe with eight hundred horse into Caiete, were Don Fredericke doth presently inuest him. Gonsalues returned into Calabria, where the Lord of Aubigni (after such resistance as his forces could make, being gotten into Gropoli, in the end promisth to leaue all the Prouince, hauing liberty to returne into France by Land. The other Capitaines (either for that they had filled their bags with the prouisions of their places, or had by disorder consumed that in few daies, which in time of necessity might haue serued long; or through feare, or impatience of the discomforts which follow a siege) were forced to yeeld them at the first summons.

But shall Ferdinand long enjoy the happy successe of his armes? Behold, hating not yettasted the sweetnesse of his conquests, nothing remaining for the recovery of the Realme but Tarentum, Caiete, and a few other places, held by Charles of Sanguin and Mont S. Angelo, where Don Iulian of Lorraine commanded, who caused the neighbor counties to feele both the greatnesse of his courage, and the weight of his armes, death comes and cuts off both the course of his victories, and the thred of his life, and transports his Crowne to Don Fredericke his vncke. Thus the fate of Naples, felt the diuers humors of five Kings in three years: Ferdinand, Alphonse, King Charles the eighth, Ferdinand, and the incestuous (hauing married his Aunt, sister to Alphonse his Father) and Fredericke.

Fredericke leauing the siege of Caiete, comes to enjoy his Nephews succession, and those which had before followed the French party, as the Princes of Salerne and Bisignan, the Earle of Cappacio and others, were the first to proclaim his name in Naples, and to helpe him to finish the remainder of the war against our men. Tarentum (besieged by the Venetians) was forced to yeeld through famine, who hauing held it some daies (not without suspect that they would appropriate it to themselves) in the end they consigned it vnto Fredericke, at the Popes entreaty, and the King of Spaine. Caiete might haue held out some moneths, but iudging the King would haue as little care to succour them, as many other places negligently lost, to the preiudice both of a great number of the Nobility, and also of the crowne, they compounded with Fredericke by the meanes of the Lord of Aubigni, giuing them leaue to returne by Sea into France, with bag and baggage: And consequently, all other places did quite reiect the French command in the State of Naples. And Fredericke (hauing obtained the inuestiture of the Realme, from the Pope) was solemnly crowned.

Thus King Charles was freed from the care he had for the recovery thereof, but the losse and infamy thrusts him on to reuenge vpon the next neighbour. Many Potentates of Italy perswade him thereunto, the Duke of Ferrara knew well, that the Venetians (hauing taken Polefan from him) sought his ruine, and amidst these diuisions he was like vnto a sheepe betwixt two Wolves, that is to say, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan his sonne in law, who (preferring his safety and his childrens, before the loue of the Duke of Milan) offered the King five hundred men at armes, and two thousand foot: The Marquis of Mantoua (being discontented with the Venetians) fell from them with three hundred men at armes. Iohn Beniuole offered a hundred and fifty men at armes, and the companies which his two sonnes led, with a good number of foot: The Florentines (not to lose Pisa and other places, and to warrant themselves from the wrongs which the Venetians practised against them) promised eight hundred men at armes and five thousand foot at their own charge. The Visins and the Gouverneur of Rome, a thousand men at arms. Moreover, there was in Aft eight hundred men at arms, and fixe thousand foot. If all these forces with the French, had ioyntly charged the duke of Milan, either his estate had bene in danger, or he must have followed the Kings party, the which obtained, the Kingdom of Naples had bene easily recovered. The duke of Orleans was appointed to this effect, for the King would not directly breake the treaty of Verceil, desiring the duke should make this warre in his owne proper name. The Duke refused to march with other title then the Kings Lieutenant, either iudging his provisions not well grounded, or seeing the King ill disposed of his person, whose next heire he was, if he miscaied. Thus both the enterprise and the intelligences which Trinulce had against the Milanais, were made frustrate.

There are other actions which succeed as unhappily. The Fregoses being expelled Genoa, by the faction of the Adornes, could not returne without some notable support, who coming to the gates, they hoped with great facility to raise their partisans, to take away their adherencies, and to reduce the towne to the Kings obedience. The King upon this hope, commands Trinulce to assist Baptista Fregose with those forces which he had in Aft; and the Florentines with Ottaviano Fregose to assault Lunigiana at the same time, and the ruler to the East, whilest that Baptista should molest the West. This enterprise did much trouble the Duke of Milan: and if it had bene continued, it had produced greater effects in the estate of Milan then at Genoua. For Lewis of Fiesque & the Adornes had brought many men into Genoa, and armed a flecte to Sea, at the common charges of the Venetians, and of Fredericke, King of Naples. And Lodowicke had not yet received his Venetians. But in stead of Genoua, they went to Nouis, a towne able to containe many men, and the Fregoses held the Castle fit to make warre in the Country, and to stop the passage from Milan to Genoua. The taking of Nouis made the neighbour places to yeeld to Baptista, and at the same instant the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, with two hundred Lances, and three thousand foot of Trinulces troops seized on Vintemille, and presented himselfe before Sauonne, hoping that in disdaine of the Geneois (whom he yoake they bare) he should finde both the Citizens hearts, and the City gates open, but no signe, no shew of alteration.

John Adorne followed the Cardinall, and forced him to retire into Altaré, a place belonging to the Marquis of Monferrat. Trinulce had another designe: and although he had an expresse commandement from the King, to surcease from making war against the Duke of Milan, and so second Baptista and the Cardinall, yet did he seek by all means to kindle troubles in the said Duchy: and if he had bene suffered to proceed, without doubt there had followed some notable effect, vnder colour, to assure the companies that were raised into the river upon the East; that he thought it necessary to shur vp the passage betwixt Alexandria and Genoua, whereas Lodowicke assembled his forces, by the taking of Bourge, and other places of importance in the country. But to obey the Kings will, he lost a goodly opportunity to doe great service to the Crowne. For now the whole Country stood at a gate, some for feare, others being desirous of innovation: and Lodowicke (as much perplexed in this adversity, as in all other) flies to the Duke of Ferrara his father in law, to mediate an accord betwixt the King and him. But the fruitlesse stay of Trinulce betwixt Bourge and Nouis, gaue the Venetians meanes to send many men at arms, and light horse-men to Alexandria, and fiftene hundred foot to Genoua: and finally, to send the Earle of Penthiene to succour the estate of Milan. Thus the Fregoses practices came to nothing, the which they imputed to the Florentines, who would not assault the river of the East, being loath to enter into a war vntill they might see the French affaires more successful. And Trinulce, leaving Garisons in Nouis, and Bourge, takes his way to Aft. It may be the dissuading of these companies did hinder their enterprise: and it may be, if all together, had gone directly to Genoua, the success had bene more profitable: for besides the diuers humors of Nations, most of the Rectors and Landgrazers, which Lodowicke had sent thither, were after some stay, returned vnto waies into Germany.

About the end of this year, the Kings of France and Spaine, began their assembly, promised at the last truce, the which they had transpired from Monpelier to Narbonne, and afterwards broken off by the Castilians excessive demands. There they found the same difficulties: the King would restraue to himselfe full power to continue his enterprise in Italy, refusing to yeeld to any agreement, wherein it should bee comprised. The King of Spaine desired to haue no warre with him beyond the mountaines, which might draw after it many inconueniences, and yeeld him small profit: finally, they continued their truce, not comprehending any of the Potentates of Italy. The Spaniard seeing the King to meditate of a second voyage beyond the mountaines, hoped to perwade him to the conquest of Naples with their common forces, and to take from the Venetians many ports, and other places which they possessed. The usurpation whereof was very suspicious vnto him. But neither of them had made his account with him, who doth prolong and shorten the daies of man at his pleasure, and who doth found the secret thoughts of men. But not able to obtaine this condition of Charles, with all his policy, hee procured it of his successor, to the great prejudice of his Crowne.

Then expired the two yeares, during the which, the Castle of Genoua had bene left in guard with the Duke of Ferrara. The King (pretending the forfeiture and disobedience of the Duke of Milan) demands the possession thereof, offering to lay downe in a third mans hand halfe the charge spent for the guard of the places, according to the treaty of Verceil; and in the meane time the law should determine, to which of them it should be restored. But the great pursuit of Lodowicke, and the imminent danger he feared, if he should breake with the Venetians, made him to yeeld it vp vnto Lodowicke, vpon restitution made of all his charges for the guard thereof. And the Venetians, to shew that they held themselves more bound, for that he had deliuered it to Lodowicke rather then to Count Charles, they entertained Ferdinand the Duke of Ferraras sonne, paying him for a company of an hundred men at armes.

The Kings desire to returne into Italy increased daily, and it seemed hee had greater occasions then euer. Experience had made him wise: Hee remembered the errors hee had committed in his first iourney, and obserued them well, hoping (if hee might recouer his losses) to provide better for the guard of the realme. His intelligences from all parts called him: he had a truce with the Castilian: he had a new league with the Swisses. The Emperor was discontented with the Venetians, and fought his friendship, being desirous to ioyne with him, to seize vpon the States of Italy with their common forces and charge, imitating the Castilian. Pope Alexander laboured to reconcile himselfe. The Venetians denied how to estrangeth themselves from Lodowicke. The Florentines had resolved to free themselves as soone as Charles should begin the warre. And to this end they demanded the Lord of Aubigni for their Generall, with a hundred and fifty Lances, whereof they should pay a third part. The Marquis of Mantoua was discharged from the Venetians pay, and should bring to the King, with the Visins, the Vitelli, and the Captaine of Rome, brother to the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, fiftene hundred men at armes Italians. He had the friendship of the Duke of Sauoy, and the Marqueses of Salutes and Monferrat. John Bentiuole promised to ioyne with his troops as soone as he should passe the mountaines. But he is diuerted by diuers meanes. Some of his fauorites thrust him forward to this enterprise, but with so huge a preparation both by sea and land, and so great provision of money as it required a long time. Others entertained him in his delights, and loathed him with all difficulties, and the Cardinall of Saint Atalo (according to his vsual manner) slackt the provisions of money. Thus the time was lost, and matters made fruitlesse, being almost brought to their perfection. There were no dispatches for the Lord of Aubigni: no money for the Visins, Vitellies, Fregoses make their peace with the Duke of Milan. The Vitelli had passed to the Venetians pay, if the Florentines had not entertained them for a yeare. The Florentines themselves (counsellled by Lodowicks sforce, in the beginning of the yeare 1508) sent an ambassage to Rome, signifying (although in doubtful termes) that if Pisa might be yeilded vnto them, they would ioyne themselves with the rest, for the defence of Italy against the French. A Florentine policy: but made frustrate by a Venetian shift.

The Venetians, being laboured to yeeld to the restitution of Pisa, seeing there was no other meanes to separate the Florentines from the French, they couer their discontent with many colours: they complaine that this counsell proceeds not of any care they haue to the common good, but from the bad affection which some one carries to their estate. For say they (by their Ambasadour at Rome) the Florentines hoping thereby the greatest part of Tuscany by the returne of the French into Italy: the yeelding of Pisa were not able to diuert them from their naturall inclination to the house of France: but contrariwise, the more mighty they are, the more means they shall haue to disturbe the quiet of Italy. Why then haue the Confederates by a common consent promised the Pisians to defend their libertie, and now to violate both their honour and faith? Is this the reward for the exceeding charge we haue so willingly maintained, when as all the other Confederates were unwilling to disburse any thing for the common good? By what means was Italy preferred? With what forces did they fight at Taro? With what armes haue they recovered the realme of Naples? Where with haue they forced Nonarre to acknowledge her first Lord? Can any one denie, but these actions did proceed from a sincere affection to the good estate of Italy? (seeing we were not the nearest unto dangers, neither are the disorders growne by vs, whereof we suffer the paine.)

Whilest these things were treated of at Rome among the Confederates, not without apparent signes of future diuision: a new humour carries away our Charles to his Castle, which he caused to be built at Amboise; a building of admirable worke and charge, hauing (to that end) brought the rarest worke-men that could be found, from Naples, and all other parts: and for the beautifying thereof, he had gathered together the goodliest plots that could be found in France, Italy, Flanders, and elsewhere: not able to foresee, that in stead of a proud and stately Palace, hee should end his life in a base and stilly Gallery.

Hauing his minde inclined (besides his building) not onely to a second voyage beyond the Alpes, but to reforme his life, honouring the Queene his wiues bed with a chastite respect, whereas many loose allurements had transported his youth. To restrain the pompe and ambition of the Clergie; to order iustice, giuing audience twice in a week to all complaints, and free access to any that would desire iustice. Doubtlesse, The King sitting in his throne of iustice (saith the Wiseman) disperseth all ill with his looke: to reforme his house, to dispose of his treasure, to ease his subjects, restraining all taxes (which had become vpon his subjects) to twelue hundred thousand Frankes, besides his reuenues: a summe which his Estates had granted at his coming to the Crowne, for the defence of the realme. It chanced the seventh of Aprill, going after dinner with the Queene into the Castle ditches, hee stricke his forehead against the doore of a Gallery, whereas he meant to see a set at Tennis: this blow being a certaine aduertisement, to driue him to the premeditation of his approaching end, the last pang of death moued him presently, with a godly and holy resolution (but wisely conditioned according to mans weakness) the which he testified by these words, talking with Iohn of Beauuois, Bishop of Angiers his Confessor, touching the faults hee had committed in his yonger age: I hope (saith he) never to commit mortall nor veniall sinne, if I can auoide it. Presently vpon this protestation he fell backward, falling into an Apoplexie, wherewith hee had bene a little before troubled, which closed his eies with the sleepe of death, about eleuen of the clocke at night.

A notable example, wherein wee read the pittifull estate of Princes, when as death knocketh with an euen hand, both at Kings palaces, and at poore mens cottages, giuing them an end like to all other men; and the inconstant loue of Courtiers. Behold a King, who commanded ouer so many Prouinces, whom so many great Cities obeyed, who had such numbers of sumptuous Castles at his pleasure, & now building a magnificent house, giuing vp the ghost in a chamber neare to a Gallery, sinking with the Vrine which euery one made as hee passed through it, laid vpon a matresse, such as they could finde out by chance. And before his eies were shut vp with this last sleepe, euery one forgetteth the course which this declining sunne had runne, to follow the hope of the Easterne Starre, which came to lighten this realme.

King Charles died.

His disposition.

Thus Charles the eighth liued, and thus hee died: an humble Prince, liberall, religious, courteous, familiar, and of easie access; of a good and tractable disposition, small of stature, but of an inuincible courage, loving iustice and his people, capable of counsell, commended for his great attempts, hauing in his youth purchased so much glory, and giuen so great hope both within & without Christendom, that if God had granted him a longer life, without doubt hee had equal'd the fame of the most excellent & rarest Prince. In him failed the direct line of the Kings of France, descended from Philip of Valois, and the crowne fell to the collateral line, of the which the nearest, and most capable of the succession, was Lewis Duke of Orleans and Valois.

LEWIS the Twelfth,

The 57 French King.

NOW behold our France (hauing vnder Charles the eighth happily breathed, after the troubles and confusions which had so long afflicted the State during the reignes of his Predecessors) takes her rest vnder the protection of a Prince, excellent in bounty of nature, in sweetnesse of manners, in temperance and moderation of minde and affection: Finally, in the happinesse and felicity of his reign. Who hauing extended his Empire beyond the limits of Gaule, subdued vnder his obedience two of the noblest and mightiest Cities of the world, Milan with Lombardy, and Genoua with her two riuers, East and West, together with the Islands of Corsica, and Chio: reconquered and diuided the Realme of Naples with the Castilian: but in the end, lost it by treachery and disloyalty: vanquished the Venetians in that memorable battell, the fiftenth of May 1509: suppressed the Popes insolencie: defeated the Verians againe before Breschia: made a peace with the Spaniard and Venetian, and consequently allied himselfe with the King of England. Hee hath haue this honor and content, to see his subjects in so great prosperity, that by the conference of things passed before his time, the Realme was neuer so mighty in armes and men; neuer so plentifull in all kinds of commodities; neuer so fortified with such strong places: and which imports more, neuer so blessed in concord: neuer so void of diuisions, neuer so able to endure a great charge, and to produce noble attempts.

The happinesse of his reignes.

A godly King, chaste, vpright, courteous, good to his seruants, gracious to his enemies, mercifull to all men, a friend to iustice and sincerity, and enemy to flattery, liberrall, but without oppression of any; loyall, respected in all parts of the world: who in regard of learning, shall open a way which his thrice worthy successour shall bring to a most happy perfection. But to crowne him with titles of honor, hee was called The Father of his people. A King commanding a nation most willing to obey: a people multiplying by millions, in Nobility, Merchants, Tradesmen, and the common sort: a people replenishing the Townes before halfe desolate. To conclude, a people testifying the excellency and greatness of their Soueraigne. For the greatness of a King (saith Salomon) is in the multitude of people, but when his subjects decrease, it is the fall of his Soueraignie. But let vs see, by the relation of the History, the course of this admirable prosperity: and first of all, his rights of Succession, as well to this Crowne, and that of Naples, being King of France, as also to the estate of Milan, by reason of Valentine his Grand-mother.

King Charles the 5 had two sonnes. The eldest, Charles the 6 his successor, who was father to Charles the seventh, of whom was borne Lewis the eleuenth, father to Charles the eighth, who died without children. The yongest, Lewis Duke of Orleans, married Valentine daughter to John Galeas Earle of Verus, and first Duke of Milan, by whom hee had three sonnes, Charles his successor Duke of Orleans, John Earle of Angouleme, and Philip Earle of Verus. The said Charles freed from his long imprisonment in England, had by Mary of Cleues his wife, our Lewis the 12, heire (for want of heires male in the direct line) of this Realme, and of the dependencies thereof, and so was anoynted at Rheims the 27 of May 1498: assisted at this solemnity, by John Duke of Alancou, serving as a Peere in the place of the Duke of Bourgongne, Peter Duke of Bourbon, for the Duke of Normandy; Anthony Duke of Lorraine, for the Duke of Guenne; Philip Earle of Rauenstein, in the place of the Earle of Flanders; Gilbert of Cleues, for the Earle of Champagne; and Gaston of Foix, for the Earle of Tholousa: and for the Peeres of the Clergie, the Bishops that were then resident. Afterwards hee receiued the royall Crowne in the Abbey of S. Denis in France, the first of Iuly, and the day following made his triumphant entry into Paris.

The genealogie of Lewis the 12.

Wee iudge of the inward beauty of a Palace, by the entrie thereof. Who would not then by these happy first fruits of this reign, conceiue a constant hope of a heavenly blessing? Lewis, after hee had worthily performed the funerals of his Predecessor, hee first purchased purchased the loue of the Noblemen of his Court, maintaining euery man in his dignity at state, and the Magistrates in their Offices. Hee applied his minde to order and cutt off the tediousness of suites; freed his Subjects of the third part of the subsidies which oppressed them: yea, even the rites which they are accustomed to pay to their new King, for the charges of his funerall that is deceased; and for his coronation: and for a second benefit to the country, he put the men at armes into their Garisons, reducing them to the ancient discipline of war, which the disordered liberty of troubles past had much corrupted. This done, by the aide of his best States-men, hee made many goodly lawes vpon the abusive charges in the pursuit of Iustice; neither did he euer publish an Edit, before it was confirmed by the iudgment of Soweraigne Courts. His decrees contained some limitation of the priuileges granted in old time to Vniuersities, the which they abused to the oppression of the people. The Vniuersity of Paris opposeth against the publication thereof, and were ready to make a sedition, many publishing infamous libells, both against the King, and against the Chancellor of Rochfort. The Scholers troope together, and resolute to abandon both study and the exercise of learning. John Cane being Rector, forbids the Regents to read any more, and the Preachers to preach, vntill the Vniuersity had recovered her ancient priuileges. The King aduertised of these mutinies, draws many men at armes into Paris, and sitting in Parliament confirms the aboue named ordinances by an Edit. The Rector fearing a checke, keeps all the Scholers within their lodgings, and reuokes the commandement he had giuen. John Standon, a Doctor of Diuinity, a Brabançon, and one of the chiefe authors of this counsell, was banished the Realme. Thomas Warner of Cambray, (who preaching, had barkt out something against the Kings authority) prevented this decree, and banished himselfe. Being thus content in minde, and quiet within his realme, his thoughts soared beyond the Alpes, and now he takes vpon him the title of Duke of Milan. He was grounded vpon the right of succession, Valentine besides her dowry (which was the City and country of Ast, with a great summe of money) had obtained this claue expressly in her contract of Marriage, This for want of heires male of Galeas, Valentine should succeed to the Duchy, or else being dead, her next descendants.

This conuention was of no force, but the Imperiall seat was then vacant: and the Pope confirmed it. The Popes pretending (the Empire being without an Emperor) that the administration belongs to them. And seeing that by the death of Philip Maria Visconti, the masculine line of John Galeas failed, who then should succeed in this goodly estate? many contended for it, the Emperour Fredericke maintained, that it should be vniuerse to the Empire, considering the line specified in the institution made to John Galeas by Winceslaus King of Romans was extinct. Alphonso King of Arragon and Naples armed himselfe with the testament of Philip, by the which he was made his heire. But in worldly affaires the strongest most often carries it. Francis Sforce, one of Philips Captaines, son to Sforce Attendule, an aduenturer, a braue and active spirit, had married Blanche, bastard daughter to the said Philip: and hauing no man at that instant that might resist his violence, he did so cunningly win all the greatest families of Milan, as by their support and succourance he soone seized on the State: the which he might easily effect, hauing all the forces at his command, and no competitor. For neither Lewis Duke of Orleans, nor his children had any meanes to recouer this Duchy from Francis, by reason of the great wars which followed in France, by the murder of the said Lewis, and of the Duke of Bourgogne slain likewise at Montreau, vnder Charles the sixt and seventh, Charles sonne to the said Lewis (taken at the battaile of Azincourt, languishing twenty five yeares a prisoner in England, and deliuered by Philip Duke of Bourgundy,) could neuer obtaine any aide from Lewis the eleuenth, being crossed by home-bred warres from the beginning of his raigne. Moreouer, Lewis did alwaies make account to settle his authority, by the suppression of his nearest blood. And for this cause our Lewis, his sonne in law, sonne to the said Charles, had no whit the more credit with his father in law, for the recovery of his inheritance. And the sword which he did vntheath against Charles the eight his brother in law, (of whom he pretended the Regency) and after in the wars of Britany, tooke from him all meanes to attempt this enterprize, vntill such time as (the King hauing left him in Ast to cross the attempts of Lodowicke Sforce) he seized vpon Nouarre, but with a fruitlesse event.

A Now is he seated vpon the royall throne of his Ancestors, peaceable within himselfe, and peaceable with his neighbors. Trinande doth not cease to lay open vnto him the necessity to expel Lodowike. To make the way easie, Pope Alexander friendship, the Venetians, Florentines; and other Potentates of Italy was very requisite. He seeks it by his Ambassadors, and finds that the death of Charles the eight, had bred an alteration in their dispositions. The Pope conceiuing, that the peace of Italy was the decay of his priuate estate, did easily allow of new troubles. The Venetians (being freed by the Kings decease, from the feare they had of him, for the indignities he had receiued,) did not beleue that a new King would so vehemently embrace the quarrell of his Predecessor: and fore-seeing also, that if Sforce were once quiet, he would oppose himselfe against them, for the affaires of Pisa, whereof he did sollicite (but coldly) the restitution vnto the Florentines by the Popes meanes. The Florentines had not yet so much estranged their affection from the French, but there was good meanes to recouer it.

Being thus affected, they all send their Ambassadors to the King. The Pope (who aspired to nothing more then the temporall aduancement of Cesar Borgia his son, being then Cardinal) did willingly embrace this occasion, to plant him in the Kings good fauor, and by some especiall bond to purchase his Masters loue. He knew well, that Lewis would willingly put away Ioane his wife, to marry with Anne the widow of Charles: and euen then he refused to exchange spirituall graces for temporall commodities.

C He then agrees with the King for thirty thousand Ducats, and draws a promise from him, to aide him presently after the conquest of Milan, to reduce to the obedience of the Apostolike see, the townes possessed by the Governours of Romagna. And for his sonne Cesar, a company of a hundred Lances, twenty thousand frankes pension, a wife in France to his liking, and Valence in Dauphine, with the title of a Duchy. Then he commuted the matter of diuorce to Ferdinand Bishop of Septa, his Nuncio in France, to Philip Cardinal of Luxembourge, and to Lewis Bishop of Alby (some name George of Amboise, Archbishop of Rouan) who vpon report of the protestation made by Lewis to a Notary, the day of his marriage, that his meaning was not to contract any marriage, and that the solemnity which hee did celebrate, was only to please the King: whom hee knew to be cruel against those, by whom he thought himselfe to be wronged. And moreouer, if by chance Lewis, either by the expresse commandement of his father in law, or after of his brother in law, did lie with his wife, hee did interpose secret witnesses, that should depose of his abstinence. And besides, the Physicians hauing iudged her incapable of issue, they declared the said marriage voyde, and gaue him liberty to marry with Anne: who contracting herselfe to any other should haue diuided the Duchy of Britany from the Crowne of France. The Venetians sent to congratulate his coming to the Crowne, and by way of excuse, gaue him to vnderstand, that the controuersies they had with King Charles, proceeded only of distrust and ialousie, whereof he had giuen them cause, seeing that not content with the Realme of Naples, he had cast his designs vpon all Italy.

The Florentines did not forget their ancient customes in like cases to the Crowne of France; but especially, to put him in mind of their despending to the deceased King. Solicited therein by Lodowicke Sforce, to the end that when the two common weales of Venice and Florence, should come to treat of the affaires of Pisa, the Venetians practices (whose greatnesse Lodowike did much feare in Italy) might be crossed by the Florentines: and they purchasing fauour and credit with the King, he might employ them, to mediate some accord betwixt the King & him, the which he desired with all his heart. Lodowike did seeke the storme, and laboured to auoyd it, but in vaine: for the time of his shipwracke was at hand. Then Cesar Borgia, the new Duke of Valentinois, came vnto the King with the Bull of dispensation: where he was no sooner arriued, but as the sonne of his father, hee plaied the first act of a bloody tragedy, vpon the alliance which the King did contract with the Pope his father. Cesar following the instructions of Alexander, dissembled the bringing of this Bull, iudging the Kings disposition to be like vnto those, who desire that more, which is refused, to make him the more pliable to his designs. But the Bishop of Septa, hauing sent intelligence vnto his Maiesty of the truth, the King thinking it sufficient to haue the Bull dispatched, concluded the marriage with Anne, giuing for a portion to his wife, diuorced, the Duchy of Berry. Cesar hauing discovered the author of this aduice, caused the Bishop to bee soone after poisoned. The peace with other Princes, which might might somewhat disturb the projects of Lewis, was no lesse expedient: he therefore con- cluded with Ferdinand King of Castile, and thereby did associate him in the conquest of the Realme of Naples: he confirmed that which his Predecessor had with the English, and renewed the alliance with the Suisses, granting them the pensions which Lewis & Charles were accustomed to giue.

Maximilian alone, working vpon the old leuaine of his Ancestors, shewed some bitter- nesse amidst these contents, calling the coales of diuision in Bourgonne and Cham- pagne, by the Lord of Vergi Comtois, when as they least doubted it, seeing that Lewis be- ing taken prisoner at the battell of Saint Aubin, and hauing, aboue all others, imployed Maximilian for an intercessor to Charles the eight, they thought that Maximilian should reioyce at this new succession, more then any other Prince, and that the discontent he had against Charles (hauing forsaken his daughter, and married with Anne of Britany) had bene mortified by the death of the said Prince. The Emperor was thrust on by the duke of Milan who being perswaded, that the King busied at home, should haue no leisure to attempt any thing in Italy, or any accord being made betwixt them, he should bee com- prehended therein. This warre put the Realme in alarme: but Lewis opposed fo great power, vnder the command of Iohn of Foix Vicount of Narbonne, his brother in law, as it was quenched as soone as kindled, by a truce of many moneths, without any mention of Lodowike Sforze. And to the end that Philip Arch. duke of Austria, and Earle of Flan- ders, son to Maximilian, might reape the fruits of their reconciliation, he did homage to the King, for the places he held of the Crowne: and those of Artois were restored vnto him. In the meane time, they consult at Venice, vpon the termes of confederation with the King. The difference was, the holding of Pisa. The Venetians offering all other con- ditions, would not haue this string toucht, and the King being resolute to haue it restored vnto him in fauour of the Florentines, refused to treat, vnlesse this Article might be gra- ted. But the Duke of Valentinois and other Agents for the Pope, the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, Triuinle, and all the Italians (who for their owne priuate interest perswaded him to warre) hauing layed before him the losse he should receiue, by the want of the Venetians ayde, considering their power and meanes to annoy the Duke of Milan, hee yeelded without any more speech: that at the same time, as hee should innade the Duchy of Milan, they should doe the like vpon their frontiers: That hauing won the rest of the Duchy, Cremona and Guairadade should be taken by their common forces for the Venetians, except the breadth of forty faddome along the riuier of Adde. That after the conquest of Milan, the Venetians should be bound to defend that for a time, with a certaine number of horse and foot: and the King should doe the like for Cremona, and other places which they possessed in Lombardie, euen vnto the Marches of Venice. This conuention tooke all hope from Lodowike, both of peace with the King, and reconciliation with the Venetians. Being thus abandoned, hee resolute to defend himselfe, and begins by the fortification of Anon, Nouarre, & Alexandria, towres lying nearest to the French, meaning to oppose against their violence Galeas of Saint Seuerin, with the greatest part of his forces, & the rest against the Venetians, vnder the com- mand of the Earle of Caiazzo. He commands Galeas to passe the Pau, with sixtene hun- dred men at armes, fiftene hundred light horse, ten thousand Italian foot, & five hundred Lansquenets: but rather to defend his places, then to keepe the field, hoping that the pro- longing of the war would breed him some aduantage, for that he expected an issue of the accord, which he did mediate betwixt Maximilian and the Suisses: the which effected, he had promise of notable ayde. On the other side, the King called Lewis of Luxembourg, Earle of Ligni, to march with Euerard Steward Lord of Aubigni, and Iohn Jaquet of Tri- uilce, leading 6000 horse, and 25000 foot. The Castle of Arazze vpon Tanare, was the first obiect of their armes, a place kept by 500 foot, assailed the 10 of August, and taken within few dayes. Seven hundred men being lodged in Anon, did likewise suffer it to be lost in two dayes, and all those put to the sword that were retired in armes into the Castle. Donat Raffagnin, a Milanois, Captaine of the Castle of Valence, well furnished with men and artillery, corrupted by the promises of Triuinle, gaue entrance to the French the same day as he had by the like treachery twenty years before, deliuered one of the gates of Tor- tone to Lodowike Sforze, to the preiudice of Bonne of Sauoy, and of the little Duke Iohn Galeas. All the soldiers were slaine or taken, amongst others, Ottavian brother to Saint Seuerin, was prisoner.

A The same deluge ouerflowed (euen vpon the very brute) Basignagne, Voguerie, Châsse- zaneuf, and Pont Coronée. Anthony Maria Palamessin yeelded vpon Tortone, not attending any assault. Alexandria makes head against the army, and whilest they presse it, Lodowike thus himselfe into Milan, and seeing his estate lost by peace-meales, hee flies to those re- medies which are vsuall in greatest despaire. Hee iuroules all that could carie armes; as- sembles the peopies, discharged them of a part of their ordinary impositions: theweth them with most vehement words, "That if happily hee had ouer charged them, nor any desire to gather treasure, nor his owne disposition (being an enemy to oppression of his subjects) but rather the time and the common dangers of Italy had prest him thereto: to: first to countercheeke the Venetians greatness: then, to oppose against the entry of King Charles. That the fruits which they had reaped thereby, were peace and public quiet, wherein he had happily maintained them many yeares, with a general increase of riches, beauty of buildings and inhabitants, with mildnesse and moderation of spirit, care- full to administer good and briefe iustice to euerie man indifferently. That the meins of his gracious gouernment of his father layed before their eyes, how insupportable would be insolent and proud command of the French bee vnto them. That abhorring the rough and vnciuill manners of strangers, they should resolute for the common defence of their liues and Countrey. That the French are but a brunt, which being withstood, it should then be easie to resist them. That the Emperor made haste to succour them in person; C That Prosper Colonne marched with the troopes of Fredericke King of Naples; That the Marquis of Mantoua, was already in the Countrey of Cremona, hauing pacified all con- trouersies. That to all these aydes, if they did but ioyne their loyalties and good will, hee should find himselfe strong enough to incounter all the power of France vnted together. But these admonitions came too late: it was very apparant, that necessity, & not any good meaning, had forced him to this humilty, whereof hee had neuer giuen them any testimo- ny. Thus his ruine approached. The Venetians for their part made war in Guairadade, and had taken Carravage and other towns vpon the riuier of Adde. The Earle of Caiazzo, discontented that his brother being yonger of yeates and of lesse experience, should bee preferred before him in the command of the army, had secretly passed his word to the King. In the meane time they thunder against the walls of Alexandria, and Galeas of S. Seuerin hauing with him 1200 light horse, and 3000 foot (not discouering his intent to any Captaine, but onely to Luke Malvezzo), flies secretly out of the towne in the night, after the third daies siege, with a part of his light horse, shewing by the effect, that hee had a brauer arme, and was more experienced in lusts and Tourneyes (in which exercise all other Italians gaue him place) then in the gouernment of any army. This flight daunted the courage of the besieged, and made the passage easie. The army enters in at the breach of the day, spoiles the gari on, and sacks the towne. The losse of Alexandria, and the fol- lowing siege of Mortare, opened the gates of Paula.

Milan rich, the Citizens arme, and respect Lodowike so little, as they giue good testi- mony of their affection, by the murder of Anthony of Landriano his Treasurer generally, comming at noone day from the Castle. Lodowike foreseeing his owne by anothers ruine: being well informed that his gouernment was exceeding hateful vnto the Milanois, and moreover, amazed at the report which Galeas made of the valour of the French men at armes, he sent away his children, accompanied with the Cardinalls Alcanius his brother, and of S. Seuerin, with about two hundred thousand Ducats which he had in treasure (well shortned of a million and a halfe which hee made thow of few yeares before) hee left the guard of the castle to Bernardin of Corte borne at Paula, whom he had bred vp yong, and 3000 foot, furnished with victuals, munition, & money for many moneths: hee restored to the Borbomes, Gentlemen of Milan, the lands hee had taken from them. But was this any bounty, seeing he could not keepe them? and the 2 day of September he departed for Ger- many, followed by the Cardinall of Este, and Galeas of S. Seuerin, with a good number of horse, and foot, vnder color to hasten the imagined troops, with Maximilian prepared for him. The towne thus abandoned, being loath to be a prey vnto the enemy, who approach- ed towards the wals, prevented their comming, and willingly consented to bring them in, reseruing the cap tulation to the Kings arriuall, from whom they hoped, (considering their voluntary submission) to receiue goodly exemptions, & great priuiledges. All other places of the Duchy conformed themselves to the pattenre of their chiefe City.

Cremona allied to the French.

Cremona abhorring the Venetian yoke, stretched out both arms and hearts to the French: but the King unwilling to infringe the treaty made with the Senate, they were forced to yield to the yoke after some daies siege. Genoua follows this example. The Adornes (to whom Lodowike had given the government) John Lepis of Fiesque, and the people, contend who shall have most honor in yielding it to the king, who gives them for Gouverneur, Philip Lord of Rauastin, and Baptista Fregose for his Lieutenant. But force could not take the Castle; by the aduce of Trinuice, gold makes a breach. Bernardin without any other approach, by the consent of the other Captaines, namely of Philip of Fiesque, bred likewise and brought up by Lodowike, sells it twelue dayes after Lodowike's departure, and receiues for payment a hundred thousand Crownes: some report but ten thousand (yet I should tearme this sale the capitulation of a foole, considering the place which he commanded) halfe the moueables in the Castle, a company of an hundred Lances, an annuall pension, with many other graces and priuiledges. But this infamous merchant (hatefull to all the world, fled from by euery man, as vnworthy to hold any ranke amongst men of honor, cast off from all companies, with words full of reproch, confounded with shame, and tormented in his owne conscience, accusing his villany and base ingratitude,) dyed of griefe within few dayes after.

Thus all things fore-tell the ruine of Lodowike: his owne indiscretion; the peoples hatred; the cowardlinesse of his Captaines and souldiers, and the treachery of his household-servants, so as in twenty dayes he is dispossessed of this mighty Estate which he had before usurped. The King receiuing intelligence at Lyons, of a speedier victory then he expected, departs presently in post, and makes his entry into Milan, granting to the people exemptions of many customes, impunity to all such as had followed Sforze, restitution to the Gentlemen, who through the tyranny of former times had lost their goods; if they were extant, or not to discontent them that were in lawfull possession, hee gave money to many to buy them againe, or other lands if any were to be sold. He repealed by Edict the Regents and professors of learning, giuing to some lands, to others increase of their entertainment, honored the gentlemen of the Country with his table, and their houses with his presence. And to make this government more popular, he made John Laques of Trinuice, a Milanais Gouvernor of Milan, giuing vnto him Vigueue & many other things. In regard of his merits & loyall seruice. As the French Forces prospered thus in the Duchy of Milan, and the Venetians busied in the Country of Cremona, the Florentines gaped after the restitution of Pisa: and to obtaine it, they giue vnto Paul Vitelli their Generall, an Army of ten thousand foot, with a great number of horse, with the which (hauing taken Cascine and other places that supported Pisa) hee incamped before the City the last day of Iuly. An enterprize of difficulty, as well for the strength of the Towne, as for the valor and resolution of the Citizens, who willingly would haue suffered any misery, rather then to haue false vnder the Florentines command. Hee batters the fort of Stampace, and the wall of either side with twenty peeces of artillery.

Pisa besieged by Vitelli.

Vitelli giues an assault and forceth it, with so great a terror to the Pisans, as abandoning the rampiers, euery man seeks to save himselfe by flight. And if the Generall had pursued it vigorously, that morning had crowned him with honour, whereas it proued the beginning of his downfall: for seeing his souldiers vpon hope of spoile run together by heapes, he stayed their heat, causing most of his troopes to retire, and gaue the besieged the surer, (seeing this first brunt past) to resume new courage, and returne to the guard of the rampiers. So as whilst he laboured to win a victory, with the least preiudice to the army that might be, being lodged in a Country full of pooles and marshes, which lie betwixt the sea and the towne, and the season being subiect vnto pestilent winds, a generall contagion infects to many of his men in few daies, as the healthy were not sufficient for a generall assault, so as he raised the siege against the Florentines will, who promised to renew his troopes with fresh supplies. So as the bad opinion which the Florentine people had conceived of him, increased in such sort, as being called into Cascine, by the Commissaries of the army, vnder color of lodging the Companies, they tooke him prisoner, and from thence hee was led by the Magistrates commendment to Florence, and there publicly beheaded. An ordinary reward for generous minds that subiect themselves to the seruice of a multitude.

Vitelli beheaded.

During Lewis his aboad at Milan, all the Potentates of Italy, except Fredericke King of Naples,

1500

A Naples, either came, or sent vnto him, some to congratulate, some to purge themselves from suspicion to haue been more affected to Lodowike then to him, as also to assure their priuate estates. The King receiuing them all gratefully, compounded with them according to the qualities of their persons, and the benefit he might reape by them. The Marquis of Mantoua, and the Duke of Ferrara, came in person. The King gaue the Marquis a company of an hundred Lances, and the Order of St. Michel, with an honorable pension. The Ferrareis (being in disgrace in Court since the time that he deliuered the castle of Genoua vnto Lodowike) was glad to buy the Kings loue with ready money. John Bentiuole sent his sonne Hannibal: the Florentines had some trouble to make their peace. They had offended all the Court, for that fearing to incense Lodowike Sforze, touching the affaires of Pisa, they had held themselves newters betwixt the King and Lodowike. Moreover, the death of Paul Vitelli (to whom the Crowne of France was beholding) made the King strange vnto them: and the credit of Trinuice did them harme: who aspiring to the Seigneury of Pisa, was as much desired of the Pisans, to warrant them from the Florentines oppressions: finally, the King had need of money, and the Florentines paying a fine as the rest did, were receiued into grace, vpon condition: To ayde one another for their common defence, to take armes in Italy for the King, and the King for them for the recovery of Pisa, and some places held by the Siennois and Luquois: that being repossessed of Pisa, they should furnish the King with five hundred men at armes, and fifty thousand ducats: paying also vnto the King six and thirty thousand Ducats, which Sforze had lent them, abating that which they had disbursed for him.

The Pope also did not forget himselfe, but vrging the performance of the treaty made with the King, obtraines for the Duke of Valentinois (who hauing married the Daughter of the Lord of Albrecht, had repassed the Alpes with his Maiesty) three hundred Lances in the Kings pay, and foure thousand Suisses to be paid by the Pope, to ayde him to make war in Romagna. The King (hauing settled such order as he thought fit for his conquest) and prolonged the truce he had with the Emperor, vntill May following) tooke his way to Lyons, leading with him the Grand-child of John Galeas, whom the mother had vnadvisedly deliuered; him hee made a Monke. Then he receiued newes of a faire daughter that was borne vnto him, the which shall hereafter bee viue to Francis the first of that name, and Queene of France. Another accident, but farall, made that season famous: The fall of our Ladies bridge at Paris, drawing after it the ruine of threescore houses, and a great number of persons swallowed vp in the riuer.

Our Ladies bridge at Paris falls.

This year Italy (beside foraigne and homebred deuils) felt also the Turks forces. Baiazet Ottoman (being expressly drawne by the perswasions of Lodowike Sforze, hauing no other meanes to be reuenged of the Venetians) assailing with a mighty army by Sea, such places as the Venetians held in Greece, he sent sixe thousand horses by land to spoile Trinuice, who finding the Country without defence, expecting no such guests, did spoile, sacke, and burne all euen vnto Luincer: they chained together an infinite number of prisoners, and being come to the riuer of Tagliamente, they refused such as they thought fit to carry with them, and murdered all the rest. In the meane time, the Duke of Valentinois (hauing ioyned the forces of the Church, with those troopes he receiued from the King) took Imola (with ease) in the end of the year. And in the beginning of the next, famous for the celebration of the great Jubile at Rome) Furli. But as hee marched to other townes, the course of his conquests is stayed by vnexpected accidents, bred by diuers motiues. The most part of the Lombards could not fit with the French humor, and all were discontented, for that they had not tasted this great bounty of the King, whereby they were promised a general exemption of all imposts and tributes.

The estate of the Emper.

The Duke of Valentinois exploits.

Moreover, the Gibelin faction (very mighty in Milan) was wonderfully grieved to see Trinuice (chiefe of the Guelfe) preferred to the government: and he by nature factious, proud, and stirring, did much increase this bad disposition, fauouring them of his partie beyond the bounds of reason. This did greatly estrange the peoples hearts from him. He slue with his owne hand some butchers, who according to their common rashnesse, refused to pay the ordinary customes, and withstood the receiuers with armes. Doubtlesse, if such as haue the guard of a mighty estate newly conquered, displease both Nobility and People, what may be expected but a generall alteration: Adde thereunto the lightnesse of an inconstant multitude, alwaies desirous of innovations: now they lament him whom before they hated. Lodowike aduertised of these broyles, strikes while the iron is hot, and without any longer feeding himselfe with the Emperors vaine & frustratorie hopes, he makes a sudden leauy of 3000 Suisses, and five hundred men at armes, Bourguignons, by the helpe (but not entertained) of the said Maximilian, and flies to Coma with all speed, the which being abandoned by the French Garison, finding the humor of these habitants inclined to change, gaue him an easie entry.

Triunlice felt this storme coming, and to auoyde it, hee demands speedy succours from the Venetians, according to the association which they had made with the King, and makes knowne to the Lord of Alegre (who commanded the French troopes, and the Suisses in the Duke of Valentinois army) the necessity which calls him speedily to Milan. The Venetians send Nicholas Earle of Pettilliano, to ioyne with Triunlice or Aubigni, and if hee were debarred, to spoile the Milanois Country. The Earle not able to ioyne with Aubigni, spoiles the Country, and then returnes towards the Towne vpon the riuier of Adda, to preuent any new alteration. Aubigni departs suddenly with the Suisses, and all the horle, obtaining free passage through the Countries of Parma and Placentia, vpon condition to abstaine from all acts of hostility. And coming neerer to Tortone, at the perswasion of the Guelles of that Towne, (who had bene expelled by the rest that were at Lodowikes deuotion) he enters and sacks the whole towne, Guelles and Gibelins, without any distinction: then he went towards Alexandria, whereas the Suisses for want of pay, went to Sforzes army.

Suisses revolt.

The losse of Coma hauing stirred vp the people of Milan, and the chiefe of the Gibelin faction, Triunlice leaues within the Cattle such forces as the present necessity could furnish: he fortified Nouarre with four hundred Lances, and puts himselfe with thier into Mortare, thinking that Lodowike would force it before hee passed, and in the meane time, giuing the King aduertisement of this sudden alteration, hee should haue means to stay the enemies proceedings. But it chanced otherwise. Sforzes army neglecting both Mortare and Nouarre, flies to the most important, and recouers Milan as easily as they had lost it. Paula and Parma presently set vp Sforzes armes. Loda and Placentia had done the like, if the Venetian troops had not suddenly entred. Alexandria and other places neerer to Aft then to Milan, would not declare themselves, before they had seen the last act of this Tragedie. The Geneuois refused to returne vnder Lodowikes command, and the Florentines reject his request, touching the restitution of money which he had lent them, for the which, they had past their promise vnto the King.

Sforze recouers Milan.

The Marquis of Mantoua sent him his brother, with some men at armes. The Lords of Mirandole, Carpi, Corregge, the Rosers, those of Verme, and Bobie, with other such weathercockes, follow the wind that blowes: finally, this new Conqueror finds more affection, and ioy at his returne, then he had left at his departure. Milan being recovered, Lodowike leaues the Cardinall Afcanius his brother before the Castle, and (re-enforced with fiftene hundred men at armes, besides the Bourguignons, and great troopes of foot) hee takes Vigean by composition: and the Kings succours, not able to come in time, for the defence of Nouarre, they compound to yeld the town, and to depart with all their baggage. But the Castle (which holds yet for vs) shall shortly be the meanes of Lodowikes ruine. At Triunlices first summons, the King had dispatched the Earle of Ligni, with a good number of foot, and horle. But he found the two commanders, Triunlice and Aubigni so diuided, as if the King had not speedily and wisely preuented this pestilent contagion, it had doubtlesse ended with a pitifull and bloody Catastrophe. Aubigni & Triunlice held themselves equal in power and vertue. The first would haue them presently to force Milan: the other would attend about Nouarre the new army which the King leauied in Suissierland. If Aubigni set at liberty any prisoners taken in warre, Triunlice ransomed them. Finally, what the one built, the other pulled downe: and they tormented one another with continual riots.

The King aduertised of this dangerous faction, he sends vnto them Lewis of Bourbon, younger brother to Gilbert, late Vice-roy of Naples, and Iohn of Foix Vicount of Narbonne: but by reason of their young yeares, they were guided by Lewis of Tremouille Lord of Thouars, being accompanied by the Lords of Grauille Admiral of France, Latrece, and many others, followed with fiftene hundred Lances, ten thousand Suisses, fixe thousand French, and the Cardinall of Amboise, who was Lieutenant for his Maiestie

A on that side of the Alpes. Tremouille being arriued, treating with these two Commanders, easily drew them (in regard of his Maiesties seruice) to lay aside all rancor, and to become good friends, handling them so wisely, as there appeared no change in their government: but in stead of two, they afterward seemed to bee three heads in one hood. Thus vniited, they resolute to send some companies of light horse vpon the way to Milan, to cut off the passage to foure hundred horle, and a great number of foot that came from Milan: and to preuent Lodowike of all maines to get vnto Milan if he were prest, and then they turne the force of their army against Lodowike being at Nouarre. There were among the Suisses, that were entertained by Sforzes, many Captaines which had serued in the voyage of Naples, and at Nouarre, who complained of their entertainment, not payed at the appointed time. Tremouille deales with them vnderhand, and vpon promise of a great summe of money, withdrawes them from Lodowike.

The Suisses, by the perswasion of their Colonels, begin tumultuously to demand their pay. Lodowike giues them all his plate, and intreats them earnestly to attend the men and money that came from Milan. But fearing, lest by the coming of these Milanois, they should be forced to winke at Lodowike and to saile Tremouille, they caused the French army to approach neerer to Nouarre, to draw Lodowike to field, who was loth to ingage himselfe among men whom hee sees ill affected to him. They are not deceived in their hopes. He goes forth with his army, & puts his light horse to begin the charge. Tremouille makes it good, vntill the Admirall Grauille, and Edmund of Prie arriuing, the Italian troops giue way, and are put to rout. The Suisses being prest to fight, answer: That they will not fight against their brethren, kinsmen and others of their nation, without leave from their superiours. And approaching neerer their Country-men, making as it were but one army, they protest, that they mean to returne, and so obaine free passage through the French army. Lodowike compassed in by this nation, could neither by prayers, nor promises, diuert them from their dysloyall intent: only he got a promise, To set him in a place of safety. So they agreed, that disguised and armed like a Suisse on foot, hee should march in their rankes. But going betwix two great troopes of men at armes, this poore Suisse disguised, is discovered, in one of their battalions, with Galeas of Saint Seuerin, Fracasse, and Anthony Lodowike taken.

Maria his brethren, and stayed: the Italians were stript, but the Lansquenets and Bourguignons were sent away without touch, and Lodowike was led prisoner to Lions, where the King remained: and within two daies after was sent to the great Tower at Loches, where he continued captiue about ten yeares, vntill his death. Behold the ambition and aspiring conceits of him, whom all Italy could not containe, now restrained in a straight prison. And to auoyde a greater corrasue, he intreats Tremouille that hee might not see Triunlices enemy: who being aduertised, and hasting thither, Sforze, (saide he with a bragging speech) thou seest the wrongs thou hast done me, are now repayed in the same measure.

This happened the Thursday before Palme-Sunday. Doubtlesse the circumstances of Lodowikes Sforzes miseries are remarkable: wherein we may learne, that the diuine Iustice doeth alwayes punish offenders, and takes from them at need, both iudgement, courage, wit, and all other faculties. Let vs obserue in this tragedy, that Lodowike being fearful, promising, praying, fighting, and flying disguised: is mockt, taken, and finally, dies in a most pitifull estate. A Prince excellent in many perfections of nature, industrious, eloquent, of an high and buisie spirit, but infamous for the death of his nephew, couetous, vaine, ambitious, turbulent, proud, trecherous, impious, cruell, paying a Crowne for every Frenchmans head that his host should murder going to the table. So as it is not strange, if hee hath felt the rigor of Gods Iustice in his owne person.

An to fill vp the measure of affliction in his family, the Cardinall Afcanius, vpon the brute of this defeat, flying from Milan to recouer some place of safety with many Gentlemen of the Gibelin faction, (who hauing affected Lodowike, depaired of pardon) refreshing themselves at Riualte, in the territory of Placentia, Conrad of Lande, Lord of the same place, (his kinsman and ancient friend) sends presently for Charles Frin, and Soncin Benzon (Captaines vnder the Venetian pay) and trecherously deliueirs vnto them the said Cardinall, with Hermes Sforze, brother to the deceased Duke Iohn Galeas, with most of the Gentlemen in their copany, who presently conveyed them to Venice: but the Senate, at the Kings instant request (who considered how necessary it was for the safety of the state of Milan to haue these men in his power) deliuered both the Cardinall

1500

Baptista Viconti, and Hermes, with all other Milanois that were retired for the same cause, into the Townes of Guairadadda.

The Cardinall was sent to the great Tower of Bourges, vntill that hauing the whole Realme for his prison, he obtained leave, by the intercession of the Cardinall of Amboise, to go to the election of a new Pope, promising vpon his oath neuer to attempt any thing to prouide the Crowne: and to be a meane to aduance one of the French Cardinals to Saint Peters chaire. But oh the ingratitude and treachery of this Milanois! the Colledge of Cardinals inclining to chooe the cardinall of Amboise, he alone by his faction wrote the Popedome from the French, to giue it vnto Innis the second, a Geneuois, in the year 1503. Milan being restrained from all meanes of rebelling, sues presently for pardon, the which they obtaine of the Cardinall of Amboise in the Kings name, vpon condition to repaire their rebellion, by the payment of three hundred thousand Ducats, whereof his Maiesty did afterwards remit the greatest part.

Milan pardoned by the King.

The rest of the rebell ng Cities were euery one taxed, according to their ability. Thus all the Duchy of Milan was quiet: the Suisses were dismissed, who returning to their houses, seize vpon Belinzon, (king in that mountaine, the which (not drawne out of their hands, as the King might haue done for a little money) shall hereafter grieve the author of this error, being a most conuenient passage to stop the Suisses entry into the Duchy of Milan, and shall giue occasion to liberal tongues, to scuffle both in publike and private, at the greedinesse of Lewis, whereof these braue Commanders returning into France, had had more cause to complaine, if the Queene had not supplied this defect with that bounty which the King did owe vnto their merits. Doubtlesse she did bountifully repaire those errors, which the King did often commit in that respect. And the King restraining his liberty, within the bonds of frugality, would not seeme bountifull with the oppression of his people.

Now let vs see how the remainder of the year was employed. The exceeding profpérité of a Prince is suspected vnto other great personages, who feare some diminution in their estates. Maximilian considering how the alienation of so goodly a see, was prejudiciall to the Empire, and the blame hee did incur by suffering Lodowike to be thus spoyled, who had cast himselfe into this protection, hee dismissed the Ambassadors of France and Venice, being ready to proclaim warres against them, as vsurping the lands of the Empire. With this designe hee acquaints the Princes Electors with the injury done to him, to them, and to all the Germane nation, and the apparent danger, lest their too still patience should make the French King seeke to ioyne the Imperiall Crowne vnto his owne, like vnto some of his predecessors. That partly through necessity, and partly through the ambitious desire which the Pope had to aduance his sonne Borgia, Duke of Valentinois, hee would willingly winke at these proceedings. This consideration made the King to put off the warre of Naples vnto the next year. But as the forcers of Germany moue but heauily, so had he leisure to assist the Florentines, (who had shewed themselves ready in the recovery of Milan for the King: and discharge the oath made by his Predecessor, and his owne) with 600 Lances maintained by his Maiesty, and seuen thousand Suisses (but payed by their common-weale) and diuers companies of French, with artillery and munition necessary for the recovery of Pisa, Pietresancte, Montpulcian, Murren, and other places, vnder the command of the Lord of Beaumont, whom they demanded, but ill chosen for them.

The King succours the Florentines.

To auoyde this storme, the Pisans, Geneuois, Siennois, and Luquois, (enuying the Florentines greatnesse) offered the King a hundred thousand Crownes in ready money, to the end the Florentines should not benefit any thing by the recovery of those places so important for their states; promising to pay him fifty thousand Crownes yearly for cuer, vpon condition that the Pisans should recouer their liberty by his meanes, and the fortresses of Luorne, with all the territory of Pisa. Triunice and Fiesque, pleaded for the Pisans, shewing how expedient it was for the King to weaken the Florentines, and some other Potentates of Italy: but offering a great sum of money to the king, they discovered their inward greedinesse, to make themselves Lords thereof. Finally the matter was concluded in fauor of the Florentines. And whilst this army remaynes in Lombardy expecting their pay, the King causeth the Lords of Mirandole, Carpi and Corregio to pay their fines, who for 20000 Ducats obtrayned remission of their rash rebellion.

The potentates of Italy recommended to the King.

The Marquis of Mantoua, (to auoyd the like centure,) humbly craved pardon. John Bentiuole (hauing fauored Lodowike as the rest,) payed forty thousand Ducats: and the King by this meane, tooke both him and the City of Bologna into his protection, whilst that the army (to lole no time) tooke Mont Chiarucole in the territory of Parma, belonging to the Torrelli fauorers of Sforze: then returning backe, to passe the Appennin, by the way of Pontreme, at Fregoses request they spoiled Aubri Malepine Lord of Massa, (with small credit,) and other places, although hee were in the Florentines protection. In the end the Cardinall of Amboise (performing his promises but badly with the Florentines) received (for a summe of money) the Luquois into the Kings protection, agreeing, that his Maiesty should hold Pietresancte in guard, vntill it were decided to whom it did appertaine. The Pisans (being resolu'd to make a defensive war) repaire their fortifications: men, women and children worke with great affection: and to coole the heat of the French comming to their siege, they made knowne the affection they bare to the Crowne of France, by an autentick instrument sent to the Lords of Beaumont and Rausstein Gouernors for the King at Genoua, who received them in the Kings name: and Beaumont (summoning the Towne of Pisa) had for answer; That they desired nothing more then to liue vnder the obedience of his Maiesty, and therefore they yielded vnto the King, vpon promise not to deliuer them into the Florentines power. Doubtlesse hee was ill practised in politike and military affaires, to seeke that by force, which hee might haue without toyle or shame.

And was it not a hard thing, to ruine a people which made such shew of tender loue and voluntary obedience to this Crowne? Beaumont campes before Pisa the 29 of Iune: batters it all night, and some part of the day following, beats downe about threecore fadome of the wall: and mounts to the assault both with foot and horse. But hee discovered not a deepe and large trench, which the Pisans had made betwixt the wall and the rampier within, so as the bredth and depth amazing our men, they remained vpon the breach, rather as spectators of the worke, then hauing any desire to enter. Strangers speake truly, that we are but a brute, and that being withstood at the first, wee are easily broken. The quality of the rampiers, the obstinacy of the Citizens, their ancient inclination to the French, ingenders such a familiarity, betwixt the besiegers and besieged, as conferring familiarly together, going into the towne of Pisa, and coming out safely as from a friend towne, the souldiers now fall to accusing their Commander of rashnesse, and support the Pisans against their Captaines, so as in stead of assailing them, they themselves encouraged them to defend and suffer Tarlattin (borne at Castello) to enter the towne with some old souldiers, to receive the command for matters of warre, as hee did euery after, with much honor. This sufferance both of horse and foot, breeds other disorders. They desiring to haue the siege raised, spoiled the victuals that came to the camp: and Beaumonts authority being vnable to stay this insolency, the Falcons first leaue the army, in tumultuous manner, and giue example to all the rest of the foot. The Suisses likewise found a retreat, and the horse returne into Lombardy, leauing the Florentines affaires in great confusion and disorder.

Pisa besieged.

The French army fauours the Pisans.

The Pisans embrace the opportunity, and with one breath take Libresacta, freeing themselves towards Luques. And the King complaining, that the Florentines had preferred Beaumont before the Lord of Alegre, would haue sent backe his men at armes, to winter about Pisa; that roading vp and downe the Country, they should keepe it, as it were blockt vp; giuing them hope, and promise of a new siege in the Spring. But the Florentines refusing this offer, despairing of any better successe by the French forces, exposed themselves to the common injuries of their ill willers the Geneuois, Siennois, Luquois, and all others, who desired their ruine. On the other side, the King considering that the Popes vnion with the Emperor would bee wonderfull prejudiciall vnto his designe for the reuenge of the reuolt at Naples, although hee had some reason of discontent against Alexander, who had nothing assisted him during the warres of Milan: yet his Maiesty shewed himselfe alwayes most tractable to second the Popes continuall designs, in fauor of the Duke of Valentinois, sending vnto him, (vnder the command of the Lord of Alegre) three hundred Lances, and two thousand foot, accompanied with threats, To be reuenged of those that should oppose themselves against the Popes designs, as an injury done to his owne person. And the Pope likewise promised him both his sonnes person, and his men, whensoever hee should recover Naples. So Borgia (joyning fixe hundred men at armes, and fixe thousand foot, to the French troops) enters Romagna, takes Peisera, Rimini, Brisquelle, and runnes without any resistance throughout all the vntill that Faenza staid for a time the violence of this stream. Hee camps before the Towne in Nouember, batters it, makes a reasonable breach, and the fifth day of the siege gives a fierce assault, so valiantly defended, as the death of Honore Sancelli, and a great number of his men, slaine at the first charge, forced him to found a retreat, and the snow, falling with an exceeding cold, to raise the siege. The former threats had terrified the Potentates of Italy: and the Kings request vnto them in private, made them abandon Romagna. The Venetians renounced the protection of Peter Astor, Lord of Faenza. Iohn Bentinole, his vncke, contains himselfe fearing to incense the King, and the Popes forces; and the Duke of Valentinois, could not endure, that an vnwarlike people, (hauing no other head but a yong man of eightene yeares of age) should obscure the fame of his first exploits: hee returns in the beginning of the new yeare, laden with ladders, and seeks to surpris it, but in vaine. Policy not succeeding, hee returns to force, and by the taking of Ruffy, and other places of the Country, hee makes the enterprise easie. A new breach is made, and new assaults given: the first with our effect, the second gaue hope of victory: but the violence of the Cannon which battered in flanke, the encountering of a deepe and large trench; the death of Ferdinand Farnese, with many other men of worth, and the number of the wounded, makes them to leave the assault. But at length hee carries it. The losse the Florentines had received in this assault, and the despair of succours, cooled this first heat, and fcare making them apprehend hard conditions, if force reduced them into the victors power, they treated to yield, their liues and goods saued, vpon condition that Astor their Lord, should with his liberty choote what retreat he pleased, enjoying the reuenues of his patrimony. But poore Astor (oh Borgia who ouer thall read the detestable life and horrible death of thy father) will alwayes iudge thee a right and worthy sonne of such a father! being yong and very beautifull, was with goodly thewes & honorable demonstrations of loue retained in the Valentinois Court, and loone after conducted to Rome, where some one (saith the Original, naming no man, but noting the villaine with his finger) hauing taken his pleasure of him, and glutted his lust, caused him to be secretly murdered with his bastard brother: and the Pope with the approbation of the Colledge, giues to his sonne Borgia, the auncienture and title of Duke of Romagna. This Estate seemed to him imperfect, without the adiuunction of the territory of Bologna. But the Kings expresse commandement, not to attempt any thing against the estate of Iohn Bentinole (whom he had taken into his protection) caused the Valentinois to content himselfe for that time, with a transaction from Bentinole, to haue pasture and victuals through his Country, a tribute of nine thousand Ducats yeerely; a certaine number of horse and foot, and Castle bologne, (a place vnder the iurisdiction of Bologna) and so he transported his forces into Tuscan. Make here a notable example of a child to his father. One of the sonnes of Gilbert Earle of Montpensier going to Pozzuolo, to visit the sepulcher of his father, suffered himselfe to be so much ouer-ruled with passion, as after hee had bathed all parts of the monument with his lamentable teares, hee fainted, and fell downe dead vpon the Sepulcher, who had as little sense of those his latest sorrowes, as he had feeling of so great an error, to giue such liberty to the rage of nature.

The Florentines are mightily perplexed, they had greatly moued the King by their bad order in the recovery of Pisa, as we haue heard before, but there springs vp new motives of discontent. The exceeding charge they had bene at, and were still forced to beare for the wares of Pisa; the ialousie of the Popes forces and of his Borgia, made them slacke in paying the King the money, which the Duke of Milan had lent them: and the debt which hee pretended to be due vnto him by reason of the pay, made by his Maiestie to the Swisses which he had sent against Pisa, whom he had maintained with his owne money, vpon refusal which the Florentines had made them, vnder color that they would retire into their Country before their time prefixed: and the King (who sought to empty their coffers, to the end hee might gouerne them more absolutely) demanded it very earnestly. Moreover, they grew more weak by their owne ciuill discords, which troubled them in the popular gouernment, wherein many of the citizens being suspected, ey-ther as friends to the Medici, or desiring an other kind of gouernment, matters were managed with more confusion then counsell: and to increase their crosses, the King did prestat them for the aids and summes of money promised for the voyage of Naples: pretending, That he had performed the conuentions they had made together, whereunto they were bound, seeing that by their owne fault they had hindred the recovery: therefore he was no more bound to protect them. And in truth Iulian de Medici, beseeching him in person, and at the Popes perswasion, to restore him and his brethren into their estates, vpon promises of a great summe of money, he most willingly opened both eares and heart to theise offers.

All these considerations drew the Valentinois into Tuscan, with seven hundred men at armes, & fixe thousand choise foot which Bentinole gaue him, (the French companies lodging apart, to attend the Kings army which began to march): But hee knew that the King would not bee pleased with this craftie in hostile manner into the Florentines Country, and that otherwise his Army was both weak of men and munition, to force any Towne.

The Florentines also knowing themselves naked both of horse and foot, others then of the Country, oppressed with ialousie, feare, and diuisions, hee makes this accord with them: That there should be a confederacy betwixt the Common-wealth of Florence, and the Duke of Valentinois, with a prohibition not to ayde the Rebels on either side: and that the Florentines should entertaine him for three yeares at their charge, with three hundred men at armes, and six and thirty thousand Ducats yeerely, which men at armes he should send to them whensoever they had need, either for themselves, or any other, and should not oppose themselves against him for the defence of the Lord of Plombin, who was in their protection. But this composition was onely to disarme the Valentinois, and to send him packing. And hee well informed of the policy, staying in the country; spoiled it in reuenge, both by fire and spoile, most like to an open enemy, trying them with demands, which partly they refused, partly deferred, hoping that the Kings authority should free them from these bonds, which necessity of the time, and Borgia force had extorted from them. The King indeed, held the rod, but stayed his arme: he was pleased the Valentinois should terrifie them, but not tyrannize ouer them. For although he would willingly haue seene some other forme of gouernment at Florence, yet an alteration then, would haue bene very prejudiciall vnto him: the King being loath to see the Valentinois aduanced to any other authority, or by any other forces then his Maiesties. So, by the commandement of Lewis he leaues Florence, and enters the territory of Plombin, taking Surgeret, Scarline, and the Islands of Elbe and Pianosa, were leauing a sufficient garison, as well to guard the places, as to molest them of Plombin, he returned towards Rome to ioyne with the army that was marching to the conquest of Naples.

Nothing crossed the course thereof, but the alarms which the Emperour had formerly caused. But when one treats with a Prince that is flexible for money, the accord is loone made. The gold of France must now stay the iron of Germany. Philip the Archduke might doe much, he was a Prince inclined to peace (and it may be he died too loone for the good of France, leauing an heire, whose birth and all the course of his life hath bene most fatal to the Crowne) and the trafficke of his subjects made them loath to heare speake of war with the French. But that which did most import, the King offered to giue Claude his onely daughter in marriage to Charles, sonne to the said Archduke, and for a dowry, when they should be both of age to consummate the marriage (for neither the one nor the other was yet three yeares old) to giue the Duchy of Milan. So by the means of Philip, & for money, Lewis obtained a prolongation of the truce, in the which the King of Naples was not comprehended, who notwithstanding, by the means of forty thousand ducats, and a bond of fifteene thousand more monethly, purchased a promise from Maximilian: Not to make any accord, but to comprehend him in it, and to make war in the Duchy of Milan, when as need should require, to disort the Kings forces. There yet remained one scruple, Ferdinand King of Arragon and Castile by Isabel his wife, might stir vp the Venetians, and happily the Pope (both prompt enough to oppose ioyntly against the greatnesse of this Crowne.) He was concurrent with our Lewis, in the right of the succession of Naples: for although Alphonso King of Arragon had disposed thereof to Ferdinand his bastard, as his owne proper good, gotten without the rights of the crowne crowne of Arragon: yet Iohn his brother (successor to the Realme of Arragon) and since A Ferdinand, sonne to Iohn, had alwaies protested of their lawfull pretensions to the estate of Naples, as a good, purchased by Alphonso, with the forces and treasure of Arragon.

And thus Ferdinand King of Arragon temporized like a Spaniard, watching his opportunity to attempt some great matter for his owne benefit, he did not onely make demonstration of all the duties of a good kinsman to Ferdinand King of Naples, and his other successors; but the better to lull him asleepe, he allied himselfe to the Neapolitan, giuing him his sister Lane in marriage, and consenting that Lane her daughter should marie with young Ferdinand.

This concurrence of two Kings in like desire, caused the one to free himselfe from lets and crosses, and the other to get a part of that which he could not compass wholly, and so then to share betwixt them, the conquests of the said realme, vpon condition: That, the King of France should haue the City of Naples, with all belonging to the land of Labour, and the Province of Abruzzo: Ferdinand should for his part haue all the landward territories belonging to Apulia, and likewise to Calabria; agreeing that euery one should conquer his owne part, without any bond to aide one another, but onely not to hurt one another, and that they should doe homage vnto the Pope; Lewis with the title no more of King of Sicile, but King of Ierusalem and Naples, imitating the example of Fredericke the second, Emperour of Rome, and King of Naples, by his wife the daughter of Iohn King of Ierusalem (in name but without effect) and of Naples; and Ferdinand in quality of Duke of Apulia and Calabria. The capitulation was no soone concluded, but the King prepared his army vnder the command of Lewis of Armagne, Duke of Nemours, sonne to Jamez beheaded at Paris vnder Lewis the eleuenth, and the Lord Aubigni, an ancient, wise, and well experienced Captaine.

In the which were Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Pol, brother to Charles Earle of Vendome, sonnes to Francis of Vendome, who died at Verceil, Lewis of Bourbon, Prince of la Roche-sur-Yon, great Grand-father to the Duke of Montpensier last deceased, Charles of Bourbon, afterwards Duke of Bourbon, and Constable of France, Lewis of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier his brother, Gaston of Foix, Vicount of Narbonne, the Kings Nephew, sonne to Iohn Vicount of Narbonne, but by reason of their young yeares, obeying the aboue named Commanders. The troops were a thousand Lances, foure men to a Lance, six thousand French foot, foure thousand Swisses, and the Duke of Valentinois with his forces. The army at Sea, commanded by the Earle of Raueffen, Gouvernour of Genoua, consisted of three Caragues of Genoua and sixteene ships, with many other small Vessells, with many footmen, so as they esteemed their footmen to be twenty thousand: who by the Popes fauour and Borgias his sons, passed through all Italy without any resistance.

Fredericke King of Naples, had not yet discovered the secret convention of the two Kings, who proceeding plainly, did solicit Gonsalue (who lay at anchor in Sicile, vnder colour to succour him) to come to Caiete: and very simply put some places in Calabria into his hands, as he demanded: but this was but to make the conquest of Ferdinands portion the more easie. So hoping (that Gonsalue, hauing ioyned with his army) hee should haue sufficient forces to withstand the French; he went and camped at Saint Germaine with seven hundred men at armes, six hundred light horse, and six thousand foot, with the troops which the Colonos brought vnto him, hauing likewise sent his eldest sonne Ferdinand to Tarentum, to commit the Prince of Basignan, and the Earle of Melere to prison, accused to haue intelligence with the Earle of Caiazzo, who was in the French army: the which being come neare vnto Rome, the Ambassadors of France and Spaine giue notice vnto the Pope of this diuision made betwixt their Masters, with an intent Afterwards (say they) to make warre against the enemies of Christian religion: and according to the renour of this agreement, they demand a league, the which was presently granted. Doublelesse the more we seeke to shadow and colour an iniustice with goodly shewes, the greater it appears.

Behold the desires of two Kings, discovered and laid open to all the world, and both jointly blamed. Ours, for that he had rather draw a corinall into Italy, to whom his enemies and ill-willers might see, then to leaue the full possession vnto Fredericke, offering (as we haue

A haue said) to hold the Realme of him, and to pay him a yearly tribute. The other, for that, desire to haue a part of the Realme, had made him to conspire against a King of his owne blood, whom (the more easly to raine) he had alwaies entertained with lying promises of succours, blamishing the glory of that noble title of Catholike King, which hee and his wife Isabel had lately obtained. This league amazed Fredericke, but more the generall mutinie, whereby Saint Germaine and the neigbour places had rebelled at the brute of the French forces, euen before that Aubigni departed from Rome: so as in stead of keeping the field, as he had pretended, he shuts himselfe vp, meaning to defend his townes. Capoua was the first place of defence that hee made choice of, and did fortifie it with three hundred men at armes, some light horse and three thousand foot, vnder the command of Fabricio Colonne, and Rainucio of Martiane: and leaving Proper Colonne for the guard of Naples, heloged in Auerse. Fabricio had caused the messengers of some Neapolitane Barons of the French faction to be murdered at Rome, being sent to treat with him touching an accord for their matters: and see now, these murders are reuenged, if not vpon the person, at the least vpon the authors goods. Aubigni in passing, burnes Marine, Cavi, and certaine other places belonging to their house: then drawing towards Montfortin, he findes that Iulius Colonne had shamefully abandoned it, leauing by the same meanes, all the other Townes about Capoua, euen vnto Vulturno, at the Victors discretion.

C Fredericke aduertised that Aubigni had passed Vulturno, leauing Auerse, hee retired into Naples. Auerse, Nalo, and other places, yeelding vnto the French, prepared then the way to Capoua, the which inuested on either side the riuer, and battered furiously on all parts, endures a hot assault, and repells them with great losse; the Cannon shakes the strongest wallies, and the rough assaults amaze the most resolute; they renew the battery, and all prepares to a second assault. The people mutined, the Captaines and souldiers fainted, and Fabricio Colonne perled from a bastion with the Earle of Caiazzo, when as our men, grieved with the first affront, force the breach, overthrow the defences, enter it, kill all they meet in the fury, ranfome such as they finde after their fury past, and lacke the towne. A happy victory, if the horrible infoleny and licentiousnesse of the Victors had not defamed it. Many women, maidens, and Nuns, to auoid this first fury, were retired into a tower. Borgia would see them, and chose out forty of the fairest, the rest serued as a prey for the souldiers lust, who afterfold a part of them at Rome. Fabricio seeing the towne taken, fled away speedily, but some galloping after, brought him backe prisoner to the Campe. Don Hugues of Cardonne, and all the other Captaines and men of quality saued their liues by ranfome. Rainucio of Marciane being hurt at the assault, died in the Duke of Valentinois mens hands.

Capoua being lost, it made them lose all hope euer to defend any place: Caiete yeelds presently, Auerse opens her gates. Naples compounds suddenly for threescore thousand crownes, payable to the Victors. And Fredericke being shut vp into Castle-Nouo, commands with Aubigny; "To deliuer into his hands within six daies all the townes and forts which were of the Kings portion, onely reseruing the Isle of Ischia for six moneths, during the which it should be lawfull for him to goe whither he pleased, but not into the realme of Naples: To draw what hee would out of the Castles of Naples, except the artillery of King Charles which remained there: That all offences should be pardoned which had beene committed since the first conquest of the Realme by Charles: & that the Cardinals, Colonne, and of Arragon, should enioy the spirituall liuings they possessed within the Realme.

Thus Fredericke detesting the treachery of the Arragonois, and desiring rather to flie vnto the Kings protection, he came into France to accept what his Maiessty should giue him: which was the Duchy of Aniou, with thirty thousand crownes of yearly pension. An ill aduised resolution, for keeping himselfe in some place of safety, happily he might (during the partialities which shall soone grow betwixt Lewis and Ferdinand) haue found meanes to recouer his realme, yet was hee happy in his misery, changing a crowne of thornes, a state full of troubles, to a quiet life, and yet honourable: for euen after the French were expelled Naples, hee was still maintained in the same honour, and in the same estate, by the Kings great loue and bounty.

Gonsalue at the same time conquered the portion for his Master, and although all the Country

Country did more affect the French command, yet having no man to receive them in his name, nor to defend them, all the townes did willingly submit themselves vnto him, except Manfredonia and Tarentum, the which after some shew of resistance, did in the end vndergoe the Castilian yoke. Ferdinand, eldest Sonne to Fredericke, was at Tarentum, with secret commandement from his father not to come into France, though he should be forced to strike faile. But seeing that both were wholly spoiled of their estates, and that our Lewis did nourish the Father, the Castilian might well entertaine the Sonne. Gonsalve sends him vnto him, against his solemne oath taken at the receiuing of the sacrament, To leaue him at his liberty: but some nation preferres the interest of state, before the feare of God and the respect of his owne reputation.

The conquest of Naples had made the Valentinois returne to his enterprize of Plombin, and Lames Aprian Lord of the Towne, hauing manned it with a sufficient Garison, came vnto the King, who long before had taken him into his protection. But whilest he did sollicit in Court for the preferation of his estate (though without any hope of fauour, by reason of the Kings promises made vnto the Pope, Not to hinder him in his legnes) Pandolfo Petruccio deliuered vp the town to the Valentinois, who by the authority of the Apostolicke Sea, and the support he had from the King, made it well knowne in Italy that his excecutive countenell had no restraint nor bounds. In the meane time the King treats a peace with the Emperour very effectually. Many reasons moued him therunto: the desire to obtaine the possession of Milan: to offend the Venetians, who (the prosperity of this realme being very offensiu vnto them) did vnder-hand hinder the conclusion of this peace, and to recouer Cremona, with Guaradade, at the great instance of the Milanois, with Brescia, Bergamo and Crema, the ancient appurtenances of the Duchy of Milan, and vsurped by the Venetians, in the time of Philip Maria Visconti.

For this treaty the Cardinall of Amboise, Lieutenant General for his Maiesty at Milan, went to the Emperour to Trent, where first they treated of the mariage of Charles the eldest sonne to the Archduke Philip, with Claude, the only daughter of Lewis, the Emperour granting to either of them, the inueftiture of Milan, but not to the Kings heires males, in case he had any: to recouer whatsoeuer either of them pretended to haue been vsurped by the Venetians: to call a generall Councell to reforme the Church, not only (say they) in the members, but euén in the head. Doubtlesse there is small assurance in the loue of Princes, who gape after nothing but their owne greatnesse. Moreover, did wee euer see any thing succeed well with them who haue coloured their passions with the name of the Church, and the reformation thereof? This is directly, To take the name of God in vaine. And likewise all the malicious practices and schoole-trickes of a Cardinall (whose ambitious spirit gaped after a Popedom) what could they bring forth but smoke for France, and combustion for Italy? Truly the reading of Histories doth teach vs, That she politike gouernment of Priests is vnfortunate and fatall.

This treaty, hauing onely in shew made way for a peace, was ended with a promulgation of a truce, giuing hope, that these things treated on should soone take effect. And this opinion was confirmed by the comming of the Archduke Philip, with his wife (daughter to Ferdinand King of Arragon, and Isabell Queene of Castile) who as appointed to the succession, meaning to goe and receiue the oath of fidelity of their subjects, they passed through Paris the five and twentieth day of Nouember, and from thence to Blois, where the King and Queene remained: and there they concluded the mariage of their children: but man purpoeth, and God disposeth.

For with the new yeere, the Emperour brought forth new designs, refusing flatly the inueftiture of the Duchy of Milan to the King, and treating with the potentates of Italy touching his passage to Rome, to receiue the Imperial crowne, he found the Florentins tractable to the articles which he propounded, considering the hard conditions the King demanded, seeming to be wholly estranged from them, saying that he was acquit of the articles accorded at Milan, and they remained still bound. Thus Hermes Sforze Ambassador for Maximilian at Florence, had obtained a promise of the common-weale, to aide him in his voyage with a hundred men at armes, and thirty thousand ducats, when as hee should be entred into Italy. But the King, fearing lest the Florentins despairing of his loue, should make some accord with Maximilian, in the end he made a new agreement with them, vpon milde conditions: That the King (receiuing them againe into his protection)

Plombin deliuered to the D. of Valentinois.

The King makes a new accord with the Florentines

The beginning of diuision betwixt Lewis and Ferdinand.

And should defend them against all men, with his owne force and charge for three yeares following, during the which they should pay vnto his Maiesty forty thousand ducats yearly, and it should be lawfull for the Florentines to proceed by force against the Pisans, or against any other that with-held their places. The Pisans are againe abandoned to the spoile, and the Florentines refused to vanquish by a general waite (the fore-runner of famine) that plague which they had in vaine tried to subdue by the sword. This passed in Tuscane, when as no man perceived what followed thele garboiles.

But two Nations of such contrary humors, could they liue so neare neighbours, but some feedes of dislike should bring forth fruits of diuision? There suddenly growes great contentions betwixt our French and the Castilians for their confines. And why doe wee not vfe a graue deliberation in our contracts, to make them so strong as nothing may ingene them? Alphonso of Arragon King of Naples, the first of that name, had (to make collection of his reuenues the more easie) diuided the realme of Naples into six principall Prouinces, the land of Labour, the Principality, Bazilicate, Calabria, Apulia, and Abruzzo: wherof, Apulia was sub-diuided into three parts, the land of Otrante, Bari, and the Capitanate ioyning to Abruzzo, and separated from the rest of Apulia by the riuer of Lofante (otherwise called Laufade.) Seeing then that in the diuision, Abruzzo was fallen to the French, had they not reason to dispute the possession, the said Capitanate being rather a portion of Abruzzo, then of Apulia? and the matter of greatest importance was, that not inioyning the Capitanate, they lost the reuennue growing of the custome of Cattell, being one of the clearest of the realme.

Moreover, the Capitanate is a corne Country, and might easly in a time of dearth furnish the land of Labour and Abruzzo, whensoever the Spaniards should forbid the traffike of graine from Apulia and Sicilia. Hereupon either part drew what he could out of their reuenues of this custome, feeding still their contentions with new motives. The Spaniards maintained, that the Principality and Bazilicate were comprehended in Calabria, which is diuided into two; the higher, and the farther; one high, and the other low, and that the valley of Beneuent, possessed by the French was a portion of Apulia. And therefore Gonsalve chalet the French Magistrates out of Tripaldi, and sent orders to aduise Iustice vnder the command and authority of Ferdinand. All things tended to open diuision. But let vp not flatter our selues. Was it not reason, that they which had deuoured others, should afterwards consume themselves? The chiefe Barons of the Country, desiring to quench these first fire-brands of discord, did mediate an enteruiew betwixt the Viceroy Neumors, and Gonsalve, who agreed to enioy those places in common, that were in controuersie; and in the meane time fet vp the banners of the two Kings, expecting what what they should determine.

The Viceroy was hot and vehement, and could not endure a brauadoe. Gonsalve (of whom the Spanish and Italian Authors make no lesse account, then of a Furius Camillus, or a C. Scipio, or a C. Caesar) had doublelesse goodly parts of a Captaine. Braue in armes, vigilant, industrious, patient in trauell, stately, prodigall, liberal, not voluptuous, and a man of a strong and vigorous complexion. He sometimes by liberality, sometimes by sufferance, gaue liberty to his souldiers; then againe would restrain their insolvency imperiously, within the bounds of duty; he loued and honoured men of Valour, and veyingennously did fit himselfe to occurants, iudging of things to come with a good natural discourse, by the comparison of the present, and what was passed, neuer grounding his designs vpon any vncertainty. But all these goodly vertues were blemished with perpetual dissimulation and treachery, no feare of God, no loyalty, where hee felt any profit, being accustomed to say, That a braue souldier must grossly weaue the web of his honour.

As Gonsalve then (following the instructions and letters of Ferdinand, who already in imagination had deuoured the whole realme of Naples) had sowed the seeds of warre on all sides, the Viceroy proffers by a publike declaration, that he will make war against Gonsalve if he speedily depart not out of the Capitanate. And seeing the King of Spaine refused not to leaue the possession, he enters Tripaldi by force, the nineteenth of Iune, and consequently the other townes which Gonsalve held in that Country. They are now imbarcked in war, and the King is at Lions, to provide necessary things, more commodiously to crosse the vniust practices of his aduersary. Vpon this designe he sends two thou-and Suiffes by sea to supply his men, and entertaines the Princes of Salerne and Bisceglia, with an intent to passe into Italy if need required.

New broyles in Italy.

The new tumults which Vitelloze (impatient of the death of his brother Paul Vitelloze, beheaded at Florence as we have said) did raise in Tuscane, drew him thither. They begun by the revolt of Arezzo against the Florentines, at the perswasion of the said Vitelloze, of the Prins, John Paul Bailion, Pandolfo Petruccio, and others which desired the returne of Peter of Medici into the state of Florence. The Florentines protecting themselves with their new league with the King, flew to him, accuse the Pope and the Duke of Valentinois, to be the Authors of these things: found forth the imminent danger of the Duchy of Milan, if the above named (vnited and conuined to ruine their estate) reduced it into their power.

Zanis succours the Florentines

The King had bene long tired with the insolency and ambition of the Pope and his sonne: Hee did foresee that the treaties of accord being broken with Maximilian, the Venetians would soone crosse him; and that hauing open war with the Spaniard, the vading of Tuscane, done by the secret practices of others, would proue very prejudiciall vnto him. And therefore he sent foure hundred Lances to succour the Florentines, with commandement to Vitelloze and his adherents: Not to molest those any more whom he had receiued into his protection, the which hee declared to all those that should feare to incurre his indignation. In the meane time the Duke of Valentinois vpon the confusions of Arezzo, went out of Rome with his army, and vnder a false pretext to take Camerino, (hauing before to weaken Gualdabald Duke of Urbino, drawne men and artillery from him) leapes into that Duchy, and takes all his estate without any opposition, except the Rock of Saint Leon, and Maiuolo, to the great discontent and amazement of Vitelloze, the Prins, and Petruccio, who by anothers ruine began plainly to discouer their owne. This conquest had made the Valentinois to assaile the Florentines, if the commandement made him from the King, or rather the comming of his Maiesty had not diuerted him. Camerino was the object of his armes. He tooke it, and with a barbarous inhumanity caused Julio of Varane Lord of the said place, to be strangled with the two sonnes. The King grieues at All, and Lewis of Tremouille comes into Tuscane with two hundred Lances, three thousand Suiffes, and great store of artillery, for the recouery of Arezzo in honour of the Florentines.

The Duke of Valentinois his study.

The Pope with his Borgia, foreseeing that the King (being incensed against them, as the chiefe motives of this war) would spoile Borgia of Romagna, & other places which he possessed, and that they were too weak to withstand this storme, they returne to their accustomed practices, imputing the rebellion of Arezzo to Vitelloze, and his associates, whom they could not (say they) neither by prayers nor authority diuert from this enterprise. And to pacifie the King the Valentinois sent word to Vitelloze, that if hee did not giue vp Arezzo and other places belonging to the Florentines, hee would cast him out by force. Vitelloze was ready to beare the whole burthen, but by what means? considering the weakenes of his forces, and that the strongest were ready reconcile themselves, and to leaue him in the mic: he therefore makes no delay but consignes Arezzo and the other Florentine townes, which the violence of his forces had put into his power, Mont Saint Souin, Chastillon d'Arezzo, Cortone, and the rest of Valdichiane: all which were presently by the Kings command restored to the Florentines. The affaires of this world require euery man to shroud himselfe vnder the strongest. The King hath no sooner set footing into Italy, but all the Princes and Common weales (according to their accustomed manner) flee vnto him, some to get pardon, some to maintaine their estates, and all in generall to draw his Maiesties forces against the Pope and his sonne. But doth it not commonly fall out, that what many desire succeeds but seldom? Their priuate interest and respects, are most commonly contrary to their outward shewes and desires. So the King, not so much moued by the Popes exact diligence (who by all meanes and messages sought to pacifie him, and to returne againe into fauour) as by the Cardinall of Amboise perswasion (who to entertaine the Pope in vnion with the King, presumed to frame himselfe a ladder to mount vnto the Popedom, and to aduance some one of his house to be Cardinall) he happily followed of two waies the worst, fauouring the Pope and his followers. The wife reader may iudge thereof by the cuent of the history.

Another alliance between the King and Pope.

True it is, the Emperour was a chiefe motive to draw our Lewis to this accord. His friends

1502

As hee itched, he could not be quiet: and vnder colour of his passage (which hee did so much affect) to receiue his Imperiall Crowne of the Pope, he might happily trouble the state of Italy, to the Kings great prejudice; and indeed hee had already sent many horse and foot to Trent, making great offers to the Pope in fauour of this passage. Moreover, the King was not ignorant how vnwillingly the Venetians did see the state of Milan and the realme of Naples in his hands. Adding therunto, the Imperious threats which foure Cantons of the Suiffes made. That if the King did not yeeld them the rights hee had to Bellinzane, and giue them Volceline, Schafonze, with other outrageous demands, they would compound with Maximilian. But to add more crosses, hee must dispute the conquest of Naples by the sword. All these considerations made our Lewis desirous to entertaine the Popes friendship, whereby Maximilians designs were suddenly disappointed. So the King (hauing more liberty to prouide for the estate of Naples) sent a fresh supply by Sea of two thousand Suiffes, and ten thousand French, the which ioyned to the Viceroy, who had already taken all the Capitanate, except Manfredonia and Saint Angelo. They camped before Canose, the which Peter of Nauarre yeelded by composition, to depart with bag and baggage. The taking of this place did shut Gonsalue into Barlet, without money, with little victuals, and lesse munition. And the French Captaines alledging (against the aduice of the Lord of Aubigny) that the army could not all campe about Barlet for want of water, and many other reasons, they resolved, a part of the army should remaine thereabouts, to maintaine a kinde of siege, and the other should seeke to recouer the rest of the realme. After this counsell, the Viceroy seized vpon all Apulia, except Tarentum, Otranto, and Gallipoli; and then he returned to Barlet. The Lord of Aubigny entering Calabria with the other part of the Army, tooke and sackt the Towne of Cosenza, with some other places.

The Suiffes braue the King.

The exploits of the French in the Kingdome of Naples.

But our prosperity lasts not long, wee commonly sleepe in the midst of our course. This happy beginning made our Lewis more careless then the cause required, the which if hee had continued, he might easily haue expelled the enemy (before hee had bene supplied) out of all the State of Naples: but hee tooke his way for France, after hee had treated anew with the Pope, and receiued the Valentinois into fauour againe, vpon condition, To aide him in the wars of Naples, when neede should require: and a promise from the King, to giue the Valentinois three hundred Lances, to helpe him to conquer Bologna for the Church, and to suppress the Vrins, Bailion, and Vitelloze, against whom the King was wonderfully incensed for the outrages they had done to the Florentines, and for that they had shewed themselves too slacke in the execution of his Maiesties commandements, especially Vitelloze, who had refused to yeeld the Florentines the artillery which hee had taken from Arezzo.

The Valentinois is fearfull to the Potentates of Italy.

This reconciliation made the Valentinois fearefull to all Italy. And doubtlesse who soeuer is neighbour to a cruell and inexorable man, hath neede to stand vpon his guard. Moreover, a wicked man hauing so firme & strong supports in the Kings Council (where the Cardinall of Amboise ruled all) how could he but daily presume to commit new insolencies? The Venetians were wonderfull ialous of Borgias greatness, increasing daily, shewing the King by their Ambassadour, how much it did derogate from the honour of the house of France, and the glorious surname of most Christian King, to fauour a Tyrant, borne for the ruine of people, and the desolation of Prouinces, disloyall, cruell, thirsting for humane blood, by whom so many Gentlemen and Noblemen had bene treacherously slaine: who sometimes by the sword, sometimes by poison, glutted his cruelty vpon his allies, his kinsmen, his brethren, and vpon them, whose age cuen the barbarous Turkes would haue respected.

But the King did not build so much vpon the Popes friendship, as he doubted his hatred. Moreover, he thought (being firmly vnited to him) no man should dare to attempt any thing against the authority of his crowne in the estates of Milan and Naples. The Kings answer was, That hee neither would nor ought to binder the Pope from disposing at his pleasure, of places belonging to the Church. The Venetians therefore forbearing to crosse the prosperity of the Valentinois, for his Maiesties respect; beheld, many small brookes ioyned together make a streame. The Prins, the Duke of Graigne, Vitelloze, John Paul Bailion, Liuero of Fermo, Hermes for John Bentinole his father, Anthony Penafre for the Siennesis, with many other heads, make an offensive; and a defensive fiue league; by meanes whereof, and by the surprize of the Castle of Saint Leon, Gualdard recovered all his Duchy of Vrbino. They goe to field with seven hundred men at armes, and nine thousand foot, but they displease the King, arming themselves with his authority, hoping (it may be) that he would not bee discontented to haue the Valentinois molested by another.

The Valentinois flies to the King, and speedily provides for conuenient remedies: first he pacifieth the Cardinal Vrsin, by the meanes of Iulius his brother, and by diuers policies did so cunningly pacifize, first one, then another of the confederates (confused and troubled with the succours, which the King gaue commandement to the Lord of Chamoont to send to Borgia, with expresse charge to countenance his affaires by all meanes) that the first which was taken in the snare, was Paul Vrsin, whom he held to be a fit instrument to dispose of his companions, and to draw them innocently into danger. But what did these poore Commanders, capitulating with a wicked wretch, whose sweet words were snares for their death, and who must shortly serue as an instrument of Gods wrath against them. Truly whilst they employ the forces (which they had leauied to suppress him) in his fauour, for the taking of some places, and that they suffer themselves to be lulled asleepe with his goodly shewes, and sweet speeches, he prepares for their ruine. After they had by his commandement taken the towne and Castle of Sinigalle: he comes thither the next day, with all his companies in order: he causeth them to be taken prisoner, strips their troops: and to make the last day of this yeare famous, he strangles Pitellus, and Linerot of Fermo, the first must follow the miserable course of his house, all his other brethren (and according to the order of their ages) being dead of violent deaths. John was slaine with a Cannon before Ofime, vnder Pope Innocent, Camillo with a blow before Circelle, Paul was beheaded at Florence, and Linerot felt in his person, the treason whereby he had in a bankrupt treacherously murdered John Frangiane his Vncle, with many Citizens of Fermo, to vsurpe the Seignoury thereof.

Now wee shall see a yeare full of memorable and famous accidents, begun with the Popes impiety and treachery, but hee was ignorant what should presently befall his owne person and state. Being advertised of his sonnes exploits at Sinigalle, he calls the Cardinal of Vrsin to the Vatican: who (trusting in his faith, whom all the world knew to be faithlesse) was lately come to Rome. Being arrived, he is taken prisoner, and with him Rainold Vrsin Archbishop of Florence, the Protonotaire Vrsin, and the Abbot of Alouano, brother to Bartholomew and James of Saint Croix a Roman Gentleman, whom some few daies after hee caused to bee deliuered vpon a good caution: but the Cardinal ended his daies there by poyson: and the Valentinois hearing that the Cardinal was prisoner, hee caused the Duke of Grauing, and Paul Vrsin to be strangled. Then he approached to Siena, meaning to seize thereon vnder colour to expell Pandolfo Perusio, as an enemy and disturber of the quiet of Tuscan, promising, that when hee had chased him, hee would presently returne with all his troops to Rome without endamaging their territories.

The Sienois thinking it no reason, that the whole city should incur so great danger to maintaine the power of one priuate Citizen, and Pandolfo desiring rather to accept that with euery mans good liking, which in the end the peoples hatred and the perill of his person would force him vnto, parted out of Siena, leauing the same guard and the authority with his friends, so as his departure bred no alteration in the government. This enterprize displeased the King, for although he were not sorry to see Pitellus and his adherents punished, yet desired hee not their total ruine, the which with the conquest of so great estates made the Pope and his Borgia too mighty. He desired therefore from this attempt, not so much to obey the King, as finding the taking of Siena difficult, being a great towne and strong: conuerting all his forces to the total destruction of the house of Vrsins, John, Iulio, Francis, Fabian and Organtino, who hauing ioyned with the Sauelli were in Ceruette, and had taken the bridge of Lamentane, and scoured all the Country.

When he had restrained their courses, he invaded the possessions of John Jordan, who was then in the Kings protection and pay, bearing armes for his seruice at Naples: The King was greatly moued herewith, and to controule the presumption and insolency of the Valentinois, he commands him to forbear to molest the estate of Jordan, & to restrain his excessive

A excessive courtoisnesse, he procures an vnion betwixt the Florentines, Siennois, and Bolognais for their common defence, to take from the Pope and his sonne, all meanes to extend themselves any farther into Tuscan. The Spaniard fortifies himselfe in the meane time in the realme of Naples, and our affaires decline. The Earle of Melet, the Princes of Salerne and Bisignan, were incamped at Villanoua, and Don Hugues of Cardone (passing from Messina into Calabria, with a thousand fix hundred foot, Spaniards, Calabrians, and Sicilians, and an hundred men at armes) marched to succour it, going through a narrow plaine betwixt a mountaine and a little riuer, ioyning to the way with a caufey, desiring rather to enter into Villanoua, then to fight. The Earle encounters them beneath the riuer, and not able to draw them into the plaine, he passeth the water to cut off their way to Villanoua, and to charge them. But very indiscreetly, for being troubled with the caufey, they were easily defeated and the towne relieved. And behold, Mannell of Benaude (hauing Anthony de Leua with him, who of a simple souldier became a braue Captaine, and shall win many victories) leading two hundred men at armes, two hundred Genetaires, and two thousand foot, takes Lofarne at the second assault, where the Lord of Ambricourt was lately entred with thirty Lances, and the Earle of Melete with 1000 foot. Ambricourt was taken, but the Lord of Aubigni, approaching with three hundred Lances, and five thousand foot, forced the victors to retire to Villanoua, and gaue the Earle meanes to saue himselfe and to keepe the Castle. Aubigni following them in the C taile to the foot of a high mountaine, cut off threecore men at armes and some 2000 foot, with thirteene hundred prisoners, taking 15 Ensignes. But this was with the death of Grigni, a braue Captaine, who led the company of the Earle of Caiazzo, being dead of sickness a little after the taking of Capoua. At the same time Porta Carrera brought two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, and two thousand foot, who dying at Rhegium, left the command of his troops to Ferdinand Andrada his Lieutenant.

Few daies after, Gonsalues departing from Barlette, set vpon the Lord of Palisse who lodged in Rubos with a hundred Launces, and three hundred foot, as securely as in an assured peace, and hauing surprised him suddenly, battered it furiously & made a breach: he forced him to yeeld the place, and to remaine prisoner with his troope, and then he retired safely to Barlette, notwithstanding the Duke of Nemours Companies lodged for their ease in diuers places about Barlette, whilst Gonsalues endured (with an admirable patience) both hunger and peffilence within the same City. Morgouer, fifty French Lances sent to surprize some money which was brought from Trani to Barlette, were defeated by such as Gonsalues had sent for the conduct thereof. All these petty losses were without doubt foretellings of a change of our good fortune. But what need was there in the beginning of this so visible Catastrophe, to hazard a fruitlesse combat, for falling to our disadvantage, it must needs greatly diminish our reputation, and make the whole nation to be scorned, although the honour and valour of a whole Country consists not in the combat a few priuate persons? A trumpet returning from Barlette (where he had treated of the ransom of some prisoners) reports some speeches which he had heard to the prejudice of the French: who offended therewith, they desie the Spaniards and Italians. Thirteene French, make offer to fight with thirteene of theirs. The field was chosen betwixt Barlette, Andrie, and Quadrate. It chanced that hauing broken their Lances, with no aduantage to either party: falling to their other armes, a French-man overthrew an Italian, and aduancing to kill him, hee himselfe was slaine by an other Italian that came to rescue his companion. In the end, after a rough and bloody fight of some houres, the Italians (hauing slaine many of the Frenchmens horses) remained masters of the field and bodies, leading their enemies prisoners to Barlette.

Whilst a State stands firme, every one feares to attempt against it, but vpon the first disauour euery one seeks to pull a plume. Some Cantons of the Suissees seeke to sithe in a troubled water, and to obtaine by force what they could not get by fauour: which was Bellinzone, the which they had surprised in Lombardy. To this end they come before Locarne, camping towards the wall, vpon that great lake which stops the descent from the mountains into the plaine: and the other Cantons seeing the enterprize succeed well in fauour of the first assailant, runne to aide their companions, to the number of thirteene thousand. These were too many mouths in a straight and barren Country, whose fury must soone faint, for want of Artillery, Victuals, Money and Horse.

the Suissees.

The Lord of Chaumont did wisely foresee all this, who furnishing his Castles vpon the mountaines, and keeping his troops in the plaine, kept this great swarme from coming into open places, whilst that hee assembled all the forces of Lombardie, and the allies of Bolognia, Ferrara, and Montoua. The Venetians (being required to send the succours which they were bound vnto for the defence of the State of Milan) sent some companies, but so late as they were vnprofitable. Thus the Swisses wanting victuals, the French hauing sunke many Barikes which brought them prouision vpon the Lake, and the Swisses themselves beginning to be diuided, for that the whole gaine of their armes redounded to them alone that possessed Bellinzone, they retired in the end, vpon condition to deliuer what they had taken of the Kings, except Musocque, as not belonging to the Duke of Milan, and Bellinzone at a certain time.

A counterfeite peace with the Spaniards.

Thus ended this great shew, and Philip Archduke of Austria, returning from his voyage, armed with authority from his Father in law, and Mother in Law, to make a peace with the King, it was concluded at Blois: *That the Realme of Naples should be enjoyed according to the first diuision; but Philip should keepe those Provinces, for the which they had taken armes. That from that day Charles his Sonne, and Claude the Kings daughter should be called themselves Kings of Naples, and Dukes of Apulia and Calabria: and both the King's Princes should be gouerned in the name of the two Children, untill the consummation of the marriage: when as the King should giue his part for his daughters dowry. This peace was of a happy consequence. Armes were laid aside betwixt two mighty Kings. It bred loue betwixt the Emperour and our Lewis; and new designs against the Venetians, whom the King desired to annoy: and it may be the Pope (being hated of all the world) had beene forced to vndergoe a Councell, a matter which he feared exceedingly. Doubtlesse there is alwaies an Antipathy betwixt bad Popes and good Councells. But this peace was but counterfeited by the Spaniards: yet it seemes not that Philip proceeded therein like a Fox, considering his quiet spirit, and the alliance he made with this Crowne. Lewis and Philip sent presently to proclaim it at Naples, and to command the Captaines; That attending the King of Spaines ratification, and holding what they did possesse, they should abstaine from all acts of hostility. The Viceroy foresaweth: but Gonsalue had his warch-word, howe else durst he disobey Philip? Gonsalue answered, That untill he had received commandment from his King and Queene, he wight not lay downe armes. He grew the prouder for that the King trusting in this peace, had neglected things necessary for wars, and kept backe three thousand foot which should haue beene imbarcked at Genoua, and three hundred Lances lea- ued to that end, vnder the Lord of Perfi: contrariwise, Gonsalue was newly re-enforced by two thousand Lanquenets, which the Venetians (against the articles of their accord made with the King) had suffered safely to passe by their Gulph. The Viceroy (foreseeing that he must stand vpon his guard) sends for all the French companies which hee had dispersed into diuers parts, and the forces of the country, except those which made war in Calabria vnder Abignii. but in the assembling thereof, he gaue the first blow to the ruine of the French in the realme of Naples. The Duke of Atri and Lewis of Ars, a French Captaine, were ioyned together to goe vnto the Viceroy, knowing well, that Peter of Nauarre was so lodged, as he might endamage them being diuided. Lewis of Ars finding his opportunity, passed without attending his companion, and the Duke advertised that the Nauarrois had taken the way of Matera, to ioyne with Gonsalue followed the tracke of Lewis of Ars. But it chanced at the same time that Rutilliane, (a towne in the Country of Bari) being revolted, had called backe the Nauarrois, who being vpon this occasion turned from Matera to Rutilliane, incountred the D. of Atri, charged him, and defeated him, Iohn Anthony his Vncle being slaine, and himselfe prisoner.*

The Duke of Atri defeated

And to increase these mischiefs, Prian Pringinal knight of Rhodes, was come into the hauen of Otranto with foure French Gallies, with promise from the Venetian Magistrate, not to suffer them to be molested by the Spanish Fleet, which hovered neare about; who entering soone after into the same Port, Prian (to the end his losse should not benefit the enemies) freed his Gally-slaves, sickes his Gallies, and saues himselfe by land with his people: another injury which shall greatly incense our Lewis against the Venetians. Hereafter all things fall out opposite for our men: but see, their violent heat makes them run headlong to their totall ruine: Calabria is the meanes. They had commandment from the King to temporize, and only to keep themselves from surprize, expecting

A expecting either a confirmation the peace, or some greater succours. But what meanes is there to temper the furious courage of the French, the enemies lying to neare them? Manuel of Benauide hauing repaired his army, and fortified it with fise thousand men, which Ferdinand had sent him, was ioyned vnto Iohn of Cardone, and the two armies approached within a league and a halfe. Abignii within Gioie, the Spaniards at Seminara. Abignii was fortified with foure peeces of Cannon vpon the riuer side, whereas Gioie is seated to hinder the enemies passage: the Spaniards being resolute to passe, they caused their foreward (led by Manuel Benauide) to march on directly to the riuer to encounter Abignii, who was planted on the other side, vnder colour of some parle, whilst the battell and the reerward passed a mile and a halfe alone Gioie. Abignii discouraging this cunning stratagem, flies thither in great hast without any artillery, to charge them before they were all passed, but it was too late. All marched in order of battell to withstand our French, running thither without order, and almost out of breath. The charge was furious, and the issue doubtfull, fighting with great obstinacie; and no man seemed desirous to turne his backe. Doubtlesse the full decision of controuersies approached to the confusion of our men; who being the smaller number, and hauing lost many in this obliuious encounter, they were in the end forced to giue way to the Spanish horse, and euery man to seeke for his safety as he could. Abincourt was againe taken prisoner, and some other French Captaines, with the Duke of Somme, and many Barons of the Realme. Abignii saued himselfe in the fort of Angriole, but being presently inuaded and vnsustained of succours and defence, he was forced to yeeld himselfe prisoner. Such is the alteration of the affaires of this world. This noble and valiant Captaine had but few years before defeated Ferdinand Gonsalue in the same place: and now by a strange alteration he is charged, defeated, and a prisoner. Moreover, that the end of a misfortune in Calabria, might be the beginning of another in Apulia: Gonsalue being forced by famine and pestilence, to abandon Barlette, and to retire to Carignole, a towne betwixt Conese (where the Viceroy remained) and Barlette: the Viceroy (foreseeing that Gonsalue, putt vp with this first successe, would attempt some higher enterprizes) he calls vnto the Lords of Ars, Alegre, Palisse, Chondion, Tristan Caracole, and other Commanders. And as he propounded vnto them on the one side the enemies forces, growne glorious by many notable victories, and now presenting themselves to make triall of a new battell, on the other side, their owne weak troops diminished and daunted by reason of the former disgraces, asking their aduice, whether they should accept or fly the hazard of a battell: many were of opinion to referre it vntill the next day, saying there remained scarce an houre: when Alegre (in a manner alone among many) blamed the feare and cowardise of such as sought delays. Then the Viceroy said: For my part I am ready to fight, but I feare this brave Councillor will repose more trust in his couriers legs, then in the valour of his arme, when it shall be needfull to fight: foretelling the issue of the fight, and the flight of Alegre. He therefore puts his men in battell, and leads the foreward with Captaine Ars, the battell he giues to Chondion, and the reerward to Alegre.

It is a triuolous ceremony to call a councill, and contemne good aduice, preferring opinions that doe but resemble the truth. And what reason had our men, so far from succours, hauing so many enemies in front, to hazard all vpon a shew of valour? Seeing the discommodity of the way, being barren of water, and the exceeding heat, beyond the ordinary of the moneth of May, required rest. But man cannot auoide his fortune, when it approacheth he runs after it. The Duke of Nemours takes the way to Cirignole, sending some troops before to seize vpon the place: but the Spaniards being armed first, lodged in certaine Vineyards, & entrenched their lodging with a large ditch. The French arising (not able to iudge whether those they did see before them, were all, or a part of the Spanish army), for that the light horse led by Fabrizio Colonne, the Lannces of the men at armes, and the fennell stakes which were very high in the Country, took from them all knowledge: did assaile the enemy with great fury. But the smoke and dust which the Spanish Cannon raised in the ayre, blinded our men, who could not come to handy blowes by reason of the enemies trench. The Viceroy seeking to force them by another way, is slaine with a Harquebuse, extinguishing in him the name and familie of the Earles of Armagnac, and daunting the courage of the whole army, the which by the death of their Commander presently fled, being fauoured by the approaching night whose darkenes couered their retreat) preferring some from death, & others from prison. A Chandion (otherwise called Chandénier, a Gentleman of Poitou, neere vnto Niort) was likewise slaine fighting at the same ditch: & Ars seeing the most part of his men slaine, and that d'Aligre had fulfilled the Viceroyes prediction, cursing the wilfulness of the man, who by his contumacy, at an vnseasonable time, had made a shamefull breach in the honour of the French nation, and diuerted the Viceroy from the true meanes to make war: in the end he saues himselfe in Venouise. Aligre running vp and downe, gathers vp the peeces of this shipwrack, with the Prince of Salerne, and many Barons of the country, whildest that Gonsalues, following his good fortune, tooke his way to Naples: at whose approach the French shut themselves vp into the new Castle: and the Neapolitanes the fourteenth of May, receiued Gonsalues, vpon condition to maintaine them in their rights, and priuileges. Auersa and Capoua were as light in their change.

But what vrgent necessity thrust our men to this hazard? They had strong places enough to maintaine themselves foure or five moneths, during the which either some notable succours, or the approaching winter, might breede some alteration. Out of doubt the impatiency of the French (who cannot temporize) was the cause of this last losse of the realme of Naples, rather then any necessity that forced them: yet Leuis of Armagnac had equalled the reputation of the brauest Captaines that had beene long before him. When as good Commanders haue managed an vsfortunate war, wee must iudge modestly of the issue of humane forces, and confesse that they haue done their duties: & that others might haue encountered the like difficulties; and raise our considerations higher, to him that placeth and displaceth Kings from their thrones, as it best pleaseth his diuine providence. The King resolued to send two mightie Armies, one by sea, and another by land, to saue the Castles of Naples, Caiete, and some other places, which yet held good: and to invade Spaine with two other armies, the one in the Countie of Roussillon, which ioynes to the Mediterranean sea; the other towards Fontarabie, and other places lying vpon the Ocean: and at the same instant, with an army at sea to invade the Coast of Catalognia and Valencia. But whildest these were preparing, Gonsalues battered the Cittadell, and Peter of Naurre made a myne, where hauing giuen fire, the violence of the powder made a breach, by the which the Spaniards (attending in battell the issue of this Stratagem) enter some by the breach of the wall, some by scallado. On the other side, the French issuing out of the new Castle, to expell them the Cittadell, the Spaniards turne head, and repelling our men towards the rauenin, they enter pell-mell with them: and aduancing with the same fury to the gate, they force the French to yeeld them the Castle. Very happily for the enemy, for the next day there arised from Genoua, to succour them, six great ships, and many other barks, laden with victuall, armes, munition, and two thousand foot. But this was physicke after death, and the worke being ended, this army retires towards Caiete. The Castle de l'Ono was taken by the like myne.

The French enioy Caiete yet, with other places thereabouts, and in Abruzzo, Aquila, the Rock of Euander, Rossane, Matalone, with many other places belonging to the Barons of the Angueuin faction: and Leuis of Ars, being with the Prince of Melis (worthy doubleesse of our history, seeing that Gonsalues, hauing offered to leaue him his state absolute, if he would ioine with the Spanish faction, he chose rather to depart with his wife and children) being fortified in Venouise, hauing surprisid and vanquished Valentine Benauides with some Spanish troops, he annoyed the whole countrey. The conclusion of this war consisted in the keeping or losse of Caiete: hauing a very convenient haven for Ships that came from Genoua or Prouence. Gonsalues therefore bends his forces thither. But Aligre hauing drawne forth foure hundred Lances, and foure thousand foot, preferred at the battell, the which he had lodged in Pendi, Iri, Tracette, the son Guillanne and elle-where, enters into Caiete, abandoning the other places to the victors discretion, to saue that which did most import: who hauing battered the wall, made a breach, & receiued great losse at two assaults, hauing intelligence of the arriual of the Marquis of Saluce (made Viceroy by the King in the D. of Nemours place) with six great Genoa Carackes, six other ships, and seuen Gallies, followed by others, carying a 1000 foot of the Ile of Crofica, and three thousand Gascons, he retires his men to Naples wel diminished with skirmishes, assaults, & with his retreat; amongst others, of Sanchio, Armentell, Alphonso Lopes, John Liteffan a Germane: but about all Gonsalues grieved for Don Hugues of Cardone.

A Cardone and Rodericke Mairigue slaine with a Cannon shot. These finall good haps were crowned by taking of the fort of Euander, Aquila, and all other places of Abruzzo, the which drew all Calabria to the Spanish obedience. The King in the meane time sent 7000 foot, and eight hundred men at armes, commanded with the title of general, by the Lord of Tremouille (who then by common consent was held one of the chiefe for martiall affairs: but surprized by sicknesse at Parma, he gaue the charge thereof to Francis of Gonzague Marquis of Mantoua) and eight thousand Suiſſes, to the which the Florentines did adde two hundred Lances: the Duke of Ferrara, the Bolognois and Gonzagua a hundred men at armes, and the Siennois a hundred more: the which being ioyned with those troopes that were in Caiete, made about the number of a thousand eight hundred lances, French and Italian, and aboute eighteenth thousand foot, besides the army at sea, wherein were great forces. For the passage of this army by land, the King desired to be satisfied of the Popes intention, and of the Valentinois; for the Pope (who made an ordinary traffick of other mens losse and calamity) signified, that as a common father (said he) to both parties, he would remaine a newter, suffering either of them to leaue troops indifferently in the territories of the Church, hee granted free passage to the said army. And the Valentinois offered the King to ioine vnto his army six hundred men at armes, and two thousand foot, but some letters intercepted from the Valentinois to Gonsalues, discovered the very bottom of his thoughts, capitulating, that Gonsalues hauing taken Caiete, and consequently all the Realme of Naples, the Valentinois should seize vpon Pisa, and then ioyning their forces they should invade Tuscanie. But as the Pope and his Borgia would serue two masters, and the King pressing them vehemently to declare their minds plainly, beheld a strange Catastrophe of the Popes Tragedy. The Pope and Borgia had before time poisoned the Cardinals of Saint Angelo, of Capoua, of Modena, Vrsin, and many other rich men, whom commonly by their death they did rob of their goods. They had likewise sworne the death of Adrian Cardinal of Cornere. They were to sup coolely in an arbor in a garden belonging vnto Adrian: and for the effecting of their designe, the Valentinois had sent before some flagons of poisoned wine, whereof he gaue the charge to a groom that was ignorant of the businesse, with expresse commandement, that no man should touch them. It chanced that the Pope comming before the cloth was layd, distempered with heat and thirst, called for wine.

The taster, thinking this flaggon had been especially recommended for the Popes own mouth and his sons, filled of this wine to the Pope; And as he was drinking, the Duke of Valentinois comes, to whom (being desirous to drinke) they gaue of the same flaggon. Thus Pope Alexander the sixth, dyed the next day, the 18 of August: whose immoderate ambition, vn-restrained arrogancy, detestable trechery, horrible cruelty, vnmeasurable couerousnesse, selling both holy and profane things, had infected all the world, verifying in his person: That the wicked man labours to bring forth out of rage, but he shall bring forth that which shall deccine him: he had made a pit, and is fallen in it. And, The Vernall God searcheth out murderers and remembers them. The Valentinois, through the vigor of his youth, and speedy counter-poisons, (being put into the belly of a moyle newly killed) prolonged his daies, to feele many deaths in his soule not dying so soone.

He had often tore scene all accidents that might hap vnto him by the death of his father, and provided remedies for them all: but he reckoned without his host, not supposing to see his father dead, and himselfe at the same instant in extreme danger of death. And whereas he did alwaies presume after his fathers deceale, partly by the feare of his forces, partly with the fauour of the Spanish Cardinals, which were eleuen, to cause a Pope to be chosen at his pleasure, he is now forced to apply his Councils to the present necessity. And imagining, that he should hardly at one instant withstand the hatred of the Colonois and Vrsins, if they were ioynly banded against him: hee resolved to trust them rather whom he had onely wronged in their estates. So restoring to them their lands and possessions, he presently reconciles himselfe with the Colonois, and others of their faction, who by the comming of Prosper Colonne to Rome, had already filled all the City with ieaousies and tumults: some fearing lest this reconciliation should draw the Valentinois to the Spanish party: others apprehending the comming of the French army. Moreover, the Vrsins assembled all their partisans, and thursting after the Valentinois blood, sought to reuenge the outrages which all their family had sustained. So as in haue tered of the deceased Pope and his sonne, they burne the shops and houses of some Spanish Merchants and Courtiers at Mont-Jordan. All the other Barons in the dominions of the Church, by their meanes, returne to their lands and goods.

The French returne to Citade Castello. John Paul Bailon chased from before Perugia at the first siege, returns, and by a furious assault takes it. The towne of Plombin receives her first Lord. The Duke of Vimin, the Lord of Pescara, Camerin, and Singalga are established in their possessions. The Venetians assemble many men at Ravenna, and give cause of suspect to invade Romagna, which onely remained under the Valentinois command, desiring rather to serve one onely and a mighty Lord, then to have a particular Lord in every Towne. Notwithstanding all these disgraces, yet both the French and the Spaniard made great instance, to entertaine him, or to winne him to the party: the French, for that he might (being armed) crosse their passage into Italy, if hee discovered himselfe in favour of the Spaniard, and molest them in the estate of Naples: the Spaniard, for they desired to make use of his forces, and to get (by this meanes) the suffrages of the Spanish Cardinal for the election of a future Pope. But the French army approached Rome, and the King might hurt or helpe him more then the Spaniard, both within Rome, and his other Estates. He therefore passed this accord the first of September, the Cardinal of Saint Severin, and the Lord of Trans, Ambassadour, vndertaking for the King, To ayde the King with his forces in the warre of Naples, and in any other enterprise against all men, except the Church. And his said Agents bound his Majesty, as well to protect the person of the Valentinois, as all the Estates which he possessed, and to ayde him to recover those which hee had lost.

The Cardinal of Amboise upon the first newes of Alexanders death, posts thither, to labour for the Popedom, building chiefly upon Cardinal Ascanius promises: whom two yeares before hee had drawne out of the Tower of Bourges. But so many ambitious braines, fraught rather with diuisions and partialities, every one for his owne private interest, then assisted with the holy Spirit, to whom notwithstanding they give the first voice of their election, did in due frustrate both the French and Spaniard, to install Francis Piccolomini, Cardinal of Sienna, being old, weak, and sickly: to the which the whole Colledge agreed both for that this neutral election might disperse the diuers pursuits of the contending nations: as also, for that the new Popes infirmities gave them hope to proceed shortly to the subrogation of another. To reuise the memory of Pius the second his vncle, who had made him Cardinal, he was called Pius the third.

Yet this election did noe pacifie the troubles within Rome. The Valentinois and the Vrsins being within the walles, fortifie themselves daily with new companies, resolved to obtaine by force, the Iustice which their reasonable demands could not get of the Colledge of Cardinals, when as their partisans should be ariued. This contention did greatly trouble both the Court and the people of Rome, and did mightily preiudice the French affaires: for this vehement affection, wherewith they see the Valentinois supported by France, drew the Vrsins to the Spaniards pay, whose forces were of no small consequence for an absolute victory. But the desire the Venetians had to see the King disappointed of the Realme of Naples, and the liberty they gave the Vrsins to leave their pay, made the world to iudge, that either they had perswaded this family to the Spanish party, or at the least they had consented therunto. And this was another cause of discontent, to be reuenged of them in time.

The Vrsins being intreated by the Spaniard, and reconciled with the Colonnois, by the mediation of the Ambassadours of Spaine and Venice, and ioyntly retolued for a common reuenge upon the Valentinois, they fall upon his troops in the Suburbs: the which (being vnable to withstand so furious a charge) were forced to give way vnto their violence, and the Commander to fuel himselfe in the Castle Saint Angelo, hauing likewise with the Popes consent taken the Captaines oath, to depart when he pleased. The tumult being thus pacified, it gave them free liberty to attend a new election: for Pius nothing desiring their continued hope, of his short Popedom, dyed the 26 day after his creation. But alas! Alexander had serued but as a scourge for that great Iudge; but now he takes his rod in hand, to break Italy in peeces. The Cardinal S. Pietro, mighty in friends, in reputation and in wealth, was chosen, the last of October, and named Julius the second: by name factious, and terrible, vnquiet and turbulent: but stately, a great defender

The Vrsins and Colonnois, reconciled by the mediation of the Ambassadours of Spaine and Venice.

Julius the second, chosen Pope.

A defender of the liberties of the Church, and a most franke receiuer of the loue and fauour of all those that might aduance him to this dignity.

The Valentinois flight to the Castle of Saint Angelo, and the dispersing of all the troops he had with him, made the Townes of Romagna (which had till then continued constant and firme in his obedience) to call home their ancient Lords, or to embrace sundry parties. And the Venetians, good fishermen in a troubled water, alpiring to the command of all Romagna, had seized upon the Castles of the valley of Lamone, of the towne of Forlimpopole, of Rimini, Faenza, Montefiore, S. Archangelo, Verruque, Gattiere, Saugnagne, Meldolese: in the territory of Imola, Tossignagne, Sotaroiole, Montebate: and had easily seized upon Imola and Furli, if by the new Popes complaints (whom they had strangely discontented) they had not put their men into garison. The Venetians vsurpations did wonderfully displease Julius: but what could he doe, being newly advanced to the chaire, vnprovided of forces, of money, or of any hope of succours from the Kings of France and Spaine, being not yet resolved whole enignes to follow? To retaine (in fauour of the Church) some places which the Valentinois yet held, and to oppose him in some sort against the Venetians (although he loued the Valentinois heeles better then his face) he agrees with him, that he should goe to Ferrara and Imola, to recleue such forces as he could leaue. But he is no sooner parted, but a new desire of command suggests, that it should be good the Valentinois should deliuer vnto him such Castles and places as he commanded, to the end the Venetians should not invade them in his absence. And to this end he sends vnto him the Cardinals of Volterre and Surenne. Upon the Valentinois refusal, the Pope being offended, sends to arrest the Gallies, wher-in he had embarked at Ostia, and caused him to be brought from Magliana to Vatican, honoured and much made of, but safely guarded. Thus you see the Valentinois power reduced to nothing, spoiled in a manner of all he had vsurped, his troops stript by the Florentinois, and himselfe at this instant so well watched as he could not goe the length of himselfe. But let vs see what becomes of so many great and goodly designes of our Lewis. He intends not onely to recouer his losses in the realme of Naples, but also with one breath to crosse the affaires of Ferdinand in Spaine.

The Valentinois a prisoner.

The Lord of Albret, and Marshall of Gié, marched towards Fontaraby, with foure hundred Lances, among the which Peter of Foix Lord of Lautrec, and the Lord of Lescun, so famous in our historie, made first shew of their vertues, and five thousand foot, Gascons and Suisses. And to make warre in the countie of Rouffillon, was sent the Marshall of Rieux, accompanied with Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, by the death of Lewis of Armagnac, the Vicounts of Paulin and Bruniquet, the Earle of Carmain, the Lords of Montaur, Terride, and Negrepelisse, leading eight hundred men at armes, and eight thousand foot, French, Gascons, and Suisses. And at the same instant an army was ready at Sea to invade the Coast of Catalonia, and the realme of Valentia: but he that overgripes himselfe holds little: these were but shewes without effect. For the Lord of Albret being entred into the Prouince of Guiscolcoa, whether that the enemies forces were greater then his, or fearing lest the Castilian should be reuenged of the King of Nauarre his sonne, he retired and went into Languedoc, to the Marshall of Rieux, to besiege Saules with their ioynt forces.

But the King of Spain, hauing assembled a great army at Pargipan from all his realms, and marching in person with a resolution to raise the siege by some notable stratagem: our men finding themselves too weak, retired to Narbonne; with a successe contrary to the Lord of Albons, in the yeare 1496. And the Spaniards after some roads and spoiling on this side the mountaines, content to haue repelled the enemy, concluded a truce for five moneths, mediated by Fredericke: (whom Ferdinand King of Arragon and Castile, sed with hope to restore him to his throne) and Queene Anne moued our Lewis therunto, onely in regard of that which concerned the affaires of France.

A truce betwixt Spaine and France.

By this truce, the thoughts and forces of these two Kings are conuerted to the warres of Naples. The French army hauing passed the territories of Valmontone, and of the Colonnois, marched through the possessions of the Church, with an intent to take the Castle of Seque. Here our men receiued their first affront, Seque well affailed, was well defended, causing our men to retire: who despairing to win Saint Germaine, take their way by the Sea Coast. But the question was how to passe Garillon, which was not to be waded through at that season. Gonsalve was encamped on the other side: our French by reason of their Cannon, win the passage of the river, make a bridge thereon, and adventure to passe. The Spaniards repulse them, even to the middle of the bridge, and by the fury of their shot, force them to goe to land, having lost five hundred men, French and Suisses, and some hundred drowned: the enemy two hundred, and Fabius the sonne of Paul Virginius, a young man and of great hope.

It is a matter of dangerous consequence, to attempt to passe a river in the face of a mighty army, and commanded by a discreet Captain, if they be not well fortified with trenches. This second disgrace encouraged the Spaniard, terrified our French, and made them lose all future hope. Doubtlesse the most important part of an army, is a good Commander, and commonly few do willingly vndergoe the command of a stranger; if he be not especially favoured by the heavens, and hath won great credit, and given great testimonies of his valour. Herein the Spaniards did exceed them: and this defect in the French armie, had bred great contempt of their General: and more confusion than concord among the Captaines. So as the Marquess of Maxoura Lieutenant for the King, either thinking himselfe unfit to gouerne a great army, or (as Sandricourt charged him) carrying away with him the Italian forces, that the French might bee so much the weaker, or for that having received this double repulse, hee would no farther engage his honour, parted from the army, laying all the fault vpon the contumacie of the French.

All difficulties conspired their ruine, the hard season of the winter, the situation of the moorish Country, the continuall raine and snow, want of pay, the impatience of the royales of war, and moreover the great sufferance of the enemy, who fortified with a deep ditch, and two battions in the Front of the enemies army, continually guarded the passage, whilst that our men wasted themselves with fruitlesse attempts, and by their unreasonable stay, the which quailed as much the heat of their courage, as the courtesie of their Victuallers, the ordinary theft of the Treasurers, the dissention of Captaines, and the disobedience of souldiers, vsual in troops, wanting a vigilant Commander, and of authority, and the increase of ordinary diseases did hurt them. Being inuironed with these difficulties, the enemy hath a new supply by Bartholomew of Aluiano with the rest of the Virgins. And Gonsalve finding himselfe to haue nine hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, and nine thousand Spanish foot, advertised moreover of the disorders and continuall decay of our army, the which being stronger in chueallery then in footmen, those being cut in peeces which they had lately left at Castle Guillaume, were so dispersed as their lodging contained ten miles in circuit; a grosse error of the Marquis of Saluce, having an enemy in front, who could well embrace all advantages: he secretly casts a bridge ouer the Garillon, foure miles about that which our men had made at the passage of Suie, where the French kept no guard: he passeth the 27 of December in the night, and possideth Suie. The Marquis vnderstanding that the Spaniard did passe, riseth suddenly, breakes his bridge, and causeth the army to march towards Caiete, Gonsalve E hinders his passage by Prosper Colonne, and the light horsemen: that being molested by them they should be enforced to march the more slowly: he ouertakes them right against Scandi, and stues them with continuall skirmishes, vntill that Gonsalve comes vpon the rereward of them. An army that retires with feare, receiues the first stroke of death when they are skirmished with. Our French were driuen to the passage of the bridge which is before the Mole of Caiete, & whilst the Viceroy layed there to giue the Cannon time to passe, the battell and rereward of the Spaniards arriue. Bernardine Adorne, the Lords of Cramont and Saint Colombe, with some Coynets of French and Italians, make it good a long time, and fauour the retreat of the foot, vntill that by the death of Adorne and many others, with the wounding of S. Colombe, the rest of these horsemen seeing the troops to haue gotten some ground, doe likewise take their way to Caiete, alwayes beaten behinde, even vnto the head of two waies, whereof the one leads to Ieri, and the other to Caiete. Here all disband, those which are best mounted saue themselves: the slowest, the wounded, the sicke, the Cannon, and the munition, remaine at the victors deuotion. At the same time Fabrizia Colonne (having passed the river with five hundred horse and a thousand foot) spoiled the companies of Lodowike of Mirandolli, Alexander of Triuice, Peter of Medicis (who followed the French army) retiring by Sea to

The Marquis of Maxoura General of the French, ouercometh the charge of the army.

The French defeated quire.

A to Caiete with many Gentlemen, and foure peeces of artillery, their barke ouer-taken with a storme in the mouth of the river was swallowed vp in the waues, and all in it drowned. Gonsalve knew well, that so great a multitude of men being retired into Caiete, would breed a sudden famine, and soone yeeld him the Towne; Hee besieged it, and our men not able to dispose themselves, to endure the tediousnesse of a doubtfull expectation of succours, made the first day of the year, one thousand five hundred and foure, famous by this accord with him: To depart with liues and goods out of the Realme of Naples, either by land or by sea, and that the Lord of Aubigni, and all other prisoners, should be deliuered on either side.

B So our French are againe dispossessed of the estate of Naples, and exposed to cold, hunger, and to a long and painful retreat, that although of so great an army, few were slaine by the enemies sword, yet the most part of them which departed after this capitulation, found their graues in hospitalls, market places and streets: and of such as tooke their way by sea, few suruiued the extreame discommodities which they had endured: amongst others, the Marquis of Saluce, Sandricourt and many Gentlemen of marke. It were better to fore-see all these difficulties, before we part from our houses, then to goe so farre to seeke our graues. Captain Bayard returned, admired greatly even by Gonsalve himselfe, having purchased great glory and reputation amongst the French.

C Doubtlesse, besides the discord and bad gouernement of Captaines, the sharpnesse of the time, and impatience of our men in military labours: two things principally had wrested this victory from the King. The one was the long stay of his army in the territories of Rome for the Popes death, so as winter came, and Gonsalve had leisure to practise with the Virgins before this army entred the realme. The other was the treacherous couetousnesse and theft of the Commissaries and Treasurers, who commonly empty the Kings coffers to fill their owne bagges, to the preiudice of the souldiers pay, and the order they should take for victuals. John Herouet Treasurer, condemned of theft, was publicly executed: Alegre Sandricourt and others, were for a time in disgrace with the King. The losse of Naples, the death of so braue a Nobility, the infinite numbers of men slaine in these attempts, had filled the Realme and Court with great heauinesse and mourning, every man cursing the day wherein that miserable desire to purchase new estates in Italy, had first entred into the hearts of our Kings of France. The King seeing well how much his reputation would bee blemished with strangers, and how much the losse of so flourishing an army, would weaken his forces, was not without feare: either that Maximilian would alter something in the state of Milan; or that Gonsalve (following his course) would employ his victorious army to the subuersion of the said duchy: and those which followed the French party in Italy, feared, lest in his way he should alter the estate of Tuscane. Without doubt it was likely, that the King, wanting money, weak of men, and the French daunted in courage, and without any desire to repaile the Alpes, would without any resistance, haue giuen place to the victors violence. But Gonsalve content with the surname of Great Captain, which the Spanish boasting had giuen him, restrained his desires within the limits of this happy victory. True it is, that many extremities kept him backe. Hee did owe much vnto his army, who made great instance to be paid, and put into garisons. Moreover, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, to lead his Army out of the Realme, from whence the enemy was not yet fully expelled. But that which stayed the course of his prosperities, was a dangerous sicknesse, so as hee could not execute any enterprise in person: hee sent Bartholomew of Aluiano, against Lewis of Ars, who during the stay of the army vpon the bankes of Garillon, had seized vpon Troy and Saint Seuer, and had put all Apulia into armes.

F This stay of Gonsalve, held the rest of Italy rather in ieaousie, then any way troubled it. And the Pope (forbearing yet to discover his designs,) laboured to get the possession of such Castles as the Valentinoi held at Furlie, Celene and Bertinoire. The Valentinoi was content for Celene: but the Pope hauing sent Don Pedro d'Oniedo a Spaniard, to receiue it in his name, the Capitaine of the place holding the composition of no force, (for that the Valentinoi was a prisoner,) caused him to be hanged. So as the Pope despairing to get it without his liberty, agrees with him. That hee should bee put into the Castle of Ostia, with commandement to the Cardinall of Saint Croix to enlarge him, him, when he had consigned the said Castles. This consignment made, the Valentinois escapes with the Cardinals permission, and retires to Naples, from whence Gonsalve sent him afterwards to Ferdinand his King, who confined him prisoner to the Castle of Medina del Campo. An act in truth unworthy the sincerity of a great Prince, but most worthy of this Duke, who not satisfied with the wickedness he had formerly done, desired a new, to trouble other mens estates, and to sow diffentions throughout all Italy. A prison which did greatly comfort all Romagna, being freed from the evil spirit, which so tormented it.

A common necessity is usually the mother of a peace, or truce betwixt Princes, thus have long tormented one another. Behold the Kings of France and Spain, both weary of war, conclude a truce. Lewis bought it, and Ferdinand accepts it willingly, thinking by this means to confirm his new conquests, with more safety, upon condition: That it should be lawful for the subjects of either party, to trafficke throughout all their Realmes and dominions, except at Naples. The Kings of Spain have alwaies treated upon advantage with our Kings. Gonsalve doth cunningly make his profit of this clause, placing upon the frontiers of those places, which the French did yet possesse, (as Rosene in Calabria, Otranto in the land of Otranto, Venouse, Conseruan, and the Castle of Mont in Apulia) guards to watch that no man living should converse in any place that was held by the Spaniard. The which brought the inhabitants to so great a fright, as resolving to yeeld to the enemy, Lewis of Aris, was forced to retire into France.

But what avails it to auoyde one danger, and fall into another? Wee haue not yet breathed from our trauels past, and see, wee now study on new iarres and confusions. In truth the estate of this world is like a chesse-board, where Princes with a vari. ble change, play most couetous games, sometimes with losse, sometimes with gaine: and oft-times (treating with men in whom there is no trust) they fall out of one mischief into a greater incontinencie. At the same time, Ambassadors being come from Maximilian and Philip, to confirme that which had bene proposed, by the coming of the Bishop of Cifferson, and the Marquis of Final, fell expressly by the Pope for that businesse: this peace was in the end concluded: "That the mariage of Claude the Kings daughter, with Charles the Arch. Dukes eldest sonne, should take effect: that all the former inuestitures of the Duchy of Milan being disanulled, Maximilian should grant the inuestiture vnto the King, for himselfe and his heires males: and for want of males, should giue it in fauour of the mariage of Claude and Charles: and if Charles should die before the consummation of the said mariage, to Claude and the Arch. dukes yongest son, in case he married with her: for which possession the King should pay vnto Maximilian, vpon dispatch of the letters patentes, threecore thousand florins of the Rhin, and threecore thousand more within sixe months after, and euery yeare, on the birth day of our Lord God, a paire of purres of gold.

All these Princes were wonderfully incensed against the Venetians, by reason of the vsurpations made by them in their estates. They make a League for their common defence, and to offend the Venerians, meaning to pull from them what they had vsurped. And for that the promises which Maximilian had vainly giuen to Lodowike Sforze, were the cause to hasten his ruine: hee was a meanes the King should let him at libertie, and giue him some good pension to liue withall in France. But this was a short comfort for Lodowike, whose turbulent spirit would haue praetised some alteration. This capitulation being so profitable to all these Princes, the Pope being comprehended therein, it was likely it should hold. But there must be stronger bands to tie it: that is, a reciprocalall love, without the which all treaties are fruitlesse. The end of this yeare is famous by the death of Fredericke, sometimes King of Naples, who was deprived of all his vaing hopes to recover his Realm of Naples, by the accord of these two Kings, and by that of Isabel Queen of Castile, a vertuous Princeesse, noble, wife, and beloved of her subjects.

The yeare following disposed the two Kings and the Potentates of Italy, to lay aside arms: Ferdinand of Arragon hauing new designs, and foreseeing that by the death of his wife, Philip his sonne in law would challenge the Crowne of Castile, (as hauing married the inheretrix of the said Realme) desired onely to preserve the Realme of Naples; by meanes of the capitulation lately made. Our Lewis was not altogether freed from doubt, for that Maximilian delayed (according to his vsuall tediousnesse) to raise the peace;

A peace. The Pope desired innouation, but his forces were too weak without the support of some mighty Prince. The last League had put the Venetians in alarme, hauing thereby three mighty enemies against them. To pacifie the nearest, they offer vnto the Pope to restore all they had vsurped, except Favosa, Rimini, and their appurtenances. And the Pope knowing, that the Emperours warre against the Elector Palatin, would hinder his passage into Italy, ioyntly with the King, for that yeare, accepted the obedience the Venetians offered him, in regard of the said places, without making them any shew of a more mild and tractable disposition. The King (for the accomplishment of that which had been treated of) sent the Cardinall of Amboise to Hagenau a towne of Alsacia (newly taken from the Count Palatin) where the Emperor did solemnly sweare, and proclaim the articles agreed vpon, according to the which, the Cardinall payed halfe the money, promised for the inuestiture of Milan.

During this ratification, there grows new seeds of diffention in Italy. The Cardinall Ascanus, brother to Lodowike Sforze, treated with the Ambassador of Venice at Rome, and had also (according to the common opinion) some secret intelligence with Gonsalve. It was in shew to invade the Duchy of Milan, the which they knew to be vnfirm of French soldiers: the people inclining again to the name of Sforze: and (that which made them the more bold,) the King being surprisid with so dangerous a sicknesse as the Physicians depaying of his health, the Queene prepared to send all her jewels into Britany; if the Marshall of Gie had not placed men upon the way to stay them: for the which, the king afterwards was as well pleased, as the Queen, by her dislike, fought to bring him in disgrace. Doubtlesse the people should oft times suffer much, if their counsels were not staid by the providence of God. The King recouers his health, and the Cardinall Ascanus dies suddenly of the plague, at Rome, interring with him the designs of Milan.

The King is freed of one danger. And as God by meanes vnknowne to men, doth change great stormes into calme sun-thines: our Lewis, who till then had the greatnesse of the Archduke Philip in iealousie, fearing to make him his enemy, hee findes now that the death of Isabel of Castile doth free him of his feare: for that the Archduke (reiecing the testament of his mother in law) deuised to take the government of the Realme of Castile from Ferdinand his father in law, the which could not bee done but by their common quarrels, and the weakening of their forces, the King (remaining betwixt both, free from troubles,) should thereby fortifie himselfe, with men, money & munition, for the aduancing of his designs. And the Arragonois, on the other side (forced to seek a support against his son in law, desiring a peace with the king, he obtains it, by the mariage of him and Germaine, sister to Gaston of Foix daughter to his Maiesties sister, upon condition, that the King should giue her in dowry that part of the Realmes of Naples which belonged vnto him: the king of Arragon binding himselfe to pay him within ten years 700000 ducats for the charges past: and to indow his new spouse, with 300000 ducats. Which dowry Germaine dying in mariage without children, should reuiewe to Ferdinand: but if he died first, it should go to the Crowne of France. A happy conclusion both of a peace, and of the yeare, if it could haue entertained long betwixt these two Princes: But it shall be soon broken, and alwaies our peace with the Spaniards hath been full of discord.

Let vs now open the Springs of new warres. The Pope had without the Kings priuiey giuen all the benefices that were fallen voyde in the Duchy of Milan by the death of Cardinall Ascanus and other Clergy men. Moreover, in the creation of many Cardinalls, he had refused to admit into the Society the Bishop of Auch, Nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise, and the Bishop of Baiex Nephew to the Lord of Tremouille. And moreover, he had armed some galleies, to be in a readinesse (as some gaue out) to free Gonsalve from the government of the French, in case the King died, as some feared, and others did hope. All these considerations, together with the Kings discontent, seemed to breed some diffention with the Pope: yet his friendship was profitable for the King in the warre hee pretended against the Venetians, against whom he knew the Pope to bee ill affected, for that desire hee had to recover the towne of Romagna. He therefore sent the Bishop of Cifferson his Nuncio into France, to propound vnto him many offers, and designs, for the execution of this common enterprize. Moreover, the Pope seeing himselfe as it were forced at the Kings instance, to prolong the Cardinall of Amboise his legation in France, and for iealousie he had that this Cardinall aspired by all meanes to the Popedom, hee could not resolute to ioyne in all points with the King. But he knew moreover, that being divided from his Maieſty, his counſells could not ſucceed happily : in the end they treated new amity and league together, and to make the King the better affected, he gives a Cardinalſſ hatt to either of the forenamed Biſhops, and power vnto the King to diſpoſe of all benefices within the Duchy of Milan.

The more the King confirmed himſelfe in the Popes alliance, the more he loathed that of Maximilian and of Philip his ſonne : the paſſage which he pretended into Italy with a mighty army to receiue his Imperiall Crowne, and to cauſe his ſonne to bee choſen King of Romans, being greatly ſuſpected vnto the King : and the greatneſſe of Philip (who by capitulation had lent his Father in law Ferdinand backe into Arragon) hauing already ſo apparently eſtranged the Kings loue from him, as he gaue Claude his daughter in marriage to Francis Earle of Angoulême (the next heire to this Crowne, after the Kings deceaſe without heires males) at the ſute and ſupplication of all the Parliaments of his Realme. The which ſerued for an excuſe to Philip. And the more to diuert Maximilians paſſage into Italy, the King lent men to ſcourge the Duke of Gueldres (a great enemy to Philip) proſperity) and to moleſt his Prouinces of the Low Countries in his abſence. As theſe things paſſed, the Pope (burning with deſire to reſtore vnto the obediēce of the Church, all ſuch places as had bene taken away) intreated the King (according to their agreement) to ayde him in the recovery of Perugia and Bologna. This requeſt was very pleaſing vnto the King; it was a meanes to tie the Pope, whom they had in ſome ſort loue in Court, to haue bene priuie to ſome practice, which Ottavian Fregos had made to diſpoſſeſſe the King of the Seigneury of Genoua. Moreover, Bentinole Lord of Bologna, ſeemed more affected to Maximilian then to him : and John Paul Bailion, then ſuror of Perugia, was in diſgrace with the King, hauing reſuſed to ioyne with his army, when it was vpon the Garilan.

Notwithſtanding the proteſtation which the Venetians made vnto the King, to take armes for the defence of Bologna, if the Pope did not firſt make them grant of the right of Faenza belonging to the Church, did ſome what diuert him, referring the execution to another time. Yet the Pope (being vehement and peremptory by nature) goes out of Rome with 500 men at armes, and gives notice of his coming to the Bolognois, commanding them to prepare to receiue him, and to lodge 500 French lances in their Country, whereof he had yet no aſſurance. Then Bailion fearing his coming, goes to meet the Pope, and deliuer him the ſorts of Perugia and Perouſin. In the end, by the perſwaſion of the Cardinal of Amboiſe, the king commanded Charles of Amboiſe Lord of Chaumont, to aſſiſt the Pope in perſon with 500 Lances, and 3000 foot, amongſt which were Gaſton of Foix the Kings nephew, and Duke Nemours, Peter of Foix Lord of Lauree, his couſin, the Lord of Palſſe and others. Bentinole and his children amazed at this ſudden arriuall, beſeech Chaumont to be a mediator, and to procure them ſome tolerable conditions, who dealing with the Pope, obtained leave to depart ſafely out of Bologna, to remaine in what part he pleaſed of the Duchy of Milan, to ſell and cary away all his mouables, and to enioy the reuenues they poſſeſſed by any iuſt title, without any moleſtation. Thus Bologna returned to the obediēce of the Church, and the Pope hauing given the Duke of Nemours a ſword enriched with precious ſtones, amongſt which there was one Diamond of inſeſtimable value, 8000 Ducats to Chaumont and 10000 for his men: he conquered all his thoughts to annoy the Venetians. At this time died Philip the Archduke, of a feuer, within few daies in the city of Bruges, young of yeers, ſtrong and healthfull of body, leauing an heire (the ſecond ſourge of the French Monarchy) who within few yeeres ſhall moue vpon the Theater of our Hiſtory, to as many & diuers tragicall parts. And the Duke of Valencinois, to ſiſt in the laſt part of his tragedy, hauing ſlipped downe with a cord from the ſtore of Medina del Campo, and fought for refuge with John of Albrer King of Nauarre, brother to his wife, was in the end ſlain before Vitau, fighting for his heeſter in law: 200 honorable dead for ſuch a tyrant.

Chaumont was no ſooner returned, but there ſprung vp a new ſeaſon to employ his forces : the Genouois taking occaſion, not of any deſire they had to rebell, but only of ciuill diſcords betwixt the people and the Nobles (the which doe often tranſpire into beyond their firſt reſolutions) did ſacke the Nobles houſes, and tumultuouſly created a new Magiſtracy of eight popular men, whom to authoriſe them the moſt chiefe ſorted

Tribunes

A Tribunes of the people : they ſeized by force vpon Spetie, and ſome other townes lying vpon the Eaſterne riuer. The Lord of Rauaſein being abſent, flies ſpeedily to Genoua, with a hundred and fifty horſe, and ſeuē hundred foot. The King had ſent vnto them Michel Riccio, a Doctour, baniſhed from Naples, to perſwade rather to ſeeke rather the mildneſſe of his mercy, then to try the rigour of his forces. But a mutinous people is like vnto a wilde horſe, which runs furiously, vntill ſome downefall ſlay him : for in ſtead of giuing care to his counſell, they goe to beſiege Monaco, lying vpon the ſea, in a commodious place, and of great importance for the City of Genoua; they create Paul de Noue, a diſt of Silke, Duke of Genoua, beat downe the Kings armes, and ſet vp Maximilians: they take Caſtellar, a Caſtle built about Genoua on the mountaine : and againſt their faith, cut the French mens throats that were in garriſon.

So the King imputing that to the Genouois as a rebellion, which they had done by ciuill diſcord, marched himſelfe in perſon, followed by 800 Lances, 1800 light horſe, 12000 foot : and an army at ſea, conſiſting of eight Gallies, eight Galleons, and many Foits and Brigantines : he raiſeth the ſiege at Monaco, takes the Baſtion which they had built on the top of the mountaine, forceth the Genouois to yeeld to his mercy, diſarmes them : and the 29 of Aprill, enters into Genoua, in complete armor, with his ſword in his hand, vnder a Canopie, accompanied with all his companies of men at armes, and Archers of his Guard : and (at the pittifull cry of the people, demanding mercy of his Maieſtie) hee grants them pardon, paying an hundred thouſand Ducats in ready money, and two hundred thouſand more to be payed at certaine dayes, for the charges of this expedition, and to build a Cittadell. And in token of his abſolute authority, he commanded that the money of Genoua ſhould from that time be coyned with the ſtampe of France : and then he ended all this Tragedy with the death of Demetrius Inſulin, one of the chiefe Tribunes, who by his examination laid open all the practices and hopes the Pope had giuen them : and ſooner after by the death of Paul de Noue the new Duke of Genoua, with threeſcore others, which he put into the hands of the Magiſtrate.

In the meane time the Pope (who found himſelfe ſo ingaged in the rebellion of Genoua) ſeemed diſcontent : he accuſeth the King, that he had perſwaded Bentinole to ſurprize Bologna, meaning to declare himſelfe afterwards an enemy to the Church, and by violence to inſtall the Cardinal of Amboiſe in St. Peters chaire, preſſing the Emperour and the Venetians to make war ioyntly againſt the King. Maximilian had (in a Diet held at Conſtance) got the conſent of the Princes of the Empire therunto : and the King, to prevent this ſtorme, which threatened him from Germany, and to free both the Pope & the Venetians from iealouſie, ſooner after the taking of Genoua, hee diſmiſſed his army, and himſelfe had preſently returned, if the deſire of a parlee with the King of Arragon his nephew had not ſtayed him. Sauone was appointed to that end, where hauing promiſed reſpectively a mutual preſeruation of loue and good intelligence, they treat of the reformation of the Church, by meanes of a holy & free counsell, and to reconcile our Lewis with Maximilian, and they two to aſſiſt the Venetians with their common forces.

Moreover, the Pope had ſent the Cardinal of Sainte Croix, for Legat to Maximilian : and the Venetians, Florentins (whom the King would not receiue into his proteſtation, againſt the paſſage of Maximilian, but with this claue, Excepting the right of the Empire) and all others that depended of themſelues (except the Marquis of Mantoua) had ſent their Agents to this Imperiall Diet of Conſtance, ſome for deſire of innouation, ſome for hope, others for feare. Which things troubled the King : eſpecially the Ambaſſage of the Cardinal of St. Croix, whom he knew to be alwaies deſirous of Maximilians proſperity. In the end, the concluſion of this Diet (the which the Pope attended, wauering betwixt hope & feare, ſometimes deſiring Maximilians coming into Italy, and ſometimes apprehending the memory of ancient quarrels betwixt the Emperours and Popes) was, That they ſhould giue vnto Maximilian to attend him into Italy, 8000 horſe, and 22000 foot, entertained for ſix moneths, and that the companies ſhould bee in field nere vnto Conſtance, by the midſt of October. Vpon this concluſion, Maximilian demands paſſage of the Venetians, through thoſe Countries which they held in Italy. They grant it, ſo as hee come without an army, elſe not. But they excuſe themſelues vpon the neceſſity of the league they haue with the King, and vpon the conditions of the preſent time : yet notwithstanding, except that which they ſhould be forced vnto by vertue of the ſaid alliance,

To prevent all inconueniencies, the King had sent great troopes of horse and foot, towards Milan; and did leaue (with the permission of the Catholike King his nephew) two thousand five hundred Spaniards, five hundred Lances in Bourgongne vnder Tremouille command, foure hundred French Lances, and foure thousand foot, ioinly with the Venetians; to prevent any alteration that might happen towards Trent: and to disfract the Emperors forces into diuers parts, he fauoured the Duke of Gueldres, who molested the Countie of Charles, grand child to Maximilian. And to begin his voyage, Maximilian being come to Trent, caused a proclamation to be publicly made, the third of February: That he was refolued to passe in hostile manner into Italy. And from that time taking the name of King of Romans, tooke vpon him that of chosen Emperor. But this was to brag of mountaines, and to bring forth mole-hills. He goes from Trent with fifteene hundred horse, and foure thousand foot, nor of that number which had beene promised him at Constance, but of the ordinary traine of his Court, and leaued in his owne territories, and the Marquis of Brandebourg with five hundred horse, and two thousand foot. But there was no reason the feruant should be more happy then the master. The Marquis C. returns, hauing only presented himself before Rouere, and demanded in vaine to be lodged within the towne. And Maximilian hindred by many trenches which the Mountainers of Siague had made, retired backe foure daies after his departure. If he had gone backe to take a greater leape, (as the Prouerbe saith) it had beene a good signe, but to turne his backe, it was a disgrace.

Behold an open warre, and the Venetians are nettled with these weak beginnings: but conquests of Villages, are like benefices of Itaw. Maximilian taking the way of Friul, for the commodity of the passage, and the Country being more open, with five thousand men leaued in those marches, hee did runne about forty miles into the Venetian territories: hauing taken certaine villages of small moment (performing the office of a sumptuous Captain; rather than of an Emperour) hee returned towards Iusbruch, to engage some Jewels, and to make prouision of money by some other means, which failing had caused eight thousand Suisses to leaue his pay, whereof five thousand went to the King, and three thousand to the Venetians. And to increase the mischief, Maximilian had left nine thousand Friul and horse at Trence. Bartholmeu of Aluiane (sent by the Venetians to succour Friul) seized vpon the passages of the Valley of Cadore, by which the Germans might saue themselves: he charged them, slew about a thousand, and took all the rest (in a manner) prisoners. So the careful valor of Aluiane made vaine the former exploits of Maximilian.

mer exploits of Maximilian. It is all one to be well or ill beaten. The Venetians put in practice this common saying, and not without some offence to the King, who did not willingly behold the prosperous course of their victories, in regard of his own designs. They were forced to take arms, and before they lay them downe, they take from the Empire Trieste, Portonaro, and Fiume: then pass gth the Alpes, Poissonia. On the other side, the Germane army towards Trente, had put to sword three thousand Venetian foot, set to guard Mount Bretonic. The Bishop of Trente incouraged by this small stratagem, with two thousand foot, and some troopes of horse, went to besiege Rive Trente, a great burgh vpon the Lake of Garde, but as he did batter it, two thousand Grisons, which were in the Germane Campe, fell into a mutiny by reason of their pay, and spoile the victuals of the whole Campe. So all being in disorder without respect of command, and without obedience, the Grisons being gone, all the rest of the army (being about 7000 men) were forced to retire. Thus ended all these great shewes; and Maximilian hauing rashly giuen

A truce betwixt
the Emperor
and Venetians.

A but with more dangerous effects. This was the 20 of April. In corrupt bodies, the remedies we apply to diuert one inconuenience, doe commonly ingender another more dangerous. So the truce (made betwixt Maximilian and the Venetians, wherein they had exceedingly neglected the king) iustified of quiet and rest which they expected, bred more horrible calamities then the former wars. The Venetians fought it by their insolent manner of proceeding. The Emperor studied by what means hee might repaire the infamy and losse he had lately receiued: and now they incensed him more, receiuing Aluian into Venice, in a triumphant manner. And the King found himselfe much wronged, for that presuming to name him in this truce, and to comprehend him as an adherent, they had notwithstanding provided for their owne safety, and left him charged with the cares and troubles of the warre: seeing that in their fauour hee had opposed himselfe against Maximilian, as we haue scene. The Emperor being then so weakely assisted by the forces of the Empire, and finding his owne too feeble, deuised to vntie himselfe with the King against the Venetians, as the only remedy to recouer both his estates and his honor lost. Moreover, this new diffidence reuiued in the King the ancient remembrance of the wrongs hee had receiued by them in the warres of Naples, and since in diuers other accidents: thrust forward with an exceeding desire to wrest out of their hands Verona, Cremona, and many other Townes possessed of long time by the Dukes of Milan. And the Pope crossing them, possessed with that first desire to recouer those places which they vsurped of the Church, taxing them that the banished men of Furl had late dayes, by means of their Senate, sought to enter into the said towne, discontented moreover, that the Venetians had, (in contempt of the authority of the Sea of Rome) giuen the Bishopricke of Vincenza, to a Venetian Gentleman, contrary to the Collation which the Pope had made to his nephew Sixtus, he perswaded the King against them, desiring rather to remaine a neuter in the midst of these contentands, and be a spectator, then to invade. In the end (vnder a colour to treat a peace, betwixt the Archduke Charles, sonne to Philip, and the Duke of Gueldres;) they must meet at Cambray. For the King, came the Cardinal of Amboise: and for the Emperour, Marguerit his daughter Gouvernesse of Flanders, assisted in this treaty by Matthew Langry, a trusty Secretary to the Emperour: and for the King of Arragon, an Ambassador of his. The ninth of December they conclude a peace betwixt their Masters, and a perpetual league against all men, euery one to recouer from the Venetians the places which they had taken from them, and to spoile them of the territories of the Church vsurped by them: whatsoever we treat, the Church must be one, but more with a colour, then any deuotion. The Emperour did solemnely confirme this new league. The Arragonois feared the increase of the King his Vncles greatnesse, and preferred the safety of the Realme of Naples before any thing which the Venetians enioyed: yet dissembling his conceits, he performed all solemnities required. The Pope was more scrupulous: hee had sent his commission, but had not yet consented. Many considerations moued him thereunto: a desire to recouer the Townes of Romagna, and a diffidence against the Venetians. Moreover, hee feared to incense the King, rejecting this affociation: yet he held it a very dangerous thing for him, that the Emperour should extend himselfe in Italy. Thus troubled in minde, hee resoules, for the mildest course, to obtaine a part of his desires by an accord, rather then all by warre. He lesse the Venetians vnderstand, that the storme which threatened them by the vniou of these Princes, would proue farre more tempestuous, if they forced him to giue his consent. That yielding willingly the places they had taken from the Church, it should make him refuse to raise the treaty of Cambray, made in his name, but without his approbation: without the which their alliances would easily turne to smoke; if they refused, hee would pursue them with spirituall and temporall armes. Oft-times, those which haue the name, the age, and countenance of wife men, conclude to the ruine of their Country. The Venetians at this time follow the worst aduice. And the Pope raises the treaty which he had deferred vntill the last day assigned for the ratification.

Thouars, the Earle of Montmorency grandfather to the Comtable that now liues, the A Lords of Paisle, Andouins, Grandmont, Curton, Boissi, Coligny, Estouteville, and al most all the Nobility of France, which followed (as to a certaine victory) with ioy and courage, amounting to three thousand fighting men, besides three thousand horse, and six thousand foot, which Chamont brought out of the Duchy of Milan, and the troops of Anthony Duke of Lorraine, who accompanied his Maiefty in this voyage. The King hauing passed the Alpes, sends Monny his Herald presently to proclaime warre against the Senate of Venice. And for that the Pope complained that the time specified in the capitulation expired without any effects of warre, the King commands the Lord of Chamont to begin.

He thereupon passeth the river of Adde, the fifteenth of Aprill, and camps before Treuti, batters and forceth it to yeeld at discretion, taking prisoners Infinian Morosin, Commaissary of the Venetian Stradiots or light horse, Vincelli de Cita de Castello, Vincen of Nalde, and other Senators, and with them a hundred light horse, and a thousand foot: then he repasseth Adde, to attend the Kings coming at Milan. The Emperour was gone into Flanders, to require a leauing of money, from the subiects of Charles his grandchild, a testimony that hee could not begin the warres within forty dayes after the King, as his promise was.

The Venetians prepared, and seeing a great part of Christendome armed against them, they seeke to dissuade this vnion by reasonable offers. But the Pope could no more accept that which he had before desired. The Catholike King had not credit enough to diuert the rest. The Emperour full of disdain, would not so much as see Iohn de l'Esquille their Secretary. As for our Lewis, they hoped for nothing from him, but by the sword. They therefore entertaine two thousand men at armes barded, foure fighting men for every Lance: 5000 light horse and Stradiots, fiftene thousand foot, of the flower of Italy, and fiftene thousand others chosen out of their territories: they arme many vessels to guard the banks of Romagnia, the towne of Apulia, the approaches of the Lake of Gard, Po, and other neighbour places, fearing to be molested by the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantoua their enemies. But behold bad signes, and prodigious fore-runners of losses, wherunto (besides the threats of men) the Venetians shall bee shortly subiect. D A Barke carrying ten thousand ducats to Rauenna, was drowned. The Castle of Brescia was fiered with lightning, the place where the Charters of the common-weale did lie, was suddenly ruined. And that which did most terrifie them, their great Councell being assembled, fire tooke their Arceball, whereas the salt-peeter did lie, and burnt twelue galies, with a great quantity of munition.

Moreover, hauing entertained Julius and Rance Vrsins, & Troile Sauelli, with five hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, the Pope commanded them vpon grievous censures (as dependants of the Church) not to depart out of Rome. And presently he did publish in forme of a monitory, a horrible Bull, containing "The Vsurpations of the Venetians had made in the fea of Rome, the authority they did arrogate to the preiudice of the Ecclesiasticall liberty, and the Popes iurisdiction: to greeue Bishopricks and other spirituall livings being vacant: to decide spirituall causes in secular Courts, and other things belonging to the censure of the Church: specifying moreover, all their disobediences past, and admonishing them: To yeeld vp within foure and twenty dayes next ensuing, the townes of the Church which they possessed, with the fruits receiued since they enioyed them, vpon paine to incurre not only the censures and curse of the City of Venice, but also of all the territories vnder their obedience, and of all others that should receive any Venetian, declaring them guilty of high Treason, and detested as perpetual enemies to all Christians, to whom he gaue power to take their goods in all places, and to make their persons slaves. Against this Bull, they cast forth a writing about Rome, containing (after a long protestation against the Pope and our Lewis) An appellation from the monitory, to the next Councell, and for want of humane iustice, to the seet of Iesus Christ, a most iust iudge, and the soveraigne Prince of all.

The Venetian army being assembled, made their beginning famous by the recovery of Treut, after the retreat of Chamont. But it was dismall to the conqueror: for during the heat of the spoile, the King (who came to releue it) passed the river of Adde with his whole army, without any lett, the ninth day of May. And Triunles seeing the army pass, this

A This day (said he) O most Christian King, haue we wonne the victory. The King lodged within half a league of the Venetian campe, and holding it more glory, it of himselfe without the assistance of any other, he ended this war. He drew the enemy by all means to a battell. The enemies designe was, to keepe themselves close in places of strength, to the necessity of fighting, and to keepe the French from attempting any matter of importance. So both armies continued a whole day one in view of another. The next day the King stood foure houres before the enemies lodging, with his troops in battell, and took Silvete, in their view, without making any other strewe, then to want courage to fight. Necessity must then force them to it, hunger drives the Wolfe out of the wood. The King to cut off the victuals that came to them from Cremona and Crema, raised his Campe to lodge at Vaile or at Pandin: and the Venetians (to ingage their enemies in the like difficulties) resolue to follow them at the heels, and always to lodge in places of aduantage. There were two waies to the said places: The one was longer and lower, which going by as against the river of Adde, was in forme like a bow: the other shorter and higher, but straight as a line. The King takes the lower, the enemy the higher, Chamont led the foreward of the French, Aluiane the Venetian. They approach neere vnto Agnadel, when as Aluiane being forced of necessity to fight, plants six peeces of artillery vpon the causey of a brooke which was then almost dry, which parted the two armies, & his foot in the Vineyards adioyning to it, & comes resolutely to charge our foreward. The combat was long and doubtfull; for that by reason of the flockes and branches the French hurle could not fight commodiously. And now the Swisses begin to wauer, when as the King sending Charles of Bourbon to encourage them, and advancing himselfe with his battell into a more large and open place, he redoubled the shocke, fauoured by his artillery: the which the enemy could not discourt by means of certain small trees and bushes. So as after an obstinate fight of either side about three houres, the Kings preference not suffering any one to faint, and the Swisses returning to their first heat, the Venetians wonderfully spoiled by the horse and Cannon, and hindered by the raine and haille which bore in their faces, began to yeeld both in courage and force: and finally resolving to sell this victory to the French very deare, failing rather in force than courage, they desired rather to lose their liues then their honours, by turning of their backs.

The Earle of Petillano (with whom was the greatest part of their forces, encountered with a Squadron of their owne men flying, grised that Aluiane had contrary to his aduice presumed to fight, and thinking that his endeauiours would preuaile little to obtaine the victory) desired rather to saue the rest of the army, then to see all lost by the rashnesse of another. The Earle Bernardin du Mont was slaine, and some men at armes, and about ten thousand foot. Bartholomew of Aluiane was prisoner, and hurt in the eie, and twenty peeces of great artillery lost. Of the French, no men of marke, but some 500 foot were slaine. The King caused the dead to be buried, and for a trophie he built a Chappell in the place of battell, the which he named S. Mary of Victory. So ended the battell of Agnadel, or Guaradade, or (as others call it) of Vaile, the 15 of May. This happy Victory purchased the King the next day Carrauge, and then Bergamo, Brescia, Crema, Cremona, Pisqueton, Pesquiere, and other places, whereof the King would not accept one but vpon condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen that were within any of them should yeeld themselves prisoners vpon ranfome. On the other side, the Pope with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horse, eight thousand foot, & the artillery of the D. of Ferrara, tooke Scruia, Solarole, Bresquille, all Valdelanone, Granarole, all the townes of the territory of Faenza, Rauenna, Imola, and all the townes of Romagnia, but more through fauour of the Kings Victorie, then by his owne forces. The Marquis of Mantoua recovered Alole and Lunata, which the Venetians had vrsurped from Iohn Francis of Gonsagua his great grandfather, and the D. of Ferrara, Polefine of Roussac. In Ilustis, Christopher Frangipan invaded Pisone and Diuinje. The D. of Bruswick entering into Friul, for the Emperour, tooke Feltri, Bellone, Trieste: and then Verona and Padoua returned to the obedience of the Empire. The Earles of Lodron seized vpon some Castles and Villages in their iurisdiccions, and the Bishop of Trent got for his share, Riuede Trente and Agreste. The King of Arragon making his prefer of another mans painted charge, recovered Brindes and Tarentum. So euery one pulling his plumes, the Crow (according to the Prouerbe) remained almost bare. Such are the fruits of a battell tell won in a Country not fortified. This cheeke had abared the naturall pride and haughtinesse of the Venetians, but their ruine toucht the hearts of the Italians diuinely. Some were well pleased, for that without any obseruation of faith or equity (thrust on with an insatiable ambition and couetousnesse) they made profession to seize vpon all that opportunity offered them. Others began to sigh, lamenting the generall calamity of Italy, ready to yeeld to the seruitude of a stranger. The Pope was one of the first that grieved at this great fall, and fearing the Emperours power and the Kings, he deuised how to crosse their affaires, and to take from them all meanes to ruine this Common-weale, the ancient seat of liberty. He accepted of the Venetians Ambassage and submission, and reuoked the sentence by the which they were excommunicate. The which gaue them a beginning of hope, but more when they see the King content to haue recovered his owne, and not to exceede the limits of the capitulation of Cambray. And that which reuiued their spirits, certaine banished men, newly restored at Treuifo by the Venetians, to make the memory of this benefite famous, troope together, plant the banner of S. Marke in the Market place, and expell Leonard of Dresseine, who without any armes or force, had receiued the City in the Emperours name, they bring in seuen hundred Venetian foot, and consequently, all the forces they had assembled in Sclauonia and Romagnia.

The Venetians
begin to recover their losses.

Without doubt Treuifo alone repaired the Venetians honour, and the chiefe cause of this accident, as also to put the Venetians in more hope, was the negligence and ill government of the Emperour, who during the course of so many victories, had made them C but of his name onely; and these importune delays had caused the King to take his way towards Milan, to returne speedily into France. The Kings dislodging of his army, gaue courage to the Venetians to recouer Padoua, which they knew to be vnfortified for men for the defence thereof. Andrew Gritti one of their Commissaries, had assembled 2000 men of the Country, with 300 souldiers, and some horse, & finding by chance the port of Codalunge halfe open, by reason of some Carts laden with hay, that were lately entred, he seized thereon without noyse, and kept it, vntill the Companies led by Chesluis Volpe, Zitole of Perugia, and Ladance of Bergamo were arriued, who held it almost an houre before that any alarme was giuen in the towne. This reprisall made the way to recouer Legnague, a very commodious towne to annoy Vincenza and Verona.

One of the ancients said, That we must reuerence fortune, else she will shew her selfe terrible. Hereafter she leaues the Emperour and returnes to the Venetians. The Marquis of Mantoua lodgeth in the Isle of Elcale, in the country of Verona, attending the preparatiues which the Bishop of Trent, Gouverneur of Verona, made to besiege Legnague. Luke Maluozze with 200 light horse, and Zitole of Perugia, with 800 foot, and 1500 of the Country, besides the garison of Legnague, entring one morning into the said Isle, surprised the Marquis his troops sleeping, spoile them, leading the Marquis, with his Lieutenant Bossi (Nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise) prisoners, leauing a lessonto Commanders in the war, to be vigilant to weigh their owne forces, and not to contemne their enemies. On the other side the Venetians in Friul recovered Valdesere by force, Bellone by composition, & fortified themselves in the Vincenrin, by the taking of many other places, as of Serauale, a passage of great importance, the which Maximilian recouered soone after, with the like crueltie vpon the Italians, as the Italians had vsed vpon the Germans at the taking thereof; for hauing not yet assembled sufficient forces to go to field, they make small attempts, besieging now one bourgh, then another, with small honour and reputation for the quality of an Emperour: solliciting notwithstanding all his confederates, to vnite their forces for the taking of Venice. But who should haue reaped the profit? The Pope would neither haue the Emperour nor King possesse it; and the Catholike King detested this enterprize as vnjust and dishonest, moued thereunto, nor with the loue of vertue, but with enuy the which he bare to the greatnesse of our Lewis his Vncle, who he thought should haue the greatest benefit by this conquest.

Whilist that the Emperour filled all Italy with a vaine feare of his force, he sent the Prince of Anhalt with 10000 men into Friul, who at his entrie tooke Cadore with a great butchery of those that defended it, and the Duke of Brunswicke (whom the Emperour had likewise sent) did put to rout 800 horse, & 500 foot, which John Paul Gradenigo, Commissary of Friul, brought to the succour of Ciuital of Aultria, which the Germanes besieged. Christopher Frangipan did also defeat the Venetian Officers, followed by the forces

A of the Country, he wasted the Country, and seized vpon Chasteauneuf, Fiume, and Raspruch. And the Venetians sending Angelo Trenisan generall of their army at sea thither, recouered Fiume and Raspruch. To conclude, by sundry prizes and reprints, mens goods and liues were continually in prey.

The siege of Padoua.

The Emperours
army.

The Emperour hauing now assembled all his forces, prepares for the siege of Padoua. Besides the forces of the Empire, he had seuen hundred French Lances, commanded by the Lord of Palisse: two hundred men at armes, which the Pope had sent him. Two hundred more from the Duke of Ferrara, vnder the command of the Cardinall of Esté: six hundred men at armes vnder diuers Italian Captaines, eightene thousand Lansquenets: six thousand Spaniards, six thousand aduenturers of diuers Nations, and two thousand foot, which the said Cardinall brought vnto him for the Duke: with so wonderfull a preparation for peeces of battery and munition, as the issue of this siege held all Italy in suspense. The Emperour had already taken Limini, neer vnto Padoua by force, when as there chaunceth a signe of happy successe for the Padouans and Venetians. Philip Rosse, and Fredericke Gonzalues of Bossole, went with two hundred light horse, to guard the artillery that came out of Germany: five hundred horse issuing out of Padoua, hauing intelligence thereof, charge them in the night, defeat them five miles from Vincenza, and take Philip Rosse.

And in exchange, Maximilian hauing extended his companies about twelue miles off C from Padoua, to be assured of the commoditie of victuals and pasture, takes by assault and sacks the bourgh of Esté, Montsilice, and Montagnane, ouerthrowes 3000 peasants at the bridge of Bouolente, and caries away a great prey of Cattell, which they had gathered together. At length after many delaies (which gaue the Padouans leasure to fortifie and furnish themselves with victuals) he is planted before the towne walls the 15 of September. As for the defence of Padoua, the Venetians had furnished it with 600 men at armes, 1500 light horse, and 1500 Stradiots or Albanos, commanded by Caprines of great experience, the Earle of Pentillane, Bernardine of Montone, Anthony Pic, Luc Maluozze, John the Gree, and twelue thousand choise foot, vnder the charge of Denis de Nalade, Zitole of Perugia, Ladance of Bergamo, Saccocio of Spoleto, and many other of D meuer quality, and 10000 foot, Sclauones, Greekes and Albanos. And why should not 20000 foot, and 3600 horse defend Padoua, with that multitude of Venetian youth, who (to make prooue of their valour and piety to their Country) had willingly thrust themselves into the towne, seeing they could not haue forced them in field, within any small trench? Padoua was furnished with great store of all kinde of artillery, victuals, and a great number of peasants, who continually labored in the fortifications.

The fortifications of Padoua.

The ports, and other fit places were furnished with bastions without, and euery vault vnderneath full of barrells of powder, to blow vp such as did assaile them. And within round about the City a Palissade, or fortification of piles, trees, and peeces of timber, fortified with a deepe ditch, sixteen fadome broad: flanked with Casemates and small B Towers full of artillery: and behinde the ditch a rampier of the same breadth, round about the towne, except some places where they could not plant any artillery, and before the rampier, a parapet of seuen cubits high, to couer them that should defend the rampiers.

Behold all the Imperiall army is now planted before Padoua, but this was not to attempt a towne besieged, but rather an army camped in a towne, which made head against an army, holding the field. The artillery thunders eight daies together, and preuailes so much, as it seemes they need not to shot any more. They giue an assault to the Bastion, at the point of the port of Codalunge.

The Spaniards and Lansquenets (seconded by some men at armes on foot) win the bastion, and plant two Enignes: but both the fortresse vpon the ditch, the valour of the defendants, the abundance of instruments for defence, artillery, stones, wilde-fire, and all other kinde of offensive armes, force them to abandon it in haist, many remaining dead or wounded, so as the army being ready to assaile the wall (the bastion being wonne) hee retired and disarmed without any further attempt. Maximilian despairing of victory by these preiudiciall beginnings, after seuentene daies siege raiseth his campe, and passing (in his retreat) by Vincenza and Verona, receiues their oath of fidelity, he then dismisseth almost all his army, and tooke the way to Trente, determining to make a truce with the Venetians for some moneths. But growne proud with this prosperity, seeing his associates to aide him so coldly, and supposing that a surceasing of armes would be preiudiciall. All vnto them, they prepared to recover Vincenza, Ciuitelle, Bassan, Montefice, Montagnagne, Este, Polesine, and in the end to make war against the Duke of Ferrara.

But he that undertakes too much, repents sometimes. Desire of reuenge is a dangerous Counsellor, and the resolution not to endure a wrong either done, or pretended to be done, grounded rather vpon passion then reason, is commonly the cause of the authors ruine. Alphonso D. of Ferrara recovering of Polesine, had (in hatred of the Venetian name) wonderfully spoiled the gentlemens houses of the country; he receiued the towne of Este from Maximilian in fee, and Montagnagne in mortgage. The Venetians (building the motives of their disdain thereon) send their Generall Angelo Trevisan with 17 Gallies, B and a great number of other small vessels, towards Ferrara, and a good number of horse by land, to second their army at sea, the which being entred into the Riuer of Po, and hauing burnt Corbole, and some other Villages neare adioyning, they spoiled all the Countrey euen vnto the Lake of Scure, and without difficultie recovered all the territory of Polesine. To withstand these violent courses, the Ferrarois plants his artillery vpon the banks of Po, to stop the passage of this army, and forceth Trevisan to cast anchor in the midst of the riuer, behind a small Island right against Pulicelle, a commodious place to molest the Ferrarois, and there he fortifies himselfe with two bastions vpon the banks, the one on the side of Ferrara, the other opposite, whilst that other vessels assailing the Duke of Ferraras country in another part, take Comache.

army in 1509.

The Duke strengthened with 150 Launces, which the Lord of Chastillon brought him, and 200 men at armes which the Pope sent him (discontented that the Venetians had invaded this Duchy, without respect of the superiority which the Church hath ouer it) fauoured with the knowledge of the country, and the nature and opportunity of the riuer, hauing brought his cannon to the bank opposite to the enemy, being covered with a strong cauley, after an assault giuen to the bastion, where his men had the worst, he saluted the Venetian ships so furiously, as some not able to resist, yielded: others fired with the shot, were miserably burnt with the men that were in them; others sinking, escaped the enemies hand, and the Generall saved himselfe by flight in a cocke-boat, his Gallie flying, shooting and defending it selfe, was in the end suncke.

To conclude, the riuer being full of blood, fire and dead men, fiftene gallies came into the Dukes power, some great ships, many foists, and other small vessels in great number: three score ensignes taken, and 2000 men slaine. This army defeated, Alphonso sent presently Hippolito Cardinall of Este his brother, against that army which had taken Comache: but the losse of the other hauing forced them already to retire, the Cardinall employed his forces to recover Loreto, which the Venetians had fortified.

This done, the Pope desirous to tie the Duke of Ferrara vnto him, to the end that acknowledging the good he should receiue by his intercession, he should depend more vpon him, then on the King, against whom hee laid the foundation of great hatred, was a meanes the Venetians should yield Comache to the Ferrarois, & should no more molest his estate. And to reconcile them with Maximilian, he sends Achilles de Grassé B. of Pesca his Nuncio vnto him. But through the Emperours excessive demands, and the Kings Ambassadors crossing it, Achilles returned without effecting any thing. The season made them proceed coldly in matters of war, vntill the end of this year. Maximilian and Ferdinand had contended before the King for the gouernment of the realme of Castile: the first for Charles his grand-child, the second building vpon his wifes testament, as wee haue seene before. In the end, the Cardinall of Amboise (not considering how much this accord did preiudice the Kings affaires) drew Maximilian to consent, that the Catholike King, in case he had no heires male, should be gouernour of the realmes of Castile and Naples, vntill that Charles his grand-child should come to the age of 25 yeares, and should pay vnto the said Charles forty thousand ducats yearly, fifty thousand to Maximilian at one payment, and should aide him according to the treaty of Cambray, to recover that which belonged vnto him. A convention which gaue courage to Ferdinand to encounter the Kings greatness, the which in regard of the realme of Naples hee alwaies feared. Doubtlesse ambition did so blind the eyes of this good Cardinall, as he could no more discouer this grosse policy, then fore-see that death prepared him a Biere in stead of a pontificall Chaire. In the end of this year died the Earle of Perillane, generall for

Although they proceed slowly in matters of war, yet Princes mindes were distracted with many diftemperatures, especially the Emperours, who desparing to get the victory of the Venetians by his owne proper forces, perswaded the King to attempt the recovery of Padoua, Vincenza, and Treuifo, receiving a sufficient recompence. The King knew well, that whilst the Venetians possessed a foot of land, he should still be subiect to continuall charge and dangers. But he was diuerted from repassing of the mountaines, by the sickness of the Cardinall of Amboise, to whom onely he committed all his affaires: fearing likewise lest a new army should wholly withdraw the Popes attention, who long before desired, by what meanes he should dislodge the French out of the estates of Italy, and fearing (as we haue said else-where) lest the King (being armed) should dispossesse him of his chaire, to place the Cardinall of Amboise in it, he laboured to draw the English from the Kings friendship, he practised to ioyne with the Suisses, by meanes of the Bishop of Sion, to the preiudice of this Crowne, and protected the Venetians.

In truth, we may behold three Princes at three diuers personages vpon this Theater, The King of a faithfull alie: the Emperour of a weak; and the Pope of a disloyall. In the end, the King (the better to supply the affaires of Italy) goes to Lyons with an intent to pacifie the Pope, or at the least, to keepe him from being his enemy. To this end hee sends Albert Pie Earle of Carpi, with commission to offer the Pope both the Kings forces and authority in all occurrences, to impart vnto him the affaires that were now handled: the request which the Emperour made vnto him, and to leaue it to his discretion, to passe or not into Italy: Were not these sufficient submissions to pacifie any discontented minde?

Contrariwise, Julius receiued the Venetians into fauour, and the 24 day of February gaue them full and absolute remission. He still sollicit the English to take vpon him the title of Protector of the sea of Rome, against the French King, against whom (said he) if he made war, many others (to whom his power was odious) would take armes. But he drew the Suisses with more efficacy to the protection of the Church, paying a thousand florins yearly to euery Canton. The boldnesse and presumption wherewith they refused to renew their alliance with our Lewis (but vpon condition to augment their pensions) had intily displeased the King: but this vnseemable repulse shall proue very preiudiciall to this Crowne. The King in exchange allies himselfe with the Valaisans and Grisons, who binde themselves to giue passage to his people, and to deny it to his enemies, and to serue him for pay, with such forces as they could make. The Pope fortified with this new alliance, bends all his thoughts to support and raise the Venetians, to reconcile them to the Emperour, and by their rising to pull downe our Lewis.

But the Popes alienation serued onely to kinde new fires in Italy. The Emperour and the King discontent with the shewes which the Pope made in fauour of the Venetians, vniued themselves more strictly together: and the D. of Ferrara gaue the King occasion to aduance his forces, for the protection of his estate: for the Duke hauing set an impost vpon all the merchandise that passed by the Po to Venice, the Pope commanded him to free it, as not being in the disposition of the Vassall to impose a tribute without the liberty of the Lord of the see. And in case hee disobeyed, he denounceth war against him. The Duke thus threatened, flies to the King, who had before taken him into his protection, giuing thirty thousand ducats; his estate also importing the King much for his affaires of Lombardie: yet loath to contend with the Pope for the Duke of Ferrara, he propounded conditions, whereby the Pope might rest satisfied of the interst, which the Church and he pretended against the Duke.

In the end, as the Pope (the more hee sees himselfe sought vnto) shewed greater signes of bitterness, the Lord of Chaumont enters into Italy with fiftene hundred Launces, and ten thousand foot: to whom the Duke of Ferrara sent two hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, and two thousand foot. At their first entry they take Polesine, Montagnagne, and Este. Then the Prince of Anhaulr, Lieutenant to the Emperour, passing from Verona with three hundred French Launces, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand Lanquenets, ioyned with Chaumont, and ioynly together they march against Vincenza.

flie to Chaumont to obtaine some reasonable conditions of the Prince, who wonderfully moved with their rebellion, would not receive them with any other condition, but to have their goods at pleasure, and their lives saved. These victories were fruitlesse, without the taking of Legnague, the which the river of Adice diuides into two parts, whereof the less is called Porto. This river is diuided into many branches about Legnague, passing the last branch, they encounter some footmen, set to guard Porto. Our men charged them, repulse them, kill a great number, chase the rest, and enter pell-mell with them into Porto. The taking of Porto made the meanes easie to batter the towne on either side the river: for the effecting whereof Chaumont sent Captaine Molard with 4000 men, and six peeces of artillery, who having in a manner battered downe the bastion, which was upon the causey, at the point of the towne; the Venetian Commissary retired himselfe into the Castle, and the Captaine which commanded the bastion, yielded to depart with bag and baggage. The bastion taken, the towne was sackt by Molard, and the Castle battered, yielded the next day, upon condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen remaining Chaumont's prisoners, the souldiers should depart with white wands in their hands. At this time died the Cardinall of Amboise, uncle to the Lord of Chaumont, a man of a great spirit and long experience in affaires, but with the service of his master he did not forget the content of his owne private ambition.

The death of the Cardinall of Amboise.

Ciuitelle, Marollique, Basciane, Feltré, l'Escale, and other places thereabouts (abandoned by the Venetians) opened their gates vpon view of the Cannon. To conclude, all places where the armies passed, were exposed to takings and retakings, sacking and burning, and all persons were at the victors mercy. Monfice remained yet. The towne is seated in a plaine, and the Castle on the mountaine, compassed in with three walls, whereof the lower required 2000 men for the defence thereof. By reason then of a new convention betwixt the King and the Emperor, that his army should continue yet a month longer in Italy, and that the extraordinary charge, about the payment of the Companies which the King had till then defraided, should afterwards be payed by the Emperor, and the footmen also for that month, and in consideration of 50000 crownes, which the King should add to 30000 others that he had formerly lent the Emperor, Verona with the territories thereof should remaine in pawne to his Maiestie, vntill it were satisfied: Chaumont besieged it; Seuen hundred foot and some companies of horse, hauing vpon their approach abandoned the towne, kept the first wall. He batters it, and makes a breach in diuers places. The French (followed with 1500 Spanish Launces, newly arrived, vnder the command of the Duke of Termini) mount to the assault, chase the Garison, and skirmishing with them, they enter pell-mell within the other two walls, and so into the Castle, the most part being slaine. Such as were retired into the dungeon, yielded: when as the Germans setting it on fire, burnt both the place and the men, so as of this number few escaped either the fury of their armes, or of the fire. The towne was likewise consumed to ashes. This done, a new commandement from the King, calls backe Chaumont, with his army, into the Duchy of Milan: which the Pope began to disturbe. Moreover, two armies of diuers nations ioynted together, to make priuate conquests, hardly can the Commanders remaine long vntied in one will. And the Germanes (who can doe little alone) lodged in Lonigie.

The Pope
seeketh to expell
the French out of Italy.

We haue hitherto seene, that Pope Iulius designs tendred, not onely to restore the Church to her pretended estates, but also to expell the French out of Italy. His first project was effected; And now many considerations draw him to the second. The Venetians are partly restored, and all at his deuotion, hauing reuoked their censures. He is strictly allied with the Suisses. He knowes well, the Arragonois will be alwaies glad to see the Kings greatnesse diminished, to haue the better meanes to settle himselfe at Naples. He findes the Emperors forces and authority to be feeble. He is not out of hope to draw the King of England into armes. And that which feeds his couetous passion, he is well informed, that the King hath no will to make war against the Church, and that at all euents it shall be in his power to make peace with him, and this is the last helpe the Popes haue alwaies relied on. But with what colour may Iulius arme against our Lewis? The King will not giue ouer the protection of the Duke of Ferrara, and Iulius desires exceedingly the possession of his Duchy, grounded (although the Seigneurie of Comache, from whence Alphonso drew the salt, belonged directly to the Emperor) vpon the discord for the

1510

A the salt pans, and customes which Alphonso leauied vnlawfully, and without the leaue (said he) of the Lord of the Fee. This was a crosse deuice to cloake his couetousnesse. To colour this, he vrgeeth the King againe to renounce the protection of the Ferrarois: vpon his refusal, he protesteth to fly from the treaty of Cambray: that he will not ioyne with him, neither yet be opposit vnto him, and that without tying himselfe to any person, he will hereafter seeke to maintaine peace in the Church. But on S. Peters day, he discouers in effect the motions of his minde: that day the rents due to the Apostolike see are paid; he refuseth to accept those of the Duke of Ferrara, alledging for his reasons, that Alexander the sixth marrying his daughter Lucrece, could not (to preiudice the Sea) redde foure thousand Ducats to an hundred. And the same day (hauing before refused to giue the French Cardinals leaue to return into France) aduertised that the Cardinal of Auch was goneto field with his dogges and nets, he sent to pursue him, after la fugitive; and held him prisoner in the Castle of Saint Angelo. And to win vnto him the Catholike King, against the Most Christian, he grants him the inuasioure of the realme of Naples, vpon condition to pay the same rent which the ancient Kings of Arragon had paid, and entertainment for three hundred men at armes, for the defence of the Church, when it should be demanded.

A leaue he twice refused and the Pope against the King.

But behold a strange turbulent spirit, who attempting at one instant to assaile Ferrara, Genoua, and Milan, toiles himselfe infinitely to bring forth paine and confusion. The Ferrarois offered to giue him the salt made at Comache, & to binde himselfe, there should be no more made: yet proceeding against him, as against a notorious offender, he lends himstopped by the D. of Vrbin into the territory of Ferrara: who at his first arrival, and at the onely summons of a trumpet, takes Cente, Pieue, Bagnacaul, and Lugo. But as he camped before the Castle of Lugo, Alphonso coming with his people & some French companies; the D. of Vrbin raised the siege, leauing three peeces of Cannon behind him (it is a dishonour for a Commander to lose his artillery) & retired into Imola, giuing Alphonso means to recouer that which they had taken from him in Romagna. But the army of the church was no sooner refreshed, but they take the same places, & likewise Modena.

Hefent eleven Venetian Gallies against Genoua, whereof Grille Centurion was General; and one of the Popes, in the which were Ottavian, and Iohn Fregose, Ierome Dacic, and many other banished men. And by land Mark Anthony Colonne with an 100 men at armes and 700 foot. About the same time 6000 Suisses (in the beginning of September) passing by Bellinzone, camped at Varese, where 4000 more ioyne with them: but this proues but a fire of straw. Iulius hoped that Genoua being assailed both by sea and land, it would breed some infallible alteration; that the greatest part hating the French command, would easily maintaine the name of Fregose, and that the French amazed with this alteration at Genoua (being likewise prest by the Suisses) would recall into the Duchy of Milan, all such Companies as they had both with the Emperor and the Duke of Ferrara: that by consequence the Venetians would recouer Verona, and he enjoy Ferrara; and then with their united forces invade the estate of Milan. But he reckoned without his host: let vs now see the proceedings of these armes. They shut those gates against him which he expected to finde open. Chaumont at the first bruce of the enemies approach, had manned Genoua with some Companies. Pretian a Prouenzal was entred the port with six great gallies, the sonne of Iohn Lewis of Fiesque, with 800 men of the Country, and a Nephew to the Cardinall of Finall, with no lesse number, was come into the towne, for the King; and these together preuented all insurrections. So the Pope and the banished men, frustrate of their chiefe hope, retire to Rapalle. And Colonne foreseeing that he should hardly recouer any place of safety by land, for that the Commons were risen, hee shipt himselfe in the gallies, with three-score of his best horse, and sent the rest by land to Sperie, who for the most part were spoiled vpon the Marches of the Genouois, Luquois, & Florentines. On the other side, the Suisses which camped at Varese, vnder colour (as they say) to go to serue the church, found in the end, to their losse, that they did but serue the ambition of one private man. Chaumont hauing manned all the passages with sufficient forces, sends Trinulce to Mont Brianse, that with his troops, & the helpe of his Country-men, he might keepe the Suisses from seizing on the passage: and he himselfe coasting along by them, and still skirmishing with them, with his horse and foot, and many field peeces, cuts off their vituals, and performing the duty of a good Captaine, without hazarding of any thing, he annoyed them at the passages of rivers. To defeat a poore but a warlike Nation, there is nothing but blowes to be gotten : & in losing, they hazard an estate. In the end, besides the continuall charges of the French army, oppressed with want of victuals & mony, they free out men (who are not accustomed to spend much in spies) of the doubt which troubled them, whether they would passe to Ferrara by the Duchy of Milan, or turne by the hills vnder Como, Lecque, Bergamo and Brescia, or else by the Guairadade, through the territory of Mantoua: for taking their way by the high places of Como, they went to lodge at the bridge of Trefe, where (brought to extremities for want of bread and money) they retired by troops to their houses. Whilest the French were else where busied, the Venetians (making profit of their absence, & of the Germans retreat) recover'd (without toyle) Este, Monfice, Montagnagne, Marosique, Bassiane, & Vincenza. Legnago staied their victories, but Verona ouerthrew them. They besiege it with 800 men at armes, 3000 light horse, and 10000 foot, besides an infinite number of peasants, and batter it from a mountaine opposite, being counter-battered, and wonderfully spoiled by the artillery from the towne. But the Venetians desire was great to conquer this City, and the valour of the besieged was no lesse to defend both their honours and liues.

They had foure hundred French Lances, three hundred Spaniards, a hundred Germans, and Italians, siue hundred French foot, and foure thousand Germans, which the Prince of Anhaule (dead some few daies before) had left there : a thousand foot, with some cornes of French issue forth in the night, put them to the sword that kept the artillery, killed two peeces, and caried them away, when as Zitole of Perugia, flying to thereloe, and being slaine with almost all that followed him, Denis of Nalde ariued, who recovering the prey, repulsed and beat them within their walls. But the Venetians daunted with this checke, seeing no rising of the people, as they expected, aduerted to the Suisse retreat, and that Chaumont came to succour them, retired to S. Boniface. The wars continued in Friul and Istria, with the accustomed insolencies and cruelties on either side, but more to the ruine of the Country and buildings, then of the people. At the same time the Marquis of Mantoua came out of prison at the Mantouans suit to Baia & Prince of the Turkes, in whose loue the Marquis had many years held himselfe.

The Pope was not grown wife neither by his owne nor other mens losses : his vnifortunate attempts had nothing daunted his hopes : and they found the prouerbe to their cost ; He that hath a companion hath a Master. A wit blinded with presumption : who (seeing his practices now discovered ; the port of Genoua furnished with a strong army ; the Towne provided of all things necessarie for defence) hopes to obtaine that now which he could not get when the port was disarmed : he periwades the Venetians to a second attempt : they come to Genoua with fifteene light gallies, three great, one Galleasse, and three Biscane ships. The French fleet going out of the haven, with two and twenty light Gallies, after they had giuen order that the contrary faction should not rise, met with them at Porto Venere : where by the thunder of their Cannons, and by the Tower of Codifa, they forced them to retire to Ciuita-uecchia, whence the Venetian fleet parting to recover the Gulfe, a tempest cast siue Gallies vpon the Coast of Messina : the others beaten and bruiued, were driuen vpon the Coast of Barbary, and in the end recovered the port of Venice, halfe lost. The army which came by land led by the Archbishop of Salerne, brother to Ottavian Fregese, by Iohn of Safarelle, and Renier of Safate the Popes Capraines, seeing the fruitlesse attempts of the fleet at Sea, instead of Genoua, went to take Fanane in the mountaine of Modena. A small recompence for so many vaine attempts.

This disgrace did rather increase the Popes obstinacy, then make him faint. Hee might easily obtaine a peace of the King, and with such conditions, as might well content a Conqueror. The King was content to referre the Duke of Ferraras cause to Justice, and gaue power to the Pope, to name such Iudges as he pleased. But Iulius (following the holy Oracles, Loned cursing, and cursing followed him : and for that he took no pleasure in blessing, it forsooke him) seeing the King yeeld to so reasonable conditions, he impatiently demands, that Genoua be set at liberty, & with such bitterneffe, as the D. of Sauoyes Ambassador (offering his Princes intercession for their peace) hee puts him in prison, & tortured him as a spy. He converts all his thoughts against Ferrara. The Venetians thrust him forward, fearing (lest in the end, losing the hope of his designs) hee

A should be reconciled to the King. And the King sufficiently informed of the Popes bad affection, resolues to defend the Ferrarois, and both by spirituall and temporall armes, to crosse the Popes insolencies.

In the end of September the Pope comes to Bolonia, with an intent to assaile Ferrara, both by water and land ; the Venetians on the one side, and he on the other, periwading himselfe, that at the same of his forces, the people would rebell against Alphonso. But the Venetian companies hauing brought many barks by the river of Po, into the territory of Mantoua to make a bridge, the D. of Ferrara, with the French forces, let vpon them vnawares, tooke them, and many vessels in certaine Chanells of Polesine, with the Venetian Commissary. Then was there discovered a practice which the Venetians had in Brescia, for the which the Earle Iohn Maria of Martinongue was beheaded there. This stay of the fleet did nothing discourage the Pope, but periwading himselfe that his owne forces were sufficient to conquer Ferrara, he assembled them all at Modena, vnder the D. of Verbin being Generall, the Cardinall of Pauy, Iohn Paul Bailion, Marc Anthony Colonne, and Iohn Pueli, Capitaines of authority : whilest that Chaumont encamped right against them at Rubiere and Marfaile, trying them with daily skirmishes ; he gaue the Ferrarois means, with the Lord of Chastillon, to recover Polesine, Final, and Cente. Hauing sacke and burnt it to ashes, he went to ioyne with Chaumont, euen as three hundred men at armes, many light horse, and foure thousand Venetian foot came to win the passage of Po, and to ioyne with the Popes forces, hauing already taken Figueiras and Sellate on the other side, and forced Alphonso to goe to the succour of his Country. Thus the two Venetian fleets, hauing free passage vpon Po, did greatly annoy the Ferrarois territory by daily inroads and spoiles : when as the D. issuing out of Ferrara put to rout that fleet, which was entred the river of Po, by Primare, & came vnto Adria : the other which consisted of foists and small vessels, being entred by Fornaces, and come to Puliselle, seeking to passe into the river of Adice, by a river adioyning, they found the water so low, as they could not enter, but were so battered by the Ferrarois artillery, as they abandoned their ships, seeking to saue themselves and their Cannon.

The Pope seeing he could preuaile nothing by his temporall forces, he flies to the spirituall, communicating Alphonso of Este, and all those that were or should come to his succour, namely Charles of Amboise, with all the chiefe of the French army. This furious course made the King to assemble all the Prelates of his realme at Tours, with the most famous Doctors of all his Vniuersities, as well in diuinity, as in the ciuill and canon lawes, who resolue vpon eight notable conclusions against the Pope. " That it was not lawfull for the Pope to assaile any temporall Princes, by force, in their territories not belonging to the Church. That it was lawfull for any such Prince for the defence of his subiects and Country, not onely to repell this injury by force, but also to invade the territories of the Church possessed by any such Pope ; not with an intent to hold them, but to the end (the Pope being dispossessed thereof) should haue no more means to molest his estate : seeing the Pope had, through the aide of the said Prince, recovered the same lands, vsurped before by certaine tyrants. That for so manifest a wrong and vniust attempt, any such Prince might withdraw himselfe from the Popes obedience, for the defence of his temporall estate, seeing he had stirred vp many other Princes and Common-weales, to invade the Dominions of the said Prince, who deserved reward and loue of the Apostolicall see. That this subtraction being made, they should obserue in France the common and ancient law, and the Pragmaticke sanction, enacted at the Councell of Basill. That any such Prince might by force defend another Prince his confederate, and of whom hee had lawfully taken the protection, for those Seigneuries which he had long enjoyed, and with a iust title, seeing this confederacy had been made with the consent of the said Pope, & who as the chiefe was comprehended therein and that this Prince allied according to the forme of the league, had giuen aide for the recovery of the patrimony of S. Peter : that the Pope pretending any thing due for any rights belonging to the Church of Rome, and the Prince on the other side challenging to hold of the Empire, and should refer this controuersie to the censure of indifferent Iudges, as equity required, that in this case it was not lawfull for the Pope, without further knowledge of the cause, to make war against any such Prince : the which if he did, the said Prince might oppose his forces, with other princes his confederates, so as that right had not been possessed by the Romane church within 1510 an hundred years. That if the Pope would not accept this honest and lawfull offer, but 1511 contrary to order and right, should give sentence against any such Prince, maintaining his right not to depend vpon the Church: neither he, nor any other by opposing, should incur the censure of that sentence, seeing that Prince had no free access, neither to go nor send to Rome to defend his rights. That if the Pope vnjustly (the due course of law not observed) should by maine force, pronounce any censure against any such Prince, their allies and subiects resisting in such a case, the sentence were of no force, neither could it by any means binde.

These conclusions taken, the King (according to the resolution of the Councell) sent Ambassadors to Julius, in the name of the French Church, to admonish him by brotherly and spiritual correction, that leauing his desires, he should attend to peace, concord, loue and charity, and reconcile himselfe with the foresaid Princes: vpon refusal, they should summon him to call a general Councell, according to the decrees of the holy Councell of Basill. That his answer heard, things should be ordered according vnto reason. In the meane time forty light horse and five hundred foot (hauing at the first summons of a trumpet yielded Carpio to Albert Pie) were encountered by foure thousand foot, led by Palisse, defeated, and in a manner all slain. And Chaumont desirous to charge the Church forces, before they should ioyne with the Venetian companies, and three hundred Spanish Launces, which Ferdinand had sent him, in consideration of the inuasi-on of Naples: but not able to draw them, but to some light skirmishes, by the persuasion of the Bentiuoles, he turned his forces against Bologna, where the Pope remained sicke, both doubtfull of the peoples faith, being besieged, and so discontented with the long stay of the Venetians, as he protested publicly to Ierome Donat their Ambasador, that if their succours entred not the next day into Bologna, he would agree with the French. And at that instant sent he Iohn Francis Pie, Earle of Mirandole, to treat with the Lord of Chaumont. Chaumont, not to alter this good disposition, understanding the Kings pleasure, keeps his troops within their lodgings, and sent backe the Earle with these propositions: That, Alphonse of Esté, and all those the Pope had comprehended in his censure should be abolished: That in regard of the Venetians, nothing should be done contrary to the treaty of Cambray: That the controversies betwixt Alphonse and the Pope should be decided within six moneths by Iudges chosen by their common consent: That Modena should be restored to the Emperor, Cortignole to the King; and the Cardinal of Auch set at liberty: and that the gift of all benefices within the Kings dominions should be according to his nomination.

But Chiappia Vitelli entring into Bologna with six hundred Venetian light horse, and a squadron of Turkes which they had in pay, made the Pope to sing another note. That there was no means of accord, if the King did not absolutely abandon the defence of the Ferrarois. And Chaumont seeing that neither by the treaties of Peace, nor by force hee preuailed any thing, the people of Bologna holding themselves quiet, and at the Papes deuotion, being also afflicted with the winter, and want of victuals, hee returned to Chastilaufranc & Spilimberte, the which he had lately taken. Chaumont is no sooner gone, but the Pope strangely incensed, exclaims against the King to all Christian Princes, as thirsting after his blood and the territories of the Church, hauing caused him to be besieged with all his Cardinals and Prelats in Bologna: and returning to his former course with more vehemency, he sends his troops to field augmented by 500 men at armes, 1600 light horse, 5000 foot, and 300 Spanish Launces. But whilst this army iournes about Modena, some squadrons running toward Rhegium, being defeated by the French, they lost an hundred horse, and the Earle of Marel que was taken prisoner. Moreover, the D.
 of Ferrara with the Lord of Chastillon encamped vpon the Po, betwixt Hospitalet and Bondin, opposite to some other Venetian companies that were on the other side of the riuier: they sunke nine of their vessels, & forced the rest to returne to Venice. These small victories were crost by taking of Saffuole & Forminge, whilst that Chaumont refreshed himselfe within Pavia & Aubigni at Rhegium. These conquered towns incited Julius more violently against Ferrara, the which he knew was well furnished with men, and things necessary for defence: & the French through the continual toile of the war, were tired both in bodies & minds. And presuming to make the enterprize more easie, he went himselfe in person the 2 of Ianuary before Mirandola, advertised that Chaumont had made an escape

A to Milan, drawne thither (as they said) with the loue of a young Gentlewoman: A iour-ney which did greatly quail the courage and hope of them that defended Mirandola, who see themselves abandoned, not so much by the negligence, as by the dissention betwixt Chaumont, and Iohn Iaquies of Triuulce, (who then was gone into France:) whereby it may be, he was not much displeased to see the Earles of Mirandola (grand-children to Triuulce, by reason of Francis their Mother, his bastard daughter) deprived of that place. In the end, after all the duties that might be performed by men besieged, despairing of succours, seeing a breach made, and the water of their ditches so frozen, as it bare the souldiers, they obtained in the end (by the intercession of the Cardinals which assisted the Pope) to depart with bag and baggage: vpon condition, that Alexander Triuulce Governour of the towne, and all the Captaines should remaine prisoners: and to redeeme the towne from sacke, which he had promised to his souldiers, they should pay a certaine summe of money.

After the taking of Mirandola, two things were propounded in Councell by the French: whether they should assaile the enemy, or besiege Modena or Bologna, to draw the Papes forces out of the Estate of Ferrara, and by that means to draw them into a convenient place for a battell. Great Captaines hold it for a firme maxime, and experience hath alwaies taught it, That we ought neuer to vndergoe the hazard of a battell, but for some great aduantage, or when as vrgent necessity doth constraîne. This was the advice of Triuulce, newly returned to the campe, and accordingly resolution was taken to go to Modena. But let vs obserue a Spanish trick. The policie & secret aduertisements of Ferdinand did more harm to the King his vnkle, then the Papes open force. He thinks this to be a means to pacifie the Emperors spleene, and to sow some diuision betwixt the King and him. Modena was held time out of minde, to be a sea of the Empire, and the house of Esté had not enioyed it but by the Emperors inuestiture. Ferdinand then aduiseth the Pope, to the end the French should not haue it, to restore it to the Emperor, as a token of his iurisdiction. So Vitfruch, Maximilians Ambassadour, hauing recieued it in that forme, gave notice vnto Chaumont, that Modena did no more belong vnto the Pope, but to her ancient and lawfull Lord. And to enioy this restitution quietly, Vitfruch and Chaumont agreed together, that the French forces should not offend Modena, nor the territories thereof: and during these garboiles betwixt the King and the Pope, it should fauour neither party.

Then died Charles of Amboise, a Captaine, whom the name of the Cardinal of Am-boise his vnkle, and the government of the Estates of Milan, and of the Kings armies, held in great reputation in Italy: a faithfull seruant to his King, but (to beare so great a burthen) he wanted a longer experience in the art of war: seeing that after the death of his vnkle, through that defect, he was become contemptible to his souldiers: to whom to keepe them the better at his deuotion) he gaue too much liberty, Iohn Iaquies of Triuulce, as Marshall of France tooke vpon him the command of the army, attending the Kings pleasure, and inflamed with an honest ambition to performe something worthy of his vncle, hauing in the month of May gathered together twelue hundred Launces, and seven thousand foot, he besieged, rooke, and sacked in one day the towne of Concordia, and won Chastilaufranc by composition. Then approaching Bologna, hee loosed the Pope, as hauing founde the Bolognois minde, and drawne from them an oath of fidelity, he left the Cardinal of Pavia there, and retired to Rauenna. He is no sooner gone, but the people looking to the preservation of their priuate and present estates, and seeing themselves lyncharged with two armies, they take armes and hinder the Cardinal of Pavia, from bringing in of any forces. The Cardinal fainting, & fearing the armed multitude should seek reuenge for their honourable Citizens, whose heads hee had lately cut off, as fauours to the Bentiuoles, flies in the night disguised into the Citadell, and from thence towards Imola with an hundred horse.

The Legats flight being knowne, the people began to sound out the name Popolo, with great mutiny and tumult. Laurence Ariosto, Francis Rinsch, and other Captaines of the towne, affected to the Bentiuoles, runne to the gates of S. Felix and Lames: breake them downe, call the Bentiuoles, and receiue them into the towne. The Duke of Vrbins aduertised of the Legats flight, and of the peoples rising, dislodged in the night, (leauing most part of his tents and pavilions standing) with all his army, except such as for the guard of the campe were on the other side of the river towards the French, to whom he gave no intelligence of his departure. The people understanding of his retreat, and the peasants coming downe from all parts, with great cries and shouts, pursue them, take fifteen peeces of great artillery, and many lesse, the D. of Urbins handred, their munition and baggage. The fouldiers had time to save themselves, whilst that Raphael of Pissi, one of the capitaines of the Church, made a stand at the bridge of Rene, vntill that by the taking thereof, and rout of all his people, the whole army had a free passage to Bologna. A victory extraordinarily happy, having in one night conquered a great city, and without perill or fight broken a whole army. The Bishop Vitelli held the Citadell, and Vilfranch, posting thither in the night, perswades him to deliver it into the Emperors hands: but three thousand Ducats which the Bolois gave him, made him to open the gates: the people having recovered it, and to free themselves both from subiection, and the jealousy of nations, and also from the feare they had lest the King should retaine it, ruined it to the ground. The Duke of Ferrara making his profit of this victory, recovered Cente, Pieve, Cotignole, Lugo and other townes of Romagna.

At the same time the Emperors and the Kings Deputies, assisted by the Cardinals S. Croix, S. Male, Baioux, Cosenso, Albert, and many others, publish a Council at Pisa for the first of September, which was lately returned to the obedience of the Florentines. To crosse this Council, the Pope (following the advice of Anthony de Mami of S. Sanjoun, one of the eight Cardinals newly created at Rauenna, appointed a general Council the 1 of May, at S. Iohn de Lateran in Rome. And to keepe the Kings for ever quiet, he colourably gave care to a peace, which the Bishop of Tiouli his Nuncio, and the King of Scots Ambassador treated for him with the King, and the Cardinals of Nantes and Strigonia with the Pope. But these practices of Peace are broken by the Popes infirmity, which having brought him euen to the pits brink, gave him yetre spit to stir vp long calamities. Iulius is no sooner freed from the danger of death, but makes a new league with the Senate of Venice and the King of Arragon, against the French: to maintain (said he) the vnion of the church, to defend it from apparant schisme, and to recover all such places, as mediately or immediately depended on the Church.

The first of September was come, when as the Cardinals Attornies, in their names do celebrate the acts appertaining to the opening of the Council of Pisa. And the Pope much incensed, that the Florentines had yielded to the celebration of this petty council (as he termed it) in their estate, declared Florence and Pisa, subiect to the Ecclesiasticall censure, by vertue of the Bull of the council which he had caused to be published: and he pronounced the aboue named Cardinals fallen from the dignity of Cardinal, and subiect to the punishments of hereticks and schismaticks. The Florentines and Pisans appeal from this curse to the holy Council (not of Pisa, but to erre least in their termes) of the vniuersall Church: and by the Magistrates commandement, the Priests continue the publike celebration of diuine seruice in their Churches. The pretext to reforme the Church was goodly and of great profit. But oh pleasant reformers! the Authors of this Council, thrust on by their own priuate ambitious designs, vnder colour of a general good, contented of their own priuate interest, so as euery one might plainly see, that whoeuer should be chosen Pope, would haue no lesse neede of reformation, then those they now undertook to reform. So as euen at their first entry the Cardinals tried both the contempt & hatred of the Commons. They call the Clergy to assist in the cathedral Church at the first session. No one appeares, the Priests deny their ornaments to the Cardinals offering to celebrate the masse, and shut the Church doores, so as the Cardinals, fearing they should not remaine safe at Pisa, vnlesse they were backt with foraigne forces, and the Florentines vnwilling to admit any, remembering the Pisans rebellion vnder Charles the eighth, they decreed to haue the Council transported to Milan. They found the like difficulties at Milan. The Clergy abstaing from saying seruice, as before accused persons: the Commons curse them and laugh at them in open streets, namely at the Cardinal of S. Croix chosen President of the Council, whom euery one noted to bee the author of this assembly, hoping by fauour thereof to make himselfe a foot-stoole to climbe to the Popedom. This refusal of the Milanois made them againe to transport the Council to Lions. Where Iulius being suspended from his Popedom, and prohibitions made throughout all France, not to send any money to Rome, nor to bring any bulls from thence, he

A he did not only excommunicate all the French, but also granted Bulls of pardon & remission, to any one that should kill a French man: giuing the Realme of France (& that of Nauarre, in hatred of Iohn of Albret allied to the King, and at the perswasion of Ferdinand King of Arragon, who had long gaped after some occasion to lay hold of it,) in prey to the first conqueror. So this council did nothing but increase their spleenes and kindle new troubles. But as the King had an intent to assaile Romagna, or to maintain the war in anothers Country, attending his owne coming in person the next spring with all the forces of his Realme, beheld 10000 Suisses, with seven field peeces (new raised by the Cardinal of Sion, vnder the authority of Iulius) enter by Varese and Galete, and from thence they send a trumpeter to desire Gaston of Foix, D. of Nemours, who with the Council of Triuulce commanded the French armies, as Lieutenant General to the King his Vncle. Gaston (having speedily assembled 700 horse, and such foot as the vrgent necessity would suffer him, the companies being diuided into sundry garisons) presents himselfe before Galete, with much artillery. The Suisses go forth in battell: yet vnwilling to fight in so open a place, they retire to Busli. In the meane time, the companies of men at armes, and foot, come from all parts to Milan. Captaine Molare with his Gascons came from Verona, & the Lanquenets from Carpi, who reuiued the spirit of the Milanois, being somewhat danted by this sudden descent. And the more, for that certaine letters were surprised which the Suisses had written to their Lords, that they had no newes, neither of the Pope, nor of the Venetian army. So as having found some difficulty to passe the river of Adde, they tooke (as in their first journey) the way to Como, and to euery one to his home. Shewing, that for want of conduct, assistance and pay, they doe commonly terrifie more then hurt.

After the Suisses retreat, behold all the townes the Ferrarois held in Romagna were exposed in prey to the Spaniards, being ioyned to the forces of the Church, who assembling at Imola, a thousand men at armes, eight hundred Genetaires, and eight thousand Spanish foot, with many Barons of the Realme of Naples, vnder the command of Fabrice Colonne, their General, and for the Pope eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and eight thousand Italians, vnder Marke Anthony Colonne, Iohn Vitelli, Ma- D lastly son to Iohn Paul Bailion, Raphael of Pissy, and others, all subiect to the command of the Cardinal of Medicis, Legat in the army, resolving to besiege Bologna. The Duke of Nemours had put into it, (besides the inhabitants and some horse and foot entertained by the Bentiuoles) two thousand Lanquenets, and two hundred Lances vnder Odet, son to Peter of Foix Viconte of Laurec, Tues of Alegre, Anthony of Fayet, Peter Terrail, surname Captaine Bayard, and in the meane time assembled all the forces of Italy together at Final, to preserve Bologna from the enemy. Already a hundred fadome to the wall nere to S. Stephens gate was layed euen with the ground, the Tower at the gate was already abandoned, and the Spaniards had planted an ensigne vpon the wall, when as the besieged placing their Cannon in counterbattery, and hauing slaine some of them that were mounted, they forced them to retire in disorder.

These first attempts had troubled the people, if Gaston had not suddenly re-enforced the Towne with a thousand foot, and a hundred and fourescore Lances. The besieged thus fortified, a strange successe doubles their courage. Peter of Nauarre hauing set fire to a myne which he had made at the port of Chastillon, where there was a chappell, both the wall and the Chappell leaped so into the aire, as the army without discovered the towne plainly, and the fouldiers prepared to defend the assault, but both the wall and Chappell falling downe, settled in the same place from whence the violence of the fire had forced them. Doubtlesse the Bolois had reason to make a miracle of this accident, and to beleeue, that this fall vpon the same foundation, was a manifest testimony of Gods assistance. This happy successe brought Gaston to Brescia, whither the Venetian army marched, to effect some intelligences: but perswaded by the Captaines of Bologna, that his absence would double the enemies courage, he parts from Final, and marching all night (notwithstanding the snow, and violent winds) entred the City in the morning, with thirtene hundred lances, six thousand Lanquenets, and 8000 French and Italians, before the enemy had any notice thereof: who being assured of the truth, retired their artillery secretly, and tooke the way to Imola. In the meane time Andrew Griiti, general of the Venetians (perswaded by Count Lewis Auogare, and the most part of the Countrymen) had had taken the towne of Brescia by assault, where James of Aillon Lord of Lude kept the Castle still. People newly conquered do commonly the like in all occasions. Bergamo (the two castles excepted) Orciuiche, Orcinoue, Pontuque, and many places thereabouts, obey the victors. The Duke of Nemours leaving 300 lances, and 4000 foot in Bologna, posted with all speed to Brescia, and having intelligence that John Paul Bailion lodged in the Isle of Elcale, with 300 men at armes, 400 light horse, and 1200 foot, he goes to charge them with 300 lances, and 700 Archers; having overtaken them (as they were ready to passe the river of Adice) at the tower of Magnanine, he chargeth them, defeats them and kills almost a hundred horse, takes many prisoners (amongst others Guy of Raigon, and Balhazar Signorel of Perugia) dispersed all his foot, (whereof the most part were drowned in passing) and takes two Fauconeux which he had. The next day in an encounter, he defeated Meleager of Furl, Captaine of the Venetian light horse, the commander remaining prisoner: for continuing his designe, he arrived at Brescia nine daies after his departure, besieged it, takes it by force, and sacks it. Doubtlesse this braue Prince did hazard his owne ruine, if he had not, with great judgment and order, commanded, that no man should looke to any spoile, before the towne were fully at his command. And hee did well put it in practice, as the first that made shew to abandon his ranke, was slaine by his companions. But who doth vie such discipline at this day, when as being greedy of booty, they lose to goodly occasions? Our French lost some men at armes, and many foot: but the enemy lost about eight thousand: some being inhabitants armed, some Venetians, who were five hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, two hundred Stradiots or Carbins, and eight thousand foot. Frederick Contarin Commiffary of the Stradiots was slaine. Andrew Gritti, Anthony Iustinian, John Paul Manfron and his sonne, the Cheualier Folpe, Balhazar of Scipione, one of the sonnes of Anthony of Picé, Count Lewis Augere his two sons, and Dominique Busche captaine of the Stradiots were prisoners. Count Lewis and his children (the chiefe authors of this rebellion) were afterwards behadded. A renolt dearly bought by this City, which yielded not to any other in Lombardy, in Nobility and dignity, and in wealth (next vnto Milan) it exceeded all the rest.

This chastisement made Bergamo and the other revolted Townes, to call backe the French whom they had lately expelled. These prizes and reprints, conquests & happy successesse, prolonged the stay of the French in Italy, and yet they did nothing fertile their safeties, seeing what they enjoyed, was rather a charge and expence to them, then any profit. But behold strange crosses both by land and sea, doe hereafter bandy against the happiness of our men. They give the King intelligence from Rome, that Henry the eight King of England (notwithstanding his promise) was ioynd in league with the Pope, and it was confirmed by writing, that a Galliesse laden with wines, corne, & other provision, arriving in England from the Pope, had exceedingly altered Henry, with the Nobility, Clergie, and commons of England. That he should with his army at sea invade the coasts of Normandy & Britany, and send 8000 foot into Spaine, to begin war in Guienne jointly with the Arragonies. And they made already great preparations of men and shipping in England, and likewise of ships in Spaine, to passe into England.

Moreover, the Emperor was altered and changed in his affection, complaining that the King (contrary to the capitulation of Cambray) did hinder the advancement of the Empire in Italy. He required that René the Kings youngest daughter should be promised to Charles his grandchild, giuing him Bourgogne in dowry; and that the Lady should then be presently deliuered into his custody. That the controuersies for Ferrara, Bologna, and the Countess should be referred to him. And moreover, having made a truce with the Venetians for eight moneths, hee protested, not to suffer the King to increase his estate in Italy: But these were but bare shifts to couer his bad intent. Besides, the Cantons of the Suisses were so incensed against this Crowne, that although the King sought to win their loues with store of gold, yet the persuasions of the Cardinall of Sion (whereby wee may see that Cardinals haue beene alwaies dealers in matters of State) had newly made them grant to the confederates a leauie of fixe thousand men. And the Pope, to straine all his strings against our Lewis, fearing lest his extreame rigour should induce the Florentines to follow the Kings fortune, to the prejudice of his designes, hee reuokes, without any lute, the censures whereunto he had bound them.

To quench this fire before it flamed farther, the King commanded his Nephew to march

A march with speed against the confederates army, of whom he promised himselfe the victory, being amazed and the weaker, and then to assaile Rome & the Pope with all violence, desiring that this war (so seeme the lesse odious) should be made in the name of the council called first at Pisa, and that a Legat deputed by the Councell, should receive the conquered Townes, in the name thereof. The Cardinall of S. Seuerin was appointed Legate of Bologna in the army. So the duke of Nemours furnishing all places with men necessary for defence, gathers together all the forces the King had in Italy, hee makes an army of 1600 Lances, 5000 Laniquenets, 5000 Galfons, and 8000 French & Italians, to whom the Duke of Ferrara added an hundred at armes, two hundred light horse, and a great quantity of good artillery: Gascon having left his at Finall by reason of the bad way. The enemies army was 1400 men at armes, a thousand light horse, seven thousand Spaniards, and three thousand Italians newly leauied.

Gascon thrust forward aswell by the Kings command, as by his owne valour and desire of glory, was desirous to see if the enemy would willingly try the hazard of a battell. They on the other side temporized, attending their Suisses, and that the English and Spaniards beginning war in France, should force the King to call backe all, or the greatest part of his troopes: and yet coasted alongst the French army, lest the townes of Romagnia should be leit in prey, and the way layed open to goe to Rome, lodging alwaies in strong places, neere to some strong towne, which might serue them for a retreat at need. So the Duke of Nemours (not able to cut off their victuals through the commodity they had of the townes of Romagnia, nor force them to fight, without great disadvantage) goes and incamps before Rauenna, hoping they would not be so base minded, as to suffer such a City to be lost before their eyes: and by this means an occasion should be offered to fight with them in an equall place.

The enemy discovering this purpose, sends Marke Anthony Colonne to Rauenna, with three score men at men of his company, Peter of Castre with an hundred light horse, Sallear and Parades with fixe hundred Spaniards. The towne is seated betwixt two riuers, Ronque and Montone, which defending from the Appenine hills, straiten themselves neere vnto Rauenna, with so small a distance, that on either side they passe close to the D wallen, then ioyning together they run into the sea three miles from thence. Gascon incamps himselfe betwixt the two riuers, and plants his artillery, some against the tower of Ronconne betwixt Port Adrian and Ronque, and some on the other side of the riuier Montone, whither almost halfe his troopes were passed to batter in diuers places, and to hold the riuier at his will. He barters the wall, makes a breach of thirty fadome, chooseth ten out of euery company of men at armes to couer the foot: diuides his army into three squadrons, and gives a furious assault, although they could not mount but with ladders, the wall remaining yet about three yards high. Those within maintaine it valiantly, and fighting the space of three houres, in the end they repulse our men with the losse of three hundred foot and some men at armes, with a great number hurt: amongst others the Lord of Chafillon, master of the Ordnance, and Spineuse, who being hurt with the Artillery from the Towne, died within few daies after. In the meane time the Citizens amazed, and fearing a more dangerous charge, treated of their yielding without the consent of Marke Anthony Colonne, when as behold, the enemy comes, marching to their succour, who camps at Moulinache three miles from Rauenna, fortifying themselves with a trench, such as the shortness of time would permit, leauing an entry of about twenty fadomes.

Gascon raised the siege, turnes the mouth of the Cannon towards the enemies, on Easter day the eleuenth of Aprill, passeth Ronque, leauing his rereward led by Iues d'Aligre vpon the riuers side towards Rauenna, to succour the army at need; to make head against those that should issue out of the towne; and to keepe the bridge which they had made vpon the riuier of Montone: then disposing of his troopes, hee giues the auant guard to the Duke of Ferrara, the battell to the Lord of Palisse, and the Cardinall of Saint Seuerin, who great both in mind and body, couered from the head to the foot with most glittering armes, performed the office of a captaine rather then of a Prelate. Gascon referred to himselfe no private charge, but would be free, to see, and succor in all places: the beauty of his armes, his callooke, his cheerefull countenance, his eyes full of vigour & sparkling for ioy, made him very apparent. The enemy seeing our French passe the riuier, were ranged in battell battell. Fabrice Colonne led the foreward, the Cardinall of Medicis, Legat of the Council of Lateran, the battell: but (a fatal sign) in a peacefull habit: Carnagial a Spanish Captaine, the reerward. So the two armies approaching one the other, stood immovable about two houres, the enemies being loth to abandon the circuit of their palisado, The Spaniards artillery thunders, and at the first volley ouerthrew many French.

The French answers, but with a greater losse to their horse. Peter of Nauarre having caused the foot to couch flat vpon their bellies, Fabrisio cries, presteth, and importunes, to go to the battell, and not to suffer them to be consumed by the Cannon. The Namarois contradicts, presuming that the more the danger increased, the more famous would the victory be which hee expected. But the Cannon had so scourged their men at armes and light horse, as they could no longer keepe their ranks. There might you see men and horse fall dead to the ground, heads, armes and legges flie into the aire, when as Fabrisio cries out: Shall wee die shamefully here, by the obstinacy and malice of a villaine? Shall this army be consumed, without the death of any one enemy? must the honor of Spaine, and Italy, be lost for the pleasure of a Namarois? Speaking thus, he presteth out of the trench with his company, all the horsemen follow him, the foot rise, and with fury charge the Lanque- ners. All the squadrons ioyne, danger, glory, hope and hatred of nation against nation, flesh them in the combat. Fabrisio Colonne is already taken by the Duke of Ferraraes companie, Alegre chargeth in flanke with his reerward. The Viceroy of Naples and Carnagial are put to flight, leading with them almost a whole squadron. The light horse are dis-ranked, and the Marquis of Pescara their Captaine prisoner, being covered with wounds and blood. The Marquis of Padilia is likewise defeated with his squadron, and taken prisoner. The Italian foot shrunke and began to turne their backs, if the Spaniards had not speedily come to second them against the Lanqueeners. But all the horsemen fled, and the Spanish Battalion retired in order, when as Gaston turning to charge them with a great troop of horse, not holding the victory absolute, if those retired whole, he went courageously to assaile them. But alas, as they charge the hindermost, they are inuironed by this battalion, cut in peeces for the most part, and hee (throwne vnder his horse) was slaine, being thrust into the flanke with a pike. Doubtlesse a happy death for him, hauing this content in his soule, to die in so yong an age, honored with so much glory, the which he had purchased in few months by so many and so notable victories: but a fatal victory, polluted with the death of so braue a Commander, who but euen now began to make his name and his valor knowne, and by his fall caried with him the happiness of the French, and the strength of this army.

The Vicount of Laurec his cousin, remained almost dead by him, maymed with twenty wounds: but led after wards to Ferrara, and being carefully looked vnto, hee escaped, to doe the King notable seruice. Gaston being dead, the Spaniards retire without trouble or lett: the rest of the army is broken and dispersed. The baggage taken, ensignes and artillery: prisoners of marke, Fabrisio Colonne, the Marquises of Pescara and Padilia, Ekelle and Bitonto, the Earle of Monteleone, Iohn of Cardone, Peter of Nauarre, many Barons and Noblemen Spaniards, Neapolitans and Italians, and the Legat of the Council of Lateran. There were slaine according to the common estimation, ten thousand, and a third of the French, amongst which were Alegre and Vincerois his sonne, Raimond of S. Maur, Molere and some other Galcoine Captaines, Iacob Colonnell of the Lanqueeners, a braue man, and commended to haue assisted much with his troope for the winning of this victory. Two thirds of the enemies, but almost all their chiefe Captaines and the brauest of their army, a great number hurt, and most of them that fled, were stript & beaten downe by the Countrymen, which lay in troopes by the way. And (for the last act of this Papall tragedy) Raenna is taken by assault and cruelly sackt, and spoiled. Imols, Furly, Cesena, Rimini and all the farts of Romagnia followed the victors fortune, and the Legat of the Council of Pisa, receiues them all in the name of the said Council. The body of Gaston was caried to Milan, with an honorable conuoy, in a litter followed by the aboue-named prisoners, and interred with a wonderful mournfull pompe, namely of the fouldiers, whose hearts he had so wonne, as they protested that nothing was impossible vnto them, vnder the leading of such a Commander. And the King his vncle, receiuing these heauy tidings, *I would to God (said he) I were driven out of Italy, so as my Ne- phew de Foix and the other Noblemen liued. A quibse once more after this sort, we shall be vanquished. Without doubt hee had reason; for that thurtime this armie (not able to finde a Commander of that credit) on the one side rich with spoile, on the other weak both of force and courage, by this so bloody a victory, seemed rather vanquished then victorious. This battell had filled the Court of Rome with terror and tumult, and the Cardinalls running to the Pope, prest him with instant prayers to accept a peace, with such conditions as the King offered by the Cardinalls of Nantes and Strigonia, wherewith the King was yet content, notwithstanding the happy successe of his affaires: That Bolegnia, Lugo and all other towne, which Alphonsus held in Romagnia, should be restored, and the Council of Pisa dissolved. Iulius seeing these conditions very honourable for him, and that vnder colour of these parties he should stay the Kings army, vntill he heard the resolution of those, on whom hee grounded the rest of his hopes, subscribed these articles nine daies after the battell, promising on his faith to the Cardinalls, to accept them. But our Lewis must try once more, how dangerous it is to moue a warlike nation. The Suisses wonderfully discontented with the Kings refusal to increase their pensions, by whose valour (said they) hee had conquered so great Estates without his Realme, and for that he had entertained Lanqueeners, as if he had meanes to make warre without their forces, they haue no sooner receiued a florine of the Rhine for euery man from the Pope (whereas before the King was enforced to giue much gold, and great presents to their Colonels, to haue them fight) but descending into Lombardy with Cleuen or eight thousand men, they force Palisse Lieutenant generall of the Kings army, to retire to defend the Estate of Milan, Robert Yrfin, Pompey Colonne, Anthony Saucelle, Peter Margane and Rance Mancin had (since the battell) accepted the Kings pay, and now the descent of the Suisses, and the dislodging of Palisse, makes some to lead such men as they had leauied with the Kings money vnto the Pope, others retaine the money to themselves, only Margane (more modest then the rest) restores it againe. All this freed the Pope from feare, and confirmed him in his obstinacy. He begins the Council of Lateran the 3 of May, pronounceth a monitory vnto the Kings: That he deliver (vpon the paines set downe by the holy Canons) the Cardinall of Medicis, taken prisoner in the warre, being at Milan: and after some sessions he surceaseth, to attend the war.

Iohn Paul Bailon, Generall of the Venetian army, attended the Suisses in the territories of Verona with foure hundred men at armes, 800 light horse, and 6000 foot: being ioynd, they surpris'd a letter which Palisse did write to the Generall of Normandy, who remained at Milan: That it would be very hard to resist the enemies, if they turned towards the Duchy of Milan: A sufficient instruction to direct them in their course, which makes them to march towards Milan. Palisse had not with him aboue a thousand lances, and fixe or seuen thousand foot, all his other troopes being diuided into places for defence, and this generall of Normandy, as bad a warriour as a treasurer (I would not forget to name him, if I had learned his name) hauing after the battell of Raenna, vnder color of sparing for the king, contrary to the disposition of present affaires, indiscreetly discharged the Italian foot & some French. And besides the small number of men, the diffention and disobedience of Captaines, and the fouldiers contempt of their Commander, ioynd with the discomforts of a tired army: a Generall little regarded, ill accompanied, in a Country farre from succours, enuironed with mighty and many enemies, must needs produce some great and sudden disorder.

The best meanes our Captaines could finde, was to abandon the field, and disperse their troopes into the most important places. In Brescia 2000 foot, a hundred and fifty lances, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentines: in Crema fifty lances, and 1000 foot in Bergamo, a thousand foot, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentines. The remainder of the army consisting of six hundred lances, two thousand French foot, and foure thousand Lanqueeners retired to Pontique, a strong place of situation, and fit to succor Milan, Cremonia, Brescia, Bergamo, and to withstand the enemy. But it is a great inconuenience to rely most vpon foraigne forces, so subiect to change. The Emperour giues the first stroke, hee calls home his Lanqueeners, and their departure making Palisse lose all hope of possibillity to defend the Duchy of Milan, he retires to Pisqueton. So the Cremonois abandoned yeeldes (except the Castle) at the first approach of the confederates, and pay forty thousand Ducats to the Suisses. Certaine banished men returning into Bergamo, cause a revolt, and Palisse being too weak to stop the enemies passage ouer ouer the river of Adde, puts himselfe into Pavia. But hee fought to prevent the ruine of a great building with a rush. Then Iohn Iaques of Triulce, the Generall of Normandy, Anthony Maria Paluissin, Galas Visconte, and many other Gentlemen and seruants to the King, sauing themselves in Piedmont, leaue Milan in prey, which bound it selfe to the first summons to pay a great summe of money. Pavia battered, and abandoned by the French, is saued by the same means from spoile. All townes except Brescia and Crema, make haste to doe the like.

All the Country calls vpon the name of the Empire. All is taken and governed in the name of the holy League (for so they called it) the Cardinall of Sion governs all at his pleasure, and causeth all the taxes of the conquered townes to be given to the Swisses, so as vpon the brute of this money, an infinite number of other runne and ioyne with the first. Rimini, Cesenne, and Rauenna returne to the Popes obedience, Placentia and Parma yeeld willingly vnto him, as members of the government of Rauenna. The Swisses seize vpon Lucerne, the Grisons (who also in this crosse left the French alliance) vpon Volturne and Chiaouenne. Genoua rebels, expels the French, and Iohn Fregese, a Captaine in the Venetians army, returning, causeth himselfe to be created Duke, as his father had beene. At the same instant the Pope recouers all Romagna, the Bentiuoles abandon Bologna, and the Duke of Vrbino seizeth thereon in Iulius name. So euery one pulls his peece from the whole, and all these estates conquered with so great toyle: so much money, and such losse of blood, are lost at the first attempt, after this great victory of Ravenna, with little labour and lesse blood-shed. Truly, the best wits are confounded in the iudgement of these things, and we must confesse, that the issue of humane affaires depends of a higher Councell than that of Man. Notwithstanding, according vnto man, to whom shall wee impute the cause of these accidents, but to the death of the Duke of Nemours: for if he had liued, it is likely, that governing well his victory, hee had (with his helpe that giues and takes) reaped fruits worthy thereof. But greauisse comes neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the desert; for it is God which governes, heuple downe one and raise up another.

The Pope still gaped with his old ambition, to haue Ferrara in his power. But by the reuercession of the Marquis of Mantoua, the Ambassador of the King of Arragon (for that Alphonso was borne of a daughter of old Ferdinand King of Naples) and the Colonies, Alphonso hauing demanded and obtained pardon of the Pope, vpon promise hereafter to doe the deeds and duties of a faithfull feudatary & vassall of the Church, Iulius turns his reuenge vpon the companies, wherewith the Florentines had ayded the King, whom he caused to be spoiled by the Venetian souldiers, with the content of the Cardinall of Sion, who notwithstanding had giuen them a passport to passe safely into Tuscane. And by the practices of the said Iulius, who (according to the ancient desire of all Popes) sought to haue authority in this common weale, the Medicis, with the helpe of the confederates, returned to Florence, and serled themselves by force in the dignity which their father was wont to enjoy. Italy being for this time freed from the feare of the French forces, the King holding nothing but Brescia, Crema, Legnague, the Chastelet and the Lanterne at Genoua, the Castles of Milan, of Cremona, and some other forts: all these confederates gaged after the Duchy of Milan: and the Swisses (on whom the Pope then partly depended) opposing themselves, not to suffer this estate to fall into the hands of any other Prince, but of such one as could not maintaine himselfe without their ayde and succor; Maximilian grand-child to Lodowike Sforze, was named D. of Milan, who made his entry in the end of December, receiuing the keys into the hands of the Cardinall of Sion, as confirming the said Maximilian. That hee held the possession of Milan in the Swisses name. An honorable act and worthy of their generosity, not to yeeld the honor which belonged vnto them to the other confederates, the which notwithstanding they should much esteeme, and (it may be) might haue obtained it for money: Nauarre returns soone after to the obedience of Sforze.

Then the Genouois recouered the Chastelet of Genoua, for ten thousand Ducats giuen to the Captaine, and the Venetians besieging Brescia, Aubigni who defended it, resolues to deliuer it to the Spaniards, to breed a ialousie betwixt them, euen as a few daies before Palisse had giuen Legnague to the Emperour, to nourish a discord betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians, who besieged it. Ottavian Sforze Bishop of Lode, and

Anew league
where the Venetians are excluded.

A gouernor of Milan, sent foure thousand Swisses to conquer Crema, for Maximilian Sforze: but Benedict Cribario, corrupted by gifts, deliuered it to the Venetians, with the content of the Lord of Duras, who kept the Castle. This was of purpose to breed a diuision betwixt the Swisses and the Venetians. A Councell generally concluded by the French, which remained of this shipwrack, the which in the end wrought some effects: but the losse fell vpon the French, for with this first disdaine of the Venetians against the Emperour by reason of Legnague, beheld a new leaue of discontent is layed by the Bishop of Gurce, Maximilian ambassador at Rome. He made great instance, that the Venetians should deliuer Vincenza to the Emperour, whereunto, neither solicitings, intreatings, nor the Popes threats could induce the Venetians. The Pope (desiring to gratifie Maximilian: that in his fauor hee should approve the Councell of Lateran against that of Pisa) protested to the Ambassadors of Venice: That he should be forced to pursue their common weale both with spirituall and temporall armes. So as nothing moued with this protestation, the Pope, the Emperour, and the Arragonois renew the league of Cambray, declaring the Venetians to be excluded. So the Emperour (by the Bishop of Gurce, in the next session of this Councell of Lateran) disauowed all them that had fled his name in the Councell of Pisa, and allowed that of Lateran.

In the meane, the six thousand English (promised by Henry King of England) were arriued at Fontaraby, a towne seated vpon the Ocean, and frontier of the realme of Spaine towards France, to assaile ioyntly (according to the conuentions of the two Kings of Arragon and England, father in law and son) the Duchy of Guienne, vpon this pretext the Arragonois had intreated Iohn, sonne to Alain of Albret King of Nauarre, (by reason of Katherine of Foix his wife, heire of the said Realme) to remaine a neuter betwixt the King of France & him, and that for the assurance thereof, he should deliuer certaine places into his hands, promising to re-deliver them when the war should be ended. But the Nauarrois, knowing well the demanders intent, obtains a promise of succor from King Lewis, who, to free himselfe from the Arragonois forces, treated with the Duke of Alua Lieutenant generall for Ferdinand in this army. But when the one party is vigilant and polike, and the other slothfull, there soone appears great effects. The industry and vigilancy of Ferdinand, the slacknesse and too great facility of Lewis, who (abused with the policy and deuices of his nephew) did equally hurt the Nauarrois, who surred himselfe likewise to be deceived with the fraudulent hopes wherewith the Arragonois entertained him, who (seeing the succors of France far off, the Realme vnfurnished of forces, and the places not yet fortified) enters into Nauarre, takes Pampelune, and the other Townes of the Realme, abandoned by Iohn (being vnable to defend it) who fled into Bearne.

And hauing no lawfull title to possesse it, publisheth, that he is lawfully seized thereon, by the authority of the Apostolike see, whereby the said Realme was giuen to the first that should conquer it, by reason of the alliance which Iohn had with the French King, a sworn enemy to the Church, and by the Popes bull, who being subiect to the censure, as Heretikes and schismarikes. Without doubt the Pope holds not this prerogative of Iesus Christ, to giue Kingdomes, and to expose them in prey: for he exhorted to yeeld to, and not to take from Cesar: & the Apostles did not busie themselves, to diuide earthly possessions. Moreover, it is lawfull for the Pope to vsurpe another mans right, giue away that which is not his owne, and consequently to vse the spirituall sword against those he cannot iudge, hauing declared himselfe a party: After the Conquest of Nauarre, the English perswaded Ferdinand to the siege of Bayonne, who without this place made no reckoning of the rest of Guienne. But he held that which he long wished for, as a commodious Country and very necessary for the safety of Spaine, and could not affect the war on this side the Pyreneé mountains. So as the English, seeing that Ferdinand did vse them onely to satissie his priuate couetousnesse, tooke shipping and sayled into England.

To recouer this viurped Realme, the King sent Francis Duke of Longueuille, gouernor of Guienne, Charles duke of Bourbon, son to Gilbert late Vice-roy of Naples, Odet of Foix Vicount of Lautrec, Iohn of Chabannes Lord of Palisse Marshall of France, Peter of Terrail, the Lords of Maugiron, Lude, Barbezieux, Turenne, Elcars, Ventadour, Pompadour, and other valiant Captaines, with the old bands and Gascons, which hee assembled from all parts. But the army being diuided by the dissention of the Duke of Longueuille, who as Gouernour of Guienne, pretended the command to belong vnto him:

Nauarre taken by the King of

and the Duke of Bourbon unwilling to yield unto him, by reason of his quality, proued a fruitlesse for the King of Nauarre. Thus the Realme of Nauarre was invaded by the Spaniard, who remained master thereof. The departure of the English, and the enterprise of Nauarre being made frustrate, the King affects the affaires of Milan, with greater vehemency, whilst that the Caffe, and that of Cremona held good: but the opposition of so many enemies bred many letts. There were many hopes to draw some one of these from this common alliance. The Bishop of Gurche had courteously giuen care to a friend of the Cardinall of Saint Seuerins, whom the Queene of France had sent vnto him, and held one of his people at the Kings Courto make a motion, that the King should bind himselfe to aide the Emperor against the Venetians: that Charles grand-child to Maximilian, should marry with the Kings yongest daughter, to whom he should giue the Duchy of Milan in dowry: that the King should yield vnto them the rights he pretended to the Realme of Naples, and that the said duchy being recouered, Cremona and Guiradade should be held by the Emperour. Morouer the Venetians were wonderfully grieved at the Popes new treaty with the Emperour: which put the King in hope to draw the Venetians vnto him. The Arragonois came betweene by a politicke stratageme: to assure his new conquest of Nauarre, he had sent two Fryers into France (it is the Spaniards custome to manage affaires by the meanes of religious persons, to make their negotiations the more graue, and to colour their policies with more subtilty) to treat with the Queene, touching a general peace, or a priuate betwixt the two Kings. The amity of the Swisss did import much, but rememb'ring that by their forces, Charles the 8 had first troubled the peace of Italy; Lewis his succellour, by meanes thereof had conquered the estate of Milan, recouered Genoua, and outthrowne the Venetians; that at this present the Pope and other Porentates of Italy paid their annual pensions, to be receined into their confederacie: They grew obdurate in refusing the Kings alliance, which hee fought by the Lords of Tremouille and Triuulce. In the end, the King (being reiecte by the Swisss) seekes to the Venetians, who conclude to make a league with the King, according to the capitulations made formerly betwixt them, by the which Cremona & Guiradade should remaine to them. Robertet, Secretary of State, Triuulce, and almost all the chief of the Councell approued this league. But the perswasions of the Cardinall of S. Seuerin opposit to Triuulce, and the Queenes authority, (who desired much the greauesse of her daughter by the foresaid marriage, so as the might remaine with her vntill the consummation thereof) made the King and his Councell incline to the Emperors partie. But discouering that these were but practises of the Emperour, to make the King proceede more coldly in his courses, he loone gaue it ouer.

Whilst that armes ceased on all sides, the Popes passions increased. Hee reuolued his designs against Ferraro, Sienna, Luques, Florence and Genoua; and as if it had beene in his power to beat all the world at one instant: he thrust the King of England into war, in whose fauour he had dispatche a Bull in the Councell of Lateran, whereby the title of Most Christian was giuen vnto him, and the Realme of France againe abandoned to him: that should conquer it. But as he deuised of all these things, and without doubt of many other greater designs (according to the capacity of his turbulent spirit) death ended the course of his present toyles, the one and twentieth day of February at night.

A Prince doubtlesse of great courage, of admirable constancy; and most worthy of glory, if he had directed his intentions to aduance the Church by peace, as he sought to grow great in temporall things, by policies in warre. John Cardinall of Medice succeded him, and was called Leo the tenth. The happy memory of his father, his lawfull election, free from bribes and simmony, his faire conditions, his liberality and mildnesse of spirit, gaue great hope of the quiet of Christendome. Yet soone after his enstallment, he shewed plainly that he was rather a successor of his predecessors hatred and conetous passions, then of S. Peter. According to the treaty of the above named Fryers, the Kings of France and Arragon concluded a truce, whereby our Lewis, having more liberty to thinke of the warres of Milan, refused to send an army, knowing well that the people of that estate, oppressed with excessive taxes, leauied to pay the Swisss, and with the lodging and payment made to the Spaniards, desired earnestly to returne to his obedience. And to make this enterprise more easie, the accord proposed before with the Venetians was againe renewed: so as the Venetians considering, that a concord with Maximilian

(keeping

Peace betwixt the King of France and the Venetians.

A (keeping Verona from them) was not sufficient to protect them from troubles and dangers, and that hardly they should get such an occasion to recouer their estate, they binde themselves by Andrew Gritt: To aide the King with eight hundred men at armes, fiftene hundred light horse, and ten thousand foot: to recouer Als, Genoua and the Duchy of Milan. And the King, to assist them, vntill they had recouered all they had possessed in Lombardy, and in the Marquisate of Treuise before the treaty of Cambray.

The King knew well, it was but labour lost to seeke the Pope, who desired to haue no Frenchman in Italy. Yet the deuotion hee had to the Romane sea, made him sue vnto Leo, not to hinder him in the recouery of the above named places, offering not onely to passe any further, but also at all times to make such peace with him as hee pleased. But Leo treating the steps of his Predecessor, perswades the King of England to ioine with the Arragonois in the inuasion of France, according to the Bull giuen by Iulius, hee protested to continue in the league made with the Emperour, with the Catholike King, and with the Swisss.

The King thus frustrate of a peace with the Pope, sends the Lord of Triuulce, with fiftene hundred Lances, eight hundred light horse, and fiftene thousand foot, halfe French and halfe Venetians. The whole Country was already in a mutiny, the Earle of Mufficque, son to John James of Triuulce, was entred into Als & Alexandria, the French had taken Cremona, Sonzin, Lode, and other places neere, and the Milanois had excused themselves to their Duke, who was at Nauarre: for that hauing no man to defend them, they made their composition with the French, yet giuing him hope to returne to his subiection, when as the Swisss and his confederats should ioine in field. Bartholomew of Aliuane, Generall of the Venetian army, had taken Valege, Pelquier & Brescia, when as the Kings army at last approaching to Genoua, and finding Othobon and Sinibaud, the sons of Lewis of Fiesque, leading foure thousand foot, and on the other side Antonel and Ierome Adornes, with a great number of the Countrymen: they tooke Genoua from the Fregoses, where the victors entring (transported with the fury of reuenge) the two Fiesques brethren, caused Zachary brother to the duke of Genoua to be slaine, and then to be tied cruelly to a horse taile, and dragged through the City, being present a little before, at the death of Ierome their brother, who coming out of the Palace, had bene murdered by Lodowike and Fregosin, brothers to the Duke.

Genoa taken.

All this succeeded well, but forty thousand ducats, lately sent by the Pope to the Swisss, had drawne an infinite number into the estate of Milan, thrusting themselves into Nauarre, at the first brute that the French meant to besiege it. It was the same Nauarre, wherein Lodowik Sforze, father to this present duke, was taken prisoner. In the Kings campe were the same Capitaines, Tremouille and Triuulce, some of the same Ensignes and Colonels which had sold the father, accompanied the son in this warre. And these presumptions caused Tremouille to make this ouer-bold promise to the King: that he hoped to deliuer him the sonne prisoner in the same place, where before he had giuen him the father. The representation of what had past, comforts this hope: but let vs take heed, lest under this colour we grow insolent and carelesse. Now the arrogancy of our French, finds a firme resolution in the Swisss, whereof follows a strange catastrophe, and an overthrow of the designe. The army batters Nauarre furiously, and layes a great part of the wall euen with the ground: but whereas the descent was wonderful hard and dangerous, so as Tremouille aduertised, that new Swisss were entred into it, and that Alaisse, a very famous Colonell, brought a great number, which coming by the valley of Aoust, approached to Iuree, despairing to take the Towne, hee retired his campe, to goe fight with the succors that came, making his accompt to breake the enemies, rather by their owne disorders for want of pay, then by the force of his armes.

But by the perswasion of Adoin, one of their capitaines, ten thousand Swisss issue forth in the night, the sixt of Iune, without horses or artillery, against a mighty army, and better provided: they set vpon our French, not asleepe, but in a lodging vnfortified. The men at armes assemblé at the first alarme of their Centinells, range themselves in battell, and the foot vnder their colors. The artillery layed many Swisss on the ground, when as the Sunne beginning to appeare, the body of their army resolving rather to bee cut in peeces then retire, seuen thousand of them fall violently vpon the Lansquenets, who guarded the artillery: and 3000 of them plant themselves with their pikes charged against the horse. The Suisses and Lanquenets, thrust on with a mutuall hatred, and a desire of A victorie, hew one another with a bloody fury: one while the one shrinkes, is chased and recoyles, and then the other: filling the field with dead bodies, wounded men, and with blood, in view of the men at armes, lodged so as the could not succour the foot, by reason of brookes and ditches, that were betwixt them. So the Suisses after two houres combat remained victors, win the artillery, tunc the mouth of it against our men, and put both foot and horse to flight, of whom there is nothing remarkable observed, but that Robert of la Marck Lord of Sedan, understanding that Loranges and Lamets his sons, Colonels of the Regiments of Lanquenets, lay among the dead carcases, moved with fury and a fatherly affection, he runs into the midst of the Suisses troopes, and in despite of them, layes the eldest vpon his horse, and the youngest vpon one of his men at armes, bringing them aliue out of the conflict, being referred to shew future proofes of their valor. There died about fiftene hundred Suisses, with the author of this glorious Councell: Of ours, the most part of the Lanquenets fighting and of the French flying, vnto the number (as the Italian Authors say) of ten thousand. All the horse in a manner saued themselves: the Suisses not able to pursue them for want of horse, all their baggage was lost, and two and twenty peeces of great artillery, with all the horse appointed for the same. Doubtlesse it was one of the most glorious battels that euer the Suisses won: whereby wee observe, that to be surprized and preuented, takes away all iudgement of command from the best commanders, dants the fouldiers courage, and breeds confusion in order. This victory being got, ten, all places which had declared themselves for the French, craue pardon, and purchase their peace for money. Milan for two hundred thousand Ducats, and the rest according to their power, to be distributed to the Suisses, to whom was due the glory and profit of this victory gotten by their blood and valour. Ottavian Fregose (aided by three thousand Spaniards, commanded by the Marquis of Pescara) enters Genoua, and causeth himselfe (to the preiudice of John his brother) to bee created Duke of Genoua. Aluiane (feareing lest this happy successe of the Suisses and Spaniards should draw them vpon him) retires himselfe, takes Legnague from the Germanes, besiegeth Verona, but in vaine, and then lodgeth his army within Padua. The two chiefe Authors of the Councell of Pisa, Bernardin, Carnagial, and Fredericke of S. Seuerin, amazed with this rout, went and craued pardon of the Pope, and were restored to the ranke of Cardinals. In the end of the year, the Castle of Milan and Cremona, returned to the Duke of Milans obedience, so as the King held nothing in Italy, but the Lanterne of Genoua, the which we shall see taken and razed by the Genouois. Without doubt, he that seekes profit farre from his owne home, is oft times forced to returne poore and naked.

The King thus dispossessed of his estates in Italy, now turnes his thoughts and armes, to cross the attempts of Henry King of England, who having (at the Popes perswasion) resolved to invade the Realme of France, agrees with the Emperour to giue him sixscore thousand Ducats, to enter into Bourgongne at the same instant, with 3000 horse, and eight thousand foot, Germans and Suisses, promising the Suisses a certaine sum of money, to ioyne their forces with Maximilian, being content they should retain a part of Bourgongne, vntill they were fully satisfied. According to this agreement, the English enters the marches of Picardy, and camps before Therouenne, with sixe thousand horse, and about forty thousand foot. But the English forces did not molest France at land only, the Admirall of England ran along the coasts of Normandy & Britany. And the King to resist their incursions, caused foure Gallies to passe the straight of Gibraltar, vnder the charge of Captain Pregent. At the first encounter the Admirall chased Pregent into Brest. Here Pregent turnes his force, fights with the Admirall, and hurts him, whereof hee died within few daies after. After that, fourescore English ships, and twenty Normands and Brittons ships, fought with equal forces, ours hauing the winde. But in the end Primoguet a Britton, Capitaine of the Nunne, which Queene Anne had caused to be built, beset by ten or twelue English ships, and resolute to sell his death dearly, grappled with the Regent, the chiefe ship of the enemies fleet, and firing it, burnt both the one and the other, with all that was in them.

Therouenne was defended by two hundred and fifty Lances, and two thousand foot, whilst the King prepared 2500 Lances, ten thousand Lanquenets led by the Duke of Gueldres, sixe thousand others, which the Duke of Norfolk brought (being dead

A long before out of England) and ten thousand French, to succour the besieged, who in the meane time molested the enemy, day and night, with their artillery, with the which the great Chamberlaine of England was slaine, and Talbot capitaine of Calais lost a legges. The troopes assembled, the King sent them to Aire, vnder the command of Lewis of Longueuille, Marquis of Rotelin, Capitaine of an hundred Gentlemen of his household. Victuals grew scant in Therouenne, when as the Lord of Piments, Gouernour of Picardy, and the French Capitaine, chose out the most resolute of all their troopes, and gaue them charge to carry victuals to the Towne. And for that their enterprise had happily succeeded, rayting too confidently, and reproaching the cheery of cowardice, having no intelligence of their intent, the English having sent their horse, and fiftene thousand foot, to cut off our mens passage, who did ride on their naggies disarmed, they charge them vna- wares (being ready to wade through a riuer that passeth at Huchin,) they kill about three hundred, and take many prisoners: amongst others, the Marquis of Rotelin, Bayard le Feigne, Clermont of Aniou, and Bussy of Amboise: all the rest casting away their Lances, and trusting to their heeles, and horses, saued themselves by flight. And therefore they call it the battell of purres, which caused the yeelding of Therouenne, the which was dismantled, to take away all cause of discord, betwixt the Archduke Charles, (who by ancient right pretended it,) and the English who challenge it, as conquered from the enemy by the sword.

C. From Therouenne Henry went to campe before Tournay, following in this resolution, not so much the actions of a good Commander in the warre (seeing the taking of this place, lying within the Low Countries brought him small profit) as the perswasions of Maximilian, hoping that this towne pulled from the French, might in time returne to the obedience of his grand-child Charles, to whom they pretended it appertained. Tournay was furnished of men of warre, and despairing of succours, for that the King (not being master of the field, nor of sufficient force to encounter the English) could not succor it, laued herselfe from spoile paying a hundred thousand Crownes. To crosse the English, at home, the King had stirred vp James King of Scotland (an ancient ally to this Crowne) but the successe of armes was nothing fortunate for him, neither at land, nor at sea. After these victories, the end of October approaching, Henry left a great garison in Tournay: dismissed his strangers, and tooke his way towards England, carying no other recompence for so great, and sumptuous a preparation for warre, but the City of Tournay. But some designs vpon Scotland (fallen into a pupills hand,) hastened him home. Another storme threatned France. The Suisses armed according to the former conditions: the King sends Tremouille vnto them, to disperse them, vnder whom many of the Colonels had recieued the Kings pay. But neither by presents, nor promises, prevailed he any thing: onely he had a secret intelligence giuen him from some Capitaines, to provide for the defence of his gouernment of Bourgongne, whither the Pope, the Emperour, and Maximilian did thrust them. And beheld foureteen or fiftene thousand Suisses, with the troopes of the French County, a thousand horse, and the artillery which the Emperour gaue them: vnder the conduct of Ulrich Duke of Wirtemberg, camped before Dijon: Tremouille was returned, with a thousand Lances, and six thousand foot, who by his practises had greatly altered the Colonels, when as the multitude doubting the faith of their Capitaines, takes the artillery, and batters the wall. Tremouille not able to resist the force of this nation, which increased daily, flies to the last remedy, and without expecting any authority from his Maiesty, agrees with them: That the King should renounce the rights he had to the Duchy of Milan, and should pay them 40000 Crownes within a time prefixed, which they pretended was due for their seruices in the former warres: and for assurance thereof, he gaue for hostages, his nephew of Mezieres Bailiffe of Dijon, and foure Bourges of the said towne, who sauing themselves a while after in Germany, escaped the threats of this people, to cut off their heads, if the King did not ratifie it. Doubtlesse these were wise men, to saue their heads from the Suisses choler. A very preiudiciall accord for the King, if he had beene constrained to ratifie it. But was it not better to lull the Suisses asleepe, then to lose Dijon? Our Lewis is now freed of two incombances, the English, and the Suisses. But the exemption of present dangers freed him not from a relaps, for the English departing, threatned to returne in the spring, and prepared already, being loth to stay any more so long at the warre. The Emperour had the like intent to annoy him.

The Suisses enter into Bourgongne.

The Emperor
affixes to her Popa.

The Catholike King deuised (as it was discovered by a letter, written to his Ambassador resident with Maximilian) the meanes to draw this Duchy of Milano Ferdinand their common grand-child, yonger brother to Charles the Archduke, shewing that by that meanes, all the other estates of Italy should be forced to take their law from them, that it should bee easie for the Emperor, assisted with the armes of Arragon and Naples, to make himselfe Pope (the which hee had alwaies desired since the death of his wife, and being installed in Saint Peters chaire, he should renounce the Imperiall Crowne, in fauour of the said Archduke. Moreover, the bad affection of the irreconcilable Swisses was apparent. The sight of the hostages had newly incensed them, who threatned Bourgongne and Dauphine.

The Pope desired greatly the whole extirpation of the Councell of Pisa, especially for matters decreed, either by the authority of the said Councell, or against the Popes authority, the which (not reuoked) must needs breed great confusions. Yet could he not obtaine abolition before the King did raise it. Three Cardinalls were therefore appointed to dresse these disorders. But the greatest difficulty was about the abolition of Censure, which the King (said they) had incurred, thinking it a thing unworthy of the Apostolike see to grant, if the King did not demand it: the which his Maiesty would not yeeld himselfe ouer-ruled by the earnest sute both of the Queene and his subiects, which wished to see crosses, relolues to yeeld to the Popes will, hoping hereafter, by this meanes, to find him fauourable. And therefore at the session of the Councell of Lateran, which was in the end of the yeare, the Kings agents, in his name, and by his command, renounced the party Councell of Pisa, adhering to the Councell of Lateran, and so obtained full remission of all things committed against the Romane Church.

The death of Queene Anne.

Amidst so many foraigne crosses which did infinitely trouble the King, there chanced home-bred affliction; the death of the Queene his wife: a Princeesse indued with most vertues incident to an honorable Lady, and for this cause greatly lamented of the whole Realme. This death was the accomplishment of the marriage betwixt Francis duke of Valois and Earle of Angouleme, and Claude the kings eldest daughter: the which had been deferred till then: for that the Queene longed not Lewis of Sauoy, mother to the said Francis, and affected more to haue Charles of Austria, afterwards Emperour, for her son in law.
The Realm being reduced to the obedience of the Church of Rome, the Pope (to whom the Kings greatnesse was commonly fearful) begins now to feare lest his power should be too much suppressed, and that the enemies of France should hereafter ioyne their forces to the prejudice of the Romane Court. To ballance things in such sort, as hee might subsist in the midst, and that the meanes which ayded one of his intentions, should not hurt another: considering that the irreconcilable hatred of the Swisses, might force the King to resigne his rights of the Duchy of Milano to the Emperour and Catholike King, in regard of the marriage which they pretended (a very prejudiciall thing to the common liberty of Italy): and holding it also dangerous to haue the King to recover it, hee perswa-ded the Swisses, that their extreame hatred might not force the King to take a course no lesse hurtfull to the liberty of their common weale (considering the little loue which Maximilian and Ferdinand did beare them) then to the Church and all Italy. Moreover, to make the Kings descent into Italy more difficult at all euents, he labours an accom-twixt the Emperour and the Senate of Venice: who being relolue, either to haue a firme peace concluded, or open warre, would by no meanes giue care to any truce, for that had bene to settle the Emperours affaires in those rownes which he enjoyed.

The Popes perswasions were fruitlesse with the Swisses: the Emperour and Venetians made him ludge of their counterfeits, but without decision for either party: hee only commands them to surcease from armes, untill the pronounciation of his sentence. The Catholike King could not more firmly assure the Realme of Nauarre, then by a peace.
Our Lewis and hee prolong the truce for a yeare, adding to the former articles, one that was secret. That during the truce, the King might not molest the estate of Milano. That which the Pope could not get of the Swisses, he obtained of the King of England. Henry discontent that his father in law had againe deceived him, by the prolongation of a truce, without his consent, grew daily more unwilling to make war in France. The Pope desiring by some kindnesse, to win the kings loue, & fearing daily, that Lewis oppressed with enemies would

A would allice himselfe, both by a peace and confanguinity with Maximilian and Ferdinand:
he sent the Cardinall of Yorke, to perswade his King: that remembering what correspon-dency of faith he had found in the Emperour, the Catholike King, and the Swisses, and contenting himselfe with his happy passage and returne, hee should forbear any more to assist France with his forces. The Cardinall finding Henry disposed to peace, whom the Duke of Longueville (a prisoner, taken in the war) had already moued: and Lewis desiring with all his heart, (having sent the Generall of Normandy) but more vnder colour to treat of the deliuey of the D. of Longueville, and his companions in prison, they made an agreement betwixt the two Kings, in the beginning of August for their lives, and a peace after their death, vpon condition, That the King of England should rein Turney, and the French King should pay him six hundred thousand Crownes. That Lewis should be bound to defend the estates one of another, with ten thousand foot, and more by land: and six thousand if it were by sea: that the French King should furnish the King of England with twelve hundred Lances at need, and the King of England with ten thousand foot: but at his charge that should haue neede. This peace was confirmed by the marriage of Lewis with Mary sister to Henry. But the Pope was not perswaded, for great wealth might so suddenly be conuerted into amity, and alliance.

A peace with the English.

Lewis King of France marries the sister of England.

For, as he had made the first motion, so did he expect to be made acquainted with the conclusion: wherein he made account to referre this clause; That the King should rein the Duchy of Milano for a time. The Emperour and Catholike King were exceedingly jealous: yet the last assured himselfe to receiue two contents. The one, that the Archduke his grand-child was out of hope, to giue his sister in marriage to Lewis: the other, that Lewis being in possibility to haue heires male, the succession of Francis Earle of Angouleme should remaine doubtfull, whom he hated exceedingly, seeing him greatly inclined to restore the Realme of Nauarre, to the ancient estate. The Swisses rejoiced, not for any affection they bore vnto the King, but foreseeing that Lewis having truce with the Arragonois, and peace with the Venetian, and English, would employ his forces to re-couer Milano, and this should be a new whetstone to sharpen their hatred, and make their vertue knowne to the whole world. No man doubted of the Kings resolution herein; and indeed he prepared for it, having retained the Lanquenets which the Duke of Guelders had brought against the English.

And the Pope, although it were a very troublesome thing vnto him, to haue the King reouer this estate, yet knowing that his perswasions could not diuert the enterprise, hee adulst him (but faintly) not to prolong it, giuing him to vnderstand that things were ill prepared to resist. The Emperour had no forces, and as little money, the Arragonois army was growne weake, and not paid: the people of Milano poore, and brought almost to despaire: no man could furnish money to make the Swisses march, and Frégise was not out of hope to agree with his Maiesty for the Seigneury of Genoua. But let vs obserue his policy: All these praioications came not from a sincere heart. The Pope sees euery one tyred with trauels path, and ill provided. And now the French had taken breath, and fetised themselves with new alliances: he begins to feare the King, and would assure himselfe of his forces, in case he came into Italy. Moreover, he knew well the King could not this yeare molest the estate of Milano, by reason of a clause mentioned in the truce with the Arragonois: and if it should so fall out, this good inclination and will, should send him for an excuse with the King, when as hee should require either his consent or helpe.
During this truce, the Lanquenets at Genoua (being reduced to all extremity for want of victuals, and not able to be succoured) yeelded to the Genouois: who made it euen with the cause. Thus the King was dispossessed of all his conquests in Italy. VVhich must not wor-der if the people make heapes of stones of Castles within their rownes, when they fall into their powers, for they are but shackles of their liberty.

The Popes policy.

In the meane time, the new confederacy which the Pope contracted with the Emperou, (betwixt whom and the Venetians, Leo laboured an agreement, not giuing the King any notice thereof) lending him forty thousand Ducats, and receiuing from him Modena in pawne, gaue our Lewis new causes of iealousie and distrust. To be relolued then of the Popes intent, he sends to intreat him, to declare himselfe in his fauour, adding more-ouer, that it he might not bee in good termes of friendship with him, hee would accept such conditions of Maximilian & Ferdinand as he had refused. On the other side, Maximilian

milian and the Arragonois wanted no persuasions full of efficacy, to vnite the Pope vnto them for the defence of Italy: shewing, that if vnited together, they had bene able to chase the French out of the Duchy of Milan, they were not now more vnable to defend it, against him. They did not omit to shew, that if the King preuailed in his designs, he would not fail to be reuenged at the same instant of all the injuries hee had receiued, namely, of the money, wherewith Leo had lately thrust the Suisse into Bourgongne. And the authority of the Suisse (who continuing in their first spleene, offered for six thousand Florins of the Rhin, to take & defend the passages of Mount Senis, Mount Geneure, and Final: and for forty thousand Florins a moneth to inuade Bourgongne with twenty thousand men) did strangely moue the Popes minde, who restrained by feare of that he most desired, made some scruple to bewray his conceits, giuing them all good hope vnder generall reames.

In the end, being prest by the King, behold his answer: That he had perswaded him to passe into Italy, when as without danger or effusion of blood he might haue reaped an assured victory. That now other Princes haue so ordered their affaires, as there is no more hope to vanquish him with much hazard and blood. And for that the Turke had lately increased his power much by a notable victory against the Sophi of Persia, Leo therefore forgets not to add, That it was neither conformable to his nature, nor agreeable to his office, to saue Christian Princes armes against themselves. That he could not but exhort him to perseuer, vntill hee should find some more easie and better opportunity; which being offered, he should alwaies finde him the same disposition to his glory and greatness, that he had some few months before made shew of.

This answer was sufficient to quail the Kings hopes of Leo's fauour: yea, to let him vnderstand, that he would oppose both his Councell & forces against this enterprise, which the King had resolved for the Duchy of Milan, according to the charge he had giuen the Duke of Bourbon. But death, which commonly cuts off the counsellors of man with his life, staied this resolution, to reuiue it soone after in his next successor. For as Lewis pleased himselfe exceedingly in the excellent beauty of his new Spouse, being but thirtene yeares old, behold a seuer, accompanied with a flux of blood, frees him from the troubles and cares of this world, to enioy an eternall and happy rest in heauen, noing the first day of Ianuary with the exceeding griefe which his memory graued in the hearts of all his subiects. He was a godly Prince, iust, chaste, milde, temperate, loyall, louing his Princes, his Nobility and his people, and likewise beloued of them; a friend to sincerity, plainnesse and truth; an enemy to enuy, lying and flattery. Let vs obserue for a testimony thereof that royall Apothegme, being vrged by the flatterers of the Court, to take reuenge of Lewis of Tremouille, who had overcome and taken him at the battell of S. Aubin: A King of France (saith he) doth not take vpon him the quarrells of a Duke of Orleans: If he hath faithfully serued the King his Master, against me who was but Duke of Orleans, he will doe the like for me, who am now King of France. But aboue all, hee was good to his subiects, whom he did alwaies studie to ease: for how many leauius hath hee made both of horse and foot, without the oppression of his people by any new impositions? How often haue his subiects willingly granted him an increase of Subsidies, to supply his foraigne and domestick affaires, and yet would he not allow of these impositions? Desiring rather to cutt off the expences of his owne person, and his house, to saue his people from oppression and spoile.

France was neuer scene so populous, so fruitfull, so rich, so well tilled, nor so well built as in this raigne. A happy raigne in the obseruation of Iustice, martiall discipline, liberty of trafficke, increase of goods, cheapnesse of victuals; & which is more, gery man to eate his bread quietly at his own board, free from the outrages and insolencies of soldiers. To conclude, neuer King loved his people so much, neuer Subiects loved their King more: neuer Subiects gaue with greater ioy to their Soueraigne, then the French did to him, that glorious surname of Father of his people.

Appy is that Realme (saith the wise man) which falls not into a childes hands.

This was the first comfort which reuiued the hearts of the French, oppressed with mourning and heauinesse for the death of their good King Lewis the twelfth: The second was, that they cast their eyes vpon a worthy Successor, a Prince well borne, iudicious, and of a generous spirit; liberall, courteous, in the prime of his age, and fit for government, affable to the people, fauourable to the clergy, pleasing to the Nobility (who do naturally loue their Princes good countenance) and (that which all subiects admire in their Soueraigne) of an excellent beauty. Thus capable was he of the royall dignity. Francis being then 22 yeares old, before Duke of Valois, and Earle of Angoulesme, tooke vpon him the government of this Monarchy, as Son to Charles Earle of Angoulesme, Son to John Earle of Angoulesme, who was the youngest Sonne of Lewis Duke of Orleans (murdered by the Bourguignon at Paris, in the time of Charles the sixth) who was also the youngest sonne of King Charles the fifth. He was annointed at Rheims the 25 day of Ianuary, being attended on by the Dukes of Bourbon and Alanson, the Earles of Montpensier, Vendosme and S. Paul, & the Prince of Roche-sur-Yon, all of the house of Bourbon. Then hauing made his entry into Paris, and a solemne Tournie kept in S. Antonie's street, he confirmed all the ancient officers of the Crowne; and to supply those which were vacant, he created Charles D. of Bourbon Constable of France, (being voided by the death of John the second Duke of Bourbon) Anthony Prat Chancellor, (for then Stephen Pomeher Bishop of Paris was keeper of the Seale) Charles of Bourbon Earle of Vendosme, gouernor of the Isle of France, making the said County a Duchy, and a Peere of France; the Lord of Lauree Gouernour of Guien, Philipe Marshall of France, Boschis gouernour in his youth, Lord Steward and Superintendent of his house, with whom he ioyned Flouremonde Robertet Secretary of State. With this title of French King, he tooke vpon him that of the Duke of Milan, not only as descending of the house of Orleans, the true heire of that Duchy, but also as comprehended in the inuestiture made by the Emperor, according to the treaty of Cambray. And for that he succeeded equally both to the Crowne, and the desire his predecessor had to recouer that goodly estate of Milan, he therefore (to worke it with more facility) renewed the peace made betwixt the deceased King, and the King of England, sending home Mary the widow of Lewis, with a dowry of threescore thousand crownes a yeare: who afterwards married with the Duke of Suffolke. Hee also confirmed the alliance this Crowne had with the Senate of Venice. The Archduke Charles sent a very honourable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Nassau was the chiefe, to do him homage, for the Counties of Flanders, Arthois, and other Lands which held of this Crowne, & (the which gaue hope of a future peace betwixt these two Princes, both being young, but marked for great designs) to treat a marriage betwixt the said Charles, and Renée the Queenes sister, who was afterwards wife to the D. of Ferrara. And for that the said Earle was greatly fauoured by Prince Charles, the King desirous to gratifie him, caused him to marie with the daughter of the Prince of Orange, bred vp in his Court.

Charles was yet vnder age, but so carefully instructed by that wise Lord of Chieufs, of the house of Croy, whom the deceased King Lewis had made choise of, to gouerne him in his youth (for that Philip the father of Charles, had by his testament intrusted Lewis to accept the charge of his Son) that euen in his younger yeares he made him capable to vnderstand the affaires of state, presenting vnto him all pacquets that came, causing him to make report thereof vnto his Councell, & to determine all things in his presence. He did foresee, that after the death of Ferdinand his Grand-father by the mother, the French might crosse him in his passage from Flanders into Spaine, holding it dangerous, to stand in the midst betwixt the Kings of France and England vnited together, and not to fortifie himselfe with this common alliance. Moreover, his subiects of the Low-countries, would haue no wars with the Realme of France, The King likewise desired to take from him all motives to gouerne himselfe hereafter by the Councell of his two Grand-fathers.

They therefore agreed, That the marriage, proceeding betwixt the Archduke and Renée, the King should give him 600000 Crownes, and the Duchy of Berry for ever, to her and to her heires, upon condition she should renounce all rights of inheritance, both from father and mother, namely, to the Duchies of Milan & Britany. That after the death of the Catholike King, the King should aide the Archduke with men & ships, to go and receive his Realmes of Spaine.

The Arragonois demanded a continuance of the truce: but the King meaning to put out that clause: Not to molest the Duchy of Milan during the truce, their parole was fruitlesse. The Emperor (who ioyned his designs to the counsels of Ferdinand) opposed against the amity of the French. The Suisses were as forward as before. As for the Pope, Francis desired to be freed from all bond to him, that he might resolve for the best, according to the course of his affaires. To build vpon these foundations, he now employes his Captaines, men at armes, & the prouisions which his predecessor had first prepared, & makes his army march with speed to Lions, whither his Maiesty comes in Iuly, hauing left the Regency of the Reaume to Louise of Sauoy his mother. The D. of Bourbon Constable, led the forward, accompanied with his brother Francis, newly created Duke of Castelleraud, the Marshalls of Palisse, and Trunche, Charles of Tremouille Prince of Talmonet, sonne to Lewis Vicount of Tournes, the Earle of Sancerre, the Baron of Beard, the Lords of Bonniuet, Imbercourt, and Teligni Senehall of Rouergue, Peter of Nauarre (whom the King had drawne to his seruice, giving him his liberty without ransom) commanded 6000 Galkons, and the Lords of Lorges (grand-father to the late Montgomerys) Pirault of Maugiron, Richbourg, Iortail, little Lainer, Onastillen, Hercules of Dauphiné, and Capitaine Commarque, euery one commanding 500 foot, making 4000, and eight or nine thousand Lanqueneers, led by Charles Duke of Guelders.

The King led the Battell, followed by the Dukes of Vendosme, Lorraine and Albans, the Earle of S. Paul, Claude of Lorraine Earle of Guise, brother to the D. of Lorraine, the Lords of Lautrec and Lescot, brothers to Arual, a younger brother of the house of Albrer, Tremouille, René bastard of Sauoy (who was afterwards Lord Steward of France, and Gouernor of Provence, whose daughter Anne of Montmorency the Constable married) and Capitaine Bayard, to whom the King did that honor the day of the battell, to receive his Knighthood at his hands, hoping that the happinesse of so gentle and braue a Knight would accompany his armes. The reuerend was committed to the D. of Alanson, who had married with Marguerite of France, afterwards wife to Henry of Albrer, King of Nauarre, Grand-father by the mothers side to Henry the fourth, lately murdered. At the first brute of this army, the Emperour, the Arragonois, Sforza, and the Suisses contract a league together, to force the King to renounce his rights to the Duchy of Milan, the Suisses, receiving thirty thousand crowns a moneth of the other Confederates, should keepe the passages of the mountaines, and inuade Bourgongne, or Dauphiné; and the Catholike King, France, by Parpignan or Fontarabia. The Pope (although the King made some account of his friendship, for that Julian of Medicis his brother, had lately married with Philiberte, sister to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and Aunt by the Mothers side to his Maiesty) in the end ieyned with them.

The Duke of Genoua swom betwixt two streames, and (as they say) held the Wolfe by the eare. Both the French forces, and the confederates victory were fearfull vnto him, namely the Popes, who vnder colour to keepe this Duchy from any stranger, desired exceedingly to vnit it to the Church. In the middle of these contrarieties, he yields Genoua to the King vpon condition: That he should lay aside the title of D. of Genoua, & take that of Gouernor of Genoua, perpetually for the King, with power to giue the offices of Genoua: (This was to retaine some markes of Soueraignty) That the King should giue him an hundred markes of armes, the order of S. Michael: and a yearly pension during his life. That the King should not repaire the port of Toulon, and should restore vnto the Citie, all the priuileges, which King Lewis had diannulled. That he should giue certaine Ecclesiastical liuings, to Fredericke Archbishop of Salerne, brother to Octavian, and to himselfe (if he should be expelled Genoua) some places in Provence.

The army approached neare the Alpes, which diuide France & Italy, & the Suisses, according to their capitulation, had stayed vpon the passages of the mountaines and valleys, as well of Mont-fenis, which is of the iurisdiction of Sauoy, the shortest way, but the most vnease, as of the Mount of Geneure, which is of the iurisdiction of Dauphiné, the longer way, but the lesse painefull, being the ordinary passage of the French armies. A King had intelligence, that Prosper Colonne was at the foot of the mountaines within Piedmont, with fiftene hundred horse which the Pope had sent to succour Milan, not fearing any enemy, for that the Suisses (as he thought) had seized vpon all the approaches. But (some guides belonging to Charles of Soiers, Lord of Morete, hauing shewed them a passage neere to Rocque Epierre) the King sent Palisse (whom hee after wee will call the Marshall of Chabannes) Imbercourt, Aubigni, Bayard, Buis of Amboise, and Montmorency, at that time highly fauoured by the King, leading foure Cornets of light horse, vnder the charge of the said Morete and his guides, who hauing waded through the Po, beneath Villefranche, whereas Colonne lodged, they came to the gates not discouered, but by some inhabitants, who run speedily to prevent their entry, but two hardy men at armes of Imbercourts company, which led the Scouts, whose names were Beannais the brue, a Normand; and Hallencourt, a Picard, set spurs to their horses (so as Hallencourt was carried into the ditch) and amazed the inhabitants: Beannais thrusting forward his Lance, kept the gate open, vntill the troops arriuing, surprised both Villefranche and Colonne as hee dined; they made booty of the baggage, and about twelue hundred Neapolitane horses, and carried away the Commander and his troope prisoner to Toslan.

Prosper Colonne hurried.

In the meane time the forces passe, some with the artillery betwixt the Alpes towards the sea, and the Cottiennes, descending towards the Marquisate of Saluce: the toile of men exceeding all difficulties, which the steepe and craggy mountaines, and the rough downe-falls in the deepe valleys of the tiuer of Argentiére, did present vnto them, where the artillery, not able to passe in those straights, the horses being vnprofitable, in fiue daies it was forced vpon with roapes by maine strength, in those places whereas neuer Cannoni nor horseman was seene to passe. Others, with infinite paines and difficulties, recovered the pace of Dagogniere: some, the high tops of the rocke of the Perier of Cuni (passages lying towards Prouence) where the Marshall of Chabannes had passed. Thus the Suisses deceived of their hope, abandoned the straight of Suze, where they defended the passages of Mont Senis and Geneure, and that of Coni, returning with tame row and Milan, spoiling and sacking Chiuaus, Verceil and other places, where they entred whilest that Ainsard of Prie, hauing passed with the first, had with the helpe of Octavian Freysse, reduced Alexandria, Tortone, and all charlies beyond the Po) to the Kings obedience, who hauing passed the Po at Montcalier, and presenting himselfe before Nouarre, receiued the towne at his deuotion, and then Paris. The Milanoeis sent Ambassadors to the Kings lodging at Bufalore, to beseech him to rest satisfied with victuals, and a promise from the people to remaine affected to his crowne, and so to march on against his enemies, assuring him, that Milan should most willingly giue him entree, when he should be master of the field. It is an ordinary stratagem of inconstant townes, so set vp the ensignes of the stronger partie. The King hauing a mightie army in front, granted their demands for that time.

Then the Duke of Sauoy did mediate an accord betwixt the Suisses and the King his Nephew, wherein he preuailed so much, as they concluded: That the King paying vnto them foure hundred thousand crownes, promised by the treaty of Dijon, and all which they pretended to be due for their ancient seruices, they should yield vnto the King his Duchy of Milan, and the valleys which the Grisons enioyed, and the King should giue vnto Maximilian Sforza 60000 ducats of yearly pension. But some hope to gaine, who lose all, especially in these cases. A new supply of Suisses, by reason of their forepassed victories (being disswayed by the Cardinall of Sion) brake this treaty, and bring matters to the same estate they were before. Thirty thousand take the way of Monte, to lodge in the suburbs of Milan, vntill the Popes army, led by Lawrence of Medicis, and the Spanish by Raimond of Cardone, should ioyn with them. Maximilian Sforza and the Cardinall pressed them, but distrust one of another staid them. Raymond had surprised letters of credit, sent from the Pope to the King, and was well aduertised that Lawrence had secretly sent (whether vpon his own motion, or by the Popes command he knew not) a Gentleman to the King, to excuse himselfe for the army which he led against him, being forced by the duty he did owe vnto his vncle, preaming, That without offence to his vnkle, or blemish to his owne honor, he would endeavour to content his Maiesty, according to the desire he had alwaies had, and now especially more then euer. Meane while, the Arragonois designe was to remaine quiet, so as this army did not threaten his new conquest of Nauarre.

And Laurence on the other side, seeing the delays of Raymond, conceived that he had some secret charge from the King his master, to forbear to fight, and give others leave to decide the quarrell, and both joyntly feared to engage themselves between the Kings army, and the Venetians, led by Bartholomew of Aluiane, the which was very available for the King. Without doubt all their private intents were to act this tragedy with the blood and losse of the poore Suisses. Thus these two armies of Arragon and the Papes, did onely labour to keepe the Venetian from ioyning with the French; and the French, these two from the Suisses. A miserable estate of Italy, the which at one instant was oppressed with five sundry armies, French, Venetian, Suisses, Spaniards and Italians. Vpon hope of this treaty of peace, the King had countermanded Aluiane, who was at Laude, and commanded Lautrec, to cary vnto the Suisses all the money they could get out of the Kings coffers, or borrow of the Princes and Nobility, but through the perswasions of this mutinous Cardinal, they resolute, both to take the money from Lautrec, and suddenly to giue the King battell, when he least doubted any enemy. This counsell had preuailed with some drowse Commander. But Lautrec (advertisied by his spies of the trecherous resolution of these Suisses) left the way and retired into Galere. And the Suisses, failing of their purpose, passed on, to wreake their choller vpon the King. The King was come from Marignan, to lodge at S. Donat, the 13 of September: when as beheld they come with a resolution, and charge the artillery of the vanguard which the Lanquenets guarded, they ouerthrew the first they encountered, recouer some peeces of Cannon, and amaze a battalion of Lanquenets, who (supposing that the treaty of peace with the Suisses had continued firme) feared lest they should deliuer them into the hands of their ancient enemies. But seeing the horse, and the King himselfe in person come to second them, they resume their courage, enter the combate, stay this violence of the Suisses, and with a fore fight maintaine the shoock with variable and doubtfull euents, vntill the dusk and approaching night made them retire. At this first charge were slaine Francis of Bourbon Duke of Chastelleraud, the Earle of Sancerre, Imbecourt, and many other gallant Gentlemen.

Marignan.

The King seeing the greatnesse of the danger, planted his artillery in conuenient places, ordered his battalions, gathered his horse together, sent for Aluiane, and lay all night armed with all peeces but his helmet, vpon the carriage of a Cannon. The Sunne was scarce risen, when as the Suisses (growne proud with the conceit of some aduantage) charge the Lanquenets, and force them to recoyle aboue a hundred paces, and but for some horsemen, who repelled the violent force of the Suisses) the issue had beene very dangerous. The Cannon thunders through their squadrons; the French and Gascon shot make a horrible slaughter; the horse charge them in flanke; Aluiane comes vpon their back in the fury of the fight: They had continued many houres very hot in skirmish, when as the Suisses (having lost most of their Captaines, being charged in front, in flanke, and behinde) grow amazed, despair of victory, turne their squadrons, and make a goodly retreat, some to Milan, others home to their houses. A great number shut themselves into the Constables lodging, where (refusing to yeeld to the Kings mercy) they were all burnt, and many of our men that were entred pel-mell with them; amongst others, John of Mouy Lord of Maileray, who caried the white corner. In this second battell was slaine the Prince of Talmont, Buffy of Amboise, the Lord of Roze, and many other valiant Knights; Gilbert of Leul Lord of Ventadour was hurt, Claude Earle of Guise ouerthrown and troden vnder the horse feet, but he was relieved by Captaine James a Scottisshman, a Gentleman of the Kings Chamber. The King was often in danger of his person, receiving many a push of the Pike vpon his armour.

Without doubt this was the most furious battell that euer the Suisses gaue, the which by the testimony of Triunlee, seemed rather to haue beene fought by Giants then by men. For that the eightene battells wherein he had beene, were like the encounters of small children in regard of this. That which happened to Gascon of Foix at the batell of Rauenna, made the King to giue them that fled free passage, leauing fourteene or fiftene thousand slaine vpon the place. The King lost of French and Lanquenets, about three thousand. The Cardinal of Sion (the chiefe author of this battell) fled at the first charge to Milan, and from thence (seeing the Suisses in a mutiny, as well for their losse, as for three moneths pay, that were due vnto them) into Germany, to Maximilian. We

A We may iustly say, that the Suisses had need of this correction; for the remembrance of their forepassed prosperities had made them insolent beyond the bounds of modesty, but they reaped a benefit by their shame, growing more tractable and friendly to them that corrected them. Moreover, this should be a good aduertisement to the King, to consider rightly of the waies of Italy, in the which (for want of iudgement) both he and his Realme were afterwards in a manner ruined. After this happy victory, Milan and all other places of the Duchy followed the Conquerors fortune. Peter of Nauarre, had by a myne blown vpa a Casemate at the Castle gate. Maximilian Sforza and the Suisses (besieged therein by the Duke of Bourbon) yeeld it, vpon condition: That the Suisses should depart with baggage and baggage, and Maximilian should deliuer the Castle with that of Cremona, vnto the King, and all other places held by him, and should goe into France, where the King during his life should giue him threescore thousand crownes ayeare pension. According to this Capitulation, Mauleon brother to Tremouille, Francis Earle of Pontremie (with many other Gentlemen) conducted him into France. The King entred into Milan armed, accompanied with the aboue named Princes, and the Nobility of his army, whither the Potentates of Italy sent vnto him, some to reconcile themselves, others to congratulate this victory.

The Pope did not forget his ordinary practices, to stay the course of the Kings victory, and finding the King very obedient to the Sea of Rome, they concluded a mutual league for the defence of the Estates of Italy, of the Pope, the Church, of Italian and Laurence de Medicia, and the Estate of Florence. By this accord the King gaue the Duchy of Nemours to Italian, who had married a sister to the Kings mother; which Duchy (after the death of Italian) the King did giue to Philip of Sauoy, who tooke to wife one of the daughters of René, Duke of Alangon: to whom the Duke of Nemours now liuing, is Grand-child. And the Pope deliuered Parma and Placentia to the King. These Articles were confirmed by an enteruiew betwixt the Pope, and the King at Bologna, in the beginning of December, where they treated of many things touching the Realme of Naples, which the King resolved to inuade; for the recovery whereof, the Pope promised him his fauor, after the death of Ferdinand (which euery man thought to be neere) or at the least when as the truce were ended. He promised also to giue him power to leauy the tenth part of the reuenuues of Clergy within his Realme, and the collation of Benefices, the which before belonged vnto the Colleged and Chapters of Churches; and for the Kings sake he made Adrian of Gonfieres, brother to the Lord Steward, Cardinal. And the King, to gratifie the Pope, granted an abolition of the pragmatall Sanction, making new conuentions in stead thereof, whereunto the French Church and the Vniuersities opposed.

The Venetians sent foure Ambassadors to the King, the chiefe and most honourable persons of their Senate: Anthony Grimani, Dominic Trevisan, George Cornare, and Andrew Gritti, to congratulate his victory, and to beseech him to make them partakers of the fruits thereof, that by his ayd they might recouer their townes, according to their agreement. At their request, the King gaue commission to the Barlard of Sauoy, and to Theodore Triunlee, to ioyne with Aluiane with six hundred Lances, and six thousand Foot, led by Peter of Nauarre. Then leauing the Duke of Bourbon his Lieutenant Generall in the Duchy of Milan, he returned into France about Candlemas, whither the designes of Henry King of England did call him.

Henry discontent that the King had taken the young King of Scotland into his protection, and to that end had sent John Steward Duke of Albania, both to gouerne his person and his Realme (which John had punished either with death or banishment, all such as hee found to fauour the English, and euen the mother of the young King, sister to the sayd Henry) for reuenge whereof he thrust the Suisses to new attempts against the King. But returning to their first sincerity, they ioyne in league with this Crowne, binding themselves, to giue vnto the King for euer, in Italy or out of Italy, and against all men (except the Pope and the Emperor) such numbers of men as he should require vnder his pay. The King did also confirme their ancient pensions, promising to pay within a certaine time the sum due by the treaty of Dijon, and three hundred thousand Crownes more, yeelding vnto him the townes and vallies which they held, belonging to the Duchy of Milan. But the fust Cantons which did enioy them, hauing refused to ratifie this accord, the King began to pay vnto the other eight that part and portion of money which was due vnto them, who accepted thereof, but with an expresse condition; That they should not be bound to march

against the king.

Man hath alwayes his mind bent to seeke meanes to annoy his neighbour. The Kings prosperity, makes the Emperor, with the Kings of England and Arragon, to devise how to crosse him. The Emperor, alwayes desirous of innovations) could not with his owne forces hold the townes he had taken from the Venetians: and the English remembering the fruitlesse promises which Ferdinand his father in law had made him (which he respected not where he might gaine) stood waivering betwixt the distrust hee had of his father in law, and the hatred hee bare to our Francis, but this treaty is suddenly broken by the death of Ferdinand, who died in the Moneth of January. A Prince excelling in counsell B and many vertues, so as if his promises had beene accompanied with their effects, he might well have bin numbered amongst the most perfect.

Ferdinand dies.

This death seemed to make the Kings enterprize vpon Naples more easie, purposing to send the Duke of Bourbon for the execution thereof: Many reasons moued him thereto. There was some reuolt in the Realme, after the decease of Ferdinand. The Archduke Charles was young, and could not come in time to succour it: the Popes fauour might aid him much (yet the King trusted to him who deceived him in the view of all the world) but about all, the priuate interest of this Crown, to whom the greatnesse of Charles (here to so many Realmes by the death of the Catholique King and future successor of the Empire) should bee wonderfully suspect. But the designs of our Francis are crossed by the Emperors coming with ten thousand Germanes and Spaniards, foureteeen thousand C Swisses, and five thousand horse, to succour Brescia, jointly besieged by the French and Venetians, which made them retire to Milan to the Duke of Bourbon. So Maximilian passing the riuers of Mincio, Oglio and Adde, without any lett, had all the Country betwixt Oglio, Po, and Adde, at his command, except Cremona and Crema, the one kept by the French, and the other by the Venetians. Then hauing taken Laude by composition, hee sends to summon the Milanois with threats: that if within three dayes they did not expell the French army, he would entreat them more rigorously then Frederick Barbarossa, one of his predecessors had done: who not content to haue burnt Milan vnto ashes, did lowe fall there in memory of his wrath, & their rebellion. The inhabitants began to rise, and D our men grew amazed, when as Albert Peter, leading thirteene thousand Swisses and Grisons, arising, confirms them, he made them to change their resolution, to burne their suburbs, and to resolve vpon defence.

The Emperors
voyage into Lombardy.

The Cardinall of Sion, and many others banished from Milan, followed the Emperor, feeding him with hope, that at the first brute of his approach, the Citizens would set vp his Ensignes. Marke Anthony Colonne likewise followed his army: with two hundred men at armes, at the Popes charge (a manifest signe of his counsels and dissemblings.) But Maximilian seeing no shew from the towne (the chiefe of the Gibelin faction being expelled by the Constable of Bourbon, as adherent to the Emperor) remembering the treachery of the Swisses to Lodowick Sforza, and fearing lest through the ancient hatred of that nation E to the House of Austria, the Swisses in the French army, and those in his (which refused plainly to fight one against another) uniting their forces, should deliuer him to the enemy for that James Stafflet Colonell of his Swisses, had with much arrogancy demanded their pay, he secretly departs from his army in the night, with two hundred horse, so as he was twenty miles off before they were priuy to his departure. His army (wanting both a commander and money) tooke the same course. The Earle of Saint Paul, with the Lords of Montmorency and Lescun, pursuing them, defeated a great number, whereof three thousand, part Germanes and part Spaniards, yielded to the French and Venetians, being in campe, and our Swisses (notwithstanding they had beene payed for three monthes) went home to their houses, except some three hundred which remained with Peter.

retires.

During these garboiles, the Pope (smothering his conceits, laboured to be as pleasing as he could to either party, yet was he grieved the Emperour had brought so great forces; for he could not remaine a victor, but hee must afterwards seeke to oppress all Italy, or put Leo from the Papall seat, to hold it himselfe, according to the common report. On the other side (as we iudge of causes by the effects) the King had many reasons to suspect the Pope: He had conspired to the Emperours descent. Colonne the Popes pensioner did accompany Maximilian. He refused to send 500 men at armes for the defence of Milan, and

1516

A and to pay three thousand Swisses, as he was bound by the treaty of Bologna. So as the King, to let Leo know, that the brightnesse of his Myter did not so dazle his eyes, but he discovered his practices; he made him brewesse of the same bread: declaring, that seeing the league they had made, was fruitlesse in time of warre, he would contract a new one which should not tie him but in time of peace. The Emperours army being dissolued, the Duke of Bourbon returns into France, and of his owne motion resignes his Government into the Kings hands, by whose command the Lord of Lautrec taking the charge of the armie, to free the King from that bond, ioyning with the Venetians, returned to Brescia, which pressed with two batteries, one by the French, the other by the Venetians, yielded B to the King, their liues and goods saved, and Lautrec deliuered it to the Venetians. Verona had a harder issue, for being battered by the French towards Mantoua, and by the Venetians towards Vincenza, giuing two assaults: afflicted with want of victuals and munition, and troubled by the hurting of Mark Anthony Colonne, Gouvernor of the City, yet being assured of eight thousand men, led by Count Roquendosse, that came to their succour, they held out vntill Christmas, at what time famine forced the Spaniards to yeeld the towne, the which was in like sort deliuered to the Venetians. The Pope, to make profit of the Kings victory and forces, solicits Lautrec to ayd him, to disposseesse Francis Maria of Rouere of the Duchy of Vrbino. The motives of this warre, which Leo pretended against him, were, for that Francis had denied the Pope thofe men, for the which he had C receiued pay of the Church, and had treated secretly with the enemy: That he had slaine the Cardinall of Pavia, and committed many other murders.

Brescia yielded.

Verona yielded.

That in the hottest of the warre against Pope Iulius his vncke, he had sent Balbasar of Chastillon to the King to receiue his pay, and at the same instant hee denied passage to some Companies that went to ioyne with the army of the Church: and pursued (in the estate which he held as a feudatary of the Church) the souldiers which saved themselves at the defeat of Rauenna. Lautrec desiring to please Leo, sent Lecons his brother, the Lord of Chiffre, the Knight of Ambrun, the Lords of Aulstun and S. Blimond, and many other Capraines, with good numbers of horse and French foot: who in few dayes reduced the said Duchy to the Popes obedience, who did inuelt Laurence of Medicis his Nephew in the said Duchy. Moreover, the Kings friendship was very necessary for the Catholique King. Charles the Archduke tooke vpon him that title (after the death of Ferdinand his Grand-father by the mothers side) to make his passage more easie from Flanders into Spaine, and to assure himselfe of the obedience of those Realmes.

Fitting therefore his resolutions according to the time and necessity, by the aduice of the Lord of Chieures his Gouvernour, he sent Philip of Cleues, Lord of Rausstain to the King, to make choice of a place where their Deputies might meet, to decide all controuersies betwixt them. Noyon was named: and for the King there came Arthur of Gouffiers, Lord of Boissy, Lord high Steward of France: for the King of Spaine, Anthony of Croy Lord of Chieures, both Gouvernors of their Masters Nonage, and both assisted with notable personages. Who concluded: "That within six monthes the Catholique King should yeeld the Realme of Nauarre to Henry of Albret, sonne to Iohn of Albret, and Katherine of Foix, deceased the same yeare: or else should recompence the said Henry within the said yeare, to his content: else it should be lawfull for the King to ayd him to recouer it. That the King should giue his daughter Louise (who was but a yeare old) in marriage to the Catholique King, and for her dowry, the rights he pretended to the Realm of Naples," according to the diuision made by their predecessors: vpon condition, that vntill shee came to yeares of marriage, Charles should pay vnto the King an hundred and fifty thousand ducats yearly, towards the maintenance of his daughter. That the dying, if the King had any other daughter, he should giue her to the Catholique King vpon the same conditions. If he had none, then Charles should marry with Renée, daughter to the deceased King. To propound and conclude mariages so disproportionable of age, is it not properly to mocke one another? Seeing that onely two yeares time brings forth occasions which make Princes to alter their designs, whose wils are often inconsistent. This treaty was respectively sworn by both Kings, who appointed an interuiew at Cambray, attending the which they sent their Orders of Knighthood one to another: and since the Emperour ratified these conuentions; but we shall see small fruits thereof.

France reaped another benefit of this peace. The Swisses seeing a surcease of armes betwixt the Emperour and the King) compounded, as the former had done: That the King should pay unto their Cantons, within three moneths, three hundred and fifty thousand ducats, and after that a perpetual and annual pension: That the Swisses should furnish him, whensoever he demanded, a certaine number of men at his charge. But duerly, for the eight Cantons bound themselves to furnish against all men indifferently, and the fuc, no other wise, but for the defence of his owne Estates. As for the Castles of Lugan and Lugarne, strong passages, and of great importance for the fury of the Duchy of Milan, they desired rather to raze them, then to take three hundred thousand ducats for the restitution thereof.

Let vs now lay all armes aside for a certaine space, and give our warriors time to take breath, and returne againe shortly to warre, by the ambitious factions of two most great and mighty Princes. This year in February was borne Francis, Dauphin and successor to this Crowne, if his end had not beene violently forced. Lawrence of Medicis did present him at the Font for the Pope his Vncle. A Christning celebrated with iousts, skirmishes, encounters, besieging and taking of places, and other such statly shewes, as the memory of man hath not obserued greater. And the King, to make a more strict league with the Pope, he caused the said Lawrence to marry with Magdalene, daughter to John Earle of Auergne and Arauguez, and of Ioane sister to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Vendosme, who died at Verceil, when as King Charles the eight returned from Naples. Of this marriage came Katherine of Medicis, whom we shall see Queene of France, and mother to the three last Kings of the name of Valois.

At the same time, the King sent Gaston of Breze, Prince of Fonquarnont, brother to the great Seneschall of Normandy, with two thousand French foot, to succour Christiane King of Denmarke, against the Rebels of Sweden, who (after they had wonne a battail for the King) being abandoned in the end by the Danes, in a combat vpon the Ice, (where those Northern Nations are more expert then ours) were ouerthorne, and the most part slaine: such as could escape the sword, returned without pay, without armes, and without clothes.

Emper.

The yeare following, the last of March, Henry the Kings second sonne was borne, who by the death of the Dauphin his brother, shall succeed his father. Henry King of England was his God-father, and gaue him his name. During this successe of armes among Christian Princes, the Pope motioned, but (with the Originall) rather in shew, then with any good intent, a generall warre of all Christendome, against Selim Prince of the Turkes. Baiazet (as we haue sayd) in his latter age studied to inuall Acomath his eldest sonne, in the Throane of the Turkish Empire: Selim the younger brother, through fauour of the Janisaries and souldiers of his fathers Guard, forced him to yeeld the gouernement vnto him. Selim was no sooner in possession, but (as they say) he boysoned his father, and murdered his brethren, Acomath and Corent, and in the end, all that descended from the line of the Ottomans. Then passing from one warre to another, he vanquished the Aduliens, ouerthrow the Sophi of Persia in battell, rooke from him Tauris, the chiefe seat of his Empire, and the greatest part of Persia, rooked out the Sultans of Egypt, the Mammelucks; rooke Caire, and seized vpon all Egypt and Syria. So as hauing in few yeares almost doubled his Empire, and taken away the hindrance of so mighty Princes, who were ialous of his Monarchy: Christian Princes did not without cause feare the happy course of his victories. Hungary was weake of men, and in the hands of a Pupill King, gouerned by Prelates and Barons of the Realme, diuided amongst themselves. Italy dismembred by former warres, feared lest the partialities of these Princes should cause Selim to turne his eyes towards it. The Pope and all the Court of Rome (making shew to preuent this imminent danger) thought it expedient to make a great prouision of money, by a voluntary contribution of Princes; and a generall taxe ouer all Christendome: That the Emperour, accompanied with the house of Polonia and Hungary, and an armie of Reistres and Laniquettes, shew to great an enterprise, should assaile Constantinople: and the French King with the forces of his Realme, the Venetians, Susses, and Potentates of Italy, should invade Greece, being full of Christians, and ready to rebell vpon the first approach of foraine forces. The Kings of Spaine, Portugal, and England, should passe the Streight of Gallipoli with two hundred sayle: and hauing taken the Castle at the entry thereof, they should approach neere to Constantinople: That the Pope should follow the same course, with an hundred great Gallies.

These

A These were goodly plots in conceit. This counterfeit shew to send an army into Turkie, was but a deuice to fill the Popes coffers, which were made empty by the former warres, especially by that of Fribin.

To treat of these Propositions, Leo published in the Consistory a generall Truce for five yeares amongst all Christian Princes, and vpon rigorous censures to them that should breake it: Appointing for Legats, the Cardinal of Saint Sixte, to the Emperour; the Cardinal of Saint Marie in Portico, to the King; the Cardinal Giles, to the King of Spaine; and the Cardinal Lawrence Campege, to the King of England: he proclaimed his Bulls of pardon to all such as should contribute a certaine summe for so worthy an expedition. All Princes accept this truce, and shew themselves very willing to so honorable an action. But the means wanted, how in so short a time to make a firme vnion among so many Potentates, who had bene long at deadly warre: Euery one studies the fruit of his priuate interest, and finding the danger to concerne one more then another, they care for themselves, and manage these affaires carelessly, more with shew then deuotion.

This negligence of the publike State, and greedinesse of priuate men, was the more confirmed by the death of Selim, who leauing his Empire to his sonne Seliman, young of age, but of a milder spirit, and not so inclined to war: then all things seemed to incline to peace and loue betwixt so many great warriors. The Kings of France and England renewed their friendship by a defensive league betwixt them, vpon promise of a mariage betwixt the Dauphin, King Francis eldest sonne, and the onely daughter of Henry King of England, both very young: which contract, many accidents might hinder before they came to sufficiency. And Henry yeelded Tournay for four hundred thousand Crownes, the one half for the charge in building the Citadell, and for the artillery, powder, and munition which the King of England should leaue in the place: for the other halfe, for the expences in conquering thereof, and for other pensions that were due vnto him. Thus oftentimes the loser payes the shot. On the other side, the Kings eldest daughter being dead; whom they had appointed to be wife to the King of Spaine: a peace betwixt these two Kings was reconfirmed, according to the first Capitulation, with promise of the younger. An alliance which either Prince did confirme, with great outward shewes of friendship, King Francis swearing the Order of the Golden fleece on Saint Andrews day: and the King of Spaine that of Saint Michael, on the said Saints day. The Venetians also, by the Kings means had prolonged their truce for five yeares with the Emperour.

A peace concluded with the Engli.

And with the Spaniards.

The death of Maximilian.

But the Soueraigne Iudge of the world (hauing decreed to punish the disorders of Christendome with sundry afflictions) tooke Maximilian out of this world: in whose life wee may obserue a strange alteration of affaires: for if prosperity did often present vnto him goodly occasions, aduersity did as often crosse him in the execution. A good Prince, mercifull, courteous, very liberall, a great spender (the which did many times hinder his good success) painfull, secret, well scene in the Art of warre: but his happy beginnings did commonly proue fruitlesse, through his owne delays and inconstancy. This death bred an equall desire in the minds of the two great Princes, Francis King of France, and Charles King of Spaine. Francis sent the Lord of Boilly Lord Steward of France, to purchase the fauour of the Germane Electors for the Empire. Some promised all fauour for the King his master: yet the cause was not so fauourable for the French, hauing no correspondence with the Germanes, neither in tongue, manners, nor life. Morouer, the Commons of Germany were sutors that the Imperiall dignity might not goe out of the Nation. The Pope fauoured the King, but in shew onely, hoping that by these demonstrations of loue, he would hereafter giue more credit to his Counsell: whereby discouraging, that in his inward thoughts the election both of Francis and Charles were alike suspected vnto him, he laboured to perswade the King (that seeing there was small hope for him to carie it by voyces) he should seek by his authority to aduance some other Germane Prince to this Crowne, rather then Charles. But whilst that Francis feeds himselfe with vaine hopes, giuen him by the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Archbishop of Treues, who to draw money from the King) gaue him great assurances. Charles in stead of gold, brings armes to the field. An army approacheth neere to Francford, for the K. of Spaine, vnder colour there should be no force in the election: the which encreased their courage that fauoured his cause, made them yeeld that wauered, & troubled the French faction. So Charles of Austria King of Spaine, the first of that name, was chosen Emperour of Germany the twenty eight of Iune. The election of a new Emperour consists in the voyce of fixe Germane Princes. Three are of the Clergy, the Archbishops of Maience, Cologne, and Teuttes: Three secular, the Count Palatine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Marquis of Brandenburg. The King of Bohemia is Vmpier, when as the voyces are equal. The Emperour is chosen at Francford, and crowned at Aix la Chapelle.

Who could doubt, but these two young Princes, having so many occasions of iocaloufe and quarrell, would toone breake forth into fierce and cruell warres, the which had taken deepe root in both their hearts. The King desired infinitely to recouer the Realme of Navarre, and did greatly affect the restitution of Henry of Albrert, to his kingdom of Nauarre, whereof he sees himselfe now frustrate by the suddē aduancement of Charles to so high a dignitie, and all that which the French held in Italy was in great danger. The Emperour on the other side was discontented, that the King (contemning the accord first made at Paris, and knowing the necessity of his passage into Castile, for the which his fauour did much import, had in a manner forced him to agree to new Articles. Moreover, the King had taken the Duke of Gueldres into his protection (an enemy to the Flemings, who were subiects to Charles) a sufficient cause to draw both Francis and Charles into armes. But about all, the recovery of the Duchy of Bourgongne, caused strange alterations in the mind of this new Emperour. The Duchy of Milan was a sufficient moeue of quarrell: the King since the death of Lewis the twelfth had neither demanded nor obtained inuestiture, and therefore they pretended the possession to be of no validity, & his interest to be void: yet all these were not sufficient moeues to stirre vp those horrible confusions, which so afflicted the Estates of these two Princes for the space of thirty yeares. Ambitious hatred is alwaies grounded vpon light beginnings. In the mean time the Preachers of this voyage against the Turke, dispersed throughout all Christendome, grew vchement, promising (according to the Popes Bulls) pardon for all finnes, and the Kingdome of Heauen, to such as payd a certaine summe of money. Without doubt Leo vsed the authority of the Apostolike seat too boldly, dispersing throughout the world, without distinction of time or place, most large pardons: not only for the liuing, but also to redeeme the soules of the dead from Purgatory for money. And for that euery one did plainly see, that these pardons were only granted to get money; which the commissioners (appointed for such exactions) demanded after an impudent and shamelesse manner; being also well knowne that the greatest part of them had purchased their authority from the Popes officers. Leo incurred great dislike: many were discontented with this insolent proceeding, especially in Germany, where the ministers of this Collection, appointed (according to the common opinion) for the deliuey of poore Christians, fighting vnder the burden of the Turkish yoke, sold for a small price, yea played away in their Ale-houses their authoritie to redeeme dead mens soules from Purgatory.

And that which did more encrease the peoples spleene, it was generally reported, That Laurence of Medicis had caried a Brieffe from his Vncle to King Francis, whereby hee allowed him to employ the money gathered throughout his Realme for this warre, to what he vses he pleased: vpon condition to yeld it when it should be demanded for the voyage beyond the Seas, and to employ fifty thousand crownes to the benefit of the said Laurence his Nephew. A worthy cause to make the French repine, seeing the money they gaue to a good intention, was conuerted to contrary vses. But that which made the Germanes wonderfully impatient, Leo had giuen to his sister Magdalene the profit of the exaction of Indulgences in many parts of Germany, who appointed the Bishop Arembault, a Commissioner in that part, worthy (saith the History) of such a charge, the which he executed with great conuolusse and extortion: Being the more odious for that this holy money went to satisfy the greedinesse of a woman. So as not only this exaction, and the Agents thereof, but also his name and authority that granted it, became odious in many Prouinces.

The beginning of Luthers doctrines.

Martin Luther, a religious man of the Order of S. Austin, learned and vehement, began to preach against these Indulgences in his publike Sermons: he taxeth the Popes authoritie; complaines of Albert of Brandenburg, Archbishop of Maience, and of the doctrine which these gatherers did teach, inducing the people to beleue confidently, That by the purchase of these pardons they must needs be saued: as if the vertue of these money-pardons could wipe away any sin, and the money put into the coffers of the Church, or of the Commissioners, could draw mens soules out of Purgatory, and send them into Paradise.

- A And thereupon he exhorts euery man to beleue soberly, and to gouerne himself wisely in this businesse, and rather to employ their money otherwise then in this frivoulous merchandise. The people giue care vnto him, find his doctrine plausible: and Frederick Duke of Saxony his Prince doth embrace it, Luther, supported by the fauour of his Prince and the people, proceeds: he publisheth propositions, wherein he doth dispute at large, of Purgatorie, of true repentance, of the office and dutie of Charitie, of Indulgences and Pardons, to lette out (saith he) the truth, calling al such to dispute as would propound any argument to the contrarie. He intreated al such as could not assist, to answer by writing: protesting, that he would not maintaine any thing, but submit himself to the censure of the holy Church: yet reiecting all things that should not be conformable to the holy Scripture and the decrees of the Fathers. In the end he encounters the Popes authoritie, the Images of the Church, the celibate of Religious persons, restraining the Popes authoritie within the limits of the Bishopricke of Rome, and publishing the doctrine, which hath caused a generall Schisme vnto this day. The Pope to quench this fire, cites Luther to Rome, forbids him to preach, declares him Contumax, if he did not obey, and submit himselfe to the Ecclesiasticall censure. Notwithstanding the Originall faith, hee did not reforme many things that were of bad example, which Luther did blame with reason, being very odious to all men, vsing his pontificall office with small reuerence. But this was to cast oyle into the fire. These Ecclesiasticall armes did but encrease Luthers reputation with the people.
- C Neither the religious men, which Leo sent to preach against him, nor the letters which hee did write to the Princes and Prelates, nor all the other meanes hee employed to suppress him, could any thing withdraw the peoples inclination, nor the fauour of Frederick from him.

This action seeming still of greater importance to the Court of Rome, made them to feare some great disgrace to the Popes greatnesse, to the prouidence of the Court of Rome, and the vnion of Christian Religion. Many assemblies were made at Rome, many consultations in the Popes chamber betwixt the Cardinals and Diuines appointed to prevent these inconveniences. Some did shew, that for asmuch as they did not correct in themselves so many vices and damnable things which did scandalize all Christendome, the persecution of Luther, would but augment the hatred of nations against him: giuing counsell like vnto that of Gamaliel in the sift of the Acts of the Apostles, that it had been better to haue winked at such a folly, which happily would haue vanished of it selfe.

Notwithstanding, the heate and violence of others preuailed, so as not only the persecutions were doubled against him, and his followers (who by his name were called Lutherans) but an excommunication was decreed against Frederick Duke of Saxony: the which did so incense him, as of a fauourer hee became a vehement protector of the cause: the which since hath been dispersed ouer all Christendome, so as neither prisons, nor banishment, fire, nor water, sword nor tortures, nor any other punishments, could preuaile against it. Without doubt, we haue learned by experience, that Religion is not planted, nor rooted out by violent meanes. The Altars of pietie are enemies to Armes, Drums, and Trumpets. Mens consciences must be gently intreated, not violently forced. Let vs attend this so desired reunion from heauen. The mediation of the most Christian King is necessarie: let vs hope, that the continuance of a holy peace will giue him the meanes, as he hath a desire to chooe men capable thereof, who not regarding their priuate interest, will seeke the aduancement of Gods glorie. But let vs returne to our Historie. Whilest that Charles the first was crowned at Aix, the people of Spaine fore-seeing, that by the means of his aduancement to the Empire, he should remaine for the most part out of Spaine, being also incensed against the Lord of C. iours, and some Flemings which had gouerned Charles in his youth, through whose couctoufnesse, Offices, Graces, Priuiledges, and expeditions (which had been vially giuen to Spaniards) were now dearly sold vnto them: they rebelled, refusing to obey the Kings officers. They erected a forme of popular government, with the aduice almost of all Spaine, whilest the Nobilitie sought by force to suppress this popular libertie. The King, by the Popes counsell (who makes his profit of Christian Princes quarrels, that he might haue peace, whilest they are at warre) seeing that the Emperour, being often vrged, did in no sort performe the Articles of the treatie of Noyon, sent an Army into Nauarre, vnder the command of Esparre, brother to Laurence, who in lesse then fiftene dayes reduced Nauarre to the obedience of Henry of Albrert their lawfull lawfull King. This was enough for Esparre. It had beene better to returne a victor triumphing with glory and honor, then to follow the aduice of too violent a Councillor. Saint. Calombe Lieutenant of Laurees Company (promising to himselfe, it may be, the conquest of Spaine, as easily as that of Nauarre; or fed with a hope to make some good booty;) carried Esparre euen to the frontiers of Catalonia: who hauing taken Fontaraby, did runne as farre as the Grongne. The Spaniards being incensed, (the Nobilitie against the people) had endured the losse of the kingdome of Nauarre; but seeing them to inuade their owne marches, they put in practice the by-word of the dogs, who fighting together, laid aside their quarrell, to fall vpon the wolfe their common enemy. So these, being at great discord among themselves, gaue ouer their intestine quarrels, to pursue their professed enemies.

Taken againe.

The Nobles and Commons ioyne their forces, they encounter Esparre, who to saue the Souldiers pay, had dismissed some part of his army, giuing leaue to all that would, in yee-ding halfe a pay: they charge him, defeat him, and take him prisoner, being hurt in the eye with a Lance, whereof he grew blind. The Lord of Tournon was likewise taken, with many other good men. So the Spaniards finding Nauarre vnurnished of Souldiers, recovered Pampelune, with as great facilitie as the French had conquered it. The first breeder of the horrible confusions which shall follow. But lets see another motiue of warre betwixt these two Monarchs, which rising from a small fire, shall flame ouer all this Realme,

The Prince of Chimay, of the House of Croy, had before-time obtained a sentence against the Lord of Aimeries, giuen by the Peeres of the Duchy of Bouillon (which iudge soveraignly) for the Towne of Hierges in Ardennes: yet through the fauour and credit which Aimeries had with Charles of Austria, and the greatest in his Court, he was released, although he had not appealed from the said sentence in time, grounding the causes of his reliefe vpon the lets and hindrances he had had during the former warres, at which he had alwaies assisted in person. So as a commission being granted before the great Chanceller of Brabant, and a day assigned to the heires of Chimay, to come to heare the reasons of Aimeries reliefe: and if need were, to see the former sentence (giuen to their behoofe) reuoked. They found this commission so vniust and vnreasonable (seeing that both their father and they had beene in long and quiet possession of the said town) and that this decree was not subiect to appeale: as they repaired to Robert de la Mark Duke of Bouillon, as to their Lord and protector, that with their right hee might defend the liberties and priuiledges of his Duchy. Robert discontented, that his company of men at armes had beene cassid for the extortions and robberies they had committed in Italy and else where, had left the King, and was retired to the Emperor. But seeing that iustice was denied him, as well for the priuate interest of the pupils (whose vncke and tutor he was, hauing married their Aunt, sister to the Prince of Chimay) he made his peace with the King, by the mediation of his wife and his sonne Fleuranges (the being daughter to the Earle of Brenne) with the Kings mother.

A bold and insolent fact.

Robert hauing assured his affaires with the King, sent to desic the Emperor at Wormes, where he had called a Diet of the Princes and free townes of Germany, against the new-bred troubles, by reason of Luther. A bold attempt of a petty Prince against an Emperor, mighty in means, men, and courage. A great Riuer runs quietly betwixt the banks that bound it, but at the first breach it ouer-flows a whole Country: so there is nothing more easie then to incense Princes; but being once moued, they are hardly appeased. This desie giuen, Fleuranges the eldest sonne of Robert, notwithstanding the Kings expresse prohibition, made a leaue as well in France as in other places, of three thousand foot, and foure or five hundred horse, with which he besieged Vireton, a small town in Luxembourge belonging to the Emperor. But soon after he retired his army by the kings commandement, and dismissed it. But their spleenes were wonderfully incensed vpon new occasions. The King, for that the Emperor failed in the payment of the pension for the realme of Naples, and in the restitution of Nauarre: & withall, his preferment to the Empire had greatly discontented him. The Emperor was grieved for the enterprise of Nauarre, and contempt of the Duke of Bouillon, being also well informed that the King sought means to recouer the realme of Naples. Francis had sent a Gentleman vnto the Pope to know when it should please him to performe his part for the execution of that which they had concluded

A cluded together (the which his Maieitie knew according to the disposition of Leo to be more counterfeit then currant.) And Leo giuing the Gentleman a note of the horse, foot and artilerie, that was necessarie for this enterprise, assigned the King two and twentie dayes to arme, whilst the Venetians might enter into this League.

The Pope had no meaning, that Naples should be subiect to the French. If the King had not in the meane time neglected his affaires, Leo had been forced to runne another course. And the Pope glad to haue some colourable shew of discontent, accuseth the King either to be carelesse, or ill-affected, hauing not drawne the Venetians into the said League, for the defence of Italy. He complains, that his Maieitie had not payed but the first moneth for the leaue of Suisses, which they had been forced to make against the Spaniard, who a little before had inuaded the territories of the Church, whereof the King should pay a moitie, and makes a shew as if the King had treated something with the Emperour, which out his priuie, and to his prejudice.

Thus Leo seeming iustly displeased, receiued into Rhegium (contrary to his agreement with the King) all the banished men of Milan: he inuested Charles of Austria in the realme of Naples, made a defensue league with him, including the house of Medicis and the Florentines: and desiring how to conquer Milan, they agreed: That Parma and Placentia should remaine to the Church, to hold them with the same rights it did before: That Francis Sforza brother to Maximilian should bee put in possession of the Duchie of Milan, as hauing right from his father, and his brothers renunciation: and that the Emperour should ayde the Pope against his subiects, and feudataries, namely, to conquer Ferrara. This mutuall resolution of alliance was a means, by Gods providence, to shew his wonderfull iudgements, and a scourge to punish both French, Italians, and Spaniards for many yeeres: whereby followed so many eversions of townes, oppressions of people, desolations of Prouinces, and the death of so many men of valour.

The Emperour in the meane time, leaues a great armie of horse and foot, vnder the command of Henry Earle of Nassau, who tooke Longnes from Robert de la Marke, razed the Towne, and hanged the Capitaine, with twelue of the chiefe of his troope. The Capitaine of Mulincourt, (deliuered by some of his Souldiers, with the place to the said Earle) escaped the gallows at the intreatie of the chiefe of his armie, but twentie of his souldiers were hanged, and the place likewise razed and spoiled to the ground. About this time, there was much controuersie touching the Duchie of Milan, the Emperour pretending it to belong absolutely to him, not only by conquest, but much rather by inheritance: concerning which, the most learned in the Lawes of the Empire produced many and very probable reasons and arguments. These two prizes caused Fleuranges and Sansey his brother (the sonnes of Robert) to put themselves into Iametz, with a resolution to die or keepe it. The Earle after foure dayes siege, hauing seene the garisons firme resolution, raised his Campe, to take the way to Fleuranges. The Germanes which kept it, yielded vpon both the Towne and their Capitaine the Lord of Iametz, the sonne of Robert, into the hands who hauing ruined it, did the like vnto Sansey. Bouillon was afterwards yielded vnto him by intelligence. After this, Robert obtained a truce of the Emperour for sixe weekes. But the Emperour Charles dreamed of a more important warre. If his spleene had beene only against the house of La Mark, why should he graunt them a truce, being almost ruined: and being a Conquerour, and strong enough to subdue the said Robert, why did he still increase his armie?

The King hauing intelligence, that warre was proclaimed against him, prepared his forces to withstand the Emperour: and to this end hee gaue a Commission to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Pol, to leaue fixe thousand foot: to the Constable of Bourbon eight hundred horse, and fixe thousand foot: and to the Duke of Vendosme the like charge. And to redresse the disgrace receiued by Esparre, he sent fixe thousand Lanquenets, of whom Clau of Lorraine Earle of Guise was General, vnder William of Gouffiers, Lord of Bonniuet, Admirall of France, to whom he gaue fixe companies of horse, & commission to leaue what number of Galcons and Balques he should thinke necessarie. The Lord of Lescut was in like sort releued with French and Suisses, for the warre of Italy.

The armies on either side were in field: there remained nothing but for the one to make breach: the Imperialls beginne. There had been a long and a great quarrell betwixt Louis Cardinall of Bourbon, and the Lord of Liques, a Gentleman of Hamault, for the

Abbey

Abbey of Saint Amand which the Cardinall enjoyed. Liques takes this occasion to assault the Abbey, which being of no strength, was deliuered vnto him by Champeroux, Lieutenant for the King in Tournaisis, in the which Loges Gouverneur of Tournay was surprized. We might pretend that these were but priuate quarrels: but Liques advanced with his forces to Mortagne, a place subiect to the King, the which hee said hee had some times enjoyed.

In the end Prancy, Captaine of the said place (having no hope of succours) yeelded it, not to Liques, but to the Lord of Portien, vpon condition to depart with their liues and baggage. But contrarie to the Law of armes and honestie, they were pursued, stript, and hardly escaped with their liues. On the other side, Fiennes, of the house of Luxembourg, Gouverneur of Flanders, besieged Tournay with a thousand horse, eight thousand foot, and fixe Cannons, continuing there five moneths, whilst that the Bourguignons did take, spoile, & raze Ardres: the Lord of Teligni in exchange did charge, defeat, and cut in peeces fixe hundred Bourguignons, that were entered the Realme to spoile it. In the beginning of these garboyles, Henry King of England did offer himself an Arbitrator betwix these two Princes, Charles and Francis, & Calais was named for the treatie of a good peace. But what meanes was there to yeeld to the Emperours vnreasonable demaunds, to restore vnto him the Duchie of Bourgondie, with an abolition of the homage which he ought vnto this Crowne, for Flanders? being vnreasonable (as he pretended) that an Emperour should doe homage to a King of France: as if we did not commonly see Princes hold their lands by homage of simple Gentlemen. So this parle tooke no effect.

Hitherto the Imperials dealt vnder-hand, protesting not to make warre against the king: but now they discouer themselves, and come with ensignes displayed to besiege Mouzon: they batter it in two places, the one by the meadow towards the port of Rheims: the other from the mountaine going to Iuoy. The foot-men newly leaued, and not yet trained, grew amazed, and force Montmorency the Captaine of that place, to demand a composition: for the obtaining whereof, he went with Lafsigny, his companion, to the Earle, and obtained, That every man at armes should depart, with a curtall vnarmed, and the foot-men and archers without armes, and a white wand in their hands: what policie was this, to see two Lieutenants to a King, goe forth off a place to capitulate with the enemy: without doubt they deserued the shame which many haue suffered for the like rashnesse, to be detained prisoners, put to ranfome, and forced to yeeld the Towne at discretion.

The taking of all these Townes without opposition, drew the Earle to Mezieres (commanded by the Chenailier Bayard) but he found a more generous resolution then at Mouzon. The experience and valour of the Captaines, and the desire which Anne Lord of Montmorency had to doe the King some notable seruice in his youth, had drawne him into the Towne, with many well minded Gentlemen of the Court: amongst the rest, the Lords of Lorges, Annebaule, Luce, Villeclair, John de la Tour Lord of Bremont, John Du-reil, Lord of Berbee, Nicholas of Thouars Lord of Suilly, Mathurin, and Charles de Clere, (whose valours and fidelitie deserves a place in our Historie.) Anthony Duke of Lorraine (whose Lieutenant Bayard was) and the Lord of Orual, Gouverneur of Champagne, commanded either of them, a hundred men at arme. Boucart and the Baron of Montmorency, had either of them a thousand foot. This might seeme too much for a small place, but it was strong and of importance. The Cannon did no sooner begin to batter, but most of the foot grew amazed, and in despite of their Captaines fled, some by the gate, others over the walls: Bayard by the basenesse of them that fled, tooke occasion to assure the resolutions of such as remained, For (saith he) preserving the helpe of few men, we shall haue the more merit and reputation: our troopes are of the more force, being discharged of this vnprofitable burthen.

The Valiant resolution of Bayard.

The Earle comming neere to Mezieres, sent to summon the commanders to yeeld the Towne vnto the Emperour. Repx vnto the Earle of Nassau (said Bayard to the trumpet) That before he shall heare me speake of yeelding up the Towne, which the King hath giuen me in charge, I hope to make a bridge of my enemies carcases, over the which I may march. Henry makes two batteries, and shakes the walls, for the space of a moneth. But finding by such dry fallies (in the which the besieged did most commonly carry the honour and advantage) the resolution of the Commanders, men at armes, and souldiers, hauing also intelligence of the defeat of a hundred choise horse of the Emperours campe, and two hundred foot,

A foot, led by the Earle Reinfowker, to spoile Attigni, vpon Aisne: all which Francis of Silli, Bayliffe of Caen, Lieutenant to the Duke of Alençon, had put to the sword, except 5 or 6, which were carried prisoners to the said Earle to Rheims, the Towne having been also released, the first of October with a thousand foot led by Lorges, foure hundred horse by Teligni, and some munition, he abated the first fury of his artillery; and despaying to take the Towne by force or famine, he raised his Campe, and made his retreat by Mont Cornet in Ardennes, Maubert-fontaine, and Aubenton, to Veruin and Guise, spoiling, burning and killing, Men, Women and Children without distinction: a mournfull beginning of the cruelties which haue been committed in the succeeding warres. Bayard for a worthy reward of his vertue, was honored by the King with a company of a hundred men at armes, and the order of Saint Michael. In the meane time the King assembles his forces at Feruaques, to cut off the enemies way about Guise, and to fight with him: during whose retreat, the Cont Saint Paul recovered Motizon, for the King.

The Earle of Nassau issues Mezieres.

Such was the estate of Picardy, and Champagne, whilst the Admirall of Bonniuet arriued at Saint Iohn de Luz, for the enterprise of Nauarre. His purpose was to surprize Fontarby. To hold the enemy in suspence, he first tooke the Castell of Poignan vpon the mountaine of Roncevaux, then making shew to take the way of Pampelune, he turned head through the mountaines towards the Towne of Maye, and whilst he lodged his artillery, he caused the Earle of Guise (who commanded the Lanquenets) to take the way by the river of Behaubic, running at the foot of the mountaines which come from Nauarre, and so passeth into the sea before Fontarbie: and in the morning he followed with his Army. Having some Spaniards in front, which camped on the other side of the water, hee passed the river at a ford, the said Earle marching before them with a pike in his hand. Don Diego de Vere chiefe of the enemies army, being equal in number, and hauing an aduantage ouer those that came wet from the passage of a riuer, amazed at the resolution of our men, left the field, and fled with his men through the mountaines.

The Castle of Behaubic kept all victuals from our Campe, and held it in great distresse. But the first Volley of the cannon, hauing split one of their best peeces, & slaine the Governor, with some others that did assist him, the souldiers being amazed, force their Captaine to yeeld at discretion: whereof the Admirall sent the best prisoners to Bayonne, the rest returned away being disarmed. The way being thus layd open to Fontarbie, (a place which they held impregnable, and one of the keyes of Spaine) fortified on three parts, with the sea, riuer and mountaine, in few dayes he made a breach, but not assaultable. Notwithstanding the Gascons, Basques and Nauarrois, demanded the assault, the which was defended with as great resolution as it was assayed: but the besieged hauing discouered some peeces, which the Admirall had planted on the mountaine, to beate them the next day in flanke at the second attempt, and knowing the resolution of the assaillants, by the proof they had formerly made, caused them to yeeld, vpon condition to depart, with their baggage and baggage. James of Aillon Lord of Lude, was made Governor thereof.

Let vs returne to Feruaques, where we haue left the King preparing to fight with the enemy. To this end he giues the forward to the Duke of Alençon (who had married Marguerite of Valois the Kings sister) accompanied with the Marshall of Chastillon, (this was the first moriue of the Constable of Bourbons discontent, the which place was due vnto him as Constable of France.) He tooke the bataille himselfe, taking the said Duke of Bourbon vnto him, and committed the rereward to the Duke of Vendosme. Bapaume did much annoy the frontier towards Peronne, Corbie & Dourlans. The Earle of Saint Paul, the Marshall of Chabannes and the Lord of Fleuranges tooke it, beat downe the defences, and burnt it to ashes. The Duke of Vendosme had Commission to doe the like vnto Landrecy: who arriuing late, foure or five Ensignes of the bands of Picardie march, without our commandement and without ladders, and fle furiously to the port, where they plant their Ensignes vpon the draw-bridge, but they were repulsed by 7 or 800 Lanquenets and some of their Ensigne-bearers slaine. This furie of the Picards did so amaze the Germanes, as without attending batterie, breach, or assault, they retired into the next forest, where they could not pursue them, by reason of the riuer running thorough the Towne. Thus Landrecy vnfurnished of men, was the next day taken, razed and burnt.

The ruine of Bapaume.

The Emperour was retired with his Armie towards Valenciennes: the King makes a bridge over the riuer of Elcan beneath Bouchain, either to fight with him, or to make him abandon abandon the countie with dishonour. Charles having intelligence of this bridge, sent twelve thousand Lansquenets, and foure thousand horse to stop the passage, but the Earle of Saint Paul with those fixe thousand men which he commanded, was already in battaile on the other side of the water, in a marsh towards Valenciennes, and the King followed him speedily with all his Army, which were about sixteene hundred men at Armes, and fixe and twenty thousand foot with the light-horse. The which the enemy perceiuing, he left seauen or eight thousand horse to couer the retreat of his footmen, taking the way to Valenciennes. Tremouille and the Marshall of Chabannes offer to charge them in the reare: the Suisses cried out for battaile, to giue a testimonie vnto the King, that they desired to scale the confirmation of their new alliance with some notable seruice: and if their aduice had been followed, the Emperour had that day by all likelihood lost his honour, and the flower of his Armie. So the enemy retired without any losse, except the bastard of Aimeries and some prisoners. GOD doth often minister occasions, the which being once neglected, are neuer recovered with so great aduantage. But howsoever, the Emperour retired by night into Flanders with an hundred horse, leaving all the rest of Armie behind him.

The next day, Bouchan yeelded at the first summons to the Duke of Bourbon. This shamefull retreat of the Imperials drawes our armie to Hedin, being vnfortified of souldiers, when as the inhabitants feared no enemy, being buſied at the mariage of a daughter of the Receiuer generall of Arthois. The Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme and the Earle of Saint Paul, with the troopes (commonly called the Blacke bands) notwithstanding the continuall raine, were at the Towne-gates, before the Citizens had any intelligence of their departure from the Armie. The Towne being resolutely attempted was taken by assault, and spoiled by the footmen, the which abounded in wealth: for that in olde time the Dukes of Bourgongne had made their chiefe residence there. But in the midst of the spoile, one quarter of the Towne was fired, contrary to the Constables expresse commandement, the which depriued the Souldiers of part of their booty. The Ladie of Rieux and the Garſon of the Castle departed with their baggage: burll the Inhabitants that were retired and come into it, were put to ranſome. The Lord of Biez had the government of the Castle, and Lorges of the Towne, with a thousand foot. This D happened on all-Saints day.

Winter was come, and the enemy appeared no more: the King disperſed his Army, and giuing the most of the Gentlemen that had followed the Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme the command of twenty fixe horse a peece, putting his Companies into Garſon, and disposing of the rest of the Armie, he retired to Compiègne, about Christmas, notable for the diftemperature of the weather to releue Tournay, necessitie forcing the Lord of Champroux to depart with an honourable composition, armed, their Ensignes displayed, Drums sounding, and their baggage ſaued.

Now may we see, what effects the Popes league with the Emperour shall bring forth. Being both equally desirous to expell the French out of Italy, they thought it best, before they came to open force, to shadow their practices with a Foxes skin, and by means of the banished men, to assaile the Duchies of Milan and Genoua at one instant, with the Cities of Parma, Placentia, Cremona, and Crema. But he that attempts too much, performs little: so many sundry enterprises doe most commonly terrifie more then hurt. According to this plot the Emperours Gallies, remaining at Genoua, the Popes come suddenly into the port with two thousand Spaniards, led by Jerome Adorne, hoping that the partisans of that Family, would not faile to mutinie: but the good order which Fregeſe had set, made their designe fruitlesse. On the other side, Lautrec, before his coming into France, to marry the daughter of the Lord of Orual, had expelled many out of Milan, that were ill affected to the King, whereof they said the most part had been banished for flight occasions, or to ſeize vpon their goods.

Without doubt, severity loseth those hearts, which clemency and moderation in a temperate commander would make use of at need. Francis Sforza, Jerome Moron, Manſſey Poluſſin and Soto of Brindesi, were the chiefe, who hauing assembled a great number of their Partisans, for the execution of their designs, retired to Regium, belonging to the Church, although neither the Pope, nor the King (according to their treaty) ought to haue supported them in their territories. Lesſei Marshall of Foix, Lieutenant to his brother,

A aduerſified of these stirres, by Frederick of Bosſole, parted from Milan on Midſomer Euen, accompanied with foure hundred Lances, and followed by Bassile, leading a thousand foot, to require Count Guy of Rangon, Gouvernour of the towne for the Pope, that according to the Treaty, he should deliuer these banished men into his hands. Whilſt that Lesſei and Rangon conferred together vpon their faith, as a poſſible entring into the Rauelin at the gate which goes to Parma, the one complaining, that contrary to the articles of the league, they did support (in towneſ belonging to the Church) the banished men, being assembled to trouble the Kings Estate; and the other, that he had suddenly entered with armes into the territories of the Church: behold a gate being opened for the letting in off, a cart laden with meale, the Lord of Bonneuil aduanced with some men at armes, to ſeize vpon the Port, but they were repulled, and the gate ſhut. Some banished men being vpon the walls, diſcharge their Harguebuſes, and hurt Alexander Trinaſe, whereof hee died two dayes after. Nothing ſaued Lesſei, but the feare which the Harquebuſer had, that aymed at him, to kill the Gouvernour. The indiſcretion of one man, is pernicious to such as accompany him. During this garboile, the Earle, to assure Lesſei perſon, led him vpon his faith into the rauelin. The men at armes taking this for an imprisonment, ſled to crye news to the troops, which ſtayed two miles from Regium, who ſtanding doubtfull, whether they should march againſt the towne to recouer their Leader, or returne to Parma, thinking it a practice to ſurpriſe the towne in their abſence: the Marshall ariued, being releaſed by the Earle, forbearing to ſlay him, hauing giuen him his faith, and receiued commiſſion not to proceed againſt the King by open warre. This enterpriſe, as badly effected as raſhly attempted, was of conſequence. It was a good colour for the Pope to accuſe the King, and to iuſtifie his confederacy with the Emperour. To prevent this, Lesſei ſent La Noſſe to Leo, to diſſauow the attempt at Regium, and to let him vnderſtand, that what hee had done, was neither to attempt againſt him, nor againſt the eſtate of the Church. For answer: The Marshall of Foix (ſaid the Pope in great choller) hath lodged (in armes like an enemy) vpon my territory, I will make him know the wrong he hath done vnto the King. Preſently after this threat, he did excommunicate the Marshall out of the Church. The designe vpon Comoy, ſucceeded no better then that of Genoua, for Manſſey of Paluſſin, and D Sino of Brindizi, hauing in the night approached to the walls, with eight hundred Italian foot, and Lansquenets, hoping that Anthony Ruſſque a Citizen of Comoy, would make a breach for them in the wall behind his houſe, as he had promiſed to Benedict Corne, another of that City that was banished; Capitaine Garrou a Buſque by Nation, a man well practiſed in armes, did mingle the towneſmen with the ſouldiers, at the guard of the wall, to prevent the execution of their intelligence, if happily they had any. So as the conſpirators not daring to diſcouer themſelues, Paluſſin decried of his fooliſh enterpriſe, hauing planted his guards about the towne, where he thought moſt ſure, went to ſleep. Garrou ſuſſies forth to giue them a ſkirmiſh, he kills the greateſt part; ſome ſecke their ſafety vpon the lake, others vpon the mountaine. Three Barks were ſunke in the lake, and ſeuſen taken by Garrou. Many were taken priſoners; amongſt others, Manſſey and Soto, who after they had confeſſed the reuolts and practices in the Estate of Milan, were publicly quartered at Milan: and Bartholmew Ferrier their complice, a man of authority in the rowne, was beheaded vpon the returne of the Lord of Lautrec, whom the King (being aduerſified of theſe diſorders) ſent preſently to Milan. The Lansquenets had leaue to depart into their Country. Seeing the Popes ſecret practices could not ſucceed, he now diſcouers himſelfe, hee complains in the Conſistory of Cardinals, of the attempt of Regium; and concludes, that the King is ill affected to the Apoſtolike Sea, and (concealing the Capitulations he had ſecretly made with the Emperour) hee proteſts that he is forced to ally himſelfe vnto him, who (ſaid Leo) had neuer committed any thing vnworthy of a Chriſtian Prince, and very zealous to Religion.

So, the Wolfe in the Fable accuſed the Sheepe for troubling the water. Thereupon he preſently makes ſhew to conſtraint with Don Iohn Emanuel, Ambaſſadour to Charles, the league which he had formerly concluded; and reſolues, by the aduice of Proſper Colonne, to inuade the Estate of Milan with ſix hundred men at armes, and the companies of horſe which the Emperour had in the Realme of Naples, ſix thousand Italian foot, two thousand Spaniards (which Adorne had in the Ruer of Genoua) two thousand Neapolitanes, (which the Marquis of Pescara should bring) foure thousand Lansquenets, nets, and two thousand Grifons (which should bee lauided at their common charge) and a two thousand Suisses, which had remained voluntarily, of a great number, vnder the Popes pay.

Whilest this was working, behold a fatal signe to our Frenchmen of their instant calamities: for on Saint Peter's day, the Sunne being set, and the sky cleare, lightning fell vpon the great Tower of the Castle of Milan, and ouerthrew six fadomes of the Curtaine on either side, consumed two hundred & fifty thousand weight of powder, twelve hundred fire-pots, the prouision of salt for five yeares: and vnder the ruines were slaine Richbourg Capitaine of the Castle, and about three hundred Gentlemen and souldiers that were walking there. Leo did not forget to triumph at this accident, and to impute it to the wrath of God laid vpon the French.

This heauy accident was a spur to hasten his resolutions, for the ruine of our men. And knowing that the estate of Mantoua did import him much for the wars of Lombardy, he entertained Frederick Marquis of Mantoua with two hundred men at arms, and two hundred light-horse, giving him the title of Generall for the Church: for the accepting whereof, the Marquis renouncing the Order of Saint Michael, sent back the collar to the King, wherewith his Maiesty had honoured him. The Marquis of Mantoua and Prosper Colonne, hauing armed for the Pope, and the Marquis of Pescara for the Emperor, they besieged Parma, seated vpon a Riuer of the same name, and easie to be passed: but after great raine, and the day after the beheading of S. Iohn, hauing battered the Port of S. Croix, to wards Milan, (which at that time was but the Suburbs) and made a breach of fifty paces, giuen three sharpe assaults and were repulsed, about foure thousand Italians (of six thousand that were within the towne) went out at the breach, and yielded to the enemy. The Marshall of Poix, who had vnderaken the defence thereof, the Lord of Pont-Dormy, gouernour of the towne, and the other Capraines, hauing kept the bafe towne about fiftene dayes, retired into the towne beyond the Riuer, leauing an Italian Capitaine at the breach, to fauour the retreat of their men at armes, who, to worke his owne safetie, deceived the enemy by a gentle stratagem, he caused euery one of the Harquebussiers, to lay an end of a match, light vpon the rampier, where they did vsually make their guard, so as it was an houre after the breake of day, before the enemies had knowledge that the breach was abandoned: which hauing discovered, they passe their artillery, spoile the suburbs, make their approaches to the towne at Nooneday, and begin to batter the wall, which defends the other banke of the Riuer.

But small accidents doe often disappoint attempts of great consequence. The same night that the enemy entred into Codipont, (which is the suburb they had abandoned) news comes, that Alphonso of Este, Duke of Ferrara, with an hundred men at armes, two hundred light-horse, two thousand foot (whereof Lautrec had sent him a thousand Italians and Corseques, and twelve peeces of Artillery) had surprised Final and Saint Felix, and threatened Modena. Prosper Colonne would not diminish his army, when as he feared the enemies approach. But to assure Modena, they must draw out of the Popes armie two hundred light-horse, and eight hundred foot, led by Count Guy of Rangon, to ioine with six hundred others that were left within the place.

On the other side, Lautrec approached with his army, which consisted of seven or eight hundred Lances, thirtene or fourteene thousand Suisses, foure thousand French, which S. Vallier had newly brought: six hundred men at armes Venetians, and foure thousand foot vnder Theodore Trinuice Generall of the Venetians, and Andrew Gritti Commissary, accompanied with the Duke of Vrbin, and Marke Anthony Colonne. These two considerations, with the obstatine resolution of the besieged, forced the enemy to raise the siege, and to take the way of Po, to enter the estate of Milan. Lautrec follows them: but hauing lost two or three dayes in taking the Castle of Roque-blanque, he gaue them leisure to passe the Riuer. It is good to obserue the errors of a Commander, that others may iudge and make their profit thereby. The Popes army lay open to the spoile: the Lanquents mutined for want of pay, refusing to follow, and resolved to ioine with the French. The retreat was made in confusion: the army was full of feare, for this sudden dislodging: they had in front a great difficulty, being to passe the Riuer of Po: when a great army passeth any Riuer, it is easie to disturbe them, if the enemy bee diligent and valiant: were they not then likely to bee put to rout, if Lautrec had pursued them hotly? Thus they passed

Errors of the French army.

A passed the Po, the first of October, spending a whole day, and a great part of the night at the passage, but the pairing of spies makes Commanders oft-times to let slip goodly occasions, being ignorant of the disorders and difficulties that troubled the enemy.

This is not all; other accidents happen, which being neglected, the French shall receive a shamefull disgrace. The enemies army was so weak, as the Spaniards and Lanquents were now reduced to about seven thousand, the Italians (for the most part new souldiers) feared rather to make a number, then for any strength, and lodged at Rebec, attending a supply of Suisses, to profit for individuals, as the prouision of meale which was brought vnto them in small quantity, was distributed to the companies by measure. The Souldiers for want of Ounces, byked their prouisions vpon the embres. Their Suisses came not, many Italians fled away secretly; and all men confessed, that if the French army which lodged at Bourdellane, two miles nere to the enemies campe, had charged them at their rising from Rebec, halfe vanquished with so many difficulties, there had remained little or no hope of safetie. For these necessities had forced them to retire: where the retreat being long, and the enemy nere, the danger had beene euident, considering that from the Castle of Pont-Iuy, belonging to the Venetians, they might disorder their battalions with the Cannon. But the fruitlesse and long stay of our commanders at Rebec, after the enemies departure, gaue them leisure to passe the Riuer of Oly, and to lodge in the village of Ostiana, with an intent not to rise before the arrivall of their Suisses.

C. The Feast of All-Saints drew nere, the nights grew long, the continuall raine and cold annoyed our Suisses, who demanded that pay which the law of Armes giues vnto souldiers that haue won a battell, laying, that it was not their fault they had not obtained a victory. But in this case nor the will but the effect merits such a pay: so as of all their company there remained about foure thousand. Thus being full of dislike and discontent, suborned likewise by the practices of the Cardinals of Medices and Sion, who as Legats to Leo, marched in the midst of the army with their crosses of silver, entreated (saith the Original) with numbers of armed men, artillery, blasphemers, murderers, and theenes: they did greatly weaken the Kings army, to fortifie the enemies, ioining with Prosper Colonne, and imputing the chiefe cause thereof to the want of pay. Without doubt, it is a great error in D. a Kings Officers, especially in an army, to convert the money appointed for the payment of an army to other vies. It was at the passage of the Riuer of Adde, that the last act of this tragedy must be played: for the defence whereof Lautrec sent the Lord of Port-Dormy, with his company: that of Ostianian Fregese (led be Count Hughes of Pepoli a Bolonis) a thousand or twelve hundred foot, and two faulcons. But it pleased God at this time to satisfie the Popes couetousnesse with the spoile of our men, that hee might execute the iust iudgement of his vengeance soone after vpon his person. The enemy beats backe our guards, and puts them to flight, kills some, and amongst others, Gratian of Luce and Chardon, neighbors to the forest of Orleans: who commanded either of them a Regiment of six hundred men. They passe Adde at Vauci, and force Lautrec to retire to Cassin, and so E towards Milan with his whole army.

The passage of Adde recouered Prosper Colonne's reputation, who for the retreat before Parma, and his ordinary tediousnesse, was ill reputed of, as well at Rome, as in his army. Contrariwise, Lautrec wanting neither valour nor braue resolution, but Vigilance and happinesse, purchaseth contempt of his men, and hatred of the Milanois, whom he did the more exasperate, in causing Christopher Palsiofin to be publicly beheaded, a man of great Nobility, great authority, great age, and a long time detained prisoner. Colonne aduertised of the retreat of the French to Milan, lodged at Marignan, and his Suisses in the Abbey of Cleruaut, doubtfull whether he should passe on to Milan, being fortified with so many men: or turne to Pavia, being destitute of Souldiers. Being thus irresolute, there appeares F vnto the Marquis of Mantoua, an aged man, meane in shew and apparall, who being brought before Colonne and the other Capitaines, assures them that he is sent from the Parishioners of S. Cir of Milan, to let them vnderstand, that at the first approach of their army, all the people of Milan are resolved to take armes against the French, by the sound of the bells of euery parish: wishing them to set forward with speed, without giuing the French leisure to bethinke themselves. And so he vanished away, not knowne to any man.

The Commanders gaue credit to this intelligence. The 23 of Nouember the Marquis of Pescara with his Spaniards, presents himselfe at the port of Rome at Sunne-setting, and presently charged the Venetians, appointed to guard the suburbs with a bastion which A they had newly begunne: hee puts them to flight, making no resistance, and the Suisses likewise that were lodged by them: kills some, and hurts others, before: our men had any knowledge of their arrival. Theodore Trimice, who (being sicke and disarmed) came to this alarme vpon a little moyle, was taken. The Gibelins seizing on the port, brought in the Marquis of Pescara and Mantoua, the Cardinal of Medici, Colonne and a part of the army: the victors not able to conceiue by what happinesse and meanes they had so easily obtained for a notable victory, the which was confirmed by the sack of the City, which continued fiftene dayes:

We cannot but blame our Commanders herein of negligence and too great confidence, in not discouering the enemies remove that day: who thought that they would not assault the Rampiers without their artillery, the which could not march, the wayes being broken with continuall raine:

Lautrec, troubled with the feare and the darknesse of the night, not able to discover in so short a time the estate of the enemy confusidly lodged, some in the City, others in the suburbs; left Mascaron (a Gentleman of Gascony) within the Castle, with fiftie meuar armes, and six hundred French foot, and retired his army to Como, where leaving Isabell of Chabannes Lord of Vandenesse, brother to the Marshall of Chabannes, with fifty men at armes, and five hundred foot, he re-passed the Ruer of Adde at Lecque; and tooke the way of Bergamo, to put his men at armes into Garison in the Venetians Country, and C other places which held yet for the French.

It is an vsuall thing to yeeld vnto the Conqueror. Lauda, Paula, Placentia, Alexandria, Cremona, hold for the Empire and the Duke of Milan. Janot of Herbouille, Lord of Buno, held yet the Castle of Cremona. Lautrec sent his brother Desaut thither, (whose fine the retreat of Parma, had ioyned with his army) with part of his forces to recouer it, who being repulsed, Lautrec brought all the troops, which were but five hundred men at armes, foure thousand Suisses, and a few other footmen, foure hundred men at armes Venetians, and six thousand foot. As all things were ready for the assault, the enemy being amazed, demanded a composition, the which they obtained with their liues and baggage. A small comfort for men halfe discouraged.

Fredericke of Bossole came from Parma with his forces by Lautrecs commandement. He had no sooner passed the Po, but Vitelli seized thereon with a most pleasing consent of all the people. All these victories were glorious to the enemy: but the treachery of one ble-mished their former reputation. Como besieged and battered ten or twelue dayes, despairing of succour and defence, had yeilded vpon condition, that as well the French companies as those of the towne, should haue their liues and goods saued, depart with their Lances vpon their thighs, and be safely conducted into the Venetians Country: and yet when the French would depart, the Spaniards entred and spoiled both the soldiers and the Citizens. Vandenesse accusing the Marquis of Pescara to haue broken his faith, challenged him to the combat: If you will maintaine (answered he) that this sacke is happened by my com-mandement or permission, I say that you haue lyed. But before the quarrell could be ended, Vandenesse was slaine at Romagnan, at the retreat of the Admirall of Boniuet, whom the end of the warres of Nauarre had drawne beyond the Alpes. At the same instant, those of the league sent the Bishop of Verule to the Suisses, to withdraw their affections from this Crowne. But displeased that their men had marched against the King, and complaining of the Cardinal of Sion, the Pope and all his officers, who had perswaded them to breake the conditions of their alliance, they put this Bishop in hold at Bellinsone, and called home the troops they had in Italy. Oft-times the victor is partaker of the discommodities of war: they made preparation to assaile Cremona and Genoua; but their designs are broken by the death of Pope Leo, who hauing newes of the taking of Milan, and especially of Parma and Placentia (for the recovery whereof to the Church, he had chiefly moued this war) he was so wonderfully transported with ioy, as he falls into a quoziden, with a Cate-ram, amidst all his iollity, the which caried him within three dayes after to the graue, being the first of December.

Death of Pope
Leo.Alterations after this death.

This death did greatly impair the Emperours affaires in Italy, and bred new Govern-ments, new Councils, and a new estate of affaires in the Duchy of Milan. The Car-dinals of Medici and Sion, went to assist at the election of a new Pope. The Impe-rials

1522

A rials retained fiftene hundred Suisses, and dismissed the rest. The Lansquenets likewise departed. The Florentine companies returned into Tuscany. Guy of Rangon led part of those of the Church to Modena, the rest remained with the Marquis of Mantoua, in the Duchy of Milan. And the Duke of Ferrara (making his profit of this occasion) recovered with the liking of the inhabitants, Bondene, Final, the mountaine of Modena and Car-fagnane, he tooke Lugo, Bagnacaul, and other townes of Romagnia. Likewise Francis Maria being expelled his Duchy of Vrbino, by Leo, and called home by the people, reco-uered it in few dayes. Our Commanders slept not, but the chance was turned. The Admi-rall of Boniuet, with three hundred Lances, Frederick of Bossole and Marke Anthony B-lonne leading five thousand French, and Italians, went to besiege Parma, the which after many diffculties incident to townes besieged, was persued by the wife resolution, and singular direction of Francis Guicciardin Governour thereof.

Parma besieged

In the meane time, the Cardinals at Rome did strue for Saint Peters Chaire. The Car-dinal of Medici, for the reputation of his greatness, for his reuenues and glory gotten in the conquest of Milan, had already gotten the suffrages of fiftene Cardinals. But the rest could not endure two Popes together of one Family, which might haue beene a pre-sident to vlturpe a right of succession in the Popedom. The most ancient Cardinals opo-posed themselves against his nomination, euery man pretending that dignity for himselfe, which another sought so greedily. During their controuersies, Cardinall Adrian Bishop C of Derthuse, borne at Vrecc, and sometimes Schoolemaster to the Emperour Charles, was put in the election, not with any intent to install him in the place of the deceased, but on-ly to spend that morning, and by delays coole the heat of the most violent futors. But the Cardinall of Saint Sixte, hauing by a long Oration amplified his vertues and knowledge, some yeilded vnto him (it may be the Emperour would haue beene displeased, if they had reiected his election) others followed them, so as all the Cardinals agreeing by a common consent, he was created Pope, when as he least dreamed of it, being absent, a stranger, yn-known, hauing neuer scene Italy, and without thought, or hope euer to see it. Being loth to change his name, he was called Adrian the first.

A new Pope

But what shall this poore Fleming get, to runne so farre to sit in a chaire, so much en- D uied? He came from Spaine (where the Emperour had made him Governour in his ab-sence) to seeke his death at Rome. He shall be little esteemed, during his Popedom, and they will be glad to send him speedily after his predecessor. The winter passed, and our soldiers laid aside armes, to resume them againe, the one to persueue their conquests, and the other to recouer their losses. To this end the King sent René, bastard of Sauoy, Earle of Villars, Lord Steward of France, the Marshall of Chabannes, Galen of Saint Seuerin, master of his horse, and the Lord of Montmorency, newly created Marshall of France, to make a leauy of 16000 Suisses, to succour Lautrec. And to crosse him, the Emperour, by means of the King of Englands money (estranged from the loue of France) sent Ierosme Adorne to make a leauy of 6000 Lansquenets, to put into Milan with Francis Sforza. Adorne E coming to Trent, vnderstood that the Milanois had already entertained 4000 foot, with the which hee retired to Milan, whilst the other 6000 did arme.

The warre reduced.

In the meane time there wanted no practices at Milan, by Ierosme Adorne, and his par-tisans, to kindle the peoples hatred against the French. It is not alone in our last troubles, that we haue tried, with what efficacy seditious sermons touch the peoples hearts. Andrew Borghia an Augustin by profession, preaching with a great concourse of people did won-derfully incourage them to defend their Religion, goods, families, liues, and country. Adorne himselfe Preacher, and gracious to the people, adds thereto his pleasant, and is the ordinary mask of wise men of this world, to searle their affaires.

It is no lesse honour to persueue then to get. Ten thousand Suisses were already come. F and Frederick Colonne, (to keep the French from entering into Milan by the Castle, and to sur-nish it with victuall and munition) caused to be made, after the manner of the ancient Romanes, without the said Castle, betwixt the gates that goe to Vercell and Como, two trenches, distant twenty paces one from another, about a mile longe: and at the end of either of the said trenches, a Cavalier, or Mount, very high, and well furnished (to an-noy the enemy) with his Cannon, if he approached on that side, so as his succours could not enter, nor the besieged goe forth.

joined his companies, and the Venetians assembled theirs about Cremona; who being joyned with the Suisses, passed the River of Adde, the first of March, and John de Medici with them, who persuaded by the Kings great and certaine entertainment, was newly drawn to his service. They march like men resolved to assaile the rampier, but the trenches stay them, the third day Marke Anthony Colonne and Camillo bastard sonne to John Laques of Trauile, walking together in a house, & disuiling to make a mount to shoot from thence with their artillery, betwixt the enemies two trenches, a volley of Cannon shot from the towne, did beat downe the said house, and buried them in the ruines thereof. Thus Lautrec despairing to take Milan by assault, conuerteth all his thoughts to vanquish it in time by famine, he wastes the Country, Rops the victuals, breaks the mills, and cuts off their water. But not to fall into their hands whom they feare, they dread not death. The peoples hatred against the French, and the desire of their new Duke whom they expected, makes them to endure all distresses patiently. Francis Sforza comes to Trent with five thousand Lanquenets, who by the taking of the Castle of Croare, hauing opened the passage of Po, arriued without any lett at Pavia. The way was difficult from Pavia to Milan: for at the first brute of their approach, Lautrec went to lodge at Cassin, and the Venetians at Binaque, vpon the way to Pavia. There fell out an accident which helpt Sforza, the Marshall of Foix came out of France with money, and some troops of footmen. Lautrec sent Frederick of Bissle, to receiue him into the Estate of Milan, with four hundred Lances, and seuen thousand Suisses and Italians: being ioyned together, they went to Nouarre, and through the fauour of the Castle, took it at the third assault, with the slaughter of most that defended it. A small gaine which shall cause a great losse.

Pavia besieged in vaine.

For Lautrec wanting a great part of his forces, he gaue Sforza meane to enter into Milan, with his Lanquenets, and three hundred horse, with an incredible ioy to the Milanois. The coming of a new Prince is very pleasing to an Estate, whereby the people hope for ease. Lautrec seeing Sforza dislodged from Pavia, and receiued into Milan, resolves to besiege Pavia, where the Marquis of Mantoua commanded, with two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. Lautrec batters the towne, and makes a breach of thirty fadome, he giues two assaults, and is repulled.

There was a postern in the towne, ioyning to the River of Tefin, where they watted their horses, which by reason of the River was ill guarded: whilst they did buse the Imperials at the breach, Saint Colombe had charge to passe the River at a foard, with two thousand foot, and Riberac and Rochepesay with four hundred horse, of the companies of Lautrec, and the bastard of Sauoy, who marching along the wall, where there was no flankers, should by the swiftnesse of their horses seize vpon the postern, and hold it vntill their foot came. Riberac and Rochepesay execute their designe, they enter the Towne, plinie a Guidon vpon the Postern: but Saint Colombe was content to bring his men to the River side, without weting of his foot. So as the Citizens had leasure to come to succour it, and to repulse our men: who if they had bene followed, had taken the towne. Riberac was slaine fighting, and Rochepesay had his leg broken with a musket shot. This attempt did wonderfully amaze the inhabitants, considering their want of men, and munition: and the Marquis made it knowne, that without succours he should in the end be forced to yeeld the towne.

Prosper knowing the danger, sent twelve hundred Corses and Spaniards, who marching by night, speaking Gascoigne, were taken for Gascoignes, by the Venetians, and passed their first guards, and meeting with some French scouts, speaking Italian, were taken for Italians. So as deceiuing the companies by this stratagem, they passed without discouerie, but very late, by the horsemen, who charging them behind, slew some small number.

The death of Riberac, kinsman to Lautrec, made him to double the fury of the Cannon, and ill prepared for an assault: when Colonne furnished with *Sforza*s troops, goes to field, and comes to campe at Chastell, three miles from the French. What heues then was there to giue an assault, having a mighty army behind them, and all things else succeeding crossely. The money which Lefort had brought, was spent, and that which came from France, was stayed in Arone, by the Viscount Amichiel, who was sent to that end from Milan to Buße. The continual raine had ouer-flowed the river of Tefin, and small brookes grew to be great flues: so as the victuals which came from

A Onelinc, to the campe, could no more passe, whereby they were forced to raise the siege, and draw towards Monce, to enioy the commodities of Laudefan and Cremonois.

The enemy seeing the French Army take the way to Monce, fearing they would recouer Milan, went to lodge at Bicocque, a Gentlemans house, but of so great a circuit, as twenty thousand men might easily be put in bataille, vpon the way from Laude to Milan. Without doubt, the valour and wildome of Prosper, gaue the first wound to the French affaires, but the impatience of the Suisses did vnto them. Their Colonels gaue Lautrec to vnderstand, that their companions were weary of camping so long without any profit, that they demand of three things the one; either money, leaue to depart, or a bataille. Our Commanders hoped by famine to driue Colonne out of his borrow. And what reason was there to assaile a mightie enemy, in a Fort entrenched, flanked with great platformes, and well furnished with Artillery? But neither periwaisons, praiers, promises, nor authority could diuert them from their first resolution. Seeing then there was no other meane to detain them, Lautrec resolved, rather to hazard his army by a bataille, then to giue any occasion to be suspected of cowardise. An vnfortunate condition of a Commander, who sees himselfe a slave to those he should command: and what a grieue is it to be forced to doe that which must needs bring shame and confusion? But where force reigneth, right hath no place.

Lautrec forced to fight by the Suisses.

The day of Quasimodo, the Army marcheth towards Bicocque. The Marshall of Foix led the forward: Lautrec, the Marshall of Chabannes, the bastard of Sauoy, and Galeat of Saint Suerin, the bataille. Francis Maria, Duke of Vrbin, with the Venetian Army, the rereward. Peter of Nauarre marched before, to make the way. The Lord of Montmorency should assaile them on the one side with eight thousand Suisses. Lefort, with three hundred Lances, and a squadron of French and Italian foot, should charge at the bridge, entering into the enemies lodging; and Pontdormy should march before the Marshall of Foix, with a troope of horse, to watch lest the Imperials should come behind and disorder the Army; and likewise to furcor where neede should require.

Besides force, Lautrec vsed this policy, to cause the men at armes to set red crosses vpon their Cassocks, the marke of the Imperiall army, in stead of a white, the luerie of France. But the prouidence of Colonne made this device fruitlesse, as we shall see. On the other side, Colonne had sent for Sforza, who hauing foudainly assembled four hundred horse, and six thousand of the Commons, was set to guard the Bridge, and all the troopes were put in bataille vpon the trench. Montmorency, accompanied with a great number of the Nobility, was come close to the enemies rampier, intreating the Suisses to attend the Artillery; and that the Marshall of Foix should be ready to assaile them on the other side: that Colonne being charged on all sides, might be constrained to diuide his forces. But a rash fury transporting the Suisses to their owne ruine, all runne furiously to the enemies fort, the Cannon entertaines them before they approach, and kills about a thousand of them. A volley of small shot kills most of their Captaines, and chiefe Souldiers, and the Rampier being about a Pike in height, staves them foudainly. The Earle of Montfort, eldest son to the Earle of Laual, Mielans of Sauoy, Granul, brother to the Vidame of Chartres, Roque-laure, la Guiche, the Lords of Tournon & Longa, Lannay, a Gentleman of the Kings Chamber, and many others died there. Colonel Albert Peter (who about all others, thrust them into this furie) suffered the paines of his rashnesse. Montmorency was overthrowne, but suddenly releued by the Gentlemen that were about him.

The battaile of Bicocque.

In the meane time the Marshall of Foix forced the guards vpon the bridge, and charging the enemy within his fort, gaue hope of Victory. But this violent heat of the Suisses was soon quenched, All retire, yet keeping a kinde of order. The Imperials flew from the Suisses, thrust all their forces vpon the Marshall and Vandenesse, who had not about four hundred horse; and force them to repasse the bridge with the losse of some men. On the other side, the Spaniards issuing forth, charge the Suisses in the rereward, and find put them to rout, if Pontdormy had not by a furious charge kept them within their Fort. The Venetians kept themselves safe from dainger, but if they had charged with the Suisses, and men at armes, & the Marshall of Foix had bene well followed, the French in all had won the victory. But, when things are done there neuer wants an if. The Suisses lost about fiftie thousand men, and two hundred and twenty Captaines. The Enemy lost few, no men of quality, but John of Cardone Earle of Cuisant. So Lautrec returned with the rest of his armie, the Suisses, and the artillery to Monce, from whence the tuesday after, the Suisses returned to their houses, and the Bastard of Saouy, the Marshall of Chabannes, and Galeas of Saint Seuerin retired with them. Now shall wee see this Nation so daunted, as of many yeeres they shall not shew their accustomed vigor.

The remainder of the French hopes was chiefly grounded vpon the towne of Laude, for the passage of the riuer of Adde, and preservation of the country of Cremona. Lantrec sent Iohn de Medici, and Fredericke of Bossole thither with their troopes, which were about foure hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, comprehending those which Bonnecual, Captaine of the place had. These Companies tired with their march in the night, arrived in the morning, and leaving the guard of the towne to Bonnecual, they took their lodgings, to refresh themselves and their horse. The Marquis of Pescara had followed them, and his forward marching neare unto the towne, gaue occasion to the garison to come forth to skirmish; in the which our men were so roughly repulsed, as the enemy entred with them pell-mell into Laude, and surpris'd most of the soldiers in their beds at noone-day. Thus foure hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, were shamefully taken in a towne without battery, without breach, and without ladder. Iohn de Medici, and Bossole saved themselves in Cremona.

The losse of Laude from the French, was the cause the enemy recouered Pisqueton, one of the strongest places vpon Adde. Hereupon Pontormy offers to put himselfe into Cremona, with such as would follow him, and being strong or weak, he would fight withall that should come, desiring rather to dye by the enemies Sword, then to fall into the mercy of villaines, or returne into France without armes, and honor. Lantrec yeelds, and he gathers together a troope out of many companies. The Marshall of Foix would haue his part of this glorie; five or six dayes after, the Imperials Campe before it. At their arrival, Iohn de Medici mutines, hee demands pay for fiftene or sixtene hundred men, which he had gathered together presently after his retreat: he seizeth vpon one of the gates towards the enemies Campe and threatens to deliuer it for want of payment. They search their purses and pay him the summe demanded.

But he was corrupted, and our men seeing his treacherous intent, hauing no hope of succours, did capitulate: That if within three monthes the King did not send a strong army, able to passe the riuer, they should reape with their baggage, armes, & all their artillery, marked with the armes of France, and should be conducted in safety vnto Saue: and the said Marshall should deliuer into Prosper's hands, all whatsoeuer was held in the Kings name, in the Citie of Milan, except the Castles of Milan, Cremona, and Nouarre. This capitulation was found of hard digestion: for, Montmorency was in possibility to renew the league with the Venetians, but aduertised of this composition, they changed both affections, and partie. The reason which made Prosper yeeld to so honourable a composition, was the desire he had to restore the Adornes into Genoua before the leauy of foure hundred Lances, and foure-teeue thousand Gasccons should be readie to enter into Italy. Prosper Colonne, plants himselfe before Genoua, which was then gouerned by Ottavian Fregese, a man of excellent vertue, who for his Iustice, and other commendable parts, was as much beloued as any Prince might be, in a Citie diuided into factions, hauing not yet lost the remembrance of the ancient libertie. Fregese seeing Iosme and Anthony Adorne take armes, in fauour of the Imperials, and the people inclined to sedition, treated of an accord, when as Peter of Nauarre enters into the port with two galleies, and some two hundred, to assure the towne attending the succours of France. But a Tower which the Marquis of Pescara had battered neere vnto the gate, made them returne vnto their parle. Being readie to conclude, the Spaniards discouering the small guard they made within, vnder colour of this hope, seized on the Tower, entering the Towne thereby, and by the wall which was ruined, killing all they met, and getting a great spoile; Fregese being sicke yeelded to the Marquis of Pescara, and within few daies after died.

Peter of Nauarre was taken fighting in the market-place. The Archbishop of Salerno, brother to Ottavian, and many Capitaines saved themselves by sea. Anthony Adorne, was chosen Duke of Genoua, and within few daies received the Citadell, the Chancelier, and the Church of Saint Francis by composition. Six thousand men newly sent by the King vnder the command of the Lord of Lorges, for the succour of Genoua, and the army of Claude of Orleans, Duke of Longueuille, to repaire the affaires of Lombardie, returned

A turned without any effect, being already entred into the territory of Asti and Lescur, preft by the terme limited by the composition, deliuered Cremona to Colonne, leaving Bunou, Captaine of the Castle. Thus the French were againe expelled out of Italy. Lantrec, seeing the enterprise of Laude made fruitlesse, his Armie ruined, the Suisses and Venetians retired; he returnes into France, bringing to the King, rather iustificacions of his actions, then any signes of his victories; imputing the cause of these disorders to want of moeiey, without the which he could no longer keepe the men at armes together, who had serued him these monthes without any pay, the Kings mother hauing raised foure hundred thousand crownes, appointed for the payment of the Armie, which summe (she said) she had spared out of other reuenues; & had long before put it into Semblançais hands, being ouerscor of the Treasurie of France. Hereupon the King appointed certain Iudges and Commissioners to determine of this controuersie, and to arraigne the said Semblançay, for the which he lost his life.

Let vs now passe ouer the Pirenee mountains, and then wee will returne to the frontiers of Picardie, another Theatre where there was likewise acted a mournfull and bloody Tragedie. The Admirall Bonnivet was no sooner returned into France with his troopes, but the Spaniards went and encamped before Fontenabre, and had so prest it with siege for the space of a yeare, as many were dead of hunger. The Marshall of Chabillon marched with an armie to relieve the towne, and Lude, being then Gouernour, comming to Dax (six leagues on this side Bayonne) he died of a violent sickness. A Nobleman of great experience and credit, Montmorency (who was then at Venice) succeeded him in the office of Marshall; and the Marshall Chabannes in that of Lieutenant General for the King in his armie; who hauing gathered together his troopes, lodged in Endayes; hauing a river betwixt the Spanish Armie and him; attending Larigee Viceadmirall of Britany, with an army at Sea, for the victualling of the towne. But not appearing (either through sloth or misfortune) he resolues of an other course: he passeth the riuer, dislodgeth the enemy with his Cannon, and by continuall skirmishes, makes them flee through the mountains. So Chabannes, hauing victualled the towne, returns, leaving Franget to gouern there in the Kings name: he was Lieutenant to the Marshall Chabannes, leading away D Lude, to refresh himselfe in France. Without doubt, Lude deserves to be registred in this History, Hauing (with the Original) non such honour in the defence of this place, as he may well be compared to any that haue maintained sieges in our daies, or our forefathers. Contrariwise, Franget shall purchase as much infamy as his predecessor did honour. During these confusions beyond the Alpes and Pirenee mountains, the warre continued throughout all the garisons of Picardie, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with losse. The day of the Annunciation, twelue hundred Lansquenets going out of Arras, hauing spoiled Bernauille, and other Villages thereabout, led away their booty, when as Esfrize, commanding the company of the Duke of Vendosme, which was in Garison at Dourlans, aduertised hereof, goes to horse about midnight with 30 men at armes only, fifty Archers, and three hundred of the country-men without pay: he attends them, at a passage of the riuer of Othie: vpon their retreat, hee chargeth them, & defeats them, and kills an hundred and fiftie, making the rest to leaue their prey. And if this handful of men could giue them so great a checke; what had bene the issue if their foemen had come to fight? In this encounter were slaine the Lord of Ricame, and the bastard of Dampton.

The enemy grieued at this disgrace, sought to be reuenged by the surpris of Dourlans, where there were no foot-men. With this designe the Earle of Bures, Lieutenant General for the Emperor in the Low-countries, incamps before the towne with all his garisons; batters it with six peeces of artillery; makes a breach neere to the Tower of Corniere, giues an assault, and plants many ladders. Here the Inhabitants shew themselves better Frenchmen, then in our late troubles; who backt by this small troope of men at armes, repulse the enemy, and ouerthrow a good number dead in the ditch.

To raise this siege, the Earle of Saint Paul (vnder the authority of the Duke of Vendosme his brother) gathers together such forces as the garisons could furnish; wherof the Bourguignons aduertised, they shamefully returned to Arras, leaving their ladders within the trenches; Diensal, Diuion, Brucil, and other places about Betune (wonderfully annoying the Frontier) were ruined by the Duke of Vendosme. But oftentimes a small gaine is crost with a notable losse. Telligny came from Monstreuill, to ioync with the Dukes troopes troopes at Mouchy le Cayen, when as passing by Hedin, he encountered abt. hundred Bourgignons foot, driving the booty before them: he charged the learned downes, the some and tooke others. A very preiudiciall victory, in regard of that valiant Knight, who well experienced in martiall affaires, who being shot into the shoulder, died within but daies after. In the meane time the Emperour passed into Spaine, to punish the authors of the sedition before mentioned, imparting his desires to the King of England. His voyage was not fruitlesse, they remained well satisfied one of another, so the provision of this Crowne, both equally desirous to ruine it. But it shall scule (as in former times) the favour of heaven against their common attempts.

The first effect of their treaty, was to send their Ambassadors joyntly together. Venice, to require the Senat to ioyne with the Emperour, for the defence of Italy. For the second, The King of England complayning that the King did not continue the payment of fiftie thousand Crownes yeerely, which hee ought him (as wee have said) he proclaimed warre against the King by his Herald, in case he would not make a generall truce with the Emperour, comprehending the Church, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines. The King refused this truce, and as for the pension, It is not reasonable (said he) to give money to him, that aides mine enemies with money. Henry King of England had before sent a notable summe of money to the Emperour: but not discovering himself openly, he sent the Duke of Suffolk, husband to Queene Mary, widow to Lewis the twelfth, to Calais, and the Emperour joyined his forces with him, being led by the Earle of Burgh.

The King opposed the Duke of Vendosme, commanding about a thousand men at Arme, with their archers, and eightene thousand foot, assisted by that veteran old man Lewis of Tremouille. The enemies Army was not ready in fiftene daies. The Duke therefore diuided his forces into Bologne, Therouenne, Hedin, Montreuil, Abbeville and other places subiect to the enemies inuasion. He must not suffer their courage to quicke through idleness: Bapaume serued them for an exercise. The Earle of Saint Paul led the Earle of Guise and Lorges thither, equall in charge, with four hundred men at Armes, six thousand foot and four Cannons: who having taken, burnt and razed the Towne and Castle, they tooke their way, to the passage of Sluce, and finding it guarded by the Bourgignons, they charge them, and chase them to the gates of Douay. Here Francis brother to the Duke of Lorraine and Earle of Guise, of the age of sixteen or seauenteene yeeres, carried his first Armes, who seeing in this chafe, seven or eight Bourgignons on foot, seeking their safety within the woods: being alone, not seene by his followers, hee lights and chargeth them, but Martin du Bellay arises happily, accompanied with ten or twelue horse, by whose means these run-awaies were cut in peeces.

Hereupon the English arise at Calais, and at their first entry, they become maisters of the castle of Comtes, betwixt Montreuil and Hedin. To prevent these incursions, the Duke sent the foresaid Earle into the trench of Bologne (Ardes was then ruined and desart) who by the recovery of the said castle, put all to the sword they found within it, except the Capitaine: and afterwards overthrow many other troopes, that were dispersed in the land of Oye, while the two Armies, English and Bourgignons assembled betwixt Ardes and Saint Omer, consulting upon the first object of their forces. Hedin seemed the easiest to be attempted, yet it must needs cost blowes. The Lord of Biez commanded there with thirty men at Armes, and two hundred dead-paies: Sercu with a thousand foot, and La Lande with five hundred. The battery continued fiftene dayes, and a breach was made of forty fadome, but no assault giuen: the enemy being diuerted by continuall alarmes: The Earles of Guise and Pont-dormy, vnderstanding one day amongst others, that four hundred English were gone towards Biez, and the Commander of Oison: they part from Montreuil with their companies, and some of the Duke of Vendosme, they ouertake them, charge them, and kill or take them all. Some few dayes after, Pont-dormy encountering some other troopes, which had burnt Fressin, a house of his elder brothers, hee put them all to the sword.

Thus kept within their lodgings, by continuall enterprises, and assisted with a generall flux, which went through their Army, proceeding in part by the continuall raize, after six weekes siege, they raised their campe with shame, to march towards Dourlans, which was not defensible. At that time there was no castle, and from the mountaine where it now built, they discovered the towne on all sides. The Earle of Saint Paul presented the enemy, and

A and (left they should make vse thereof) he spoyle the victuals, and tooke off the gates: then he retired to Corby, to withstand the attempts of the English. Then arrived the Marshall of Montmorency, bringing with him the two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber, with authority from his Maiestie to command in Corby, if the enemy did besiege it.

But there was too great a resolution in Corby, the wayes were too foule, the infirmities were many in the English and Bourgignons Armies, and winter approaching (it was about all-Saints) invited them to let faile. Being able to doe no worke, they burnt Dourlans, and the villages about, and retired into Arthois, putting the Bourgignons into Garifon, and the English tooke their way for England. Let vs conclude this yeere with an inglorious and fatal loss for the Christians. Soliman did not forget to make his profit of these horrible confusions, who by a painefull and constant siege, for the space of eight moneths, brought the Isle of Rhodes vnder his obedience: where (to the great contempt of our religion) hee made his entrie the day of the birth of our Lord and Sauour. In the beginning of the following yeere, the castle of Milan (preft with diseases and want of all things) compounded to depart with bag and baggage, if they were not releued by the fourth of April. But death preuenting most part of the garifon, hindered them from enioying any benefit of the Capitulation.

At the same time Linot, a Souldier of the garifon of Guise, treated with the Duke of Ascor, to deliuer him the Towne (but not according to the buyers intent) by the consent of Nicholas of Buslu Lord of Longueval, capitaine of the castle. The party was well made and the plot cunningly laid, to take the merchants when they should come for their possession. The Lord of Fleuranges, with three hundred men at Armes, and foure or fife thousand foot, should lie betwixt Auenues and Guise, to stop the enemies retreat. The Duke of Vendosme, with five hundred men at Armes, foure thousand Germanes, and foure thousand French, should cut off their way betwixt the Abbey of Bonhoury and Guise, so as the enemy seeking to retire, had the one before him, and the other behind. The chiefe of all their troopes would bee partakers of this enterprife: When as newes comes vnto them, that the King (who would countenance this exploit with his presence) was come in post to Genlis, neere vnto Chaunis. This made them turne head without any effect, giuing him the strappadoe that sold it, and was their guide, the which Longueval requited with the like to the hostages, which the Duke of Arescor had giuen him for the performance of covenants.

His maiesty, to make vse of these troopes which he had assembled, commanded them to victuall Therouenne, the which Fiennes besieged with fiftene thousand Flemings and six hundred English, the King had a little before repaired it. Bailleul vpon the hill, a strong place, betwixt Arras and Dourlans, and defended by three hundred Spaniards, was a hinderance to this designe. The Duke of Vendosme tooke charge of the Army, whereof the Duke of Norfolk led the Germanes, the Lords of Sercu, Bourmonuille, la Hergerie, Fountains and Heillis commanded the French. Brian had foure hundred archers of the Kings guard, and la Fayette commanded the artillery: he made his approaches at noone day, without any trenches, but with the losse of three Gunners that were slaine, and the Lord of Picennes shot into the arme: he batted it the same day, gaue them their liues that were within it, and razed the Castle. The enemy lodged in Andinon and Dellente, halfe a league from Therouenne: and la Lude Marshall of the Campe (hauing lodged his Army at Fouquemberg, to haue victuals more commodiously from Montreuil, & to keepe them from the enemy) did cut off the way to Saint Omer, and the garifon of Therouenne, that of Aire. Fiennes seeing them approach so neere, dislodged in the night, and went to Campe at Elsauf. The Duke of Vendosme followed, with an intent to fight, whilst that Brian marching directly to Therouenne releued it with such victuals as were brought from Montreuil. The Earle of Dammartin and the Lord of Esquilly began the skirmish, when a sudden feare surprising the Flemings, puts them in rout towards the ruer of Coldes, where many were drowned in the passage, not able to be staid, although no man followed them: for that Brian returning from Therouenne, brought commandement from the King to the Duke of Vendosme, not to hazard a battaile, but to keepe his forces whole for the voyage of Italy, which his Maiesty pretended to make in person.

troopes at Mouchyle Cayen, when as passing by Hedin, he encountered aboue hundred A Bourguignons foot, driving the booty before them: he charged the learned blowes, and some and tooke others. A very preiudiciall victory, in regard of that valiant Knight, B well experienced in martiall affaires, who being shot into the shoulder, died within five daies after. In the meane time the Emperour passed into Spaine, to punish the authors of the fedition before mentioned, imparting his desires to the King of England. His voyage was not fruitlesse, they remayned well satisfied one of another, to the prouidence of this Crowne, both equally desirous to ruine it. But it shall seele (as in former times), the fauour of heaven against their common attempts.

The first effect of their treaty, was to send their Ambassadors jointly together to Vien-nice, to require the Senat to ioyne with the Emperour for the defence of Italy. For the second, The King of England complaining that the King did not continue the payment of fifte thousand Crownes yeerely, which hee ought him (as wee haue said) he proclaimed warre against the King by his Herald, in case he would not make a generall truce with the Emperour, comprehending the Church, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines. The King refused this truce, and as for the pension, It is not reasonable (said he) to give money to him, that aids mine enemies with money. Henry King of England had before sent a notable summe of money to the Emperour: but not discovering himself openly, he sent the Duke of Suffolk, husband to Queene Mary, widow to Lewis the twelfth, to Calais, and the Em-perour ioyned his forces with him, being led by the Earle of Burges.

The King opposed the Duke of Vendosme, commanding about a thousand men at Armes, with their archers, and eightene thousand foot, assisted by that reverend old man Lewis of Trenouille. The enemies Army was not ready in fifteene daies. The Duke therefore diuided his forces into Bologne, Therouenne, Hedin, Montfieuil, Abbeville and other places subiect to the enemies inuasion. He must not suffer their courage to quile through idleness: Bapuarne serued them for an exercise. The Earle of Saint Paul led the Earles of Guise and Lorges thither, equal in charge, with foure hundred men at Armes, sixe thousand foot and foure Cannons: who hauing taken, burnt and razed the Towne and Castle, they tooke their way, to the passage of Sluce, and finding it guarded by the Bourguignons, they charge them, and chase them to the gates of Douay. Here Francis brother to the Duke of Lorraine and Earle of Guise, of the age of sixteene or seuentene yeeres, carried his first Armes, who seeing in this chase, seuen or eight Bourguignons on foot, seeking their safely within the woods: being alone, not seene by his followers, hee lights and chargeth them, but Martin du Bellay arises happily, accompanied with ten or twelue horse, by whose meanes these run-awaies were cut in peeces.

Hereupon the English arise at Calais, and at their first entry, they become maisters of the castle of Comres, betwixt Montfieuil and Hedin. To prevent these incursions, the Duke sent the foresaid Earles into the trench of Bologne. (Ardes was then ruined and desert) who by the recovery of the said castle, put all to the sword they found within it, except the Capitaine: and afterwards overthrow many other troopes, that were dispersed in the land of Oye, while the two Armies English and Bourguignons assembled betwixt Ar-des and Saint Omer, consulting vpon the first object of their forces. Hedin seemed the castle to be attempted, yet it must needs cost blowes. The Lord of Biez commanded there with thirty men at Armes, and two hundred dead-paies: Sereu with a thousand foot, and La Lande with five hundred. The battery continued fifteene dayes, and a breach was made of forty fadome, but no assault ioyne: the enemy being diuerted by continuall alarums: The Earles of Guise and Pont-dorny, vnderstanding one day amongst others, that foure hundred English were gone towards Biez, and the Commander of Oison: they part from Montfieuil with their companies, and some of the Duke of Vendosme, they overtake them, charge them, and kill or take them all. Some few dayes after, Pont-dorny F incounting some other troups, which had burnt Freffin, a house of his elder brothers, hee put them all to the sword.

Thus kept within their lodgings, by continuall enterprises, and assisted with a generall flux, which went through their Army, proceeding in part by the continuall raine, after sixe weekes siege, they raised their campe with shame, to march towards Dourlans, which was not defensible. At that time there was no castle, and from the mountaine where it is now built, they discovered the towne on all sides. The Earle of Saint Paul prevented the enemy, and then he retired to Corby, to withstand the attempts of the English. Then arose the Marshall of Montmorency, bringing with him the two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber, with authority from his Maiestie to command in Corby, if the enemy did besiege it.

But there was too great a resolution in Corby, the wayes were too foule, the infirmities were many in the English and Bourguignons Armies, and winter approaching (it was about all-Saints) inuited them to set faile. Being able to doe no worse, they burnt Dourlans, and the villages about, and retired into Arthois, putting the Bourguignons into Garifon, and B the English tooke their way for England. Let vs conclude this yeere with an ignominious and fatal losse for the Christians. Soliman did not forget to make his profit of these horrible confusions, who by a painfull and constant siege, for the space of eight moneths, brought the Isle of Rhodes vnder his obedience: where (to the great contempt of our religion) hee made his entrie the day of the birth of our Lord and Saviour. In the beginning of the following yeere, the castle of Milan (preft with discases and want of all things) compounded to depart with bag and baggage, if they were not releued by the fourth of April. But death preventing most part of the garifon, hindred them from enioying any benefit of the Capitulation.

At the same time Lucret, a Souldier of the garifon of Guise, treated with the Duke of C Ascof, to deliuer him the Towne (but not according to the buyers intent) by the conquest of Nicholas of Buslu Lord of Longueval, capitaine of the castle. The party was well made and the plot cunningly laied, to take the merchants when they should come for their possession. The Lord of Fleurang, with three hundred men at Armes, and foure or five thousand foot, should lie betwixt Auennes and Guise, to stop the enemies retreat. The Duke of Vendosme, with five hundred men at Armes, foure thousand Germanes, and four thousand French, should cut off their way betwixt the Abbey of Bonhoury and Guise, so as the enemy seeking to retire, had the one before him, and the other behind.
The chiefe of all their troopes would bee partakers of this enterprife: When as newes comes vnto them, that the King (who would countenance this exploit with his presence) D was come in post to Genlis, neere vnto Chaunais. This made them turne head without any effect, giuing him the shippadoe that fold it, and was their guide, the which Longueval required with the like to the hostages, which the Duke of Arscot had giuen him for the performance of couenants.

His maiesty, to make vse of these troopes which he had assembled, commanded them to viuall Therouenne, the which Fiennes besieged with fifteene thousand Flemings and six hundred English, the King had a little before repaired it. Baillieu vpon the hill, a strong place, betwixt Arras and Dourlans, and defended by three hundred Spaniards, was a hinderance to this designe. The Duke of Vendosme tooke charge of the Army, whereof the Duke of Norfolk led the Germanes, the Lords of Sercu, Bourbonsuille, la Hergerie, Fon-E tains and Heills commanded the French. Brian had foure hundred archers of the Kings guard, and la Payere commanded the artillery: he made his approaches at noone day, without any trenches, but with the losse of three Gunners that were slaine, and the Lord of Piennes shot into the arme: he batted it the same day, gaue them their liues that were within it, and razed the Castle. The enemy lodged in Andinton and Dellente, halfe a league from Therouenne: and la Lude Marshall of the Campe (hauing lodged his Army at Fouquemberg, to haue victuals more commodiously from Montfieuil, & to keepe them from the enemy) did cut off the way to Saint Omer, and the garifon of Therouenne, that of Aire. Fiennes seeing them approach so neere, dislodged in the night, and went to Campe at Elfaat. The Duke of Vendosme followed, with an intent to fight, whilst that Brian F marching directly to Therouenne releued it with such victuals as were brought from Montfieuil. The Earle of Dammartin and the Lord of Eguilly began the skirmish, when a sudden feare surprising the Flemings, puts them in rout towards the riuer of Coldes, where many were drowned in the passage, not able to be staied, although no man followed them: for that Brian returning from Therouenne, brought commandement from the King to the Duke of Vendosme, not to hazard a bataille, but to keepe his forces whole for first for some dayes. The victuall and cariages being ready, and the troopes camping A before Andinoton, vpon the Riuer of Lis, the foreward led by the Marshall of Montmorency, was on the one side of the Riuer, and the battaile on the other: the Flemings and Bourguignons (advertisid of these diuided lodgings) come and charge them both by night at one instant, fall vpon the guards of the light horsemen of the battaile, and repulse them to the men at armes, whereof part being then on horse-backe, they sustaine the shooke, and if they had not busied themselves with the spoile, before a small victorie, it would haue caused a great disorder in the Armie.

The Marshall had fortified his guards. Tiguerette, a man at Armes of his company commanded them, who at the first alarm giuen by his Skouts, being advanced to discouer, B he was compassed in and taken prisoner. Our Historie owes the report of his name, to the faithfull affection he bare vnto his country: for, fearing lest the Campe should be surprised, he respected not his life in regard of the advertisement he might giue, in crying to armes. So the enemy seeing himselfe discovered, made the victualling of Therouenne easie by his retreat. This exploit increased the Kings desire to repasse the Alpes. With this intent he sent the Marshall of Montmorency, to make a leany of twelue thousand Suisses, appointing the Rendezvous for his Army at Lions in the beginning of August, he dispatched the Admirall of Bonniuer, with six thousand French, led by Lorges, to get the passage of Suze, vntill he might follow with the rest of his forces.

The Venetians, hauing tried in former times that the neighborhood of the French C King, and the Emperours of Germanie, had caused them to attempt against their common weale, desiring that the Duchy of Milan might remaine in the possession of Francis Sforza, whose power they nothing feared; and for that the Emperour, not able to proceede further, inclined to the restoring of Sforza, they embraced his friendship, and concluded a peace and perpetuall league with him, with Ferrinand Duke of Austria, and with Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan, whereby they bound themselves; To arme for the common defence of Italy, six hundred men at armes, six hundred light-horse, and six thousand foot. And the Emperour, with the like numbers of men should defend all that the Venetians possess in Italy. Moreover, Pope Adrian, desiring (in shew) the generall peace of all Christendome, had soone after his coming to the Pontificall seat, made some D shew to interpose his authority for the reconciliation of our warriors.

But he had beene a long time at the Emperours deuotion, so as he did willingly giue care to such as perswaded him, not to suffer the French King to repossesse the Duchy of Milan. And certaine letters of the Cardinall of Volterres, intercepted by the means of the Duke of Sessa, Ambassador for the Emperour at Rome, thrusts him on to make his declaration against the King. This Cardinall aduised the King, by the Bishop of Xaintes his Nephew, to assaile the Island of Sicilia, with an Army by Sea, to constrain the Emperour to turne his forces to the defence thereof, and so make the way more easie to recover the estate of Milan. And according to this counsel, a practice was discovered in Sicilia, in the Kings fauour, which was the death of the Earle of Camerote, the Master E of the Ports, and of the high Treasurer of the Island, who was quartered. These reasons, and the landing of the French, which was bruited throughout all Italy, did easily draw the Pope to ioyne with the Emperour, the King of England, the Archduke Ferdinand, brother to the Emperour, the Duke of Milan, the Florentines, Genouois, Sienois, and Luquois, who agreed to leany an army to oppose it against any one that should invade any of the confederates in Italy. Neither the Emperours league with the Venetians (who had plaid the turne-coates) nor the vnion of so many Princes and Estates conspired together, could daunt the resolution of our Francis: and now the rumour of his coming bred new tumults in Italy. Lionel, brother to Albert Pic surpriseth the towne of Carpi, which the Emperour had taken from him, proclaiming him a rebell to the Empire. F

Francis Sforza, riding one day from Monce to Milan, and his troope remaining behind, lest they should annoy the Duke with the dust which their hories did raise, Boniface Visconti, a young Gentleman (griued that a kinsman of his had bene put to death within Milan, by the consent (said he) of the said Duke) watching his opportunity, pricks forward with a dagger in his hand to strike Sforza in the throat: but being mounted vpon a little Moyle, and Boniface vpon a tall and swift Turkish horse, Sforza had meenes to slip aside, so as he hurt him in the shoulder, & then the murtherer began to strike him with his sword

A sword, but his traine coming to his rescue, they forced him to leaue him, and so by the swiftnesse of his horse, heaued himselfe in Piedmont. Galeas of Birague followed by the banished men of Milan, and some French footsouldiers which were in Piedmont, seized vpon Valence, but hauing no time to fortifie it, Anthony of Leua besieged it, battered it, and the second day of the siege tooke it by force, with the slaughter of foure hundred men, and many prisoners taken, of which number was Galeas chiefe of the troope.

The French Armie passed the Alpes in small troopes, and the King prepared to follow them. But it is a matter of dangerous consequence for a King to thrust a great Prince into despaire, who hath meanes of reuenge, if without respect of his degree or quality, B they seeke wholly to oppress him. Notwithstanding Princes should forbear to cause any innovations, if they did but duly examine the causes and reasons whereby men colour their bearing armes against their country. The Kings journey is staied by the like occurrent. We haue noted before, that the leading of the foreward (giuen by the King to the Duke of Alanson, and to the Marshall of Chastillon) was the first motiue which estranged Charles Duke of Bourbon, Constable of France, from the Kings seruice, and this other did wholly withdraw him. Of the marriage of Peter Duke of Bourbon, and Anne, sister to King Charles the eight, Susanne was borne, their onely heire, the which being made sure to Charles of Valois, Duke of Alanson, Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Montpensier, and afterwards Constable, commenced a suite, after the decease of the said Peter, C that all the lands of his succession belonged vnto him, as the heire male issued from a younger brother of Bourbon. To end this controuersie, a marriage was made betwixt the said Earle of Montpensier, and Susanne, and he called himselfe Duke of Bourbon. Susanne dying soone after the first discontent of Charles Duke of Bourbon, the Kings mother being Regent (by the counsell as they say of Anthony Prat, then Chancellor) pretended, that such lands as came by the succession of Peter of Bourbon, and were held by gift, belonged to the King: and such as were held by inheritance, appertained vnto her, as the next heire, and daughter to a sister of the said Peter married with the Duke of Savoy.

The suite depended in the Court of Parliament at Paris, and Charles either distrustful the equity of his cause, or fearing lest the Regents authority should preuaile against his D right, and so by consequence dispossesse him, choosing rather to abandon his country, then to liue in want, he practiseth with the Emperour, by the means of Adrian of Croy Earle of Rieux: and to make the articles of his transaction the more strong, he obtains a promise from the Emperour, to marie Elenor his sister, widow to Emanuel King of Portugal.

The King being past the Alpes, the Constable should invade Bourgongne with twelue thousand Germans, which should be secretly leauied by the Emperour and King of England, who at the same instant should invade Picardie, whilst the Spaniards recovered Fontarabie, as they did. Of their conquests, he onely reserved Prouence, pretending to call himselfe King of Prouence, as belonging vnto him (said he) by the house of Anjou, yeelding all the rest to the English. A practice sufficient to shake France, before the King (being absent with his forces) should return in any time to succour it. But they reckoned with their host, and the Guardian of this Crowne did prevent them: for Argouges and Marnigon, Gentlemen of Normandie, and household seruants to the Duke, had aduertised the King of his pretended retreat to the Emperour, but they were ignorant of the agreement made betwixt them. To diuert him from this resolution, the king passing by Molins, did visit the Duke in his chamber; who made a shew to be sicke, and that cunningly. "I vnderstand (said the King) of some practices which the Emperour makes to withdraw the loue you vndoubtedly beare vnto the Crowne, as if used and neare allied to the house of France. I doe not beleue, that you haue giuen eare to any such perswasions, moued F with any dislike of me, or of my realme. Some feare of distrust to lose your Offices, hath perchance made a breach in the loue you haue alwaies made shew of. Let not this conceit trouble you, I promise you, in case you should lose your suite against my selfe & my mother, to restore you to the possession of all your goods. Prepare therefore to follow me after your recovery, in the voyage of Italy. The Duke (being very wise) dissembled his intent cunningly, confessing vnto the King, that in truth, the Earle of Rieux had sought him for the Emperour, but he would giue no eare vnto him; that his intention was to haue aduertised his Maiesty at the first view, being loth to commit it to any mans report: that the Physicians gaue him hope to be soone able to goe in a Litter, and that he would not faile A to come to Lions, to receiue his Maiesties commandements. But, considering that he had to deale with too strong a partie, and that hardly he should enioy his goods, which were already sequestered by a Decree of the Court, he retired to Chantelles in the beginning of September, a house of his owne, where he had the most sumptuous mouebles that any Prince could haue. From thence he sent the Bishop of Autun, of the house of Hu- rants to the King, with instructions signed with his hand, promising, To serue his Maiesty well and loyally in all places, whensoever it should please him, during his life, and without any breach, vpon restitution of the possessions of Peter of Bourbon.

The King finding this manner of proceeding hard and insolent, sent the bastard of Sa- uoy, Lord Steward of France, and the Marshall of Chabannes, with four hundred men at armes, the Captaines of his Guards, and the Prouost of his house, to besiege the Duke in Chantelles. And vnderstanding that many Lanqueners did troope together vpon the frontier of Bourgongne, he caused the Bishop of Autun, the Chancellor of Bourbonnois, the Lord of Cars, Saint Valler, Bussy brother to Palisse, Emard de Prie, la Vanguion, and many others to bee taken prisoners, who for the loue of him were content to abandon their Country, families and goods, notwithstanding they found grace with the King. But the Duke (despairing of his estate) resolved to hazard all, and to beginne a furious Tragedie, in the which we shall see our Francis act the part of an vnfortunate prisoner of the warres, and Charles referred for a bloody and tragick end. He disguiseth C himselfe, and taking the Lord of Pomperant for his onely companion, whose seruant he seemed to bee. After many turnings being often feared, as appeares in the Originals, the waies being laied, and the passages stoppt, or full of troopes, marching into Italy, he recouers the Franche countie, and so by Ferrete, crossing through Germany, he came into Italy, and according to the choise which the Emperor gaue him, either to passe into Spaine, or to remaine in Italy with his Army; in the end he continued at Genoua, to see the end of these two great Armies.

The Duke of Bourbon
dies disguised.

The Marshall and Lord Steward seized vpon Chantelles, with the mouables of Car- lat, and generally of all the lands of the house of Bourbon for the King. In the meane time the Marshall of Montmorency had made such speed, as his twelve thousand Suisses were D ioyned with the Admirall, attending the Kings coming at Turin. But his presence was necessary in France: there were strange practices against him. He therefore sends part of his forces to the Admirall, and commands him to execute the enterprize of Milan, as they two had concluded. He had eightene hundred Launces, twelue thousand French, ten thousand Suisses, six thousand Lanqueners, and three thousand Italians, a sufficient army for a great attempt: but want of iudgment to imbrace occasions, and negligence of his business, made the Admirall lose the opportunity to recouer Milan at the first, and to be vnfortunate in this voyage.

Prosper Colonne, considering the Venetians league with the Emperor, and the treache- ry of the Duke of Bourbon, could not beleue that the King should continue constant in E his resolution, to invade the Duchie of Milan that yeare. This perswasion had made him carelesse to make necessary prouision for this war. But now (notwithstanding his infirmie- tie he imployes all his meanes and forces to keepe the French from passing the Riuer of Tefin, neglecting to repaire the Bastions and Rampiers of the suburbs of Milan, being for the most part ruined and spoiled. But the French finding the waters low, some passed at a Ford, others in Boats about some foure miles from the Imperiall campe, making a Bridge for the Artillery. Colonne, knowing that an encounter of the French is very dan- gerous, in their first heat, retired into Milan, and finding the Citizens and Souldiers won- derfully amazed, seeing no meanes to keepe the Citie in the estate it was, he abandons it, to prouide for the defence of Laude. Without doubt the capitious propositions of an enemy must bee duly examined: and moreover, an assailant, that hath preuented his ene- mie, should not lose any houre neither by his two great lenitie, nor his base negligence: Hereupon Galeas Visconte giues the Admirall to vnderstand, that if he enters forceably into Milan, there will bee no meanes to saue it from spoile, and so by consequence, the King shall make no vse thereof against his enemies: but if hee would suffer him to goe and compound with some Citizens, which did sollicite him, hee would giue order the Imperialls should depart, and furnish the King with a good sum of money, which might greatly

A greatly auail him in his affaires. The Admirall is caried away with these perswasions. But whilst that Galeas Boyer, Generall of Normandie, and some others doe treat, they spend some time in vaine by the Riuer of Tefin, during the which, Prosper deluded out men with parles, reuiued the hearts of his men (who had already packt vp their baggage for their retreat) and with exceeding diligence, puts the Rampiers in defence. And then knowing his forces vnable to defend the whole Duchie, hee restrained them to keepe Milan, Cremona, and Paui, whilst the fury of the French should grow cold by an idle abode, and the winter approaching neare, ruine them.

The Admirall, finding the error he had committed by his too great credulity, em- ployed all his forces against Milan, but too late, the Citizens had gotten heart, and Prosper B had now gathered together eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, foure thousand Spaniards, six thousand five hundred Lanqueners, and three thousand Italians, besides the Inhabitants, who were all armed. He doth notwithstanding besiege it, be- twixt the wayes to Laude and Paui, and seeing other places abandoned, hee takes Monce for the King, to cut off the victuals from Milan: he sends Bussy d'Amboise, with 2000 Frank-archers, to seize vpon Alexandria, and the Cheualier Bayard, with foure hundred men at armes, eight thousand foot, and ten pieces of artillery to Laude, where leauing a strong garison, he went suddenly to attempt Cremona. The Castle held yet for the King, but the enemies had made two great trenches betwixt the towne and the Castell. There C Rance de Cere, a Baron of Rome ioyned with him, leading foure thousand Italians. This supply encouraged Bayard to attempt the towne in another place. They make their ap- proaches, and within three daies make a reasonable breach. But all fall out crossly for the French, being readie to goe to the assault, a continuall raine of foure daies, made the as- cent so slippery, as they went as much backward as forward, and did so breake the waies, as no victuals could come to the Campe from any part, euen so it chanced to Lantree be- fore Paui. Moreover, the Venetians arrie on the one side, and the Spanis on the other, cut off their Victuals. So Bayard prest with famine, refresheth the Castle with men and victuals, and returned to Milan. Without doubt Bunon with the whole garison that kept this Fort, deserued great commendations: where hauing continued two yeares in ex- D tremed necessity, desiring all rather to dye, after the example of their Captaine then to yield the place by treacherie, there remained onely eight souldiers, whom Bayard found languishing, but resolute in their constancie.

Wee haue vnderstood, that by the intelligences of the Duke of Bourbon, the Emperor at the same instant should assaile Bourgongne, and Champagne, the English Picardie, and the Spaniards Fontarabie. According to this designe, and to make the siege of Fontarabie easie, the Spaniards campe before Bayonne the seuenteenth of September. Lantree, Go- uernor of Guienne, although he were vnprouided of men, (the Kings forces being dis- persed in Italy, Champagne, and Picardie) furnished the towne with victuals, munition, and such men as the time and necessitie could afford, and he himselfe went into it: where E the valour of this Noble man, who continued three daies and three nights continually vpon the walls, prouiding for all things necessary, especially for the entrie of two Riuers which passe at Bayonne, giuing such courage to men, women, and children, as euery one falling to worke, the most coward made shewes of great willingness.

So as the fourth day of the siege, the enemy finding that he did but lose his time, left Bayonne to besiege Fontaraby, which shewed no proofes of like valour. It was furnish- ed with good store of men, and other things necessary. Franquet commanded there, as we haue formerly declared. He was an ancient Gentleman, and all his life had had the rep- utation of a good Souldier. But now to saue his goods, nor attending any force, he yeelds the towne which was not to be forced. A cowardlike which brought him to a scaffold at F Lions, to be there degraded of his nobility, and himselfe, with his posterity declared base, for that hee had beene so faint-hearted and carelesse, to preuent the conspiracy, which he said, Don Pedro of Nauarre (the Sonne of Peter, Marshall of Nauarre, whom the Spanis ards had lately caused to die in prison) had with the Spaniards. On the other side, the Lanqueners which had beene leauied for the Duke of Bourbon, were come vnto Cham- pagne, vnder the command of William, Earle of Furtemberg, and spoiled the Prouince, after they had taken Coiffie, a place vpon the confines of the French Comté, & Montclairre, a Castle seized vpon a mountaine, neare to Chaumont in Bassigne. War in Cham- pagne.

whom the King had made his Lieutenant generall in Bourgogne, in the place of the Lord of Tremouille, lately advanced to the government of Picardie: having with his company of an hundred men at armes, those of the Dukes of Alençon and Vendosme, ioyned with the forces of Ornel, Gouverneur of Champagne, and some other troopes, making about six hundred men at armes, so restrained the enemy, as having no meanes, for want of horse, to guard their foragers, they were in few daies famished, and forced to seeke their retreat at Neuf-chastell in Lorraine. The Duke of Guise, advertised of their course, sent some three hundred men at armes before, to charge them in front, at the passage of the River of Meuse, whilst that he should set on them behind, being laden with a great bootie. The Duke came, and finding them halfe past, he cut the remainder in B peeces, and recovered the bootie. But a quarrell chanced betwixt Courville and Chasselet a Lorraine, Ensigne-bearer to the said Duke, the which (Courville being thrust through the mouth with a sword) overthrew the better part of this goodly enterprise. The Duke of Suffolke was lately landed againe at Calais, with fourteene or fiftene thousand English, which ioyned with the forces of the Earle of Bure, made five or six thousand horse, and about five and twenty thousand foot. But if in their former voyage, they made a great strece, and reaped small benefit, so likewise, they will make but a bare conquest by this last descent.

Tremouille (although he had so few men, as he was forced, when he had left the place, to retire his men, to put them into that whether the enemy seemed to bend) had so furnished C the townes with valiant Commanders, and all things necessary, as the Duke and Earle, having made a shew to besiege Therouenne, Hedin, Doulans, and Corbie, in the end they Campe before Bray vpon Somme: the wall was weak, and three mountaines commanding the towne, were the cause they could not fortifie it; yet that brave Pontdormy had thrust himselfe into it with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and some fiftene hundred foot, to defend this passage against the enemy. Let vs not blame a valiant Capitaine, if he receive a disgrace in a weak place. He made his account (in case he were forced) to retire by the Causey, and to breake the Bridges after him. But he was so prest, as he had no meanes to retire, but in disorder, with the losse of foure-score, or an hundred men: and if he had not maintained the fight with his men at armes, whilst his footmen D recovered Corbie, there had bene no hope of safety for the rest.

But see how he revenged this disgrace. The enemy threatened Montdidier: and the small forces Tremouille had, made all men vnwilling to lead any succors thither. Pontdormy was neuer daunted with the difficulty of any enterprise. Night being come, hee goes to field, and without any encounter, puts Rochebaron an Auernac, into Montdidier, and Flewas Lieutenant of the Earle of Palmartins Companie, either of them commanding fifty men at armes, and René of Dalliere, with a thousand French. And fearing lest Tremouille should haue need of him, hee had not the patience to attend for night to make his retreat, he doth it at noone day, resolute to charge all he should encounter, having but his owne companie, with that of the Vicount of Lauedan. With this resolution hee E meetes with five hundred horse, chargeth them with such fury, as hee puts them to rout. But two thousand men, coming to succour the rest, he was forced to leave the chase, to fauour the retreat of his troope. In the which, his horse being slaine, he left Barnicelles, and Canaples his brother & nephew, to beare the shock with twenty men at armes, whilst that he saved the rest in Amiens, the enemy cutting off the way to Corbie. Barnicelles, and Canaples (ouerthrowne from their horses) were taken prisoners, with seven men at armes of their Company. So Roy remained at the enemies mercy, who having taken and burnt it, marched to Montdidier, where a breach being made, they within distrusting of their forces, departed with their baggage, and came to Tremouille.

The enemy had opened the passage of Oise, and approached within eleuen leagues of F Paris. But their courses are staid, and Paris is assured by the arriuall of the Duke of Vendosme, with four hundred men at armes, so as the English and Bourguignons fearing to be compassed in by the Duke and Tremouille, and so famished, tooke their way to Artois, and a litle after All-Saints day (a notable season for the losse of corpe, which was frozen generally throughout the Realme) they dismissed their armie, carying no other spoiles of their victory, but the taking of the Castle of Bohain, which was yielded vnto them without summons. But the enemy was no sooner retired, but Tremouille, before the Duke of Vendosmes

A Vendosmes arriuall, made so furious a battery with six Cannons, as the Garison, seeing their armie broken, yielded by composition. Thus Picardie is freed from a mightie Armie, which at their departure held not one foot of land of their conquest.

In like sort, the Duke of Bourbons attempt against Bourgogne turned to sioake, for wanting money to pay his Lanquenets, the King did practice some of their Captains, who came to him with their troops. So despairing to get any thing in France, he retired to Milan. Augustus the Emperor loued treason, but not the traitor. So the Emperor Charles loued his actions, but not the D. of Bourbons person. To keep him from passing into Spaine, vnder hope of marrying with Eleanor, sister to the Emperor Charles, he made him his Lieutenant Generall in Italy, whilst that hee prepared to passe into France in person, as wee shall see.

Let vs now returne into Italy, where we shall see a Pope of a more turbulent spirit then Adrian, who died the fourteenth of September, little lamented, and of small esteeme. He was a stranger, and little acquainted with the affaires of the Court of Rome; he was learned, and not greatly vicious. The Colledge of Cardinals repined to see any other set in S. Peters Chaire, but an Italian, or at the least, one bred vp in Italy: Julius, Cardinal of Medici, after many & sundry strifes and contentions, every one of the Cardinals seeking the choice & election by the support of such as fauored him, in the end caried it, the nineteenth of November, Through the fauour (saith the Originally) of the great reuenues of his

C Ecclesiastical linings. In all his Actions we shall see him discouer a spirit wonderfully ambitious, of a great courage, active, desirous of innovations, giuen to affaires especially of the world, not much subiect to his pleasures, and giuing hope of great and extraordinary matters: and for that presently after his insaltment, hee vsed clemency to the Cardinal of Volterre, declared vn sufficient to come into the conclave by Adrian, for the subiect wee haue formerly noted: hee therefore tooke vpon him the name of Clement the seventh.

In the meane time our Admirall tooke cold before Milan, which hee thought to famish, cutting off the Conduits that went into the towne, and beating downe the Milles: but the great number of hand-milles (which Colonne had caused to bee made) preferred the Citizens from famine. And to cut off the vidu- D als that came from Laudefan to the French Campe, Colonne had put the Marquis of Mantoua, with five hundred horse into Paia. The Admirall fearing lest hee should seize vpon the Bridge hee had made at Vigueu, by the which victuals came vnto his Army, hee commanded Bayard and Rance, to come and lodge at Vigueu: But by their dislodging from Monce, the passage was open to the enemy, and then victuals entered abundantly into Milan, which caused the ruine of the French Army.

Nothing succedes happily with them, whom the prouidence of God doth not fauour. The hope to famish Milan is frustrate, and the intelligence which the Admirall had within the towne, with one Morganá, a Corporall of the Squadron of Iohn de Medici is discovered, with the losse of all their liues, that had consented (he should E haue receiued the French into a bastion, when the guard thereof fell vnto him.) Moreover, the enemy grows proud of small advantages and light victories, who being accustomed to overcome by degrees, resolues to vanquish all at once. Iohn de Medici being to guard the victuals that came from Tresse to Milan, with five hundred horse, and a thousand foot, met with foure-score French Lances; and by a faigned retreat drew them into an ambush of five hundred Harguebuziers which hee had laid: he easily defeats them, slew some, and takes the rest.

In another encounter, Sucere a Bourguignon, put to rout three-score men at armes, of the company of the Master of the Horse. Our men being in guard at the trenches, which were made to go vnto the rampiers, assailed by many skirmishes, had most commonly the worst. So decreasing in number, prest with abundance of snow, and the sharpness of the winter which they had endured six months together, the Admirall retired his armie to lodge it in Biagras, & other places thereabouts. He sent the Earle of S. Paul from Biagras with Rance de Cere, and Lorges, Generall of the French foot, to besiege Aronce, a towne vpon Laco-Maiore. They make their approaches, plant their Ordnance, batter it about five and twenty daies, and giue two or three assaults. But Colonne foreseeing this designe, at the retreat of our men, had manned the towne with twelve hundred soldiers, who made our attempt fruitlesse. That which they could not doe by assault, they seeke to effect by myne, blowing vp a great part of the wall. But they kickt against the pyncke. The wall falls vpon the same foundation, and stands firme. So frustrate of their intention, hauing lost many good men, they retorne to the Campe.

At that time Prosper Colonne, the chiefe pillar of the Emperours affaires in Italy, dyed the last day but one of the year. A famous Captaine throughout all the course of his life, well practised in matters of warre, slow to imbrace the occasions which the weaknesse or disorders of his enemies might present him: but commended to haue managed the warre more by councell, then with the sword. Don Charles of Launoy, Viceroy of Naples, was substituted by the Emperour: Don Charles, having taken vpon him the government, employed all his wit to expell the French out of the Duchie of Milan, either by force or famine: and to approach neere vnto them, attending a supply of six thousand Lanquenets out of Germany: an occasion was offered to make the first fruits of his armes famous.

They giue him intelligence, that Bayard Mezieres, and Saint Mesme with two hundred men at armes, and Lorges with the French foot, whereof he was Colonel, lodged at Rebec, two miles from Biagras. To giue them a Canuissado on the sudden, hee sends the Marquis of Pescara, and Iohn de Medicis, who came from the taking of Marignan by composition. Sometimes renowned Captaines are lulled asleepe with conceit of their owne reputations: and although the enemy feares them, yet hee most obserues them, and desires most to circumvent them.

The French charged and beaten in their quater.

But Bayard was sicke, and that day had taken Physicke. The Spaniard falls vpon the French guards two howers before day, and presently beates them backe vpon their men at armes; Bayard (being sicke) and Lorges, gather together what men they could, and maintaine the shooke whilst the rest retired to the Campe: few men, but all the baggage was lost. Hereupon the Lanquenets arise, and the Imperiall army ioyned with the Venerians: and the Popes (a right Florentine, and no lesse counterfeite then Leo the tenth, his kinsman, for hee assured Saint Maxent, the Kings Ambassador, that hee would assise neither party, and yet he did ayde the Emperour both with men and money) being come to lodge at Casete, five miles from Biagras. There were in the Imperiall troopes, fixteene hundred men at Armes, fiftene hundred light horse, seuen thousand Spaniards, twelue thousand Lanquenets, and fiftene hundred Italians. The chiefe Commanders were the Dukes of Milan and Bourbon, the Viceroy of Naples, the Marquis of Pescara.

The Duke of Vrbino commanded for the Venerians, six hundred men at armes, six hundred light horse, and seuen thousand foot. Iohn de Medicis led the Popes forces. The Admirall, besides his companies diuided into Garisons, and the French troopes camped at Biagras (attending six thousand Suisses to refresh his army) had with him eight hundred Lances, eight thousand Suisses (and within few daies after three thousand more ioyned with him) four thousand Italians, and two thousand Lanquenets. The lodging was safe, and no means to force them: onely feare of famine must dislodge them. With this designe the Imperials passe the riuier of Tefin, and lodge at Gambale, to cut off the victuals that came from Omeline to the French: they take Garles from them, and Saint George, seated about Morice. Garles furnished their army with victuals, which came freely to them from Pavia: and Saint George cut off the prouision that came to our men from Biagras.

So the Admirall fearing to be distressed for victuals, and to lose the other places of Omeline, the which being taken, he had bene in a manner besieged of all sides: he leaues an hundred light horse, and a thousand foot in Biagras, vnder Ierome Caraccioli a Neapolitan, and went to lodge at Vigee. He was farre inferiour in number, yet he presents his army in bataille three daies together, but the enemy refusethe the combat: he would not hazard a victory which he held assured without losse of men. It was better to dislodge the French from Vigee: for the effecting whereof, the Imperials marche to Sartirane vpon Po, fit to cut off the victuals from our men: Hugh Earle of Popoli, and Iohn of Birague kept it for the King. The Admirall followes them to saue both the men and the place. But vpon the way he had newes that it was forced, most part of them flaine, and the Commanders prisoners. Verfel supplied our men with most part of their necessary victuals. The enemy by the meanes of Resit Ferrelon, fliz vp the Gibelins, being stronger

A stronger then the Guelphes in the said City, who by their mutiny bring in the Imperials, which gaue them great hope to haue the French army at their mercy for want of victuals: and if need were, to stop their retreat into France, and to this end they leize vpon the passage of Camarian. Mischiefe vpon mischiefe is no safety. Monteian, and Boutterres Lieutenants of Bayard his company, had chosen an hundred or six score of their best men at armes for the execution of an enterprise they had plotted. But being ill guided, they encountered a stronger party, were defeated, and all taken prisoners: a great weakening to an army in an after-season. The Admirall did still temporize, grounding his hopes vpon four hundred Lances which the Marquis of Rotelin did bring: who passing by the Mount of Geneure, should ioine with ten thousand Suisses, and Rance de Cere brought six thousand Grisons, by the country of Bergamo, to passe at Laude to Fredericke of Bosiole, who led a great number of Italian foot, to assaile the Duchy of Milan on that side, and force the enemy to re-passe the riuier of Tefin. With this designe the Admirall comes to lodge at Nouarre.

But the ruine of our men approached. Sforza sent Iohn de Medicis against the Grisons, with fifty men at armes, three hundred light horse, and three thousand foot, who ioined with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and four thousand foot of the Venetians, and stopt their passage, so as being discontented, hauing no ayd of horse nor foot as Rance had promised them, they returned to their Country. This thorne pulled out of the Imperials foot, Iohn de Medicis takes Carauage, batters down the bridge which the French had vpon Tefin at Bufaloro: and nothing remaining of all the towne betwixt Milan and the Tefin, but onely Biagras, which lying vpon the great channell that runnes to Milan, did cut off the victuals which were wont to come to the towne in great abundance: Sforza followed by all the youth of Milan, besieged it, accompanied with Iohn de Medicis: he battered it foure or five dayes, and was repulled from the first assault; hee forced it at the second, and spoiled it. A spoile deely sold to the Milanois. Biagras was infected with the plague, so all the houses of Milan, whither any of the booty came, were infected with the same contagion, which was the death of aboute fifty thousand persons. Biagras taken (to stop all the passages from the French) the Vice-roy went to lodge at Marignon: and the Admirall, considering that it was better to hazard the rest of his army, then to perish by famine and pestilence, which had greatly diminished his troops, he tooke the way of Romagnan, to ioine with eight thousand Suisses which were come to Yurée. But they strucke the last stroke. They send him word, That it should suffice them to retire their companions, and conduct them into Suisse, seeing the King had broken his promise with them; by the which they should meet at Yurée with Claude of Longueuille, and foure hundred Lances to conuoy them. Their country-men which remained in the Campe, vnderstanding that their companions were vpon the banks of the riuier of Stesie, dis-banded for the most part, to ioine with them that were newly come.

In the meane time the Imperials, by the perswasion of the Duke of Bourbon, followed the Admirall at the heeles, who to take from the enemy the knowledge of the Suisses disorder, endured the shooke with such men at armes as he could gather together: but being hurt at the first charge with a shot in the arme, and forced through the griefe of his wound to leaue the retreat of the army to the Earle of Saint Paul, and to Captaine Bayard, Bayard and Vandenesse (performing wondrous deeds of armes) died there: Vandenesse presently, Bayard thrust through the body, caused himselfe to be layd at the foot of a tree, by his Steeward, his face turned to the enemy, as he that neuer turned his backe. The Duke of Bourbon pursuing the chase, seeing him in this pitifull estate, I am sorry for you, said he, hauing known you so valiant a Knight. Sir (said Bayard, drawing towards his end) there is no pity of me, I die an honest man: you are to be lamented, who serue against your Prince, your Country, and your oath: and soonne after he gaue vp the ghost. Lorges arming with those few French which remained, repulled such as pursued vnto the body of their armie, & the Earle of Saint Paul hauing passed the riuier with the losse of few, but the bravest of his men, deliuered the attillery to the Suisses, who made their retreat by the valley of Aouste, and himselfe by Turin, Laude, Alexandria, Nouarre, and generally all which the King possessed in Italy, remained at the Victors deuotion.

The Estate of Milan was thus freed from the French, and Italy from their present calamities, but the roots were not yet cut vp: it was but deferred for a time. Then the Duke of Bourbon gaue the Emperour counsell to transport the warre into France. The King of England

England did willingly giue care vnto it. The fauour, the authority, the many followers, A and the great intelligence which the Duke of Bourbon presumed to haue in France, invited him thereunto. To this end the Emperor treated with the English, and the Duke of Bourbon: "That the Duke should enter into France with a part of his army which was in Italy: That hauing passed the Alpes, the King of England should pay him an hundred thousand crowns for the charge of the first month, & should continue the same month-ly, vnlesse he would invade the Realme with a mighty armie: That France should be conquered for the English, and Prouence for the Duke of Bourbon, according to the Treaty we haue before made mention of: That the Emperour at the same instant should make warre vpon them from the confines of Spaine, and should procure the Potentates of Italy to concur in this enterprife, for the freeing of themselves for euer from the inuasion of the French.

Marfeilles is a commodious port to annoy France, and to passe from Spaine into Italie. According to the Emperours desire, and the former treaty, the Duke of Bourbon, and the Marquis of Pescara, march to the conquest of Marfeilles. The King aduerted of their designe, sends Rance de Cere, a man well experienced in war, and the Lord of Brion, with two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, for the guard of Marfeilles: repaired his army, and sent to make a leauy of fourteene thousand Suisses, and six thousand Lanquenets.

The Duke and Marquis had now lyen six weekes before Marfeilles: the King hauing C vnited his forces, marcheth with an intent to fight with his enemies, who seeing so great a power to approach, embarked their great Ordnance for Genoua: the lesser they layd vpon Moyles, and so made a speedy retreat. The Marshall of Chabannes, who had the leading of the fore-ward, sent foure or fise hundred horses after them: who ouerthrew many, and returned with great spoile, euery one leauing his baggage behind him, and the souldiers casting away their armes, to bee more light to runne away. The King seeing himselfe to haue a goodly army ready, and his enemies retired, resolues to cut off their way, or to come before them into Italy: many dissuaded him, the season might well diuert him (for it was in the middest of October): the Regent his mother aduised him to make war by his Captaines, and not in person; and the Bishop of Capoua came from the Pope to treat of a generall peace: But the heat which transported this good Prince to his owne ruine and dishonour, made him to say vnto the Bishop: That he should treat with him by Letters, and attend him at Auignon with his mother. If the King makes haste to pursue, the Duke and Marquis made as great haste to arive in time for the defence of Milan: so as in one day the King arriued at Verceil, and the Marquis at Albe: the Duke followed a day after him with the Lanquenets.

At that time Claude Queene of France died at Blois, leauing three sonnes by the King and her, Francis the Dauphin, Henry Duke of Orleanes, and Charles Duke of Angoulême; and two daughters, Magdalene married afterwards to the King of Scots, and Marguerite, which shall be Duchesse of Sauoy. The Vice-roy seeing the King to march directly towards Milan without stay, he put Anthony de Leno into Pavia, with twelue hundred Spaniards, and six thousand Lanquenets: posting himselfe with exceeding speed to Milan with the rest of the army. Milan had changed her mind, the plague had wonderfully wasted the Citizens: many (to auoid this danger) had absented themselves: there was no such store of victuals within it as was vsuall: the traffike had ceased, there was no meanes to recouer money: they had made no account to repaire the fortifications, and the King had from Vigieu sent Michel Anthony Marquis of Salusses, with two hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foot: who at the first ouerthrew the Spaniards that were set to guard the suburbs of Milan: beat them into the towne, and kept the suburbs: notwithstanding their continuall sallies, by means of the Lord of Tremouille, who came to second him. The Vice-roy finding the Citizens minds to be litle at his deuotion, went out by the Port Romane, leading with him the Duke of Bourbon, the Marquis of Pescara, and the rest of the army to Laude. The Milanoes freed from the danger of the Imperials, retired in the Marquis of Saluffe and Tremouille. The Imperiall army retired in great confusion and disorder, tyred with the tediousnesse of the way, hauing lost many horse and armes: If they had bene hotly pursued, without doubt they had bene easily ouerthrowen. Moreover, if our men had presently gone to Laude, the Imperials had not dared to stay there: and

A and it may be, passing the Riuer of Adde with speed, they had disordered the rest of his army with the like facility. But when as the prouidence of God meanes to chastise a people, he blinds the eyes of their vnderstandings, in such sort as they cannot iudge of occurrences, but oftentimes they embrace those courses which be most dangerous.

Thus it fell out with our Francis: for according to the aduice of such (as held it not fit for his Maiesties affaires, to leaue a strong towne behind him, manned with many souldiers) he turned head to Pavia, in the end of October. He had with him Henry of Albrekt king of Nauarre, the Dukes of Alancou, Lorraine, Albany, and Longueuille: the Earles of Saine Paul, Vaudemont, Laual and Tonnerre: the Marshalls of Foix, Chabannes and Montmorency, the bastard of Sauiy Lord Steward, the Admirall of Boniuet, the chiefe author of this counsell Lewis of Tremouille, the Marquis of Salusses, Anthony of Rochfaucault, the Lords of Brion, Escars, Bonneau, Fleuranges, Paulmy, Roche-du-maine: the Vidame of Chartres, Aubigny, Clermont, Buffy d'Amboise, de Conte, Fontenay, a younger brother to Roban d'Amont, and a great number of others: two thousand Lances, eight thousand aduenturers, eight thousand Lanquenets, six thousand Suisses, and foure thousand Italians, which number did afterwards greatly increase.

The Imperials gathered together the remainder of their ship-wracke, and made a new leauy of twelue thousand men in Germany: but want of money did greatly trouble their affaires. The Emperour could not helpe them: to draw any out of the Duchy of Milan, C there was no meanes. From their ancient confederates, they hoped for small or no succors at all. The Pope and the Florentines contented them, but with generall words. Clement sought to maintaine himselfe in the middest of these stormes, and would make no league with any other Prince. The Venetians, vrged by the Vice-roy, to furnish the men where- vnto they were bound by the Capitulation, made cold answers. They grew now more jealous of the Emperours ambition. All Italy complained, that he would not inuolunt Sforza in the Duchy of Milan, vnto which the Popes authority did moue him: to whose example and counsells they had then great regard, being willing in like sort to frame themselves to preuent occurrences. And the King of England, instead of furnishing them with the money he had promised, demanded all that which he had lent. All these considerations, made D our Francis resolute to the siege of Pavia. He batters it in two places, makes a breach, and gives an assault, they winne the breach, but had not meanes to enter: they find large and deepe trenches to stay them, and the nearest houses furnished with shot, forced them to abandon the breach after the losse of many good men.

As they despaird to take Pavia by force, James of Silly, Bayliffe of Caen, propounds a more easie meanes to force it. The Riuer of Tedi diuides it selfe into two branches, two miles about Pavia, and ioynes againe a mile beneath the towne before it runnes into Po. By reason of the depth of the water, the wall was nothing fortified vpon the greatest streame, hee vndertakes to cut this arme, and to driue all the streame into the lesse, hoping that the course of the water being dried, and making a sudden and furious B Eterie on that side, the Towne should bee forced, before the enemy had any meanes to preuent it.

They spend many dayes, employ an infinit number of men, and make a great expence, in this worke. But the water is of more force then the labour of men, or the industry of Enginiers. A continuall raine did so swell the Riuer, as breaking the sluices and banks, which were made within the Channell, in one houre it made all this great labour fruitlesse. So all the attempts of our men were reduced to a hope, to force them to yeeld at length by necessity. The Pope in the meane time (moued with the sudden spoile and conquest of the Duchy of Milan by the King) desirous to settle his affaires and businesse, and to pacifie Italy the better, sent John Mathieu Gilbert, Bishop of Verona his Datarie, to exhort our F warrours to peace and concord. The Vice-roy trusting in the strength of Pavia, refused to giue care to any agreement of composition; whereby the King should hold any sort of land in the Duchy of Milan: the King on the other side, putt vp with his good success to the greatness of his army, the hope not onely to maintaine it, but also to increase it, so pretere vnto himselfe the Estate of Milan, to recouer Genoua, and afterwards to assault the Realme of Naples, made him as vnwilling to yeeld to any peace.

Thus the Pope hauing failed to reconcile these two Princes, the chiefe cause why he sent his Datarie, tooke effect. Clement bound himselfe, Not to giue any succour or aid open open or secret against the King. And the King receiued the Pope and the Florentines into A his protection, especially to maintaine the Family of Medici in their greatness. The Pope supposed the Emperour should goe to the wall, but he will soone repent him. This agreement drew the King to the enterprise of Naples: for the execution whereof, hee made Iohn Steward Duke of Albany his Lieutenant generally, accompanied with Raunce de Cere, six hundred men at armes, three hundred light-horse, ten thousand foot, and ten or twelve peeces of artillery. His intent was to force the Vice-roy to abandon the Estate of Milan, to flie to the defence of Naples, whereas there remained no Garisons. But hee should haue consulted hereof after the absolute conquest of the Duchy. The enemy will make his profit of this indifferet diuision of his army in so vnseasonable a time. He did foresee, that in succouring Naples, the Duchy of Milan would be wholly lost. The Vice-roy hauing refused to make head against the King within Lombardy, sent the Duke of Traietto to geue order for the defence of the Realme, in case the French did assaile it. Let vs leaue the King a little at his siege, and see some exploits of armes.

The Marquis of Saluces, Lieutenant for the King at Saunone, had in the beginning of March sent two thousand men in garison to Varas, a small towne, all walled vpon the sea-shore, mid-way betwixt Saunone and Genoua. Don Hugues of Moncade, Vice-roy of Sicily, then Governour of Genoua for the Emperour, brought the Emperours Gallies to beat downe the gate of Varas with their Cannon, hoping that the weakness of the place would force the souldiers to make their retreat to Saunone: and with this designe he put himselfe C in ambush with four thousand men, betwixt Varas and Saunone. The Marquis aduertised of this battery, flies thither with those few men which the present necessity would suffer him to gather together. At his approach, the besieged take courage, and rampier vp their gate quite ruined. The Gallies of Genoua grow amazed, and turne their prowes. The Marquis pursues them. Don Hugues seeing himselfe abandoned by his forces at sea, begins likewise to make his retreat to Genoua along the shore. *La Maille*ray, by the commandement of the Marquis, goes to shore, drawes forth the garison of Varas, and leads them in the pursuit, whilst that he coasted along, seeking to disorder them with his Cannon, being forced to march by the sea side, by reason of the mountains. Moncade falls into the rearward with some of the chiefe Captaines to endure the shocke. They charge him, and put his troops in rout, and he, with all them that did accompany him, are taken prisoners. The Marquis takes two gallies, and pursuing his victory, finds the Admirall of Genoua in the road: he forceth her to yeeld, and makes a great booty of artillery, munition, and other riches. And if his forces had bene sufficient to assaile Genoua suddenly by land, as well by sea, considering the feare which had seized vpon the City, it had bene in danger to haue bene lost for the Emperour.

On the other side, Anthony of Creguy Lord of Pontdormy, parting from Monstrueil, at such time as the King lay encamped before Pavia, to put victuals into Therouenne, and to try if he could force Neufosse (which was a great trench full of water, that shut vp the valley of Cassel, from Saint Omer vnto Aire, furnished with bulwarke at euery entry with artillery, and well manned, to guard the entries and passages of the said valley, whither they retired all their goods and cattell) he came to Fauquemberg with three hundred men at armes, some twelve hundred foot, and two Culterins. And after the men at armes had fed their horses, hauing put the victuals they had brought into Therouenne, he parred for the execution of his enterprise: and comming to Neufosse before day, hee forced the passage, carrying away an inestimable prey: & passing in his retreat neere to Arques, halfe a league from Saint Omer, he ouerthrew the Garison of the said Saint Omer, which issued forth to succour the valley. In this charge Eshree tooke Licques, Lieutenant to the Duke of Alfort, who the same day had married his mistress, to whom Eshree was likewise a seruant: but with a courtisie neuer enough to be praised, at the request of the new bride, he sent backe his prisoner. Those of Aire and Betune likewise came posting, to the number of eight or nine hundred naturall Spaniards, five or six hundred Wallons, and three hundred horse of their Ordnaunces, and ioyned with the troops of Saint Omer, to stop or hinder the retreat of the French. Pontdormy chargeth them, beats backe the horse vpon their Spanish foot, and entring pell-mell, breakes them, slue two hundred and forty, and carried away eight or nine hundred prisoners to Therouenne, all which hee sent backe for a monthes pay, and for hostages retained their Captaines.

A Morecuiet, Fiennes Governour of Flanders, hauing suborned a Souldier of the Garison of Hedin (which had bene taken in the warres) to deliuer him the Castle of Hedin: the souldier aduertised Pontdormy of the meanes he had to deliuer into his hands the said Governour, the duke of Alfort, and most of the Noblemen of the Country. The souldier brings this troop at the day appointed. Pontdormy is there with two hundred men at armes: and couers bals of wild-fire with straw, in a raelin of stone, where the enemy must passe, into the which those that were about the gate should cast fire, when as they should see a sufficient number of the enemies entred. Men encounter their enemies both by fraud and veritie: but fraud is oftentimes farfall to the author.

B Pontdormy hauing his mouth open to speake, the fire was so suddenly cast by him that he had in charge, as entring in at Pontdormy's mouth, it burnt his bowels, whereof he died two dayes after. Canaples his Nephew, had his face likewise so burnt, as there remained no forme thereof: so as their enterprise to charge the enemy behind in this disorder, came to nothing. Four score or an hundred Bourguignons being entred within the Raelin were burnt: the rest saved themselves in this amazement, and many were lost in the wood vpon their retreat. But all were not sufficient to repaire the losse of that worthy and valiant man of warre.

The siege of Pavia was continued, when as the Duke of Bourbon bringing five hundred men at armes Bourguignons, and six thousand Lanquenets, the Imperials resolute to succour Pavia, and to that end part from Laude the 25 of Ianuary. The Imperials approach assured the King he should haue battell; and to prouide for it, hee had caused Tremouille, whom he had appointed Governour of Milan to come vnto him, leaving Theodore Triunles with Chandieu within Milan. Iohn de Medici with three hundred light-horse, and three thousand foot, was newly come into the Kings pay, and had wonne him many Italian Captaines: amongst which, Guy and Francis Earles of Rangon, and Iohn Lewis Palauisn, brother to him whom Lantrec had beheaded at Milan. Tremouille, the Marshalls of Fois and Chabannes, with other Captains of great experience, aduised the King to retire his army from before Pavia, and to encamp in some strong place, whereof there are many in that Country, by reason of the Channels which ouer-flow the meadows. They gaue him to vnderstand, that the enemies army being vnfurnished of money, they should be forced within few dayes to breake, and to put their companies into Garison. That the strangers for want of payment of their money, would make some dangerous mutinie. That the enemies did not maintaine themselves together, but with hope to giue battell: and if they did see the warre prolonged, they would be engaged in many difficulties and confusions. To conclude, it was (say they) exceeding dangerous, to thrust betwixt a Towne defended by five thousand men, and an army that came to succour it, being mighty in numbers of men, in valour and experience.

But all this was to cast oyle into a fire which already flamed. The King will not leaue the siege, and yet will he keepe the enemy from entring into Pavia. He referred (saith the Originall) the government of the army to the Admirall: hee beleueed his counsel, and gave care to Anne of Montmorency, and Philip Chaubot Lord of Brion, men pleasing vnto him, but not yet of any great experience in matters of war. Morecuiet, he had not that number of men in his army, as they gaue him to vnderstand. The Duke of Albany had led away part of his horse: some remained for the guard of Milan, many were dispersed into townes and villages about. There were but eight hundred Lances in the Campe: and the negligence of his Officers, with the deceit of his Captaines, especially the Italians, abused him, nor furnishing the number of footmen, for the which they receiued pay. But howloever, hee must needs fight. Behold pitifull first-fruits, fore-runners of a generall ouerthrow.

F Two thousand Vallaisans lodged at Saint Sauueur, betwixt S. Landfranc and Pavia. They had fore-runners of an ouerthrow. Within charge them suddenly, and disperse them. Pyrrhus brother to Frederick of Bosiole, held the Castle of Saint Angelo with two hundred horse, and eight hundred foot. This place lying betwixt Laude and Pavia, stooped the victuals which might be brought from Laude. Ferdinand of Aualo approacheth with his Spaniards, takes away the defences, and forceth the garison to yeeld, that Pyrrhus, Antilus Cauriane, and the three sonnes of Phabus Gonzaga remaining prisoners, all the rest should depart without armes or horses, and for a month should beare no armes against the Emperour. Belioyuse, and then all the

the other places which lay behind them, except S. Colombain, which they had besieged & as no man could issue forth, came into the power of the Imperials.

Moreover, the King caused two thousand Italians to come of those which had maintained the siege of Marfelles. Passing the confines of Alexandria, neere to the river of Vibé, wearied and toyled with the tediousness of the way, Gaspard Maine Captaine of Alexandria, chargeth them suddenly, breaks them, and chaſeth them into Chastellat, and there forceth them to yeeld with ſeuentene Enſignes. The like ſucceſſe had John Lewis Paluſſin. The King had ſent him to ſurpriſe Cremona, which was guarded onely by five or fix hundred foot. Sforza advertiſed that he lodged at Caſſal the great, with foure hundred horſe, and two thouſand foot, ſent Alexander Bentiuole with ſome number of horſe, and two thouſand foot, ſuddenly leaued, to Cremona. Too great confidence doth no leſſe prejudice men then feare. Paluſſin (holding himſelfe ſtrong enough without attending of Francis of Rangon, who came to ioyne with him with three or foure thouſand men) abandons his fort to fight with them, marcheth directly to the enemy, and at the firſt puts Sforzas horſemen to flight: but Bentiuole coming with his footmē, John Lewis was overthrowne in the middeſt of the comba, taken priſoner, and all his men put to rout, which was a great prejudice to the Kings affaires. Behold another diſgrace of no leſſe importance.

John Iaques of Medicis, a Milanois, Captaine of the Caſtle of Muſ, had intelligence, that the Captaine of Chiauenne, a Caſtle vpon the Lake of Como, belonging to the Grifons, hauing no enemy neere to annoy him, went daily to walke without his Fort (the taking of this place was a fit meane to diuert ſix thouſand Grifons, newly come vnto the Kings Camp) John Iaques lying one night in ambuſh cloſe to the Caſtle, failed not of his prey, but holding this inſufficient Captaine, he brought him before the gate, with a dagger at his throat ready to ſtab him, if his wife had not let downe the bridge. The gate being open, three hundred men iſſue forth of another ambuſh, ſeize vpon the Caſtle, and ſo on the Towne. The Grifons ſuppoſing that Medici had other enterpriſes vpon their places, call home their men, who notwithstanding the ſhame they ſhould purchaſe in forſaking (vpon the point of a battell) a Prince, whoſe pay they had receiued, and to whom they had giuen an oath, returned five dayes before the fight. All theſe difficulties chancing one vpon another, were infallible fore-runners of ſome great diſaſter: which when hee ſees come, he ought carefully to provide for the preſeruation of his Eſtate, or with a firme and conſtant reſolution, try the hazard of a battell. A Commander may lawfully try this laſt remedy: but a King muſt uſe the other.

The two armies approached within halfe a mile: the fore-ward led by the Marſhall of Chabannes, lodged with the Suiſſes at Ronces, in the Suburbs neere to Saint Iuſtins gate: the King at the Monafteries of Saint Paul and Saint James, places of aduantage, neere vnto Paui: the Duke of Alençon at Mirabel with the rereward, ſo as holding Paui girt in of all ſides, the Imperials could not enter, vneſſe they diſſe the River of Tefin or the Parke of Paui. The Imperials lodged at Prati towards Saint Iuſtins gate, and extended vnto Treluere and La Morre, and in a wood by Saint Lazare, ſo neere as they did greatly endamage one another with their Cannon, being diuided onely by a little brooke, which they call Vernicule. The lodging of both armies had in front on their wings, and on the left ſhancke, great rampiers enuironed with trenches, and fortified with baſtions. But the Imperials had this aduantage, being approached ſo neere vnto Paui, as in a day of battell they might be aſſailed by them within the towne. In the meane time Anthony de Leus did greatly annoy our men by continual ſallies, and in many ſkirmiſhes had moſt commonly the better.

The 17 of February, John de Medicis was reuenged of a diſgrace which his troops had receiued by a former ſally, laid a bait for them of the towne, ſeconded with a double ambuſh, the one in the trenches neere vnto the towne, the other farther off. The Spaniards drawne on by their former victories, purſuing them which had charged, they diſcouer the fartheſt ambuſh, and beganne to retire, when as the neerer cutting off their way, puts them all the ſword. But this ſmall victory did greatly prejudice the generall. John de Medicis had the bone of his heele broken with a ſhot, and was caried into Placentia. His troops were ſo diſperſed after his hurt, as the army was diminished about two thouſand, and his abſence did coole his ſouldiers courage and heat in ſkirmiſhes and aſſaults: for he

A was a great ſouldier, and the good ſucceſſe of a battell doth partly depend vpon the preſence of ſuch perſonages.

The Imperials had no more meanes to maintain themſelues within their Fort, want of money had ſoone driuen them forth: yet they conſidered that by their retreat, Paui would be loſt, and they were out of hope to preferue the reſt, which remained in the Duchy of Milan. To aſſaile the French within their lodging, were a dangerous and vaine attempt. Alſo the enemies reſolution was not to giue battell, vneſſe ſome aduantage were offered them, but onely to retire their men that were within Paui, and to man it with freſh troopes, the which they could not do without paſſing in view of the French Campe.

B They therefore prepare themſelues to two effects, either to execute their deſigne, or to fight if the King iſſuing out of his fort would ſtop their paſſage.

The night before S. Matthias day, the 25 of February, the day of the Emperor Charles ^{Battell of Paui} his Natiuity, they diſquiet and tire our men with many falſe alarms, and make two ſquadrons of horſe, and foure of foot. The firſt vnder the command of the Marquis of Guſt, conſiſting of ſix thouſand Lanſquenets, Spaniards, and Italians. The ſecond vnder the Marquis of Peſcara. The third and fourth of Lanſquenets, led by the Viceroy and Duke of Bourbon. They come to the Parke wall, caſt downe about threeſcore ſadome, enter within it, and take the way to Mirabel, leaving the Kings armie vpon their left hand.

The artillery planted in a place of aduantage, doth much endamage their battalions, C and forceth them to run into the valley for ſhelter. Here impatient transports the King. He ſees the enemy diſordered, and thinks they are amazed: moreover, hee had intelligence, that the Duke of Alençon had defeated ſome Spaniards that would haue paſſed on the right hand, and had taken from them foure or ſiue Cannons. Thus the King, loſing his aduantage, ſeekes his enemies, and paſſing before his owne Cannon, hinders their execution. The Imperials deſired nothing more, then to haue the King out of his fort, and to be couered from his artillery. They now turn head againſt him which was directed to Mirabel. The King (ſupported with a battalion of his Suiſſes, being his chiefe ſtrength) marched directly againſt the Marquis of Saint Ange, who led the firſt of the horſemen, overthrowes them, kills many, and the Marquis himſelfe. But, oh villany! The Suiſſes D inſtead of charging a Battalion of the Emperors Lanſquenets, which did ſecond their men at armes they whele about, and goe to ſaue themſelues at Milan. The Marquis of Peſcara came to charge the King with his battalions; Francis brother to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Norfolk, who led about ſiue thouſand Lanſquenets, marched reſolutely againſt him, but they are ſuddenly inuironed with two great battalions of Germans, defeated and cut in peeces: the Suiſſes thus retired, the Lanſquenets loſt the whole burthen of the battell lay vpon the King, ſo as in the end, being hurt in the leg, face, and hand, his horſe ſlaine vnder him, charged on all ſides, defending himſelfe vnto the laſt gaspe, he yeeded vnto the Viceroy of Naples, who kiſſing his hand with great reuerence, receiued him as priſonour to the Emperor.

E At the ſame inſtant the Marquis of Guſt had defeated the horſe that were at Mirabel, and Anthony de Leus iſſuing out of Paui, charged our men behinde. Thus (ſeeing the pitifull eſtate of the Kings perſon) all giue way, all ſecke to ſaue themſelues by flight. The Duke of Alençon ſeeing no hope of recouerie, preferres the rereward in a manner whole, and paſſeth che riuier of Tefin. The Varr-guard (for a time) maintained the fight, but in the end it ſhrunk by the death of the Marſhall of Chabannes. This day deprived vs of a great number of the chiefeſt Noblemen of France, among the which the Marſhall of Chabannes and Foix, the Admiral of Bonniuet, Lewis of Tremouille, about threeſcore and fiftene yeares old, (a worthy bed for ſo valiant a Nobleman, whoſe counſell deſerued to be followed) Galas of Saint Seurin Maſter of the horſe, Francis of Lorraine, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earle of Tonnerre, Chamont ſonne to the great Maſter of Amboiſe, Buſſy of Amboiſe, the Baron of Buzancois, Beaupreau Marſin the chiefe Quirre of the Kings Stable, and about 8000 men. The Baſtard of Sauoy, Lord Steward of France died of his wounds, being priſoner. There were taken Henry K. of Nauarre, the Earle of S. Paul, Lewis of Neuars, Fleuranges ſonne to Robert de La Marke, the Marſhall of Monmorancy, Lanal, Brion, Lorges, La Rochepot, Monteſau, Annebaſt, Imbercourt, Frederick of Boſſole, La Roche du Maine, La Maileray, Montpeſat, Buſſy, Cuſton, Lancey, and many others. Of the enemy there died about 700, few men of marke beſides the Marquis of Saint Ange.

Triumlee

The King of England's alliance to the French King being a prisonner.

The Emperors unreasonable demands.

The Kings reasonable offers.

Triandus, and Chandion, who remained at Milan, aduertised of the ruine of their Armie, returned with their men into France, so as the very day of the Battaille, all the Duchie of Milan was freed from the French Forces. The next day the King was led to the Castle of Piqueton, vnder the guard of Capitaine Alarcon, alwaies intreated according to the dignity of a royall person, but so far-forth as the quality of a prisoner would permit. The Duke of Albanie was farre engaged in the realme of Naples, and all passages by land were by this disgrace stoppt. To draw him out of danger, the Regent, Mother to the King, giuing order for the affaires of the Realme, sent Andrew Doria General of the Kings Gallies vnto him, with La Fayette the Viceadmirall being at Marfeilles: who (without any losse of men, but of some scoutes, chased by the Colonois euen to the very gates of Rome) returned safely into France. The estate seemed now neare a shipwracke, as well by the imprisonment of the head, as by the death of many worthy personages, who might haue serued greatly in the preservation thereof. But God by many corrections would often chastise France, but neuer ruine it. And now touching the King of England (who was then ready to imbarke for Calais) he suddenly changeth his hatred into loue, so as growing ialous of the Emperours exceeding greatnesse, the Regent, hauing intreated him by Iohn Iachin a Geneuois, her Ambassador, to giue care to some middle treaty, rather then to invade the Estate of a captiue Prince: hee promisseth all succours both of men and money for the Kings deliuey, and without any demand of restitution for his charges he dismisseth his armie.

In the meane time, the Emperour aduiseeth in Councell, what course hee should hold with the King. The Bishop of Osmie, the Emperours Confessor, is commended to haue aduised him to shew a brotherly loue, and to let him free, referring this notable victory to the expresse will of God: shewing that the chiefe vse thereof should bee the peace of Christendome, threatned with a total ruine by the Turkish armies, whereof wee shall soone see fatal effects. But the aduice of Fredericke Duke of Alba, a man of great authority with the Emperour, was of more force. Hee yielded to the Kings libertie, but with so excessive conditions, as it might haue bene the meanes for Charles to lay the foundation of an absolute Monarchy in Christendome.

According to this aduice, he sent the Earle of Reux, his Lord Steward, to offer the Kings liberty, so as he would resigne all the rights he pretended in Italy: restore the Duchie of Bourgongne, as belonging to him by right, with Prouence and Dauphiné for the Duke of Bourbon, to incorporate them with other lands which he had formerly enioyed, and to make all together a kingdom. Moreover, the Emperour offered to giue him his sister in marriage, propounding many other conditions, so absurd and void of reason, as it is better to let the curious read them in the Originals themselves. Amongst all losses, that of liberty toucheth nearest: but our Francis hauing learned to withstand all aduersity with a constant resolution, I will die (said he) a prisoner, rather then make any breach in my realme for my deliuerance: whereof I neither will nor can alienate any part without the consent of the foueraigne Courts and Officers, in whose hands remains the authority of the whole realme. We prefer the generall good before the private interest of Kings persons. If the Emperour will treat with me, let him demand reasonable things, which are in my power, then shall he finde me ready to ioyne with him, and to fauor his greatnesse. And to redeeme his liberty with honour, and his subiects content, who wonderfully desired his enlargement, he then offered, To marie his said sister, widow to the King of Portugal, and to hold Bourgongne for her dowry, the which should belong to the children that should come of this marriage: to resigne his interest to the Realm of Naples and the Duchy of Milan: to accompany the Emperour with an army both by land and sea, when he should go to Rome to receive the Imperiall Crown. Was not this properly to giue him all Italy in prey? To yeeld vnto the Duke of Bourbon his offices, lands, and mouables confiscated, and the reuenues received by reason of this seizure, and to giue him to wife the Duchesse of Alancón his sister, newly a widow by the death of the Duke of Alancón, in stead of Eleanor, the widow of Portugal, which had bene promised him: to content the King of England with money: and to pay what summes of money should be set down for his ransom.

Hereupon the Earle of S. Paul, hauing corrupted his guards, escaped out of prison, and ioyntly with the Earle of Vaudemont, and the Marquis of Salusses, treated by the meanes of

A of Francis Earle of Pontrefme, with certaine Princes and Captaines of Italy, to slay the King from being transported out of the Duchy of Milan, hoping that the Potentates of Italy (feareing lest the Emperour should seeke to supplant them) would seeke his Maiesties deliuey with their common forces. And the Venetians being now aduertised of the reconciliation of the English with the King, retired themselves from their league with the Emperour. But the Viceroy discouering these practices, gaue the King to vnderstand, that he had commandement from the Emperour to passe him into Spaine, that being there, their maiesties by a gracious and fauourable enteruie, would easily conclude a peace, which should cause his liberty. So the King vnderstanding that the Duke of Bourbon pursued his marriage in Spaine with Eleanor, yeelded to this passage, hoping hee would rather desire to marie a King of France, then a Prince dis-inherited. They imbarke the seauenth of Iune, and within few daies after (the Emperour hauing commanded, that hee should be receiued, with all the honour that might be, as he passed) they arriue happily in Castile: the King was lodged at Madril, a place of hunting and pleasure, but farre from the Sea, or the confines of France.

The King transported into Castile.

The Emperour would not admit the King to his presence, before the accord were made, or in such termes, as there were no doubt thereof: for the aduancing whereof a truce was concluded vntill the end of December, during the which Catherine the Kings sister, Duchesse of Alancón, came with a large Commission into Castile, to treat with the Emperour. Her arriual was very pleasing and healthfull to the King: who finding him so sicke, as few men hoped for his recovery, she did more reuiue him then all the Physicians art. But hauing found the Emperour (who was come to visit the sicke King) constant in his vnreasonable demands, especially for the restitution of Bourgongne, whereunto the King would not yeeld, but vpon the former condition, or that they might trie it by law, to whom it belonged; and seeing that the King had recovered his former health, shee returned into France leauing with the Emperour, the Archbishop of Ambrun, afterwards Cardinal of Tournon, and Iohn de Selue, chiefe President at Paris, to pursue the treaty begun, bringing with her an ample declaration from the King, whereby (resigning vpon his crowne) he gaue her power to inuest the Dauphin his Son, the King remaining resolute, rather to continue in perpetual prison, then to pass any thing to the prejudice of his realme.

But the Emperour seeing the King constant in this resolution, in the end yeelded to his Maiesties deliuey, whereof we will set downe the most important points: That within six weekes after his deliuey, he should consigne the Duchie of Bourgongne to the Emperour; and with all the dependances, as well of the Duchy, as of the Countie, the which should hereafter be sequestred from the Soueraignty of the realme of France. That at the very instant of his enlargement, they should deliuer into the Emperours hands, the Dauphin, and with him the Duke of Orleans, the Kings second sonne; or twelue of the chiefe Noblemen of France such as the Emperour should name, to remaine as hostages, vntill the restitution of the said lands, and satisfaction of the peace, with all the Articles, by the generall Estates of the realme: and vpon the restoring of the Hostages, they should deliuer vnto the Emperour the Earle of Angoulesme, the Kings third sonne, to be bred vp with him, the better to assure and maintaine the peace. That hee should resigne vnto the Emperour, all his rights pretended to the Estates of Naples, Milan, Genoua, and Aft: That he should quit the Soueraignty of Flanders and Arthois; and should marie Eleanor, sister to the said Emperour, with two hundred thousand crownes dowry, and Jewells fit for her estate; and the Emperour should renounce all his pretensions to any place belonging to the Crowne of France, especially to Peronne, Montdidier, Roye, Bologne, Pontieu, & other Seigneuries, lying on either side the Riuer of Somme. Without doubt these were hard conditions and beyond all the bounds of reason. But the King being a prisoner, guarded, and not his owne man, of what validity could they bee in law? It was therefore in his power to redeeme his Children by money. These be the fruits the Spaniards would gather by his victory, to teach the French not to fall againe into their hands. The iudicious Reader may consider whether they be growne wife by their owne losse.

Then the King and Emperour did visit one another againe, with great demonstrations of loue: they shewed themselves together in publicke places, had often, long, and secret discourses, they went in one Carosse together, to see Queene Eleanor, to whom the King was made sure. But for that in the midst of all these shewes of loue, the King was at no more liberty then before, but more carefully guarded: who would not haue held this A accord to be full of discord, this alliance without loue; and the most part of the articles extorted by force, would bring forth the fruits of their ancient jealousies? A lesson for Princes that be victors, to containe themselves within the limits of reason; for, what-soeuer is forced by violence, is not durable. Some daies were spent in these actions: then the King was conducted to Fontarabie, where exchange was made of his maiesty, with his two sonnes being yet very young. At Bayonne the Ambassadors of Charles demanded the ratification of the treaty which the King should giue at his entry into the realme; but he could not alienate the Bourguignons without their consent, and therefore hee answers, that he will shortly assemble the Estates of the country, to know their mindes. B Let vs see then what followed, and begin somewhat higher.

After they had transported the King into Castile, Francis Sforza fearing lest the Emperor should retaine the Duchy of Milan to himselfe, together with the excessive summe of twelue hundred thousand Ducats, which he demanded for the expences hee had made in the conquest, and defence of the said estate; considering also, that part of the Spaniards were gone into Spaine with the Vice-roy, part were with the Duke of Bourbon, many laden with spoile were retired into diuers places; and the Marquis of Pescara was in bad termes with the Viceroy: he perswaded himselfe, that the rest of the troops might be easily overcome, if the Marquis would giue his consent. Sforza therefore by the aduice of Jerome Moron his Chancellor, did sound the Marquis his minde; hee pro- C pounded vnto him to cut in pieces those companies which remained within the Estate of Milan, and to make him King of Naples, if the Pope and the Venetians would agree. A sufficient spur to prick forward an ambitious man. The Pope did not dislike it, the Venetians shewed themselves most affectionate, all ioyntly doe malice the greatnesse of Charles. The Marquis at the first gaue care vnto them, but hauing discovered the whole practice to the Emperor, and growing suspect vnto the rest, hauing accepted the Lieutenancy of Lombardy of the Emperor, hee publicly put in execution what hee had in charge, to prevent these imminent dangers, as he should thinke most fit. And first hee seized vpon Moron (whom he made to confesse all the conspiracy, charging Duke Sforza, as culpable and consenting to all that had passed) he made him to resigne vnto him Cre- D mona, Tressle, Lecque, and Piqueton, the Keies of the Duchy of Milan, hee forced the Milanois to take the oath of fealty vnto the Emperor, and Sforza to shut himselfe into the Castle of Milan. But when as the Marquis had reduced him to all extremities, death takes him away before he could enjoy the fruits of his malice. The Duke of Bourbon did succeed after him.

The Marquis of Pescara dies.

A league against the Emperour.

There was great likelihood, that the Emperor being in quiet possession of the estate of Milan, all the rest, especially the Pope (lying betwixt Lombardy & the realme of Naples) would remaine in prey. To prevent Charles his attempts (who made shew to inuett the D. of Bourbon in the Duchy of Milan, if Sforza were found guilty of the crime, whereof they accused him) a league was made at Cognac, betwixt the Pope, the Kings of France E and England, the Venetians, Florentines, and Swisses, for the common liberty of Italy, and the restoring of Francis Sforza to the Duchy of Milan, being besieged as we haue said.

This league was signified by the King to the Viceroy of Naples, to the Duke of Traieto, and to Alarcon, whom the Emperor had sent, to be fully satisfied of the Kings in- tent, who, excusing himselfe that he could not performe his promise for the alienation of Bourgonne, as very preiudiciall to the Crowne; hee offered to accomplish all the rest, and for the ransom of his children to pay two Millions of crownes. According to this treaty, the Pope sends to field eight hundred men at armes, seven hundred light horse, and eight thousand foot, vnder the charge of Gni Earle of Rangon, and Iohn de Medicis. Co- lonell of the Italian foot. The Venetians sent eight hundred men at armes, a thousand F light horse, & eight thousand foot, commanded by Francis Maria D. of Vrbin. Laude was the first object of their armes, the which by the intelligence of Lodowike Vislarin, a Gentleman of that town, they surpris'd from 1500 Neopolitans, whom the Marquis of Guast & Anthony de Lena had lodged there, vnder the charge & command of Fabricio Maraman.

These happy beginnings should haue made the heads of the league to haue proceeded in their course speedily, and valiantly. By the taking of Laude the way was open euen to the Gates of Milan: the enemy had no more meanes to succour Cremona, and if they

A they had speedily aduanced towards Milan, they had found them in great perplexity and confusion: the Citizens oppressed by the tyrannicall yage of the Spaniards, breathed nothing but rebellion; but the Duke of Vrbin, terrified with the very name of Spaniards, marching slowly like an Abbot, and staying a whole day in euery lodging, to attend the Swisses, without which he thought it dangerous to approach neere Milan, by his slow and faint proceeding, he caused an irreparable losse and blemish to his owne reputation, and to his masters! For hauing by his long delays, giuen the Duke of Bourbon leasure to en- ter into Milan, with eight hundred Spaniards, before the Army of the league could ap- B proach, the souldiers of Milan resumed courage, charged the Artillery in the night, and B terrified the Duke, as he presently retired his Army, desiring rather, said he, to repaire the forepassed error, then to persist in it, seeing they had approached so neere Milan, contrary to his opinion, where expecting no resistance he knew that a longer aboad would wholly ruine the league. He trembled for feare at the report of the Spanish forces, and yet would make shew as though he had to deale with men made of snow, who without striking stroake would suffer him to reape the fruits of his pretended victory. So the Duke retired to Marignan, being resolute, not to dislodge vntill he were fortified with twelue thousand Swisses: without doubt a hundred thousand men cannot assure a fearful minde. It was a foule error, at the beginning of a long and dangerous voyage. The Im- perials freed from this army, repaired the Rampiers and Bulwarks of the Suburbs, dis- armed the people, thrust forth such as were suspect, and lodged the Souldiers in the Ci- zens houses: who insulung ouer their hostes, as in a towne of conquest, forced them to furnish victuals, cloaths, and money, abused their wiues and daughters, compelled ser- uants to discover their masters wealth being hidden; to conclude, they practised all acts of inhumanity, which licentiousnes doth commonly breed in this nation being a conqueror.

Being thus oppressed, they repaire to the Duke of Bourbon, being newly arriued, and with pittifull complaints, teares, and lamentations, they beseech him to ease their miseries. The Duke (after he had imputed the causes of these insolencies to the want of pay for the army) promised to lodge them else-where, so as they would prouide thirty thousand crownes, for the entertainment of one moneth: and the better to countenance his pro- D mise, he wished, In case that euer any extortion were committed, that he might be slain with a Harquebuse, at the first enterprize he should be at. A prayer which wee shall soone see take effect. The money was gathered, but the people finding no fruits of his promise, the pitifull estate of the multitude being spoiled, nothing mollifying the cruell insoleny of these barbarous souldiers, many not knowing to whom to haue recourse, cast themselves head-long from the tops of their houses, many hanged themselves, many ended both their liues and miseries, by other horrible and strange kinds of voluntary torments.

Francis Sforza was at this instant ready to yeeld vp the Castle, when as the confede- rates, fortified with five thousand Swisses, newly arriued, drew the Duke of Vrbin a se- cond time before Milan: but this was to make a second discovery of his indiscretion and E cowardise, for being still ready to number his souldiers, possessed with a strange feare, and seeking rather meanes to flie then to fight, Sforza, prest by famine and want of courage in the Duke of Vrbin, yeelded vp the Castle of Milan, to the Duke of Bourbon, the 24 of Iuly, and retired himselfe to the confederates, who put Laude into his hands. Then the Kings army arriued, lead by Michael Anthonie Marquis of Saluces, consisting of foure hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, and foure thousand Gascons; and within few daies after, the twelue thousand Swisses, leauied in the Kings name, encouraged the Duke of Vrbin to returne towards Milan, where leauing part of his men at Armes, the Popes troops, and the forelaid Swisses, he went with the Venetian foot to fortifie Ma- lase Baillon, who with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and eight F thousand foot, besieged Cremona, and so prest it, as they yeelded by composition, the which was likewise deliuered vnto Sforza.

Euery one hath his tunc, saith the Prouerbe: the Pope had bene the principall au- thor of the Kings sending the Duke of Albany into the estate of Naples, and now he sollicitis his confederates againe to inuade the realme, supposing things could not succeed happily if the Emperor were no where else encountered, but in the Duchy of Milan. But whilst he seeks to fire and burne his neighbours house, it falls vpon his owne head. Ill counsell is commonly dangerous to the giuer. All these warres had bene plotted in the
